"How shall I tell Raymond, when he comes home?" was the thought which now occupied poor Mildred's mind, whenever it was not dwelling upon her lost Millie's fate. "How shall I find words to let him know that we are desolate, nay, worse than desolate, for that is what we say when Death has snatched our darlings only to give them to God!"

The agony of the mother was the more insupportable, since she was forced to remain inactive—since nothing could be done, save what already had been done. She could not take coach to Cliffe, and cry to the wolfish woman there:

"You have stolen my lamb."

Well convinced as she was that such was the case, she had not a particle of proof to support the accusation. It was useless to inform the police of the true state of the case, since that would enable them to take no further steps at present. When the actual stealer of the child should be tracked and secured, then, indeed, some blow might be struck at her who had set him on. But, at present, there was nothing for it but to wait and weep. Perhaps, when Raymond came, he might suggest some course of action, and yet the terror of having to tell him, "Our Milly is stolen," so weighed down her soul, that she scarce wished him back. It would have almost been a relief to her, in her lonely anguish, if he had sent a messenger from Marmouth to say: "My business keeps me here awhile." In the interim, perhaps, the robber might be captured, the child restored; or Aunt Grace herself might relent. No, that was impossible. Even if she could have heard of her niece's agony, of the desolation she had wrought in hearth and heart, of the utter wreck of that humble little household, which she had effected as by the lightning's stroke, no touch of pity would have moved her; of that Mildred was sure as of her loss itself. Hope she felt still; on which, indeed, alone she fed, through which alone she lived, and did not wither suddenly, like a flower beneath the pall of the first snow—but not in her aunt's mercy. No, it was the thought of that hard, vengeful woman, which, more than all, made her dread her husband's coming. But when Raymond did not come, nor any messenger to tell her wherefore, and the third evening of his absence was thickening into night, then she began to feel that the uttermost depths of wretchedness had not been sounded even yet.

Terrible, indeed, are the weapons which God sometimes uses, or, in His inexplicable wisdom, suffers to be used against His creatures for their good. Inexhaustible is the armory of His tremendous will. "The Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away, blessed be His name," is a wise saying; but let no human mourner venture to add—He can now take away no more; He has done His worst, or what seems to be His worst, when in truth all is good.

The arrows of His wrath have darkened our sun, but the night of our sorrow has still, perhaps, some moon of comfort. What, then, if the flight of His chastening darts continue yet, and darken it also, until all indeed is night! The shield of Resignation is sometimes raised in vain—or what seems in vain, to our poor, impatient, ignorant, fretful spirit, with its "How long, how long?"—and, smitten through and through, we lie prostrate in the dust, and still are smitten. Then, what was sorrow before becomes almost joy by contrast with the more dismal present, as one who, from inner gloom, looks forth on some late-traversed dusky way, and wonders how, with those glimmering stars above it, it ever could have seemed so dark.

Thus, no sooner did the shadow of her coming widowhood begin to steal over poor child-bereft Mildred, than all her former woe seemed almost light; she no longer feared her husband's arrival, but waited for it eagerly, and at first hopefully; then yearned for it as never bride longed for bridegroom; then prayed for it, as for some blessed boon, almost beyond the power of Heaven to grant; and still her husband came not. Mildred had heard from Mrs. Carey of the frightful fate of the man Stevens; of how one of the Sandby fishermen had gone to the Mermaid's Cave for crabs at the next low tide, and found the drowned man still imprisoned, like another Milo, by the pitiless stone, with his wrist half cut through, and the knife still clasped in his other hand. Directly she heard the news, a shudder had run through her frame, not upon his account alone who had thus perished, but because she also seemed to see a retribution in it, for some crime at present undivulged—the finger of the Avenger pointing to another fatal catastrophe, in which Raymond's own life might be involved. And when, after a little, news arrived that he had never reached Marmouth, never got to the end of the journey begun with his dread companion, then, indeed—her husband murdered and her helpless child in the power of her bitterest foe—it seemed that there was no new sorrow, as no joy, left in the world for Mildred. In vain Mrs. Carey besought her to leave her own desolate home and remove to "Lucky Bay," out of reach of further hurt.

"No," answered she, with bitterness, "lest my slain Raymond's spirit, wandering hither, should seek for me in vain; or lest, when Grace deems it time to smite, that of my murdered Millie should return, and wail for me about the desolate home, which is the only one she knew. While, as to further hurt, my friend," continued she, "I would thank this aunt of mine to send and slay me, as the most welcome revenge she can take."

If friendship and genuine sympathy could have mitigated such woes as Mildred's, there were many who would have gladly helped to bear them. Coast-guard and smugglers, for the first time, united in a common object—in striving to bring her comfort. If the stealer of her child had fallen into the hands of either party, it would have gone hard with him, indeed. The lieutenant was quite a changed man; all merriment and good-nature had left his eyes. Like a knight-errant under a vow of vengeance, who abjures feast and tourney, and even puts in abeyance his fealty to his own sovereign lady, so did Lieutenant Carey forsake pipe and glass, and even his duty to his fair mistress, the Revenue, and scoured the country night and day, and by land and sea, in Mrs. Hepburn's cause. Every yard of cliff, and particularly the Beacon Cliff, about which suspicions had been excited by Stevens's behavior in the cutter, was examined by his own eyes, from his own boat. Every foot of ground traversed by Raymond along the down-land on that fatal day was gone over with the carefulness of a sleuth-hound. His men, too, whose hearts had been won by Raymond's generosity and friendly bearing, worked in the same cause with a will. Nor, as I have said, were the free-traders backward in showing their sympathy for the widowed and childless lady, although they evinced it in a very strange manner.

They would not permit the body of Stevens to lie by the side of their own dead in the little churchyard. In vain were they told that they had no right to charge the poor wretch with a crime which it was not even proved had been committed at all. In vain was the drowned man interred with all decency by clergyman and clerk. They dug him up, again and again, and cast his dishonored limbs upon the wayside stones, until it was found necessary to remove them to a distant locality. Walter Dickson, whose boat had visited the Beacon Cliffs so immediately after Stevens had exhibited such an inexplicable dread of them, had come up himself to Pampas Cottage, and assured poor Mildred, with a profusion of the strongest expressions in his vocabulary, that it was out of possibility that any person could have been pushed over the cliff in that part, without leaving, to a practiced eye like his (to which, moreover, the place was known as well as the palm of his own hand), some traces of his fall. The evident desire of the man to give some comfort, so moved Mrs. Carey, who was present, that she rose up and shook both the freetrader's hands. "But you see it is no use, my man," she whispered, pointing to Mildred's hopeless face; "and even if you could give her hope, it would be a mistaken kindness. Nevertheless, I owe you a good turn for this, Walter Dickson, and will repay it you, if it should ever be in my power."

"Bless your kind, honest face," returned the smuggler, with a curious sort of struggle in his own weather-beaten features. "If ever a coast-guardsman does go to heaven, it will be your husband, who has got an angel for his wife, to show him the way. Perhaps it is as you say, and nothing as I can tell this poor lady can do her good; but if she was to take the good Book to my old woman this evening, as she has often done afore, who is down and abed with the rheumatics, and nothing to think upon except the boys we lost at sea, older than this poor child (whom, please God, we shall see again), and, therefore, worse to part with, she might, maybe, forget for a little this sad trouble of her own in —— There, if she ain't gone to put on her bonnet and shawl already! We won't keep her from your company—that is, my old woman won't—not half an hour. She'll read, it is likely, just a chapter out of Job—something as teaches folk to put up with everything; although Job, I warrant—and saving your presence, Mrs. Carey—never knew what it was to be troubled with the Excise."

Whether it was the act of a good Catholic to read the sacred volume in the vulgar tongue to a female heretic, deservedly suffering from the rheumatics, was a question with which, I fear, Mildred Clifford did not concern herself, although she was, probably, the first of her name who had ever committed mortal sin in that particular. Perhaps the Church forgave her, in consideration of her ignorance and her good intentions; but, certainly, upon her return—which did not take place nearly so soon as Mr. Walter Dickson had specified—she did not present the appearance of one who had incurred grave spiritual penalties. On the contrary, the consolation which she had administered she also seemed to have partaken of, and that so largely that Mrs. Carey could not restrain an ejaculation of joyful surprise. "You have heard some good news, dear Mildred; I am sure you have," exclaimed she, excitedly.

"I have nothing new to tell you, Marion, but only the corroboration of something you said the other day, but which I, Heaven forgive me! was too hard of heart to acknowledge. You told me then that God was never thanked in vain. Within these few minutes I have found, my friend, that that is a true saying; but please do not ask me any questions."

SEA-BIRDS.—The question is often asked, Where do sea-birds obtain fresh water to slake their thirst? but we have never seen it satisfactorily answered till a few days ago. An old skipper, with whom we were conversing on the subject, said that he had frequently seen these birds at sea, far from any land that could furnish them with water, hovering round and under a storm-cloud, chattering like ducks on a hot day at a pond, and drinking in the drops of rain as they fell. They will smell a rain-squall a hundred miles, or even further off, and scud for it with almost inconceivable swiftness. How long sea-birds can exist without water is only a matter of conjecture; but probably their powers of enduring thirst are increased by habit, and, possibly, they can go without it for many days, if not for several weeks.

HOW AN ILLUSTRATED PAPER IS MADE.

(From the Evening Post.)

AMONG the marvelous developments of American skill and enterprise during the past decade, none has been more notable than that exemplified in the history and growth of illustrated papers and periodicals. Among the enterprises of this nature we have chosen to-day to allude especially to that which has grown into mammoth proportions under the sole direction of Mr. Frank Leslie, whose various publications are known throughout the land. Their readers will be interested to know how the great events and minor incidents of the past war have been made familiar and real to them, and now, in these peace times, all remarkable occurrences, distinguished or notorious personages and notable places, are so promptly and vividly portrayed for them.

For this purpose we have recently visited the large establishment which has subsidized so much and such a variety of talent, and which in itself is such an illustration of American enterprise. Commencing at the private office of Mr. Leslie, we are shown specimens of the pictorial papers of ten or twelve years ago, when—with excellent plates—the processes of printing were crude and defective compared with those at present in use. Mr. Leslie, it should be said, has been a pioneer in the business, and has been among the foremost in introducing the various improvements which have been made in it.

After examining the successive improvements made by Mr. Leslie, as shown by his files, we took a look at the sketches from which the cuts are engraved. These were from all parts of the country, some from well-known artists, and many by amateurs of more than ordinary skill.

During the war more than fifteen artists were continuously employed, whose sketches were received regularly every morning, Five hundred of these sketches were presented by Mr. Leslie to the Sanitary Fair.

Passing to the department where the engravers work, we first noticed the manner in which the blocks were engraved. Formerly a single block of wood was used; but this was a slow process, and entirely unsuited for the demands of a pictorial that would represent current events promptly. Instead of this, several small blocks are now skillfully joined together, upon which the drawing is made. They are then taken apart and each piece is given to a different engraver. We saw one block made of thirty-six pieces, and which cost $130. The wood is procured from Philadelphia.

Besides the large number of artists whose sketches are occasionally received, Mr. Leslie employs regularly over forty engravers and twelve artists to put the sketches on the blocks. His weekly bill for engraving alone amounts to over two thousand dollars. His establishment has, in fact, been a sort of school for artists. Many who have now a national reputation were once employed by him in subordinate situations.

There are some now in the establishment who have gradually risen from humble positions to occupy the first and best paid places. The sketches of some of these, published in the Chimney Corner, show a great degree of perfection.

After the drawings are finished they are taken to the superintendent of this department, who decides which shall be engraved in the establishment. At first the rejected ones were very numerous, as there were but a few good artists in the city. Now, however, the establishment of Mr. Leslie alone has at its service a large corps of able artists. The excellence of their work is not fully realized by the public, however, as the present exorbitant prices of paper preclude the use of the quality Mr. Leslie would desire to have for his publications. One secret of his success in securing subordinates is due to the fact that he makes few changes in his establishment. We saw many persons who had been with him for twelve years. He had formerly to give the strictest personal attention to all the details of his business, but by the introduction of numerous improvements, and by the training of competent subordinates, he has in a measure freed himself from this degree of care.

One of the most interesting features of the establishment is the room where photographs are taken on wood. The difficulties to be overcome in doing this were very great, as the boxwood used absorbs like a sponge, and it was seemingly impossible to wash off the silver without warping the wood. There were other equally serious obstacles, which have been all overcome, so that now we have wood-cuts from photographs which are remarkable for their life-like fidelity.

Descending to the press-room, which is unusually large, light and pleasant, we are shown the various kinds of presses used in the printing of Mr. Leslie's numerous publications. These have been all made under his express direction, one of them—just imported from London—having the capacity to print three thousand copies per hour. There are four double and twelve single presses, and forty thousand dollars' worth of paper in this room. In the folding-room is a machine that folds three thousand papers per hour.

One of the greatest difficulties Mr. Leslie had to contend with arose from the fact that he could not procure the right quality of printing ink. At first he tried imported inks, but these failed. He then energetically set to work to manufacture for himself, and was rewarded by success in making an article of the required quality.

In so extensive an establishment, where so many different papers are prepared and published, there must, of course, be the utmost degree of order and system, and this we found in a remarkable degree. In each of the several editorial departments, and in the various business and mechanical departments, we found admirable organization and subdivision of labor, the head of each being responsible for his special work. The amount of business transacted can be estimated when we say that the receipts of the establishment are nearly one million dollars a year. The circulation of Leslie's papers and periodicals is enormous. If they were cut in strips one yard wide—according to his estimate—one issue of them would reach from New York, by way of Philadelphia and Baltimore, to Fredricksburgh, Virginia. Mr. Leslie is the publisher and proprietor of eight illustrated periodicals, viz.: Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner, Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung (German), Frank Leslie's Illustracion Americana (Spanish), Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine, Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours, Frank Leslie's Children's Friend, Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun, together with the following four almanacs: Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac, Frank Leslie's Lady's Almanac, Frank Leslie's Comic Almanac, Frank Leslie's New England Almanac. These are all conducted by one man, who has never had a partner, and has gradually risen from being the possessor of a thousand dollars capital to the exclusive control and ownership of this great publishing establishment, a deserved reward of unfaltering enterprise, skill and good management. Among the publications we have named, the Illustrated News has been the longest and most extensively known, but others bid fair to equal it in popularity. The Chimney Corner, especially, has been a great success. On the thirty-ninth week of its publication it reached the unprecedented circulation of one hundred and sixty thousand copies. The other publications have been also, without exception, very successful.

It has been a mystery to some how Mr. Leslie supplies the great Western demand. He has established a branch house in Chicago, where the Chimney Corner is printed from duplicate plates, under the superintendence of his son, from paper manufactured in that vicinity.

The secret of Mr. Leslie's success may be summed up in a single line—he understands every branch of his business—being at once artist and engraver, and the first who has brought to perfection the art of printing wood-cuts by steam-power in this country.

NATURAL BRIDGE OVER CAYOTE CREEK, CALAVERAS COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

NATURAL BRIDGE IN CALIFORNIA.

NATURE has shown her most sportive moods in the land of gold. Such variety and supplies of minerals, such gigantic trees, such stupendous waterfalls, such sublime scenery, are found in no other part of the world. Verily, it is a land of wonders. On this page we give two illustrations of a remarkable natural bridge over the Cayote Creek, in Calaveras county. Approaching it from the east, along the stream, the entrance beneath presents the appearance of a noble Gothic arch of massive stone-work, thirty-two feet in height above the water, and twenty-five feet in width at the abutments; while the rock and earth above, supported by the arch, are thirty or more feet in thickness, and overgrown to some extent with trees and shrubbery.

Passing under the bridge, the walls extend upward to an almost perfectly-formed and pointed arch, and maintaining their width and elevation, but with here and there an irregularity, serving to heighten the interest of the beautiful scene presented. Along the roof hang innumerable stalactites, like opaque icicles, but solid as the marble of which they are formed. As we advance, the width of the arch increases to forty feet, and its height to fifty feet, and the spacious cave resembles an immense cathedral, with its vaulted arches and numberless columns, with here and there a jutting portion, as though an attempt had been made to rough-hew an altar and corridor, with massive steps; while stalactites, springing from the bottom and sides, appear like waxen candles ready to be lighted. Approaching the lower side of this immense arch, its form becomes materially changed, increasing in width; while the roof, becoming more flattened, is brought down to within five feet of the water of the creek. The entire distance through the vast natural bridge is about three hundred feet.

MESSRS. BLUNT & NICHOLS'S

Nautical Instrument Establishment.

THERE are many places of interest in this city which, making little show or pretension, are passed by without notice, though they contribute largely to the importance of the metropolis. We were forcibly reminded of this fact the other day by a call at the Nautical Instrument Establishment of Messrs. Blunt & Nichols, the salesroom of which we illustrate on this page. It was commenced by Mr. Blunt's grandfather, in 1797, and located in its present position in 1838, where it has grown into one of the largest and most perfect of the kind in the country.

As we entered the large salesroom, we were struck with the variety and perfection of the instruments displayed. Night and field-glasses, of exquisite finish and unerring accuracy, were temptingly arranged in handsome cases, awaiting the inspection of visitors and purchasers; while the array of marine chronometers and fine watches strongly inclined us to turn burglar and become the possessor of an unvarying timepiece. And these are not imported, but manufactured in the establishment, and, in point of beauty and accuracy, are unsurpassed. No "Jurgensen," or "Cooper," or "Tobias" watch can excel those turned out here; while those who pride themselves on encouraging home manufactures can have their wants supplied by Messrs. Blunt & Nichols with an American article that will never fail to give entire satisfaction, for every instrument is inspected by one of the firm, and warranted perfect.

The graduation of instruments was formerly a most difficult process, which could be done only in Europe. To overcome this difficulty, Mr. Blunt constructed a most ingenious and complete dividing engine, the largest in the country, except the one in the United States Coast Survey Office, by which scales and verniers are marked with the nicest accuracy. This machine is automatic, thus avoiding all possibility of mistake.

The firm likewise manufacture every description of astronomical and surveying instruments, together with drafting-tools and everything used by the surveyor. Their marine charts have gained so high a reputation for neatness and accuracy, and are printed with so much care, that they have become as familiar with navigators as household words, and their facilities for furnishing them are unsurpassed. As to the "Coast Pilot" and "Bowditch," comment is unnecessary.

Every instrument and article offered for sale by Messrs. Blunt & Nichols is manufactured in their own establishment and under their direct supervision; and while they maintain the reputation for good workmanship which the house has long enjoyed, by availing themselves of all modern improvements, they are able to meet the demands of the public and to extend their business and fame. As a gratifying evidence of the magnitude of their operations, we may state that they employ about fifty men in the various branches of their manufacture.

THE GALLERY OF A LONDON THEATRE.

A WRITER on London life thus describes his youthful experience at the theatre, when his limited funds would afford him admission only to the gallery:

"When I first entered, I found men and boys lying at full length on the front seats, and displaying the selfishness of human nature in the most violent manner. When, however, the excitement had subsided, and the whole mass had settled down into something like order, a little play was given to more generous feelings. I was invited into a good seat, and offered cakes and mutton pies. The place was intensely hot, but in spite of many discomforts, the gallery folks contrived to get more enjoyment for their sixpences than most of the box visitors did for their half-crowns. The appearance of this motley crew is well depicted in the illustration, and with slight variations, similar scenes are constantly presented in American places of amusement."

UPPER SIDE OF THE NATURAL BRIDGE OVER CAYOTE CREEK, CALAVERAS COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

AN ORISSA BRAHMIN.

THE Brahmin priests of India embrace the highest caste, and consider themselves a superior race of beings. The undisputed exercise of authority, and the respect shown to their official character, have rendered them exceedingly arrogant and bigoted. The illustration shows one of these Brahmins offering his devotion to the sun, which, in India, is an object of worship. Many of these men are well educated, and being fond of disputation, they hold long and able arguments with the missionaries, who have endeavored to teach them the truths of Christianity. As a class, they are superstitious, and generally averse to any changes in their belief and forms of worship, though the influence of European civilization is gradually molding their social and religious system into a modern type.

THE DOG AND THE PIES.

THE almost marvelous extent to which the sagacity of the dog can be cultivated, and the affection he shows to his master, render that animal a universal favorite, and make him the chosen companion of man.

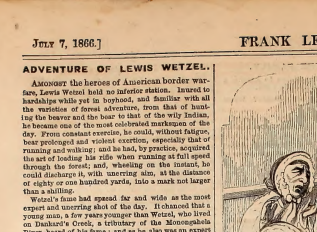
The illustration on the next page, shows the result of careful training, and how the sagacity of the brute was put to practical uses.

The dog was trained by his master to execute various commissions. When he wanted him to go to market, he made certain signs which the dog understood, and immediately set off to bring home whatever was put into the basket intended for his master.

He went on in this manner without accident, when, one evening, as he was returning with some hot pies, two dogs, attracted by the smell of the pastry, attacked the faithful messenger. The dog instantly dropped the basket, and placing himself before it, flew with determined courage at the first that advanced; but, while thus engaged, the other dog ran to the basket, and began to devour the pies. After a moment's hesitation, seeing that it was impossible to preserve the pies for his master, he determined, at least, to have them for himself, and accordingly darted upon them and dispatched all that remained.

A RUSSIAN CAKE-SELLER.

WITH a slight variation of costume, New York could afford almost the exact counterpart of the Russian cake-seller. At the corners of our streets, venders of small wares, and especially of such things as the children like, station themselves to supply the wants and receive the pennies of the passing crowds. And so, the world over, the hope of gain will induce men to follow any calling that promises compensation. Though engaged in an humble pursuit, many of these cake-sellers manage to make a very comfortable livelihood.



The one shown in our picture seems to be a good-natured fellow; just such an one as would please the little folks and dispose of his stock rapidly. Contented with his lot, he wishes his patrons to be satisfied with their purchases, and when one cake is sold, he is ready to offer another to the next comer.

MODERN ROYAL AUTHORS.—At the present moment, authorship seems to be the fashionable pastime of the Courts of Europe. The Crown Prince of Prussia is engaged upon a history of the Electoral Princes of Brandenburg. The ex-King of Greece (Otho of Bavaria) is translating the "Iliad" of Homer; and his father, Louis, ex-King of Bavaria, is at Nice, giving the last touches to a new volume of poems. King John of Saxony has just issued the third and last volume of Dante's "Divina Commedia," translated by himself into German. The literary labors of the Emperor and Empress of the French have been subjects for conversation and criticism for a long time; while it is said that Omar Pasha is busy writing a "Life of Alexander the Great."

ADVENTURE OF LEWIS WETZEL.

AMONGST the heroes of American border warfare, Lewis Wetzel held no inferior station. Inured to hardships while yet in boyhood, and familiar with all the varieties of forest adventure, from that of hunting the beaver and the bear to that of the wily Indian, he became one of the most celebrated marksmen of the day. From constant exercise, he could, without fatigue, bear prolonged and violent exertion, especially that of running and wading; and he had, by practice, acquired the art of loading his rifle when running at full speed through the forest; and, wheeling on the instant, he could discharge it, with unerring aim, at the distance of eighty or one hundred yards, into a mark not larger than a shilling.

Wetzel's fame had spread far and wide as the most expert and unerring shot of the day. It chanced that a young man, a few years younger than Wetzel, who lived on Dunkard's Creek, a tributary of the Monongahela River, heard of his fame; and as he also was an expert woodsman, and a first-rate shot—the best in his settlement—he became very desirous of an opportunity for a trial of skill. So great was his desire, that he one day shouldered his rifle, and whistling his faithful dog to his side, started for the neighborhood of Wetzel, who, at that time, lived on Wheeling Creek, distant about twenty miles from the settlement on Dunkard's Creek. When about halfway on his journey, a fine buck sprang up just before him. He levelled his gun with his usual precision, but the deer, though badly wounded, did not fall dead in his tracks. His faithful dog soon seized him and brought him to the ground; but while in the act of doing this, another dog sprang from the forest upon the same deer, and his master, marking the appearance at the same time from behind a tree, with a loud voice claimed the buck as his property, because he had been wounded by his shot and seized by his dog. It so happened that they had both fired at once at this deer, a fact which may very well happen when two active men are hunting on the same ground, although one may fire at the distance of fifty yards and the other at one hundred. The dogs felt the same spirit of rivalry with their masters, and quitting the deer, which was already dead, fell to worrying and tearing each other. In separating the dogs, the stranger hunter happened to strike that of the young man. The old adage, "strike my dog, strike myself," arose in full force, and without further ceremony, except a few angry words, he fell upon the hunter and hurled him to the ground. This was no sooner done than he found himself turned, and under his stronger and more powerful antagonist. Discovering that he was no match at this play, the young man appealed to the trial by rifles, saying it was too much like dogs for men and hunters to fight in this way. The stranger assented to the trial, but told his antagonist that before he put it fairly to the test, he had better see what he was able to do with the rifle, saying that he was as much superior, he thought, with that weapon as he was in bodily strength. He bade him place a mark, the size of a shilling, on the side of a huge poplar that stood beside them, from which he would start with his rifle unloaded, and running one hundred yards at full speed, he would load it as he ran, and wheeling, would discharge it instantly to the centre of the mark.

The feat was no sooner proposed than performed; the ball entered the centre of the diminutive mark. Astonished at his activity and skill, his antagonist instantly inquired his name. "Lewis Wetzel, at your service," answered the stranger. The young hunter seized him by the hand with all the ardor of youthful admiration, and at once acknowledged his own inferiority. So charmed was he with Wetzel's frankness, skill and fine personal appearance, that he insisted upon his returning with him to the settlement on Dunkard's Creek, that he might exhibit his talents to his own family, and to the hardy backwoodsmen, his neighbors. Nothing loth to such an exhibition, and pleased with the energy of his new acquaintance, Wetzel consented to accompany him, shortening the way with their mutual tales of hunting excursions and hazardous contests with the common enemies of the country. Amongst other things, Wetzel stated his manner of distinguishing the footsteps of a white man from those of an Indian, although covered with moccasins and intermixed with the tracks of savages. He had acquired this last from closely examining the manner of placing the feet; the Indian stepping with his feet in parallel lines, and first bringing the toe to the ground; while the white man almost invariably places his feet at an angle with the line of march. An opportunity they little expected soon gave room to put his skill to the trial. On reaching the young man's home, which they did that day, they found the dwelling a smoking ruin, and all the family lying murdered and scalped, except a young woman who had been brought up in the family, and to whom the young man was ardently attached. She had been taken away alive, as was ascertained by examining the trail of the savages. Wetzel soon discovered that the party consisted of three Indians and a renegade white man—a fact not uncommon in those early days, when, for crime, or the love of revenge, the white outlaw fled to the savages, and was adopted on trial into their tribe.

As it was past the middle of the day, and the nearest ambuscade and from some considerable distance, that there were only four to contend with, they decided on instant pursuit. As the dead had very recently been slain, they hoped to overtake them in their camp that night, and, perhaps, before they could cross the Ohio River, to which the Indians always retreated after a successful incursion, considering them also in a manner safe when they had crossed to the right bank, at that time occupied wholly by the Indian tribes.

Ardent and unwearied was the pursuit by the youthful huntsmen; the one, excited to recover his lost mistress; the other, to assist his new friend and to take revenge for the slaughter of his countrymen—slaughter and revenge being the daily business of the borderers at this period. Wetzel followed the trail with the unerring sagacity of a bloodhound, and just at dusk traced the fugitives to a noted war-path, nearly opposite to the mouth of Captina Creek, emptying into the Ohio, which, much to their disappointment, they found the Indians had crossed, by forming a raft of logs and brush, their usual manner when at a distance from their villages. By examining carefully the appearances on the opposite shore, they soon discovered the fire of the Indian camp in a hollow way, a few yards from the river. Lest the noise of constructing a raft should alarm the Indians and give notice of the pursuit, the two hardy adventurers determined to swim the stream a few rods below. This they easily accomplished, being both of them excellent swimmers. Fastening their clothes and ammunition in a bundle on the top of their heads, with their rifles resting on the left hip, they reached the opposite shore in safety. After carefully examining their arms, and putting every article of attack or defence in its proper place, they crawled very cautiously to a position which gave them a fair view of their enemies, who, thinking themselves safe from pursuit, were carelessly reposing around their fire, thoughtless of the fate that awaited them. They instantly discovered the young woman, apparently unhurt, but making much moaning and lamentation, while the white man was trying to pacify and console her with the promise of kind usage and an adoption into the tribe. The young man, hardly able to restrain his rage, was for firing and rushing instantly upon them. Wetzel, more cautious, told him to wait until daylight appeared, when they could make the attack with a better chance of success, and of also killing the whole party; but if they attacked in the dark, a part of them would certainly escape.

As soon as daylight dawned, the Indians arose and prepared to depart. The young man selecting the white renegade and Wetzel an Indian, they both fired at the same time, each killing his man. The young man rushed forward, knife in hand, to relieve the young woman, while Wetzel loaded his gun and yielded it up to one of the two surviving Indians, who had taken to the woods until they could ascertain the number of their enemies. Wetzel, as soon as he saw that he was discovered, discharged his rifle at random, in order to draw them from their covert. Hearing the report and finding themselves unhurt, the Indians rushed upon him before he could again reload. This was as he wished. Taking to his heels, Wetzel loaded as he ran, and, suddenly wheeling about, discharged his rifle through the body of his nearest, but unsuspecting enemy. The remaining Indian, seeing the fate of his companion and that his enemy's rifle was unloaded, rushed forward with all energy, the prospect of speedy revenge being fairly before him. Wetzel led him on, dodging from tree to tree, until his rifle was again ready, when, suddenly turning, he shot his remaining enemy, who fell dead at his feet. After taking their scalps, Wetzel and his friend, with their rescued captive, returned in safety to the settlement.

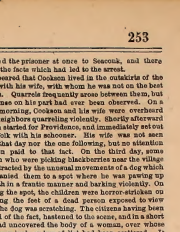
THE DOG AND THE FIRE.



A CASE OF MISTAKEN IDENTITY.

AMONG the many cases of mistaken identity known in the records of the law, few are more curious than the following:

Several years ago, Inspector Leonard, then a Captain of Police, received a telegraphic dispatch from the police authorities at Providence, R. I., requesting him to arrest John M. Cookson, master of a small coasting schooner plying between Providence and Norfolk, Va. The accused was charged with having murdered his wife at the little town of Sconcoh, near Providence. Capt. Leonard at once set about the task required of him, and in a very short time ascertained that Capt. Cookson's schooner was then lying in the harbor of New York. He at once boarded the vessel, and, on inquiring for the master, Capt. Cookson appeared in person. The officer notified him of the charges against him and of his purpose to arrest him. Cookson turned pale, stammered, was confused, and, in fact, showed all those signs of embarrassment which are generally interpreted as evidences of guilt, but may also be the effect of surprise and virtuous indignation. He, however, submitted quietly to the arrest, protesting, in the most solemn manner, his innocence, and declaring that he knew nothing of the whereabouts of his wife, if she were not at home. The officer conveyed the prisoner at once to Sconcoh, and there learned the facts which had led to the arrest.

It appeared that Cookson lived in the outskirts of the village with his wife, with whom he was not on the best of terms. Quarrels frequently arose between them, but no violence on his part had ever been observed. On a certain morning, Cookson and his wife were overheard by the neighbors quarreling violently. Shortly afterward Cookson started for Providence, and immediately set out for Norfolk with his schooner. His wife was not seen during that day nor the one following, but no attention had been paid to that fact. On the third day, some children who were picking blackberries near the village were attracted by the unusual movements of a dog which accompanied them to a spot where he was pawing up the earth in a frantic manner and barking violently. On reaching the spot, the children were horror-stricken at beholding the feet of a dead person exposed to view where the dog was scratching. The citizens having been notified of the fact, hastened to the scene, and in a short time had uncovered the body of a woman, over whose remains an inch or two of dirt had been scattered. It was found that the body was frightfully mutilated, and had been pounded with some quick-lime to aid in its decomposition previous to being covered with earth. The body was conveyed to the village, and there identified as the remains of Mrs. Cookson. The mother and sister of that lady positively identified the body, not only by the general appearance, but by certain marks. Mrs. Cookson's hair was somewhat singular in its color, and her manner of wearing it was peculiar. She had lost one of her front teeth and another had been filled with composition. These marks all appeared on the body of the dead person, and the mother and sister were not only positive on these points, but also identified the clothing with which the corpse was covered. The fact of no quarrel between Cookson and his wife became known, and the dead body of the woman found in the woods being recognized as that of Mrs. Cookson, led to the belief that the latter had fallen a victim to her husband's violence. The dispatch to Capt. Leonard was of a character to excite the deepest interest.

When the prisoner arrived at Sconcoh the indignation of the citizens against him was most intense, and for a short time it was feared that lynch law would be called into requisition. Good sense, however, guided the citizens, and the prisoner was confined in jail to await the action of the Grand Jury. This body soon met, and with little delay found an indictment against John M. Cookson for the murder of his wife. Additional evidence of a circumstantial nature was adduced calculated to remove all shadow of doubt as to the guilt of the accused. It was shown that after the quarrel with his wife, the accused had come down to Providence and there purchased a barrel of lime, which had been sent on board his schooner. From this time he was lost sight of for several hours, and the next that was known he had boarded his schooner at an unreasonable hour and suddenly put to sea. The prisoner explained that he certainly did quarrel with his wife, and, leaving her in anger, had determined to start upon his voyage as speedily as possible. As he was going to a southern climate, in hot weather, he had purchased a little lime to be used as a disinfectant on board his schooner. He could suggest no possible place where his wife could have concealed herself, and, indeed, had no doubt but that the body found was her remains. His explanations, of course, were disbelieved, and his fate was considered settled. The prisoner himself thought that there was no possible way to establish his innocence; the evidence against him appeared conclusive, and the only opposition to it he could interpose was his unsupported statement. He abandoned himself to despair, and as the day for his trial approached, all hope had fled from his bosom. Arrangements for his trial were completed, the day was fixed, counsel had volunteered to defend to the extent of their ability the seemingly doomed man, when, the day before the trial was to commence, Mrs. Cookson, alive and well, appeared upon the scene and claimed her husband! Of course the prison-doors were opened, and he who had so long shed beneath the shadows of the gallows was restored to society with an unstained reputation.

Mrs. Cookson accounted for her absence by stating that, after the quarrel with her husband and his departure for Norfolk, she had departed quite as hastily for New Hampshire, where she had been visiting some friends. Being an uneducated woman, she had held no communication with her relatives, and they had been in utter ignorance of her whereabouts. She returned on the critical time she did, supposing her husband would have completed his voyage, not knowing that he was imprisoned on charge of having murdered her.

The question then arose, "Who was the woman who had been thus murdered?" but no satisfactory answer could be given; and, although the police long devoted their energies to unraveling the mystery, no solution to it could be obtained, and the affair was forgotten. The unfortunate woman slept in the graveyard at Sconcoh—no friend visited her grave, and no one could tell her story. Her sad fate, with her remarkable resemblance to another, had secured for her Christian burial, and that was all that was known of her.

A short time since Inspector Leonard had in custody a noted burglar, who had long been known to the authorities as being one of the most skilful of his class. This man gave to the Inspector a solution of the Sconcoh mystery, which has never been printed. He said the the murdered woman was the wife of an expert English burglar sam-d Collins, who is now dead. Collins had long followed his nefarious profession, from the proceeds of which his wife had endeavored to wean him. She was aware of many of the secrets of the gang to which Collins belonged, and particularly of all the facts connected with a burglary perpetrated at Providence shortly previous to her death. The gang had become suspicious of her, and, fearing that she might expose them, had resolved upon her death. She was accordingly most brutally murdered by her husband and his associates, and her body disposed of in the manner described, Collins immediately left the scene and shortly afterward died in prison. The burglar who related these facts knew nothing regarding the history of the unfortunate woman, save that she was born in England, and was Collins's wife. The old adage that "Murder will out" seldom fails, although the development may sometimes be delayed until the perpetrator has answered the charge before a Court from which there is no appeal.

WANTED—A MINISTER.

We have been without a pastor
Some eighteen months or more,
And though candidates are plenty—
We've had at least a score,
All of them "up-top" preachers—
Or so their letters ran—
We're just as far as ever
From settling on the man.

The first who came among us
By no means was the worst,
But then we didn't think of him,
Because he was the first;
It being quite the custom
To sacrifice a few
Before the church in earnest
Determines what to do.

There was a smart young fellow,
With serious, earnest way,
Who, but for one serious blunder
Had surely won the day,
Who left so good impression,
On Sunday one or two
Went round among the people
To see if he would do.

The pious, godly portion
Had not a fault to find;
His clear and searching preaching
They thought the very kind;
And all went smooth and pleasant
Until they heard the views
Of some influential sinners
Who rent the highest pews.

On these his pungent dealing
Made but a sorry hit;
The coat of Gospel teaching
Was quite too tight a fit.
Of course his fate was settled;
Attend, ye parsons all!
And preach to please the sinners
If you would get a call.

Next came a spruce young dandy;
He wore his hair too long;
Another's coat was stoudy,
And his voice not over strong;
And one New Haven student
Was worse than all of those—
We couldn't heed the sermon
For thinking of his nose.

Then, wearying of cobdidates,
We looked the country through,
Mid doctors and professors,
To find one that would do;
And after much discussion
On what should bear the ark,
With tolerable agreement
We fixed on Dr. Parke.

Here, then, we thought it settled,
But were amazed to find
Our distant invitation
Respectfully declined.
We turned to Dr. Hopkins
To help us in the lurch,
Who strangely thought that college
Had claims above our church.

Next we dispatched committees
By twos and threes, to urge
The labors for a Sabbath,
Of the Rev. Shallow Splurge.
He came: a marked sensation—
So wonderful his style—
Followed the creaking of his boots
As he passed up the aisle.

His tones were so affecting,
His gestures so divine,
A lady joined in the hymn
Before the second line;
And on that day he gave us,
In accents clear and loud,
The greatest prayer ever addressed
To an enlightening crowd!

He preached a double sermon,
And gave us each by God
On such a lovely topic—
"The joys of solitude."
All full of vivid descriptions
Of flowers and pearly streams,
Of warbling birds, and moonlit groves,
And golden sunset beams.

Of faith and true repentance
He had not a word to say;
He rounded all the corners,
And smoothed the rugged way;
Managed with great adroitness
To entertain, and please,
And keep the sinner's conscience
Completely at its ease.

Six hundred is the salary
We gave in former days;
We thought it very liberal,
And found it hard to raise;
But when we took the paper
We had no need to urge
To raise a cool two thousand
For the Rev. Shallow Splurge.

In vain were all the efforts—
We had no chance at all—
We found ten city churches
Had given him a call;
And he, in prayerful waiting,
Was keeping all in tow;
But where they'd get the highest
It was whispered he would go.

And now, good Christian brothers,
We ask your earnest prayers
That God would send a shepherd
To guide our church and ours,
With this clear understanding—
A man, to meet our views,
Must preach to please the sinners,
And fill the vacant pews.

BENHASSAN.

A WORD spoken at random has often proved of more utility than the best concerted plans; and it happens that fools often prosper when men of talent fail. Here is an illustration:

A poor, simple peasant, of the name of Benhassan, being heartily tired of his daily fare of brown bread and water, resolved, whatever might be the consequence, to procure to himself, by hook or by crook, even at the expense of a broken head, three sumptuous meals. Having taken this courageous and noble resolution, the next thing was to devise a plan to put it into execution; and here his good fortune befriended him. The wife of a rich ivory merchant in the neighborhood of his cottage had, unknown to her husband, lost a very valuable diamond ring; she offered great rewards to any person who could recover it, or give any tidings of the jewel. But no one was likely to succeed in the keen eyes, of whose fidelity she had not the smallest doubt, had stolen it. The loss soon reached our gallant's ears.

"I'll go," cries he; "I'll say I am a conjurer, and that I will discover where the gem is hidden, on condition of first receiving three splendid meals. I shall fail, 'tis true. What then? I shall only be left in my poverty; my bars and soles may say 'How d'ye do?' to the bastinado, but my hungry stomach will be filled!"

To conceal his scheme and put it in practice was but the work of a moment. The merchant's still was absent. The lady, anxious for the recovery of her ring, accepted the offered terms. A sumptuous feast was prepared; the table was covered with rich viands; expensive juices of every sort were poured out. "Come aboard, Allah! how he eats! An attentive footman, one of the servants, filled him shortest; our conjurer, gorged, exclaimed:

"'Tis well; I have the first!"

The servant trembled at the ambiguous words, and left the apartment.

He has found us out, dear friends," he cried. "He is a conjurer, and he knows all. Let us fly, for he could be sorcerer enough to—"

"It looks a little like it," replied the second thief. "I'll wait and see how daylight is but you may have mistaken his meaning. Should he speak to us, we can then fly."

At night a supper fit for the caliph was set before the greedy Benhassan, who held until it was quite dark out. The second footman watched him all the while. When satisfied, he rose, exclaiming:

"The second's in my sack, and cannot escape me." Away flew the slightest wishes.

"We are lost!" he cried. "Our heels alone can save us!"

"Not so," answered the third. "If we fly and are caught, we are hanged. I'll wait and see what he knows" mean; and should he then speak as before, I'll win the theft to him, and offer some great reward to screen us from punishment, and that he may deliver the jewel to the lady without betraying us."

They all agreed. On the morrow Benhassan's appetite was that of a savage. Again he rose, and thus exclaimed:

"My sack is done; the third, thank Allah, is here!"

"Oh," said the trembling culprit, "behold the ring; but hide our shame, and you shall never repent the fair gain."

"Be silent!" exclaimed the astonished Benhassan, who little thought that what he had spoken of his meals could have made the plunderers fancy themselves in his sack. "Be silent! I have it."

Some crowns were pressing before the windows; he went out, and having seized the largest, forced the ring down the pipes, then returned, and told the lady where she had lowed the jewel. The goose was killed, the diamond found in the crop, and the fortune of Benhassan was made.

"Some crowns, I know, O wife," said he: "either the third listened, or his sleep was light, for with a well-concerted scheme, wrought on our own ears that we might not betray the secrets of divination. I'll provide him with a meal likewise.

No second thief was done; between two dishes the mysterious fare was hidden. The false conjurer was told to descend, that his counsels might cheer, on pain of being well beaten should he fail.

"Alas!" he muttered not," Benhassan, the cunning pig; thou art dead," referring to himself, and quitting the apartment.

"He's right," the merchant cried. "Give him a purse of gold: I fancy him capable of such a thing."

It was pork in the dish. Thus our glutton, by four successive impositions, gained three hearty meals, a purse, comfort for life, and a most brilliant reputation as a cunning man.

MY COURTSHIP.—When I was sixteen, I fell in love. There was nothing remarkable in that, for most all people do at the same age do the same thing. But what I am going to tell you is how my courtship terminated. It was at a party I saw Ella Brown, who was one of the sweetest girls in all Dicktown; and, I tell you, she looked sweet in her white muslin ball-dress, with her hair jauntily over her shoulders, and her face (in contradiction) danced with her ones, twice, thrice, and I was just the happiest man that ever lived. I had just the party broke up; but I had an invitation to call on Miss Brown. That was all I wanted, and I called pretty much before Sunday—for that was the time I'd promised to call—and, being invited, I went to make her home; and, when I left, I had a pressing invitation to call again—and I did not forget it, I can assure you. At the end of the month, I was completely gone. After I resolved to "pop the question," and fixed on my next visit for the time, studied "Courtship Made Easy" thoroughly, and concluded I was ready for the task. The time arrived. Here I was sitting by the side of my beloved, with my arm around her waist. I took her hand in mine, and screwed my courage up to say: "Dear Ella, do you love me?" She made no answer, but her eyes were cast down, and I hoped. Yes, I was certain she loved me. I put both my arms around her neck, and pressed one, two, three kisses on her rosy lips. She did not resist, but raised her head and said: "Don't be so bad as Sam Simmons!" I took my hat—haven't been back since.

AN absent man lately put his dog to bed and took supper himself. He did not discover his mistake until the next morning.

OLD Bogg was a miserly old fellow, who had accumulated a fortune by life-long parsimonies. But even misers have to die some time, and Old Bogg was at length called upon to yield debt where all must pay, and which is paid as easily by the man who hasn't a cent as by him who has millions.

Old Bogg was sick unto death, finding a partial recognizance in the fact that he was refreshed by what he could not eat anything, something was being saved. His physician, called in from time and was used, and he felt within himself that he was rapidly approaching his family reunion. Said he to Old Bogg, as he stood near the latter's very soon:

"Well, how have I to live?" asked Old Bogg, in a despairing half an hour," said the physician, taking out his watch to see how many minutes, and adding, "there may one you would like to send for—a clergyman, for instance?"

Old Bogg mused in a lethargic way for a moment, and then said to his wife, in a feeble voice, as he laid feeble hand and fist of his emaciated chin, upon which two weeks' growth of gray and stubbed beard had grown, then whispered, pursuedly:

"Catch-and-run parson, Sally."

The barber came with his kit, and Old Bogg said, in a voice that was rapidly growing weaker:

"You—charge—ten cents—to shave—live men?"

"Yes, that is the regular price," said the barber.

"What—you charge—to shave—dead men?"

"One dollar," said the barber, wondering what he meant.

"Then—shave me—quick," said Old Bogg, nervously eying the watch which the doctor held in his hand. He was too weak to speak further, but the doctor interpreted aright the question that was in his eyes.

Fifteen minutes later Old Bogg died.

Old Bogg made a feeble motion as with a letherbrush, and the doctor saw that his work in a jiffy. He performed his task with dispatch, and although the job was done in several minutes quite of an amazing nature, yet he bore up to the end. When the last stroke of the razor was given, Old Bogg whispered, in tones of satisfaction:

"That'll do—uncle—cents—saved!" and immediately expired.

A WITTY young lady who has broken a score of hearts in her time, married lately. She sent to a young gentleman, who had been very devoted to her before they had reached the altar, a piece of a bell wedding cake, a second string, accompanied with the following verses:

DEAR STEPHEN:
I do not wish to consider what you lose,
And for the bridal knot, accept this noose;
This bridal cake, which I've enclosed for you,
Will help you bear the loss of such a bride.
STEPHON.

He returned the noose to her with the following reply:

DEAR CHLOE:
Your gist as a symbol with candor you chose;
My narrow escape is most every one knows;
As a gift from a lady, I ought not to refuse it,
But your cake, you know, may soon want to use it.

And so, by the bearer, your gift I restore,
For your bridegroom will want it ere the honeymoon's o'er.

"You wouldn't 'a' seen me dis time, cap'n, if de negro hadn't rotten on."

"DOCTOR, do you think that tight-lacing is bad for the consumption?"

"Not at all—it is what it lives on."

"DID your fall hurt you?" said one Fenian to another who had fallen from the top of a two-story house.

"Not in the least, honey; 'twas stoppin' so quick that hurt me."

"WHY, Tom, my dear fellow, how old you look."

"Dare say, Bob, for the fact is, I never was so old before in my life."

INFLUENCE OF LICHT ON PLANTS.

THE Academy of Sciences has received from M. Duchartre a highly interesting communication on certain well-known plants called creepers, because their stalks, too weak to support themselves, tend to twine round the nearest objects. They generally do this from left to right—that is, inversely to the motion of the sun —but some species turn in the contrary direction, and it is impossible to make either one or the other change its direction.

Palms, Van Mohl, Dutrochet, and, latterly, Ch. Darwin have successively expressed the opinion that light was the cause of this irregularity; but Duchartre, after long wasting to confirm this theory, M. Duchartre, who had previously stated that the Chinese yam would turn to the left only, resolved to try the effect of absence of light upon it.

At the end of May last he placed one in a pot, and, as soon as it showed its stem above the surface, put it down in a cellar, where it received no light. On the 1st of August following, the stem, in the course of seven weeks, grew to the height of seven and a half. It looked withered and whitish, and bent upon the whole, strong, and even still perfectly straight, showing nowhere a tendency to twine itself round the stick which had been placed there for its support.

Another yam was planted nearly a month later, and left, opposed to daylight, until it had twined itself twice round the stick. It was then taken and placed in the cellar, where its stem, still obeying its natural tendency, went round one leaves only, but in a more restricted direction than before; after which it grew straight up along its stick, to which it was fastened as it grew. It was now again taken up into the garden, where it immediately began to twine round again, making its close turns; and when it was once more taken down into the cellar, it continued its growth in a straight line and upright position, according as it was alternately in the light or in the dark.

The same phenomena was observed, not only in the bean, or Dolichos Soja, but also in the Ipomea coccinea and Ipomea purpurea; but, on the other hand, the bean and the Ipomea purpurea continue to twine round their supports in the dark.

A SHREWD DETECTIVE.—A Paris letter of a recent date contains the following amusing anecdote, illustrating the astuteness of an American detective:

"A fast young nobleman of Vienna, over head and ears in debt, and desperate for his success in the last sex, received, recently, a perfumed rose-colored note, whose contents ran: 'If you have your pocket-book figure have made such an impression upon me, I earnestly desire to make your further acquaintance. Come this evening to the Vienna Theatre. I have taken stall 79 in the parquet.' He added the fashionable number to 79 for a gentleman who would ask for it, saying, No. 79 for ever. I trust you will have the pleasure of seeing you.—EMMA.' The dandy dressed himself in a most elegant style, and as soon as the door was opened he applied for 'No. 79 for ever,' and received it. As the curtain rose the gentleman came into the theatre and took the seat. As soon as he was at his ease, he bent his head forward to look for the lady's face in a consetable—I have been hunting for you these fifteen days' time, sometimes in vain. Don't make a scandalous scene here, for I tell you I have the warrant for your arrest in my pocket.' The fast man stared wildly enough for a moment, but, seeing no means of escape, quietly hopeless, he remained quiet until the end of the opera, when he followed the officer to the police station.

QUEEN MAB, until her marriage with Philip the Second, is said to have been mistress of the robes for Hollandsd says, that, when she appointed Sir Thomas Parry to that office, the queen's physician, she told him, "that notwithstanding the old error which did not allow any women to profess the art or other matter to be heard, (her majesty being party), that her pleasure was that he should come to her chamber for cure of the subject, should be admitted to be heard: and moreover, that his patience should not trouble himself to put in judgment, otherwises for her highness pleasure he should not."

A MOTHER'S DUTY to her child is, first of all, to watch over its health. Among children, in nine cases out of ten, sickness commences with a disordered state of the bowels. This is invariably counteracted by the use of Dr. Spring's Carminative Syrup. No family should be without it; its general use would save thousands of lives. It is the best cure for cholera among children, which form such a startling item in the weekly reports of the City Inspectors.

A CONVENIENT REMEDY.—Persons liable to the disorders of the season, will find Needler's Camphor Cordial a most convenient and reliable preventative. A box, carried in the pocket, would enable any one to check the approach of disease. In the case of a sudden attack of Cholera and kindred diseases, the Cordial is the best article needed.

No. 563—VOL. XXII.] NEW YORK, JULY 14, 1866. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

Marshaling the Hosts.

In the marshaling of the nations for the coming great continental war, which is sure to leave indelible marks on the map of Europe, it will not be uninteresting to have presented a statement of the military force, disposable for the struggle, on the part of the principal combatants. There are, of course, other considerations besides heavy "battalions" which go to decide victory in the great game of war. These, apart from moral and physical stamina, may be summed up in the comprehensive word, "resources"—money, credit, supplies, arms. But we must remember that European armies are not paid as ours were; often not paid at all; and that European rations are not, nor were they ever, more than a poor approximation, whether as regards quality or quantity, to ours. The country occupied by a European army is literally eaten out, and the poor producers are not paid, nor do they even receive promises to pay, for what they lose. War in Europe is a real scourge, a devastation, to which our war affords no parallel, except, in a mild way, in "Sherman's march to the sea."

A European army of one hundred thousand men may, therefore, be raised (by conscription, and with no expense for bounties), for one-twentieth what a corresponding army cost us; be kept in the field and fed (after a fashion) for one-tenth, and so on. Consequently, the bankruptcy of Austria and the poverty of Italy may not be such weighty drawbacks to their efficient action as our people might, at first, suppose.

Returning, then, to the numerical forces of Austria, Prussia, Italy, and the possible participator in the mêlé, France:

At latest accounts Prussia had under arms 647,000 men, exclusive of the municipal guards. This force is to be reinforced by another corps d'armée of 64,000 men. The Prussians had also in the field, at last accounts, 132,000 horses and 1,008 guns, one-half rifled.

Austria had, as nearly as can be computed, and in round numbers, 800,000 men in the field, including the levies from Venetia, which serve under duress, and those from Hungary, which will fight only under compulsion.

Italy has at least 400,000 men in regular service, and it is safe to assume that they will be reinforced by from 100,000 to 200,000 volunteers under Garibaldi and other republican leaders, who will make up in enthusiasm what they may lack in drill and experience.

Italy will, of course, co-operate with Prussia; and the opening of the war will show Prussia and Italy with 1,200,000 men in arms, against Austria with 800,000. But Austria, geographically and strategically, occupies a central position, while Prussia and Italy must attack from the outside. To this advantage—which is a great one, considering that her possession of "the Quadrilateral," the four famous fortresses of Venetia, will enable her to hold in check, with a vastly inferior force, the whole Italian army, and before which Louis Napoleon shrank back—we say, to this advantage, she may count upon the support of nine out of fifteen of the minor German States. On the presentation of the issue between Austria and Prussia before the Federal Diet, the vote for mobilizing the Federal armies was passed by nine to six, notwithstanding Prussia declared, in advance, that she should regard all the States voting for the measure as enemies. We do not yet know what States sided with the respective disputants; but we may assume that Austria will obtain the principal part of the Federal soldiery, numbering about 300,000 men.

The advantage thus accruing to Austria may, however, be regarded as considerably more than compensated for by the unquestioned naval superiority of Italy in the Mediterranean, which may enable her to turn the famous "Quadrilateral," and operate from Trieste, or Venice itself, against the Austrians.

As a possible participant in the quarrel, we may observe of France, that her army in 1865 mustered upward of 400,000 men, which may easily and rapidly be run up to 800,000. Her navy, of course infinitely superior to that of all the other combatants, is, however, likely to be of little account as against Austria—in case the greed or policy of the Emperor should lead him to interfere as against that power. We are inclined to doubt the probability of such an intervention, since it is discernible that Russia, with its army of 1,000,000 of men, is not disposed to permit Austria to be humbled (notwithstanding her unfriendly conduct during the Crimean war), nor sensibly curtailed in territory.

It is safe to say, that at this moment, there are in Europe not far from 4,000,000 of soldiers under arms, and directly opposed to each other, or who may become so within the next twelve months. The shock of such an encounter cannot fail to effect changes, impossible to foresee, but which must be great, if not radical—involving not limits alone, but the forms and very principles of government. The spirit of '48 is not dead in Europe; and if roused again, it will leave no room for constitutional perjuries, nor will it listen, with a faith once so bitterly betrayed, to the protestations and oaths of kings, and the lesser spawn, which impiously assume their rights to be "divine."

OUT ALL NIGHT.

THE illustration on this first page, from the picture by J. T. Beard, seems in itself a very simple matter, but we suspect the artist intended it to tell a most instructive story, and in the sad plight in which he has represented the unlucky dog, whose roving propensities tempted him to leave his kennel and risk forbidden pleasures, has leveled his shafts at those of the human species, who, in their quest of enjoyment, often involve themselves in difficulty and disgrace. It is not our purpose, however, to trace out the moral suggested by the subject; our readers can do that for themselves, according to their various tastes and experiences; we would rather call attention to the expression and attitude of this brute family, so finely depicted. The "Head of the House," wearying of home comforts, has gone out "to see the sights," and being somewhat unsophisticated, has fallen among tormentors, and met with very shabby treatment. Ill-used and disgraced, he gladly seeks the quiet and protection of home, but madame, his companion, extends to him anything but a cordial welcome, and appears disposed to dispute his right to a place in the hitherto well-ordered and happy kennel. Weary, wounded, ashamed and repentant, he looks the promise of reform, and doubtless has come to the conclusion, from the experience of one night, that "there is no place like home." The picture will bear study, and the more we extend and apply its lessons to the habits of society, the more we will see in it a rebuke to folly and a warning against excess.

Is this the Nineteenth Century?

Is this the first decade of the last half of the nineteenth century? Is this the eighteen hundred and sixty-sixth anniversary of the inauguration of the Christian era, and of the birth of Him who was to bring "peace on earth and good will toward men"? Has our boasted civilization and our religion, after all, resulted in what we see around us?—Nine-tenths of the Christian world in open war, or breathlessly awaiting the dread moment when "Red Battle" shall stamp his foot? Have all our improvements in locomotion, in transmission of intelligence, production and exchange of commodities, only resulted in giving concentration, strength, and deadly effect to the worst and most malignant passions and faults of our nature?

So it would seem! We repeat, nine-tenths of the so-called Christian world are in arms, or may, at any moment, be engaged in deadly strife. Not two years have elapsed since the dominating nation of the Western World closed the most terrific and bloody contest known in the annals of mankind. How stand her neighbors on this continent now? Canada feverish and unsettled, after the first onset of a subtle and persistent foe; Mexico, the theatre of a prolonged and implacable struggle; Chile, Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador struggling against a monarchical enemy; Brazil, with the Argentine Republic and Buenos Ayres in an unequal contest against Paraguay; Jamaica still smelling of slaughter; the embers of revolution not yet cold in Hayti and San Domingo!

In Europe, Austria, with all her dependencies and her sympathizers in the Germanic Confederation, arrayed against Prussia and Italy; France silently arming in view of eventualities apparent to every mind; Russia and Turkey confronting each other in the Principalities, and threatening a conflict that must drag England into another war, which may relight the fires of insurrection in India; Ireland under military rule, and heaving with revolution; Spain involved in a struggle in South America and racked by dissensions at home!

Are all these omens, these throes, these prospective and actual conflicts, portents of "Armageddon"? Can Christian, philosopher, or statesman reconcile all these conditions and fearful actualities with the theory or principles of religion and civilization? Are these terms only empty and cant phrases for bad men and charlatans to play and juggle with? Can this really be the nineteenth century? Is this the fruition of the gospel preached on the Mount? Or are we, in spite of its instructions and injunctions, savages as before, with only improved facilities for murder?

IN view of the impending European war, it will be interesting to know the relative strength of the two principal combatants. The following table shows the area, population, etc., etc., of Austria and Prussia:

	Area, sq. miles.	Population.	Army, men.	Navy, vessels.	Debt.
Austria..	236,311	37,000,000	800,000	59	$1,500,000,000
Prussia..	108,212	19,304,843	700,000	85	None.

The number of fighting men stated for Prussia probably comes very near the limit of popular fighting capacity, although no allusion is made to the landwehr or militia reserve, amounting to 2,000,000 men, who are ultimately available for strictly defensive purposes. On the other hand, Austria can draw from those recondite regions of Croatia, Tyrol, Carniola, Hungary, Transylvania, no end of the best fighting material in the world; men of the utmost endurance and courage, and used to the exactest discipline. We must, however, remember that Italy will act with Prussia. The out-look for Austria is not brilliant. The device of the house of the Emperor of Austria is the five vowels, A E I O U; which the Emperor Frederick III. chose to interpret: "Austria Erit Imperatrix Omnis Universi." If the rendering was intended as a prophecy, events thus far have sadly belied it; for besides losing the imperial sceptre, the Hapsburgs, as a correspondent of the Journal des Débats reminds us, have lost Lorraine, Belgium, the Netherlands, Alsace, Tuscany, the Two Sicilies, Silesia, Lombardy, and a host of minor holdings in Italy. Her next loss will be Venetia.

WE must not flatter ourselves, because we have a territory as large as Europe, the biggest debt and highest taxes of any nation on earth, and because our "bright home is in the setting sun," that we are ahead of all the world in all things. The boy Ketchum, who swindled Wall street out of three or four millions, was certainly a promising youth, and the late bogus bank (and Government depository) in Washington was a rather successful establishment in its way. But they do these things better in Engand. The Agra and Masterman's Bank has just failed—"gone up"—in London, for the highly respectable sum of from seventy-five million to one hundred million dollars. Its shares, which were at one hundred and ten dollars, or ten per cent. above par, are now selling at three dollars. This is a great country, but there is a "greater!"

A PLAN has been adopted at Liverpool to prevent "attacks" upon the banks in order to depreciate their shares, which will probably be followed in London. The Exchange there has prohibited the sale of shares unless the numbers of such shares are inscribed upon the contract; that is, has prohibited fictitious sales. As it is not worth a seller's while to run down his own property, this rule, which will not hamper business, will prevent combinations to "bear" the market, and the various frauds which, comparatively unimportant when directed against foreign stocks, are so fatal as against banks.

PRINCESS MARY of England has married a gentleman by the name of Teck—a "Prince" Teck, one of the multitude of titled German adventurers. The people of England have been called on, through their Commons, to give him ten thousand dollars a year to live on, because he is "a good fellow" and short of "shiners." The Princess Mary is also a pauper—we mean to say a pensioner, as well as princess, and gets fifteen thousand dollars a year from the same people of England, because she is Princess Mary. "Simply this, and nothing more!" Otherwise, she is a buxom lass, and capable, so the will were not wanting, of doing as good a day's work as any Biddy in the land.

A CORRESPONDENT of a daily contemporary, of an economical turn of mind, advocates utilizing the carcasses of the dogs sacrificed to the popular fear of hydrophobia. He says a "very good article of oil may be extracted from their bodies; their hides may be converted into leather and glue; and their bones into bone-black. Supposing that from 15,000 to 20,000 dogs will suffer death at the pound this and every succeeding year, could not their carcasses be made a source of profit and use? I found a medium-sized, tolerably fat dog to yield a quart of oil, which was superior to any other for tanners' purposes in its crude state, and when refined and deodorized made a very superior hair-oil. In its crude state the smell is very pungent, and its appearance something like crude whale oil. The leather made from the hide varies with the breed of the dog. The bull, Newfoundland, large curs, and, in fact, all heavy coarser breeds make a tough, durable and pliant shoe-leather. While the finer grades of animals give a leather equal to any kid. I have seen boots made of well-tanned dog-hide, which could not be told from the finest calf-skin. The glue made is as good as that from the clipping, etc., of any other hide. The amount of oil, leather and glue varies in proportion to the size and fatness of the dog, some yielding as high as half a gallon of oil. The improved quality of the hide will, in almost every case, make up for the smallness of size. With the value of the bones for bone-black, or the manufacture of phosphates, there are many around New York who are acquainted. My opinion is, that even the waste of flesh might be turned to account in the manufacture of some character of compost manure. I know that it has been used in the generation of saltpetre. From my own observation and experience, my opinion is, that an enterprising man might make the dog carcasses of New York and Brooklyn produce twenty thousand dollars, of which at least ten thousand dollars would be profit."

THE Kladderadatsh, or German Punch, has a splendid and significant wood-cut. It represents a mighty big spider, adorned with the Emperor Napoleon's head, waiting quietly in its large web, while all kinds of insects, representing the other European States, are flying and caught in it, to be devoured in time by the Imperial spider. Beneath are Rouher's words in the Corps Legislatif: "Honest Neutrality and Liberty of Action."

BEGGARS.—We all have read the mode described in "Gil Blas" of a beggar holding out one hand for money and presenting a gun with the other. A still more ingenious method of soliciting charity was lately adopted by a beggar in the south of France. This man was in the habit of prowling about the country with a very savage wolf. The wolf was muzzled, but if the beggar happened to hit upon an uncharitable person in any house where he presented himself, he threatened to unmuzzle the animal. Generally speaking this threat produced the desired effect, and a little money was given to the mendicant to get rid of him. The nuisance, however, became so intolerable that information was given to the police. The wolf was summarily killed and its owner is in prison. Neither of these accounts is exaggerated. A correspondent of the Anglo-American Times relates a correspondent story. "Some years ago, while I was riding over a solitary mountainous district, on my way from Burgos to Madrid, two men rushed down from the side of the mountain, and, each presenting a musket, asked for charity. This persuasive style, of course, induced me to give a trifle without delay. I rode off with courteous salute from the men, of 'Vá usted con Dios' (God go with you),"

THE State census of New Jersey for 1865 shows a population of 672,035, being a net increase of 101,665 from 1860, or about one-sixth.

THE Papal Government has just appointed a banking-house in this city its agent for the negotiation in this country of a loan of $4,000,000. The proceeds of this loan, it is understood, are to be appropriated to the purpose of defraying the necessities of the Papal Government during the pendency of the negotiations now going on between France and the Government of Victor Emanuel, for the liquidation of the debt of the Roman States. What between the Fenians and the Pope, Biddy's fractional currency stands but a poor chance.

IN Switzerland the telegraph is the property of the state. An office is established in almost every village, and the charge is uniform—one franc for twenty-five words, irrespective of distance. The dispatches are printed, and the establishment yields a large revenue to Government.

THE EXCISE LAW.

A LATE decision of one of our judges pronounced the Excise Law unconstitutional and void, and thereby declared all the proceedings of the Excise Board irregular and reversible. The reasons upon which this decision is based are very plausible, and to all who are interested in its terms, quite conclusive; and it is barely possible that in a technical sense the dictum of the Court is correct—for all the enactments of legislative bodies seem to possess the permeability and elasticity of the acts of the English Parliment—through any of which, it has been said, a coach and six may be driven. In regard to the Excise Law, there are in the main but two opinions: the friends of virtue, order and decency, deeming it wise and necessary, and the lovers of self-indulgence denouncing it as arbitrary, unjust and impracticable; and all these latter hail Judge Cardozo's decision with delight. The principal argument of the judge was, that the new law requiring all bars to be closed on Sunday contravened the provisions of the previous law, under which licenses were granted without any restriction as to the time when sales should be made, and therefore, being a violation of a contract, proved unconstitutional and void. If we mistake not, there is an unrepealed statute forbidding the prosecution of ordinary business on Sunday, by the provisions of which, the farmer who plows his lands, the mechanic who plies his trade, the merchant who opens his warerooms and offers his goods for sale, may be arrested upon complaint, and become liable to a severe penalty. Why the business of liquor-selling should be more important than any other, and therefore prove an exception, is certainly not very clear; and it is believed that, were the statute referred to strictly enforced, there could arise no collision between the Excise Board and the Courts.

But there are other considerations connected with this question worthy of attention. The most forcible objection against the law is, that it is sumptuary, interfering with the social habits and rights of a large class of our citizens, and so opposed to public opinion, that it must soon become a dead letter. A fundamental principle entering into the constitution of all society is the surrender of individual interests for the common and general welfare. What promotes this welfare is right; what interferes with it may properly become the subject of legal restriction and enactment. Apply this obvious principle to liquor-selling and Sunday observance, all the time taking into account the nature and character of free and republican institutions, and you can hardly escape the conclusion that it is both proper and just to set certain bounds to all practices that tend to excess and lawlessness.

The safeguard of our institutions is the virtue, intelligence and uprightness of our people. We do not want, because we dare not tolerate, the customs and habits that are fostered by monarchical governments, which resort to every expedient for amusing and diverting the people that will prevent the assertion of natural right, and maintain a spirit of contentedness with the existing order of things. If the sports and customs of the Old World become the established order of things with us, and if the preferences and inclinations of our adopted citizens be paramount to the honored practices of our forefathers and the founders of our political system, we shall be in danger of falling away from the high standard we have hitherto maintained, and reaching the level of the effete and corrupt dynasties of Europe. We need not be puritanical, but we must be virtuous, and foster everything that tends to promote and encourage virtue, or we cannot long remain free and independent. It is in view of these facts that the Excise Law becomes a measure of so much importance. The great question is not whether a few hundred men shall be restricted in the questionable pursuit of gain, and a few thousand others prevented from encroaching upon the long-cherished privileges of the great mass of our people, and offending their honest and reasonable convictions, but whether we shall quietly and deliberately tolerate the introduction of customs that corrupt the public sense and imperil the public security. Our civilization is gained at too great a price if it involve the destruction of that simplicity of character and earnestness of purpose that gave it birth. Beside, our spirit and institutions are essentially American, noble, grand, and far-stretching as our forests and mountains and slopes, that inspired and brought them into being, and to retain them in their purity and power, we must carefully guard against the infusion of any element of weakness and disturbance. It must be remembered, too, that the men and presses that clamor most loudly against the operation of a law that confessedly has resulted in good and greatly diminished the labors of our police, are not the representatives of the virtue and learning, and intelligence and worth of our community, but rather those who would pander to low passions, and operate upon the under-strata of our society by an appeal to their appetite in preference to their reason. This fact is a suspicious one, and pregnant with very serious considerations. As all power is from the people, and in the people, and for the people, it is indispensable that the people should be wise and elevated, and reasonable and far-seeing, or power will rapidly degenerate into oppression, mere demagogues become our rulers, and our boasted freedom be turned into a mockery and a lie.

It is to check such a tendency that the Excise Law was enacted. We were insensibly drifting toward corruption and anarchy. Our municipal officers could not be trusted, a large portion of our population had little or no sympathy with our national ideas, and brought with them the spirit and the habits of their native lands, and we were rapidly resolving the anomaly of a European metropolis in an American and antagonistic government. The danger was foreseen, and an attempt made to guard against it; and it is especially unfortunate that our Courts should lend their influence to a cause that must depend for its support upon mere technicalities, and that is reprobated by our best and most reliable citizens.

TOWN GOSSIP.

GOLD has gone up again to figures we had hoped it could never reach, and the speculators of Wall street are more jubilant than a young Miss preparing for her first party. If our good friends at Washington would only fix upon some decided policy, and let the country know whether Pompey or Protection is to be king—whether reconstruction or destruction awaits us—whether an inflated currency or a contracted currency shall be our dependence—whether North and South are to continue sulking like spoiled children, or to unite in a loving embrace as fond members of the same household, our monetary skies would become much brighter, and somebody's occupation would be gone. We do not know that the advance in gold has had any effect on old Sol, but during the week he has given us some evidence of his sway, and with the thermometer at ninety degrees and upward, breathing becomes a very serious matter, and active exertion almost an impossibility. Some few, overpowered by the intensity of the heat, have died, thus showing the fearful temperature we have experienced. Picnics, excursions and various sports attracted multitudes away from our burning streets to the refreshing green of the suburbs and the savory breezes of the bay, while others strove to counteract the effects of the hot air by the liberal use of various beverages, many of which rather increased than diminished the discomfort.

Speaking of beverages suggests the difficulties thrown in the way of the Excise Board by one of our city judges, whose ermine may not be quite immaculate, and who is the creation of that abominable caricature of decency and impartiality—an Elective Judiciary. This Bunsby has decided that the Excise Law is wholly void, and invited every dealer in liquors to disregard it, assuring him of the protection of an injunction, and even threatening to arrest and confine the Superintendent of Police, should he interfere with this decision. In the meantime the Board continues to arrest all persons violating the law, and the judge endeavors to screen his friends by his fulminations, doubtless in the hope of being remembered by them when his present term of office expires.

Were it not that the great principles of justice and right are too sacred for such trifling, we might find our quantum of amusement in this embroglio of the functionaries.

In fact, recrimination and cross-purposes seem in vogue just now. Fenianism, which many supposed dead, without hope of resurrection, has been showing some evidences of vitality, in presenting two factions of the order, not, however, a Siamese twins arrangement, in which both feel and act in harmony, but rather a dog and cat affair, each cherishing a bitter hatred of the other, denouncing and abusing without stint. But if the Fenians can endure this process without injury, outsiders will not trouble themselves very much with the dissensions of these fanatics, who have long since rendered themselves ridiculous.

The annual hegira to the watering-places and pleasure resorts has commenced, and the season promises to be an immensely gay one. Fashion and custom both combine to induce a visit to the noted centres of attraction with which our country abounds. Saratoga retains its pristine fame, and will so long as its sparkling health-giving waters continue to flow, and though some of its best hotels have been destroyed, Col. Leland, of the Union, is still there; and since a watering-place hotel, like a street car, is never full, ample provision will be found for the suitable accommodation of the tens of thousands who, during the summer, will crowd to their favorite resort. The Union, however, can receive twelve hundred guests and make them comfortable, so none need be deterred from going to Saratoga by the fear of not finding suitable quarters.

Of our sea-side watering-places, Long Branch holds the first rank, and is always popular. There is something about the ocean breezes and surf-bathing especially invigorating, while the constant blending of sea and sky, and the occasional variation of a storm, form views of which one never wearies. Here, too, the hotel men have made extensive preparation for the reception of visitors, and the new Continental will compare favorably with any establishment of the kind in the country. Elegant and commodious in all its arrangements, its spacious colonnades, ample dining-room, well-furnished guest-rooms—all lighted with gas—will render the Continental a favorite with visitors, while the politeness of its experienced hosts gives the sojourner a home-like feeling he cannot always entertain.

This hotel also has connected with it a fine shooting-gallery, together with a bowling-saloon and billiard-room, amply provided with Kavanagh & Decker's splendid tables, which are becoming so popular. These features will add to the attractions of the house, besides furnishing pleasing exercise to the lovers of active sports. Commend us to the Continental and its gentlemanly proprietors.

Pleasant as these topics are, they are terra incognita to multitudes, who must toil through the heat of summer and the cold of winter without any hope of a respite. To such, the excursions to places around the city afford the relaxation others, more favored, seek at the springs and the seaside, and, with a little stretch of fancy, they can, for a time, convert these haunts into others of much greater pretension—though some are churlish enough to affirm that, barring the pretension, there is little or nothing left of Saratoga, Newport, etc.

The theatres have not brought out any striking novelties during the week, and are confining themselves to the usual summer adaptations.

At Niblo's, the Ravels continue the attraction, and, notwithstanding the heat, draw good houses. People do not readily tire of witnessing their feats of agility and gracefulness, and the theatre is so cool and comfortable that, aside from the performance, it is an actual treat to spend an hour or two there for the sake of escaping suffocation.

Mr. Dan Bryant has been—to speak à la Fenian—the C.O.I.R. at Wallack's; and while he does not propose to found an Irish Republic, he does intend to present Irish characters in such a manner as to please his patrons and crowd the theatre.

The Worrell Sisters have brought out a sufficient variety of entertainments at Wood's New Theatre to render that pretty place quite a family resort.

Mr. Brougham, at the Winter Garden, has made a decided hit with his burlesque "Pocahontas." The play has been re-written and interspersed with allusions to the topics of the day, is full of fun without vulgarity, and will prove immensely popular.

Barnum's, despite the heat, despite almost everything, is constantly thronged: and combining as it does both theatre and museum, is one of the great attractions of the metropolis.

The opera, at the French Theatre, grows in popularity, each week increasing the number of its admirers. With some defects, it still possesses many merits, and the effort to provide such entertainment as it affords is very generally appreciated; and Mr. Eichberg has the thanks of the lovers of music for his sparkling presentations.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE well-known firm of Blunt, Nichols & Co. have published a very useful and comprehensive volume, called "The Coast Pilot," with maps, charts, and soundings. The importance of this work cannot be overrated, and the care bestowed upon it in every particular renders it, in swelling it to the above recommendation. It is, indeed, indispensable to every mariner, whether he belongs to the commercial or the more elegant service of the yacht club. Blunt & Co. have also issued a list of all the lighthouses on the coasts of the United States. This is published by order of Congress.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A convention of Texas planters has been held at Austin, and organized a local stock company with a capital of a million dollars, having for its object the improvement of labor, and the sale of it to parties of emigrants. The plan of operations reported is to employ agents to induce European laborers to emigrate to Texas. The Tennessee Colonial and Immigration Society met a meeting and took at Nashville. Over $30,000 were subscribed, and the society will furnish colonists "with any number of hands that are required.

The Fort Scott (Kansas) Monitor asserts that not less than twenty-five thousand people have passed through Bourbon county, in that State, during the past up to the first of June.

—A telegram from Mobile announces that an Austrian officer has arrived at that city empowered to offer protection to the Austrian army of occupation. It is thought that quite a number will avail themselves of the opportunity to plunge again into the maelstrom scenes of war.

—A roof is in process of construction in Detroit over the Michigan Central depot, which will cover three hundred thousand square feet, or over seven acres.

—The Brownsville (Texas) Ranchero says that an accident recently happened to a train on the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad. The baggage-master set in his car, reading, at the time, but perceiving by the motion of the train that a great change was about to occur, he attempted to jump out, when he was unfortunately caught between the doors and badly pinched. He was taken out in an insensible condition, and being laid upon the ground, an attempt was made to restore him to which proved successful. As he opened his eyes to a consciousness of things, a clergyman stepped out from the circle which surrounded him, to offer prayer for his unexpected restoration. He immediately on his side of the victim, but, before proceeding with his work of mercy, he inquired, "Are you a Catholic?" "No, sir!" as emphatically as his weak condition would allow. "Then," the baggage-master at once left the Great Western Railroad."

—The new baths established by the city authorities of Boston are patronized by about ten thousand persons daily, men, women and children of all ages are all well arranged, and have from thirteen to thirty-five dressing-rooms. The water flows constantly through openings at the sides, making it always clean and cool.

—Cornell University, at Ithaca, N. Y., is well under way. It will be remembered that Ezra Cornell gave $500,000 for founding this University, and the State has also made a grant of land which are likely to prove valuable. The hope is expressed that this institution will eventually be the endowment of the value of $2,000,000.

—The Post-Office Department have issued an order against selling boxes to policy dealers, bogus lottery ticket swindlers, faro-cheats bookmakers, and all other swindlers, so far as can be ascertained, after the expiration of the present quarter.

—A person who has recently visited the Shenandoah Valley, says it is wonderful to see the progress of cattle and poultry in this "denuded" valley, after the devastations of war. It was said to have been before the absence of fences in some places, now and then a farmhouse or a barn had been, no one would suppose an army had been in the valley.

—Bonanza, Parola, of Auburn, Ohio, recently lifted a dead weight of 2,731¼ pounds, which is the greatest lifting ever known. He has been exercising at intervals during the last six years. Dr. Winship, for seven years past considered the strongest man in the world, at last accounts had lifted only 2,600 pounds.

—The four hundred cadets of the Annapolis Naval Academy are about starting on a long summer cruise. They will be four weeks at sea, giving them an opportunity to practice gunnery and seamanship, and all the vessels will be fitted with best sea outfits. Furthermore a short stay will be made. Halifax. Every precaution will will also be visited, and on the return of the fleet, in the latter part of September, the cadets will be given an opportunity for recreation at Newport, R. I.

—Brooklyn has a Mayor who is one of a thousand. The City Government having passed a resolution to fill his salary from $5,000 to $5,000, the Mayor—the Hon. Samuel Booth—has vetoed it!

—There were 7,202 deaths, and 4,460 marriages and 10,702 births in Connecticut during the year ending leaving the population of the State 3,251 greater than in 1865. At Bridgeport, in Stratford, 117 years old, was the oldest person who died. Four hundred and four divorces were granted during the year.

—One of the most valuable collections of natural history in the United States was destroyed at the recent burning of the Academy of Sciences in Chicago. The ornithological collection had been gathered with great care by the Smithsonian Institute, and by Mr. Robert Kennicott, the curator of the Academy. The collection at $30,000, and was totally destroyed.

—A cave has been discovered near Nashville, in which were some human bones, supposed to have been those of Indians. Bows, arrows and other rude Indian weapons were found among them; also, several beads, the value of which is estimated at $200. Also several reels of wampum were found.

—The total revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, is estimated at $500,000,000 four hundred millions and $165,000,000 from tariffs.

—The Philadelphia Bulletin makes the startling statement that five hundred indictments for murder have been made in that city while citizens of it, since the collapse of the rebellion, without the possibility of being convicted of treason; while every one of them would have been convicted and punished, some on the most frivolous charges. The Bulletin regards this fact, not as saying that he had just pardoned two, one of whom, a lad of fifteen, had been proven guilty of the cowardly offence of stoning a ginger cake woth a dime, and sentenced to three years in the Penitentiary, and another who had stolen a basket of potatoes, was sent for five years to the same place.

—In 1795, when we first established a national government, the American shipping engaged in foreign trade was 127,329 tons. In twelve years it increased to 849,360 tons, and in 1807 it was 1,116,548 tons. From the last year of the war of 1812, it sank to 69,786 tons, and it took fifty years to come up to what it had been at the highest. In 1861 our registered sail tonnage was 2,546,630, having doubled in fifty years. The returns in 1861 show a diminution in tonnage of upward of a million, owing to the partial destruction and decline of British neutrality during the rebellion.

—A Milwaukee newspaper relates the following rather startling incident. It says: "On Thursday night a lame boat, which is kept by the proprietor of the Cambria House, got loose from his kennel, and started on an exploring expedition through the premises. Finding a door open, Rover entered, and made his way through the house. In passing through the hall he came in contact with one of the servingirls, an Irishlady, who, supposing that the bear was bent on mischief, began screaming with all her might. Rover, a bear-lamb, seem no to appreciate the joke, pursued her with all his might, and made a dash at the door. The poor servant could not get under the bed to hide from the monster. She therefore ran to the bed, and, in her excitement, in the presence of the girl, and a dog from making his way down stairs. Rover, on the contrary, compliments the servant girl on her good looks, and ventures to say, than she had no cause to be a bit lonely, and added her presence to the general fright. The bear commenced a charge upon the fair ones, being evidently in a sportive mood, but his unwelcome attentions movement he converted them both, and, raising himself on his hind legs, he began to dance with them as much as it to say, 'What do you think now, my dears?' By this time the whole house was in an uproar, and some came to the rescue of the besieged. Brain was seized by the collar, and dragged unceremoniously to his kennel, while the frightened women were taken care of by their parents or some of the house. They leisurely having been seen in no scent an apparel, and afterward laughed at the preposterous fears of Rover."

Foreign.—Another new fashion has originated among the eccentric nabobs of London and Paris—that of wearing a wedding ring on the thumb instead. For example, a white rose, without the slightest leaves or thorns, is worn on the left hand on the first joint of the thumb; the edges of the snowy leaves overlapping each other. Sometimes it is also done in colors, grouping dead violets, lilies, and pansies, and the like. The effect, it may be, yet after decisions recorded to be "quite too sweet for anything." The sentiment and the poetry in the memory of the dead lilies grouping emblems of the departed may or life and death and resurrection, all in black white however, with their glittering jet accompaniments.

—The London Saturday Review states that about 4,000,000 persons are now entitled to vote in the United Kingdom, of which number not more than one in a hundred avail themselves of the privilege. Bills introduce any effect upon the understandings of the multitude. Parliamentary debates are unintelligible to the ordinary hearer, more or less grammatical, which either never reach or are passed in the House, or are left to the bare side of the question. Assuming, then, that one fifth of the adult population is capable of half an intelligent vote," it is easy to discover how many years of agitation will be required to add a million more electors to the United Kingdom."

—The Emperor Napoleon, at last session of the British Parliament, a bill was introduced for clearing the statute book of all useless enactments, which have ceased to have become inoperative from various causes. The period covered by the bill extends from the 31st December of 1865 to the tenth of George III. One bill marked for repeal was passed in the reign of Queen Anne, and is entitled "For the preservation of white and black herring." Another was passed in the reign of Queen Anne, and is entitled "For the preservation of white and black herring." Another was passed in the reign of Edward III. and entitled "For the Regulation of Salmon." It is easy to discover how many years of agitation will be required to add a million more electors to the United Kingdom."

—The substitution of ocean penny postage, instead of the present rate, is now under discussion in some of the English press. It is argued that the goods can carried from Liverpool to New York for the rate of $3.35 to $50 per ton of forty cubic feet; a bale of dry goods can be sent weighing 400 pounds, and of the same ground, by the same ship, costs $8,000. The postage of letters between England and the United States $17,000 per ton; and yet the freight on the letters is more than twice as much as that on a bale worth $16 per ton. It is said that the cheap ocean postage would increase correspondence to such an extent from, in the increased correspondence.

—A letter from Jerusalem says that a proof of the good feeling which prevails among the different religious communities in the Holy City is found in the celebration of the Jewish festival, a few days back, at Maggiore, which is sacred in Jew and Christian eyes, was richly decorated by a number of Christian fellow-townsmen, who during the ceremony, which lasted for hours, were persons of divers religious forms of worship, was present.

—Gustave Doré, the wonderful illustrator of classical tales, is a native of Strasburg, and now only 34 years old. He was born in Strasburg in 1832, and so may be regarded as half German and half French. His parents were laborious idlers when only sixteen, on the Journal pour rire, which was published weekly, and of which the chief weighing, having arrived from Switzerland, it was found to be impossible to publish the paper, and that they were studied full of cigars of the finest brands.

It was supposed to be unhealthy. It had been informed me unhealthy, but also as to its fertility, and climate very healthy. It was his opinion that it would one day become the granary of the world, supporting in comfort twenty millions of inhabitants.

AMERICAN FEMALE SCULPTORS.

THE London Art Journal has a double claim to commendation; its numerous illustrations are in the characteristically high style of the art, and its articles are most diversified, instructive and interesting. There is much in a recent number on "Rome," from which we take an extract or two, hoping it may induce our female readers to peruse the whole:

"Mrs. Browning's reasons for obvious reasons we give precedence, as an English lady by birth, an American by marriage, and a resident for many years, and probably in Rome, eight or nine of which have been devoted to sculpture. Her first work was a bust of her husband (children), and, as if to suppy the want of that which has been denied to her by the fates, she has modelled her woman nature into the pretty marble statuettes and bas-reliefs which she executes. Who that has seen in forget her 'Sleeping Nelly,' as idea taken from that inimitable production of Hiram Powers, 'The Greek Slave Shop.' Poor, deserted N—y, deserted by all but Providence, and her mother, Mrs. Browning's two beautiful guardian angels are watching at her pillow. This, one may suppose, was the first work of the modeller's art. Very similar in character are the 'Princes Sleeping in the Tower,' a composition which is to be cast in bronze. In twenty-four figures in relief she describes a Brazilian feast, all of them children, and all indicative of the gayety of youth, some dancing, some playing on musical instruments. Vine leaves and grapes fill the borders of the group, which is completed by a bold medallion of the appear to have yielded to the soporific influences of the jolly god.

Again:

"Of Miss Hosmer, an American lady, it is unnecessary to say that she is well known in this country and to the British as well as to the American public. She arrived in Rome about twelve or thirteen years since, and studied for some time under the great master; Gibson, of whom she was a favorite pupil. One of the first, if not the first, of her sex who adopted the profession of sculptor in the Eternal City. Miss Hosmer excited not a little curiosity, and later a much attention, by the singular character of her studio. Instead of the usual block of marble, a rock on a mushroom, which has been described as the model of her earliest works, was to be seen. Then came her reputation; but, to our regret, her 'sleeping works' have not been executed in marble. The perfection of form, the graceful position, the perfect repose of the figure, are wonderful in the art, and we are half disposed to think that the sleeping figure is the position in which it is philosophically described. At present Miss Hosmer is modelling, as a companion to the 'Waking Puck,' the youngster of the right family is seated on the ground by his side, and apparently absorbed in the recovery of his parrot, has managed to bind him; but the Fates suddenly awake, bearing the shears with which they are about being quent by the hair. Another work now nearly completed is the sister group to the Puck, a composition for both of Marianne Alford, who was one of the first to appreciate the interesting subject. The figure of the sleeping Puck is formed of a series of large shells, from the centre of which rises a pedestal bearing on the summit a scroll. Round the base of the pedestal are three water-sprites, two of them dolphins, each little chubby face turned upward, or in a listening attitude, to catch a glimpse of the sleeping Puck, and commencing such sweet melody. Graceful in design, the entire group, so far as we can judge of it in the unfinished state, bids fair to be one of the most finished works of the fair artist.

From the studio of Miss Emma Hosmer is Miss Edmonia Lewis, a colored lady, whose sex, extreme youth and color justify our most sympathetic regard. She is an Indian mother and a negro father, she passed the first twelve years of her life in the wilds, fishing, hunting, swimming and making moccasins. Her love of sculpture first manifested itself in modelling animals. The 'Lion' made something like that," she said to a benevolent gentleman who was visiting her studio, "and he took it to persuade her to visit his studio. Then she had some day given her her self-confidence, and, with a mind thus unfettered so well as to merit praise and encouragement. Her first sculpture she calls 'Old Sally,' being a bust of a negro woman, the 'Sally' and here she is simple and natural. Her next work was a bust of Colonel Shaw, a subject which must have been a difficult one, competing with the finished masters of the art. As she has finished her last work, a bust of Lincoln, she modelled a bust of Col. Shaw, who commanded the first colored regiment that was raised in the free States, and who has been ordered by the family of the brave colonel, who fell leading his men to victory. Another bust, of Mr. Dionysius Lewis, of New York, is nearly completed as a companion. Miss Lewis is a member of the Catholic Church, a broad woman falling on her knees, and, with clasped hands and upturned face, thanking God for the blessings of liberty. She has not forgotten her people, and this early dedication of her genius to their cause is honorable to her feelings. Two other groups, the designs of which are taken from Longfellow's 'Hiawatha,' are nearly modeled. They represent, first, Hiawatha coming to the wigwam of his love to claim her as his bride, and the last, on token of an offer of marriage; and secondly, Hiawatha leading Minnehaha home from the land of the Dakotahs."

This interesting article furnishes other illustrations of the fact that, among the lady artists in Rome, the American element is very prominent.

Bread Upon the Waters.

WHEN I was at college I chanced to be returning to my quarters one late hour one night, when I stumbled over something lying on the sidewalk. As I was just beginning my junior year, and had consequently some little knowledge of human life, and swearing was a mark of superior manhood, without so much as a blessing upon careless watchmen I bent it down, and after a little examination found that I had stumbled over one of the city nowsboys. He was almost frozen; so wrapping him up in my overcoat, I carried him with some difficulty up the long hill, and soon had him in quarters something warmer than those in which he had found him.

It was a long time before the boy became conscious of his whereabouts; but when his delirium was over, and I found that before my wrapped in my warm dressing-gown, I ascertained how it happened that I found him asleep on the sidewalk.

He told his story in a few words. He was alone in the world—his father and mother were dead—and he was shifting for himself. He had been unsuccessful in the sale of his papers that day, was hungry and cold, and, as he said, he was disloving very cold, he had crouched down a moment at the corner to shield himself from the cutting blast, had fallen asleep, and in that state I had found him.

I thought the little sinner was lying to me when he began to tell me his story and made up my mind that I watched to see if he didn't bring himself out some way before he finished. He was a bright little fellow, full of fun, sure, and very jolly, but he did have a keen, black eye, and no mistake. His story, plain as it was, was not added to much. I feeling sure he was not lying to me, had decided what to do.

The next morning, measuring the length, breadth and thickness of my nowsboy, I went down street to my tailor's, obtained a suit of clothes which, after some fitting on the boy, of which, with a few changes, proved to be just the thing, purchased a pair of shoes which exactly suited the measure I had in my pocket, and returned to my room before the lad was awake

You ought to have seen how he opened those eyes and stared when he entered the room, at everything, and have watched the shadow of perplexity, accumulating on his face when I told him that, at the recollections of the last few hours came back.

"Well, my man," said I, "how do you feel? Have you any recollection of these large sets of anywhere near the size of that body of yours?"

He was out of bed in a flash, and in a very short time was dressed in the new suit. Ah! but he did look well, as he stood there so neat and trim, and so thankful withal, that I felt as the schoolmaster did when he gave the boy a flogging, "I was more blessed to give than to receive."

I had made the boy with me till he was well and strong, and one morning called him to me, and in a set speech, à la junior exhibition, said:

"Mr. Newsboy, it is high time that you should begin again the voyage of active life, and this morning I am going to cut you adrift. Here's a little desk to help you along in your travels at first, and do you be careful that you don't make a bad use of it. Before you go I want you to promise me that you will preserve yourself, by temperance to society, and all that sort of thing, will you?"

He said yes, of course, a dozen times, and after a hearty shake of the hand and a hasty "Good-by, Sam," he disappeared down the college stairs.

Time passed along. I graduated, settled in business, married; but still never once heard of my boy, and at last he and the occurrence were forgotten.

Five years ago this winter my business called me to the West. It proved a sorry journey to me. I lost my traveling-sack, containing valuables to a considerable amount; my baggage was lost a wild goose chase without the least shadow of success, and just about discouraged, I left Chicago.

Misfortune did not desert me here. On seeking my wallet, I found that it had been stolen, and what I had cash in my pocket. I was in a faint recollection of not feeling particularly amiable just at that time. Out West, in those days, was something that it is not now, and it is now, where you roll over the ground at the rate of forty miles an hour, and out West, with not a dollar, and no means of communication but a line of small-paced stage-coaches, was anything but delightful.

The coach for the East was just starting, and having watched it out of sight, I went back to the tavern and sat down to think how I should get out of my difficulty. I had been sitting there for some little time, when a man who had been warning himself with his back to the fire drew his chair nearer to mine, and, after a little chat at the weather, surprised me by asking if I wasn't Mr. ——, of Providence, Rhode Island. I told him I was, and before he could return the compliment of asking his name, he said:

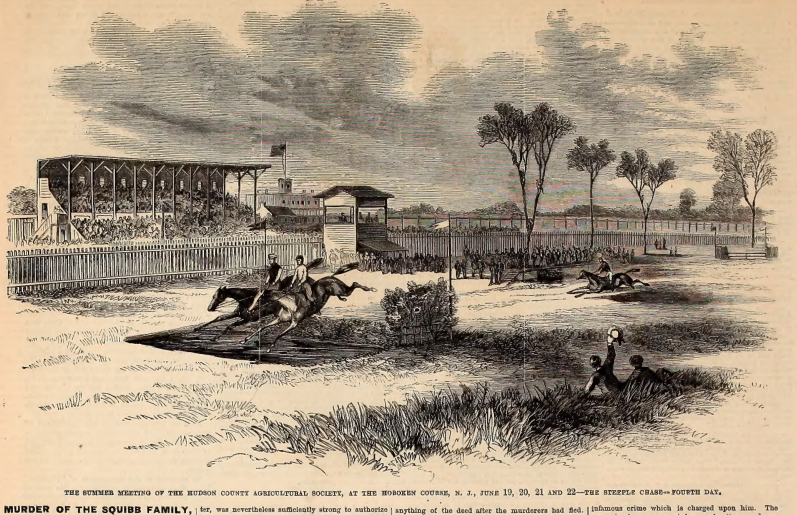
"Do you remember the boy whom, when you were a student in the university, you found almost frozen in the streets of Providence? Do you remember that I promised you (I was that boy), to be a honest, industrious man, to behave myself, and become an ornament to society? Well, sir, I have kept my word, and I have without fear of denial, that I am an honest and successful man, and that whatever I am, morally, socially, I am indebted for every bit of it, and he shook my hand as only a grateful man can.

Then he told me what he had been about all these years; by industry and economy since he had won the confidence of his employer, had in time been admitted by him as a partner, had married his partner's daughter, and was, in fact, a happy man.

My surprise at the appearance of "my boy," had evidently pleasure in meeting me, his earnest inquiries after my welfare—all these things at the time highly appreciated, and I shall never forget him how it was strained. He laughed at my misfortunes, hoped I "wouldn't lie awake o' nights grieving about it," and then quietly turned me away. He took me to his office, told me of his extensive business, made me snake hands with his fellow-clerks, he introduced me to his lovely mistress, his wife.

I passed a pleasant week under that friendly roof, and more than once thought, as I left my native homeward, how many more such grateful harvests might be garnered if men would be less miserly of the proper seed.

POISONS OF HUMAN DISEASES.



THE poison of scarlet fever, although it has not yet been a parsed and carried on in ivory point or in bone, like that of small-pox, is nevertheless a solid poison. It appears to be thrown off with the epithelial covering of the skin and mucous surfaces. It travels very short distances by the air, but it holds tenaciously to solid articles. We have direct evidence, which we have communicated elsewhere, to show that this poison may be carried by a letter, by a slipper, and by a large piece of clothing. The unwashed clothes of the poor in the agricultural districts it is retained in the fabric, which forms too often the ceiling of the bedroom. In one case we have communicated the disease by inoculation although the evidence on this point is doubtful, and we have also, by bags or morsels of flannel, it impregnates the susceptible body, and gives rise to further disease. The poison of small-pox, it is destroyed at 212 deg. Fahr.

The poison of measles is carried with even more difficulty than that of whooping-cough. It is form it in the breath, and it is destroyed by a temperature of 212 deg. Fahr.

The poison of diphtheria is conveyed with even more difficulty than that of whooping-cough. It is form it in the breath, and it is destroyed by a temperature of 212 deg. Fahr.

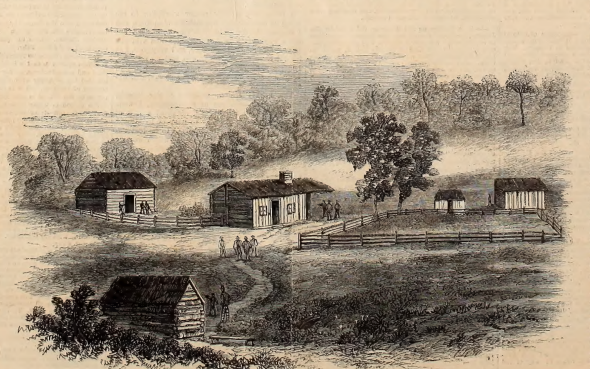
Poverty and pride are combined in the most unnatural union with ignorance and with idleness, the depth or wretchedness is attained.

If you would enjoy your meals, be good-natured, and make others so; and cannot tell whether he is eating boiled cabbage or stewed umbrellas.

THE SUMMER MEETING OF THE HUDSON COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY, AT THE HOBOKEN COURSE, N. J., JUNE 19, 20, 21 AND 22—THE STEEPLE CHASE—FOURTH DAY.

MURDER OF THE SQUIBB FAMILY,

In York County, Pa.



THE spirit of Cain seems to be let loose upon the land, and scarcely a day passes without the record of some frightful and successful attempt to destroy human life. A few weeks since, the incarnate fiend, Probst, murdered the whole Deering family, and just as he had exploited his aggravated crimes on the gallows, the soil of the Keystone State was stained with the blood of another innocent household, who fell victims to the wanton cruelty or malicious hate of the assassin.

George Squibb, a respectable and inoffensive old man of Quaker descent, was living, with his wife and grand-daughter, on a small farm situated in a quiet and secluded spot, at the foot of Dare's Hill, in Warrington Township. He had owned it for many years, and by strict economy and industry had succeeded in accumulating a small sum of money, which he kept in the house, and was in the habit of loaning out to his friends and neighbors as their necessities required. He was seventy-one years old at the time of his assassination, and his wife, who is still living, was aged sixty-seven. The little granddaughter was between eleven and twelve. On the evening of Sunday, the 17th ult., as appearances indicated, about the time they were preparing to retire to bed, the murderer or murderers entered his humble dwelling, and commenced their bloody work. The house is situated about 150 yards from a public road, leading from the Lisbon road to the road going to Lewisberry, and is distant from the nearest dwelling about five or six hundred yards. It is an old dilapidated building, constructed of rough logs, is but one story high, and no one who was not acquainted with the character and habits of its inmates would have thought for a moment that they were in the possession of any money whatever. It would be the last place to which a stranger would have resorted for robbery or gain. It has but two rooms on the ground floor, the one used as a kitchen and sitting-room, and the other as a bed-chamber. It was, therefore, pretty strongly suspected that some one residing in the neighborhood, and who was acquainted with the family, was connected with the dark crime. It is stated that two suspicious-looking strangers were seen in the neighborhood on Sunday, but while the investigations were going on, a man by the name of William Donavan, familiarly known as Irish Bill, who resides about a mile from the house where the murder was committed, was arrested and brought before the coroner's jury, and subjected to a close and telling examination. The evidence against him, independent of a circumstantial character, was nevertheless sufficiently strong to authorize the jury in committing him for trial at the August term of the Court.

It seems that Donavan, about five years ago, in a wanton and cruel manner, beat one of Mr. Squibb's cows so that it died, and Squibb brought a suit against him to recover the price of the animal. It was decided in his favor, and when, Donavan was obliged to pay the money, he made threats that he would have revenge on Squibb if it were twenty years afterward. Donavan is an ill-tempered, desperate character, and is the terror of the neighborhood, particularly when under the influence of liquor, which is often the case. Ostensibly, at least, he is the owner of a small property on the north side of Dare's Hill, and it is said that several executions are pending against him which he is unable to satisfy. He knew that the Squibbs had money in the house, and probably availed himself of the opportunity to gratify his revenge and supply himself with the money to settle his liabilities at the same time. The wounds upon the heads of the victims are all on the right side, showing pretty conclusively that they were inflicted by a left-handed person, and Donavan is a left-handed man.

The murder was discovered on Monday morning, about ten o'clock, and the victims of the brutal outrage, both the living and the dead, must have lain where they were found, during the whole of Sunday night, up to the hour mentioned. George Smilbaker, a grandson of Mr. Squibb, came to the house about ten o'clock to borrow an auger, and was the first person who knew anything of the deed after the murderers had fled. The alarm was immediately given, and the neighbors collected from far and near to witness the awful spectacle and to devise some means of bringing the guilty parties to justice. George Squibb was found lying face downward, upon the porch, with a pool of coagulated blood around him, and his features covered beyond recognition with the same. He was insensible but not dead. He lived until half-past twelve o'clock on Monday night. There were fourteen wounds on the right side of his head, thirteen of which had penetrated to the brain, and, of course, he remained perfectly unconscious to the time of his death. The little granddaughter was lying dead in the kitchen, with the back part of her head crushed in, showing that the hand who robbed her of her innocent life must have accomplished his purpose by using a heavy hammer or some similar instrument. Close beside the corpse of the child, Mrs. Mary Squibb was lying in a state of insensibility and covered with blood. She had three wounds on the right side of the head, one of which produced a slight fracture of the skull. Although at the present writing very feeble and greatly prostrated by the terrible shock her nervous system has sustained, there are slight hopes of her recovery entertained by her attending physician. Should she survive, she unquestionably will be able to identify the persons who committed the murder, or should she ever be so far restored as to be able to state what might be received as her dying testimony, it will either tend to convict the party now accused, or relieve him entirely from the infamous crime which is charged upon him. The amount of money carried away by the murderers cannot be ascertained. It is supposed, however, to be some three or four hundred dollars. About the same amount was left in one of the bureau drawers untouched, having escaped the search of the plunderers. There was nothing left or found on the premises to indicate what kind of an instrument had been used by the assassin, but it would seem from the appearance of the wounds that they were inflicted with a blunt piece of wood or iron. The awful deed has thrown a gloom over the community, and the surviving relatives of the murdered family are receiving the warmest and most heartfelt expressions of sympathy.

The illustration on this page shows a view of the house where the horrible tragedy was enacted. The spot is an isolated, lonely one, and the frequent occurrence of such crimes will break in upon the feeling of security, which heretofore has pervaded the rural districts of our happy country.

THE SCENE OF THE LATE BUTCHERY OF THE SQUIBB FAMILY, WARRINGTON TOWNSHIP, YORK COUNTY, PENN.—SKETCHED BY GEO. W. M'ELROY.

THE STEEPLE-CHASE.

THE spring meeting of the Hudson County Agricultural Society was held at Hoboken, N. J., on the 19th ult., and continued four days. It proved to be one of the most brilliant and successful affairs of the kind ever held in America. The weather was magnificent, the attendance unprecedentedly large, and the trials of speed between the various horses brought upon the course most satisfactory. One of the most interesting features of the meeting was the steeple-chase on the last day, which we illustrate on this page.

This was a race of three miles over the rough ground inside the track, with twenty-seven jumps. There is an irresistible attraction for sight-seers and curiosity-seekers to any place where anybody runs a risk of life or limb, or where it is expected that anybody will break his neck or put it in imminent jeopardy. The running horses seem to be gaining popularity over the trotting horse for the very insufficient reason that they go swifter, and steeple-chasing draws more spectators than mere running for the reason that people love excitement and relish anything that thrills the nerves.

The route for the steeple-chase, commencing on the regular track over one hurdle, passed thence into the field over two or three rail fences, about four feet high; at the opposite side led over a fourteen feet field ditch, thence around on the inside, over several rail fences to the brush and water-jump. The horses were to go three times around, coming on to the regular track at the last round, and making in all twenty-seven jumps.

Of the four horses starting in this chase, only two succeeded in completing the rounds. The winner at the Paterson steeple-chase the week before, fell, throwing the rider and injuring him fatally.

The particular feature of the race, shown in the picture, is the vaulting over several hurdles in succession by two of the horses simultaneously.

Much of the satisfaction afforded by these races was due to the good management of the lease of the grounds, Colonel McDaniel, assisted by the efficient and energetic Secretary and Superintendent of the Association, Messrs. J. Harvey Lyons and John M. Francis.

The popular Caterer, Mr. Charles F. Lotman, contributed greatly to the comfort of the crowd of spectators, by providing an abundance of such good things as their wants craved, no unimportant matter on such an occasion.

THE CAROLINA TWINS,

Now on Exhibition at Barnum's Museum.

THE strange freak of nature is the blending together of two colored girls in a manner more thorough than the linking of the Siamese Twins. In the case of the latter, a ligament about two inches and a half in diameter binds the twain together at the region of the stomach, and this ligament being the only point of connection between the two brothers, the individuality of each is distinct, except in respect to this link. The Carolina Twins, as this latter wonder is styled, are placed together, back to back, and instead of a mere ligament, the bodies are actually blended into one from the bottom of the trunk to a short distance above the lower ribs. Throughout the point of contact there is but a single spinal column. Above the connecting point the spine branches off, forming two distinct human beings, with separate stomachs, two hearts, two heads, the regular allowance of arms, etc. Below the point of contact there is the proper supply of legs for two persons; but in each, the nerves of sensation, which centre in the spinal column, affect both girls in precisely the same degree, while there is independent action above the point of contact. To explain our meaning better, we would say, that if a visitor were to touch Millie upon the toe, Christina would immediately turn her head in response to the touch; while pinches upon the arm, or a touch upon any part of the body above the point of contact, would only be felt by the person touched.

Except at the part of the body where the twins are blended into one, and where one set of functions serve the purposes of both, there are but few points of difference between these strange children and ordinary humanity. Most curious among the exceptions is the fact, that, while the heart of one of the girls is in its proper place, that organ is upon the right side of the other. Their pulses never beat in common, there being a complete alternation in the beatings, and both working with the regularity of a pendulum. The girls are bright and intelligent for their condition in life. They sing, play, dance, read, write and converse, and do all with sprightliness and good humor. They chat with each other almost incessantly when not otherwise occupied, and the two talk with different persons upon different subjects at the same moment. They seem perfectly cheerful in their strangely blended condition, declare that they know of no inconvenience resulting from it, and protest that they would be unhappy if they were separated, were such a thing possible.

The twins are about fourteen years old. They were born in Columbus County, North Carolina. Their father and mother were healthy, well-formed persons, and the mother gave birth to sixteen children, besides the strange pair whom we have attempted to describe. All their brothers and sisters were properly formed boys and girls. North Carolina, which was the birth-place of these twins, seems to enjoy a sort of monopoly of such strange natural productions. It will be remembered that the Siamese Twins have made their home in that State.

THE "CAROLINA TWINS," MILLIE AND CHRISTINA, NOW ON EXHIBITION AT BARNUM'S MUSEUM, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

ENGLISH OPERA.

THE establishment of English Opera in this city has been an achievement long desired and frequently attempted, but with such varied success as to dishearten nearly every manager who has undertaken the enterprise.

It has been reserved for Mr. Julius Eichberg to attain a triumph that others have sought in vain. For some weeks he has produced, at the French Theatre, his sparkling and graceful "Doctor of Alcantara," and other operas, that have been received with great favor by crowded and appreciative audiences.

The acting and singing have been excellent; and while there are, doubtless, defects, we are disposed to overlook them, in the desire to foster and encourage an effort that promises so much and has succeeded so well. The introduction of Mr. Eichberg's operas may properly be regarded as inaugurating a new era in the history of musical enterprise in this city. By sustaining home talent, we shall have better performances, and a more improved musical taste, while by trusting to our own resources we can at all times, provide such entertainments as will please and profit.

We have selected for illustration the scene in the second act. The "Good night, Señor Balthasar!" is one of the best things in the opera, the rendition of which by the artists is extremely happy. Mr. Fetchum, as Señor Balthasar, convulses the audience with his varied manifestations and agitation at being left alone; terror indescribable is depicted on every feature, but he is at length relieved from his fears on the assemblage of the family, and all ends happily.

CONTRASTS IN NEW YORK.

A LARGE city is an epitome of the world, comprising every condition of social existence, and presenting all the phases of human life. Wealth, and all it commands of comfort, influence and enjoyment; Poverty, and all it suffers of sorrow, and wretchedness, and despair; Refinement, springing from virtue and intelligence; Coarseness, growing out of vice and depravity; Taste, the result of high culture and enlarged ideas; Vulgarity, the resultant of ignorance: all these exist side by side, and make up the variety or city life. And in no city these differences more marked than in New York. Our population represents almost every nationality, forming a kind of social conglomerate, in which the various individual peculiarities are retained, giving character to the whole mass, while all is crystallized into a distinct form, unlike any other, and possessing its own generic distinctions. It is a common but mistaken notion that, because the metropolis is the centre of enterprise, and capital, and influence, it must likewise be the concentration of all comfort, and wealth, and domestic enjoyment. These do exist here in their most attractive forms, but they exist in juxtaposition with all that is sad, and miserable, and repulsive in life.

On our outside pages we present some of the contrasts that exist in our city, and make up its distinctive character. And these, so far from being exaggerations or caricatures, barely afford an idea of what would strike even the casual observer. The quiet, orderly, virtuous citizen, while on his way to church with his family, will be almost deafened with the hoarse cries of newsboys, or shocked by the brutal cursings of the rabble, who defy law and outrage decency. The millionaire, whose costly mansion contains every luxury and convenience and comfort that money can command, may look from his lordly windows upon the rude hovel of the miserable squatter, who gladly calls some squalid shanty his home. The successful merchant, whose business is summed up by scores of millions, has an earnest competitor in the street vender of nuts, and candies, and toys.

Each thoroughfare presents its own type of fashion and social standing and exclusiveness; and the frequenters of our various promenades are as different in their appearance and character as if they lived on opposite sides of the globe. The daughters of fortune amuse themselves in viewing the costly fabrics and rich products that our fashionable stores offer for their inspection and purchase; the daughters of perdition pass a few gay hours heading the siren song of forbidden pleasure that leads to ruin and shame.

Central Park is enlivened with gay equipages and joyous ramblers, proving a fruitful delight; while a few squares away are the filthy offal wharves, the repulsive receptacles of what is cast away in all our homes and streets. And so we might proceed: but the picture explains itself, and gives, at a single view, a glance at life as it is. Its lessons are obvious, and each reader can form his own conclusions.

VICE should excite shame for its own sake, and not for the censure which it may incur from others. The virtue of him who is guarded from temptation only by the fear of the world, and the probability of detection, is certainly fortified by feeble defenses.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "THE DOCTOR OF ALCANTARA," BY JULIUS EICHBERG, AT THE FRENCH THEATRE, FOURTEENTH STREET, N. Y., BY THE ENGLISH OPERA TROUPE NOW PERFORMING THERE.

THE EMPTY NEST.

Yor ask my Annie for a wife, my sweetest and my best,
The last of all the darlings that once filled the dear-home nest,
And with kindly care and tenderness you pray I, too, will come,
To live a loved and honored guest within your pleasant home;
You say that, for the share in that poor child's heart you have won,
You'll render back to me the love and duty of a son.

Yes; I will come; my children all are scattered far and wide,
My sons and daughters each have found their own warm fireside;
My own would seem too desolate, too dreary, and too lone
When this, my last sweet birdie, from my shelter-ing wing is gone;
But, oh, 'tis not without a pang, I bid my home farewell,
And go—beneath another roof, in other walls, to dwell.

My life has been a peaceful life—few trials in the past,
And I still can keep a cheerful heart, chastened, but not o'ercast;
I would not have been spared one cross, one sweet that which left
My life of its far dearer part forsaken and bereft,
For if no trial had been sent, nor any grief been given,
I might have doubted of my hope for happiness in heaven.

Yes, all has been as it should be; and in the days to come
I may live in pleasant usefulness in your bright, cheerful home;
But none can ever be as dear, or seem so fair and good,
As where I came a bride, and knew the grief of widowhood;
I hardly think that sanctifies and gives the highest worth—
That here I've known my deepest joy and heaviest grief on earth.

My dear old home! how fair it stands amid its wide green lawn—
Its trees, grand in their stately growth, the grass so smooth shorn!
The rose-trees round the porch will still grow taller day by day,
And the lindens be just as thick and trim when I am far away:
The garden borders, here and there, bright as they were before—
But I must not call it now my home—it will know me soon no more.

The wide, high hall will be as cool in summer's sultry days,
The parlor just as bright and warm in the clear Christmas blaze,
And around the hospitable hearth, perhaps, just as of old,
Friends gather close, and songs be sung, and many tales be told;
And like my own dear parents, in reverend age be seen
Some grandpapa and gran1mama, to keep their memory green.

Twill always warm my heart to turn in fancy back again
To where I've felt the most I'll know of this world's pain;
Its walls are precious to my heart, 'tis sanctified to me
As none, however bright or glad, again can ever be;
'Tis grown like a forsaken nest with all the young birds flown;
I love it still, but cannot dwell here desolate and lone.

COUSIN KATE.

BY G. CLIFFORD.

"WELL, Miss Blonde, of all the stupid wills in the world, I think the will your father made was the stupidest. I wouldn't love such a father a bit —although he is dead and gone."

"You must bear in mind, Madge, that my father's sister married against her father's consent, and when her husband secured her money, all he cared for was to waste it. This must be some excuse for my poor father, who, I am told, cried with vexation when he was told I was a girl, and not a boy, as he had hoped."

"Do you remember your father, Miss Blonde?"

"Well, I have a faint recollection of a very grave man, who would come up now and then into my nursery and pat me on my head; but I was only six when he died, and as I lost my mother when I was quite an infant, I, of course, was not the slightest recollection of her. Since then I have lived with my old bachelor uncle, Mr. Egerton, the only one of my guardians I like."

"To think that you cannot marry without the consent of four musty old fellows, who never knew what love was in all their lives! And if you do marry without their consent, you only have two thousand dollars a year for your life, while your splendid fortune goes to found an institute for lunatics—I declare it is enough to drive any young lady mad, and make her one of the first patients for her father's brilliant idea. Oh, if I were you, Miss Blonde, I'd outwit those old rascals, your guardians, that I would!"

Our readers will gather from this brief dialogue that Madge was Blonde's waiting-maid, and that Blonde was an orphan and an heiress. Her father, Mr. Delmar, had been a Boston merchant, but eventually settled in New York, where he made a large fortune, which he left to his only child, under such stringent conditions, that her marriage became almost an impossibility, unless she chose to sacrifice her wealth, and contest herself with the mere pittance of two thousand dollars a year. Mr. Delmar had been induced to this step from a profound disgust of the marriage state.

He had, when quite an elderly man, married one of those detestable things called belles, whose only pursuit was dress, pleasure and frivolity. Being a reserved man, he took his bride (unlucky!) but it gave him such a distaste for marriage, that when he heard his wife had given him a daughter instead of a son, he declared that if he could help it, she should never make a man miserable, as her mother had done. He therefore selected from his nearest kinsmen acquaintance for his child, people—four of the most opposite characters to each find, and left them guardians to his daughter. Let us in a few words describe them.

Mr. Lucre was a mean, miserly man, who never had a thought beyond money. With the usual reckless ness of Providence, his son, Thomas Lucre, was one of those insufferable exquisites who make Bond Street miserable. He was a complete copy of Lord Dundreary. He cultivated the same inane whiskers, imitated the same style of pronouncing, and occasionally had an almost supernatural concentration of his mental energies, produce a conundrum. This effort, however, generally produced a severe mental prostration, and required several bottles of eau-de-Cologne to restore him to his former condition. In a word, Mr. Thomas Lucre was a very fine young gentleman who come out of their bandboxes every afternoon for the special admiration of the ladies. He did not speak—he drawled over his words—his most eloquent speeches being, "Distinctually so!" "Pawsitively no!" "By Jauve, you pawfectly astawnish me!"

His notions of a lady's food were ice-cream, ratafia cakes, and a very small glass of green stuff. He once sat a lady's acquaintance because at a supper she took two sardines, which he declared were sufficient for the army of Xerxes. He avoided a meal-table as he did a pestilence, always speaking himself in so low and languid a tone that it was inaudible a yard off. His habits of dress were equally fastidious—one of his spotlessness being that it took six artistes to make a glove, one for each finger and two for the thumb. Such was old Lucre's only son and heir, and the one whom his father had determined should marry the wholehearted and lively Blonde. Mr. Egerton, who had the personal care of her, was of a very different stock: he was a retired merchant, very fond of his garden, his house, his grounds and his library. He was a gentleman and a man of the strictest honor. Owing to a disappointment in early life, he remained a bachelor, and his days, finding more consolation in his quiet pursuits than in the decisive snares of wife and children, this malapropant stupidity of his friend Delmar's will was a great source of annoyance to him, and if he could do anything to modify its selfish severity, he would most cordially do it.

Mr. Solomon Grabham was another of her guardians, and belonged to the same class as old Lucre; he was a wealthy city goods merchant, and dearly loved his money. His only child Mr. Barnabas Grabham was just the reverse of his father, being extravagant and always hard up, partly the result of his own improvidence and partly the result of Mr. Father's parsimony. Despite all his father's lecturings nothing would induce Barnabas to attend to business, and when he did he made such alarming blunders, that at last his father was reconciled to his absence from the store, and allowed him a certain sum for his private expenses. This, however, was a very little way with a man or his prodigal habits. The last of this singular band of guardians was Mr. Bletchy: he was an Englishman, who, having visited this country as a managing partner of a Liverpool house, married an American lady, and settled down in his home. Ephraim was one of those sneaking and cowardly young men who now and then shame the human shape. His father was pompous and conceited, and despite his reverence for riches, really considered it a great honor for his son to marry an American lady.

As Mr. Egerton lived in the country, and as there was no opportunity for him and his brother guardians, Blonde had never seen any of these aspirants to her hand, or rather, to her money, for her personal attractions were only some once a year, and sometimes not even so often. By her father's will she was not to enter on her rights until her twenty-second birthday, and that eventful period was on the very point of arrival. She was then to accept a husband at the hands of her guardians, or remain for all her life, unless she chose to marry whom she pleased on the love-in-a-cottage stripend of two thousand dollars a year. Such was Mr. Delmar's fallacy in love, and not with any of the suitors whom she had never seen, but with a very handsome, serious, learned, and accomplished young friend Claude Vesey, who had been for the last two years a resident in the Egerton household. Mr. Egerton received that his ward, for whom he cherished a fond affection, should have an education worthy of her position and wealth.

The all-important day arrived when Blonde was to test her fate. Madge informed her the first she would have to encounter would be old Lucre. Blonde received him with great cordiality, and in reply to his question, as to whether she had ever seen his son, replied that she had seen his photograph, which, if it was anything like him, was enough of itself to fascinate any woman.

"You are still a very handsome man yourself, Mr. Lucre. Now, from what I hear of your son, he is just the man I have long wished, I may make this bargain with you: I engage to give the preference to your son, if you will give me your promise, in writing, not to withhold your consent from any one I may choose, in the event of your son rejecting me."

"Reject you! Why, he must be mad to reject you; he is coming to-morrow for that very purpose."

"Then you agree to my terms?".

"Certainly," replied old Lucre, and begged Blonde to give him pen and materials.

Blonde called Madge to bring the necessary articles in, and was told to wait to witness the memorandum.

"Madge," said her mistress, "you know what I think of Mr. Lucre, and that it is my intention to give him the preference, if he will accept me. In consideration of this promise, Mr. Lucre consents to give his power in the will he refuses to marry me."

"Certainly," said Mr. Lucre; "and here is the same in black and white; but promise of Miss Lucre is as good as gold. Now, young woman, witness this."

Madge did as requested; and after warmly applauding Blonde's taste in selecting his son, old Lucre took his departure, actually slipping into Madge's hand a dollar as a douceur.

When left to themselves, Blonde and her adviser, Madge, had a quiet talk.

"Leave a woman alone," said the latter, "if, when she tries, she cannot outwit all the men in this world."

When old Grabham was introduced, Blonde told Madge she need not leave the room, as what she had to say was addressed to her.

"Oh, my dear Mr. Grabham," was Blonde's welcome to the old miser, "I congratulate you on having such a son. I am positively in love from merely seeing his photograph. What a charming expression of countenance! I can, however, read character in you. He has dotted his face and fortune from you."

Old Grabham, pleased with this, felt the fascination of such words from such a pretty mouth as Blonde's, and he assured her how delighted he was to have such a daughter.

"Now, Mr. Grabham," said Blonde, in her most winning manner, "can you keep a secret?"

Old Grabham vowed he could, but pointed at Madge.

"Oh," said Blonde, "it's no secret to her; I tell her when I like, and she comes into my head. I am afraid, from your nice sense of honor, you will think I am not treating the other suitors fairly; but as woman's happiness is her all in all—"

"The secret, my dear lady!—the secret!" said old Grabham, "I am sure you wouldn't act unfairly for all the young men in the United States."

"You only do me justice," observed Blonde, "and I thank you. Now, I am a proud woman, and do not like to be dictated to; so I have resolved to choose my husband, and not have my husband, on one condition, which is, that if he should reject me, you will make no opposition to my choice."

"But I know he will not reject you, my dear girl."

"Well, then, if you are sure he won't, we are sure to be married, and you can have no hesitation in giving me your written promise, as I have requested."

The old miser sat for a few moments, as though in doubt.

"I know it is a whim; but you should remember I am but one of the witnesses, as women ought to be of Miss Harvey Blonde, carelessly. "Yes or no, Mr. Grabham? I am a very self-willed and obstinate girl, despite my amiability."

Old Grabham, who loved the large, honest eyes of the fair heiress, and said:

"Honor bright, Miss Delmar, you solemnly promise to marry me?"

"That's if he does not reject me. I suppose you do not want me to drag him to the altar, and shoot him if he refuses?"

"I will do it now. Where is pen, ink and paper?"

Madge witnessed the old man's signature, and Grabham took his departure.

"Remember, Mr. Grabham, this is a secret, known to you and me only. I quite right for a young lady to confess as much as I have to you; but I know your son will make an excellent husband."

When old Grabham had left the room, Blonde shrugged her lovely shoulders, and said:

"Heaven pardon me for this trick, and you, dear Madge, for suggesting it—I don't know which is the worst!"

Madge looked quite arch!

"For mercy's sake! I would tell a bushel of fibs, and play a hundred tricks, innocent as this, to secure the man I love, and the girl that wouldn't, cannot care a fig whether she marries the right or the wrong man, so long as she gets a husband!"

Blonde succeeded equally well with Mr. Stately, and Mr. Solomon Bletchy. Mr. Egerton had no son, and wanted only that she should entirely consult her own taste in the matter, there was no need to tell a falsehood to him; and so, however, much as she loved him, let him into her ingenious but daring plot to get rid of the necessity of consulting the prejudices of those whom she had resolved, by appealing to their selfishness, for not one of them, of course, for a moment thought that one of their number would refuse her hand.

In order to carry out, with the greatest probability if success, the erratic scheme proposed by Madge, Blonde had arranged that an hour should elapse between the visit of each suitor, and that they should come in a certain order, so that she might deal with them to the most advantage. The first that arrived was that prince of exquisites, Mr. Tenuel Lucre. He came in his elegant little brougham, closely covered from the wind and dust, lest, as Shakspeare says, "They should visit the face of heaven too roughly."

raving-room, where Blonde was to see her suitors, Mr. Tenuel threw himself into an easy-chair, and taking a small smelling-bottle from his pocket, said, in a low tone to himself:

"What fearful roads there are in these haunted pawts. How a lady of Miss Delmar's delicacy and refinement can bury herself in such a bucolawcous place is to me distinctually and pawsitively astonishing!"

He was interrupted in his soliloquy by hearing a female voice shouting in a loud tone:

"Coats my pony, you old fool, or I'll break every bone in your ugly skin!"

The next moment and the owner of the loud voice stood before him. It was Miss Lucre, the lively heiress of the Cedars. In one hand she held a large carrot, from which she had just taken a good bite.

"How are you, my boy? I know you by the description, but I'm darned if I thought to see such a swell. Why, where's the horse you came in? Oh! hull What a stench! Oh! I dare say it's what you call the perfumery! Here, Madge, you have been; bring me a little chloride of lime. Here's young Lucre got his pockets stuffed with all the trash of a perfumer's shop."

As she said this, she went up to the astonished exquisite, and giving him a slap on the back, which nearly broke it and disturbed the arrangement of his immaculate tie and collar, saying nothing of his symmetrical curls, every separate hair of his mustache quivered, and the soul of young Tinsel was shaken to its centres. When Madge entered with a small fumigating vessel, Blonde said:

"Did you ever smell a fellow like that? Fumigate him!"

Young Lucre sat in a stupor of astonishment, as though paralyzed; but when Blonde advanced to where he sat, and after having taken an enormous bite of the carrot which she carried in her hand, as though it had been a broomstick, and thrust it within an inch of his mouth, exclaimed, "Take a bite, Thomas!" he could only wave it away with his hands, and commend himself to the protection of heaven.

"And so, young Bandbox, you and I are going to be married? I'm agreeable. You're rather goodlooking, and have taken off a hundred and perfumery out of you. I'll make a decent chap of you, I'll warrant. I hope you are fond of pork and beans, boiled beef and cabbage and such things? I mean to live off them. Come, stir your stumps, young Bandbox, I want to take you to see my stables; and, Madge, you hussey, get a couple of horses as he shall help me sweep the stalls of my favorite ponies. It's a fancy of mine, and I always do it; but when I am married I mean to make my husband do it for me."

Madge ran out, and before Tinsel Lucre could get a word edgeways, or instead, incapable of speech, of dirty brooms, one of which Blonde forced into the hands of the utterly bewildered dandy, Blonde took hold of his arm, putting aside with the free wrong way, knocked it on with such violence that young Lucre's politeness completely gave way, and, shaking his arm free, roared out, he called to his groom in as loud a voice as he could command:

"Fergyson, take me away before I am pawsitively murdered."

Then, dropping the broom, he walked down toward his carriage, closely followed by Blonde and Madge.

"Come, look here, young Bandbox—do you mean to say that you don't marry me? I thought you came on purpose. I'm willing to say 'Snip,' if you'll say 'Snap.'"

As young Lucre was about to escape into his carriage, Blonde caught hold of him, saying, "Now, you are not going to sneak off without saying 'Yes' or 'No.' You are in a row till you say one."

"No! distinctually and pawsitively, No!" said young Lucre.

"Very well, that, Madge? And you, young man, you hear it, too?" The last words were addressed to Ephraim, who said, "I do, marm, distinctually."

Blonde and Madge then ran up the steps of the porch, while the terror-stricken exquisite was driven away to recover his serenity at his club in New York.

Solomon Grabham was, as we have already said, very extravagant, and, consequently, always hard up. The consequence was, that a dollar today looked larger than ten dimes to-morrow. Blonde had ascertained from her guardian, Mr. Egerton, a few particulars about his colleagues and fellow-guardians, which she set down to good account. When Mr. Barnabas Grabham was announced, she received him with a forbidding countenance and great gravity, which impressed him with a great idea of her firmness of character and her strength of will. After the interchange of the usual civilities of the day, he had taught to himself, "That lady, if she says I will, means it, and also keeps to her Yes or No." She had also changed her dress, and made herself look as forbidding and unattractive as possible.

After a few words, she said:

"Mr. Barnabas Grabham, I have heard a great deal of your excellent common sense, and I am about to propose a matter to you, which will not also know that you are a man of honor, and when a lady makes you her confidant, nothing can ever induce you to betray it. Am I right?"

Young Grabham shrugged his shoulders, as he replied:

"Upon my Miss Delmar, I won't say anything about my common sense—there I have strong doubts; but I will endorse the good opinion you express of my being a man of honor, and that nothing would ever make me betray any confidence a lady might do me the honor to repose in me."

"I was sure of it," was Blonde's reply. "Now, I am going to confide to you a great secret. Three of my guardians wish me to marry their sons. Now, if my heart were not already engaged, I would not, on any choice; but my faith is plighted to another. As I told you, I am a very straightforward person, so you must pardon my direct way of going to work. If you will write me a few lines, declining my hand, I will give you two thousand dollars down this very minute, and another two thousand the day I am married. Is it a bargain? Four thousand dollars are better than nothing; and I tell you candidly, much as I am impressed with your appearance, nothing will ever induce me to marry any but the man to whom my faith is pledged."

The lingering manhood in the young man's nature was stirred and roused into life; there was an evident struggle in his breast, as he rose and said:

"Miss Delmar, I perceive there are pens, ink and paper here. So here is my answer." He went to the table and wrote a positive refusal of Blonde's hand. Giving it to her, he said: "Miss Delmar, I have done what you wished. I can guess your purpose. Although overwhelmed with debt, I am an American gentleman, and need no bribery to fulfill a lady's request."

He was about leaving the room, when Blonde detained him.

"Mr. Grabham, I decline being outdone in generosity, even by one of your noble nature; if you wish to make me your friend and debtor for life, you will not refuse this little testimony of my gratitude—if only as a loan. Pray do not wound my feelings by rejecting it."

The young man closed his eyes as though fighting with himself, then, taking it, he said:

"You will not think meanly of me, if I take this as a loan for a short time?"

Bowing to her, he left the room.

Blonde's heart gave a bound. "Only one more experiment, and I am safe."

When Madge came to inquire the result, she found her mistress resting her head on her hand and buried in thought.

"Ah, Madge, if my heart were not Claude's, I have seen the man who should have had it. But now, Madge," continued Blonde, "prepare for your part in this most absurd, and—if it were not for the magnitude of the stake I play for—most humiliating farce."

Madge went up to her mistress, and, kissing her forehead, left the room. Blonde paused for a minute or two, and followed her faithful attendant. When Mr. Ephraim Stately was announced, Blonde told the servant to inform him that she would be with him in a few minutes. When she entered the room where her suitor was seated, she was accompanied by two enormous dogs, of which she heard young Stately had a perfectly childish terror. In her hand she brandished a large whip, and every now and then she made the thong resound like a small clap of thunder. The dogs leapt up around her, while she encouraged them in the roughest style. Ephraim looked at her all eyes, as though he was perfectly astonished.

"What are you staring at, you young noodle?" said Blonde.

"I wish to see Miss Delmar," said young Stately, in a half-frightened voice.

"And who in the name of thunder am I? Do I look like her Biddy?"

"Excuse me," replied her suitor; "then I have the pleasure of addressing Miss Delmar!"

"Allow me the honor of saying that if you had one grain of sense, either common or uncommon, you need not have asked such a question! "'Pon my honor, I am so provoked I've half a mind to set these dogs at you! That I have!"

The young man looked as though he would like to sink into his boots, if his boots had only been a trifle larger.

Blonde now began to play with her dogs, whose delight and vivacity displayed itself by springing about, sometimes almost over the head of Blonde. These gambols made her suitor evidently feel very uncomfortable.

Madge at this minute entered, saying:

"Oh, Miss Blonde, here's Major Rupert Bounce, come! he looks handsomer and fiercer than ever."

Turning to young Stately, Madge said:

"Major Bounce is my young lady's favorite young man; he's such a spirit, he has killed more men about here than all the doctors put together. If you go to our churchyard, you will see on half the tombstones there the saying: 'Killed in single combat by Major Rupert Bounce.'"

"What do you mean, you impudent hussy, by talking to Mr. Stately in my presence? but I'll teach you manners!"

As she said this Blonde began to cut Madge about the head and shoulders with the whip, and when young Stately, alarmed by the pretended cries of Madge, said:

"Pray, Miss Blonde, don't strike the poor girl so hard."

Blonde furiously turned upon him and slashed him about the legs with some real blows, while those, of course, she dealt upon Madge were all feigned.

Poor young Stately hopped and danced about the room, while Blonde indulged in the fiercest vituperation, and lashed him with all her vigor.

While Blonde was thus employed, Madge took the opportunity to escape.

"'Pon my honor," said Blonde, "I'm out of breath, so I'll let you off this time; but when we are married, if you dare ever to contradict or oppose me, disobey me, or in any way to say your soul's your own, I'll cut you into strips with my whip, and then set my dogs on you. Do you know, Mr. Stately, that these dogs are so fond of me, that if I were but to say the word, they would devour you alive!"

The poor young man shuddered, as well he might.

"Don't be afraid," said Blonde; "my rage is all over now; so let us sit down, and I'll hear what you have to say."

Young Stately took a chair at some little distance from the bouncing heiress of the Cedars, and sat as though he were on nitro-glycerine.

"Don't be afraid of me," said Blonde, moving her chair nearer to her terrified suitor; "I'm perfectly harmless when my rage is over, but I will own that when the fit is on me, I am doubly dangerous, as the fire insurance fellows call it; and no wonder: four of my grandmothers all died raving mad, and it required strait-waistcoats instead of shrouds to hold them in their coffins. I only hope they will behave themselves at the Resurrection."

A shudder, like a strong case of chills and fever, shook the entire frame of the unhappy Stately.

"Now, youthful Stately," cried Blonde, "are you, or are you not, going to pop the question, or are you a born idiot?"

"Miss Blonde, I hardly know what I ought to say; but—I can assure you that you must not be angry with me—but in obedience to my father's command, I have come to-day to offer you my 'and hand 'art."

"Then, sir," replied Blonde, flourishing her whip in the air, as though she was horse-whipping some imaginary person, "since you have come here to make love to me in obedience to your father's will, I command you to go down on your knees to me, the only proper position for a man to assume when he offers a lady his 'and hand 'art!"

As Blonde called to her dogs and brandished her whip as she spoke, young Stately sank on his knees before the lovely termagant, and was about to speak, when the door opened, and an officer in the Zouave uniform entered the room.

"Why, Major Bounce!" said Blonde, "how glad I am to see you!"

"Madam," roared the young officer, drawing his sword, "who is this man who has dared to insult you?—he must die!"

"Spare him, dear major; I know that killing a man is nothing to you, but for the sake of my new carpet, allow me to plead in extenuation of his crime—for it is a crime to aspire to the hand you have won, whether the presumptuous individual knows it or not; but his father is the cause of all his anguish."

"Then," said the young officer, "his father shall die as well—let that console the wretched son!"

Young Stately was utterly bewildered, and remained on his knees, looking first at one and then at the other.

"Presumptuous man!" said the young officer, "a man can only die once, and as he must die once, it cannot possibly matter to him when; for if a man must pay his tailor, and he has the spondulics in his pocket, he cannot be called upon at a better time to step up to the captain's office and settle. Now, you have life: that is just the exact amount sufficient to discharge your debt to nature—so die!"

As he said this, he brandished his sabre over him, and flourished his legs in true Zouave and acrobatic style.

"What am I to be killed for?" inquired the unfortunate youth.

"For daring to love the idol of my heart!"

"But I don't love her."

"Then how dare you to offer to marry her?"

"Because my father told me."

"Then you have to thank your father for being killed," cried the young officer, in stentorian voice. Then, after a short pause, he said: "On second thoughts, if you really don't want to marry this young personage, I may be induced to let you off, although I haven't killed a man for nearly a month, and my average is one a week. Apropos, my young enemy, I will make your mind easy on one point. I'll have you buried in a nice, healthy, gravelly soil, and I'll kill you without any unnecessary pain. If you decide in favor of swords, I'll only pass my weapon once through your body, and after carefully wiping the blood-stained blade on your cravat, I'll tenderly insinuate it once more through your heart, in order that you may avoid the horrors of being buried alive; and then I will pay for a first-rate obituary in the New York Times, and endorse you as a gentleman."

Like Bob Acres, the valor of Ephraim Stately oozed out at his fingers' ends.

At last he mustered up courage sufficient to say:

"Mr. Soldier, if you are spoiling for a fight, I am willing to oblige you, but I must go to New York first, for I want to read the conclusion of that capital story in the "CHIMNEY CORNER.'"

"No you don't," said Major Bounce; "you can't fool this chicken that way; but I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll kill somebody else instead of you, on one condition"—and here the major flourished his sword about the young poltroon's head.

"What's the condition?" asked young Stately.

"You say you don't want to marry Miss Delmar?"

"No, I don't."

"Then, if you will write her a letter declining the honor of her fair hand, I won't kill you."

Young Stately cheerfully complied with the request, and when all was signed and sealed, Major Bounce gave him his hand, saying:

"Sir, I have never seen a man so providentially saved from an early grave as you have been. I came here on purpose to kill you, and I must say I feel horribly disappointed."

The young man then made good his escape, leaving the valiant major and Blonde nearly convulsed with laughter.

When young Stately had gone, the Major took off the whiskers, mustache and military cap, and untying the long hair which had been curled up beneath it, revealed the merry face of the ingenious Madge.

When Blonde told Mr. Egerton the manner in which she had gained her point, he looked exceedingly grave for a minute, and felt inclined to blame her, but when she told him that the prize was her happiness, he took her in his arms and agreed that the justification was ample.

Blonde and Claude did not spend all their time in reading the classics, after their marriage, for when we met them at Saratoga, last year, they seemed to enjoy their rides as much as though there had never been such a thing as philosophy in the world, but only love.

TRACKING.

THE patience and skill with which Indians follow a trail have always excited the astonishment of civilized nations. In tracking game or pursuing an enemy, their precision is unerring, and tracks that would entirely escape ordinary observation are perfectly clear to the denizens of the forest. Col. Marcy, in his recently published work, gives the following account of the aptness of the Indians in this respect:

Almost all the Indians I have met with are proficient in this species of knowledge, the faculty for acquiring which appears to be innate with them. Exigencies of woodland and prairie life stimulate the savage from childhood to develop faculties so important in the arts of war and of the chase.

I have seen very few white men who were good trailers, and practice did not seem very materially to improve their faculties in this regard; they have not the same acute perceptions for these things as the Indian or the Mexican.

A party of Indians, for example, starting out upon a war excursion, leave their families behind, and never transport their lodges; whereas, when they move with their families, they carry their lodges and other effects. If, therefore, an Indian trail is discovered with the marks of the lodge-poles upon it, it has certainly not been made by a war-party; but if the track do not show the trace of lodge-poles, it will be equally certain that a war or hunting party has passed that way, and if it is not desired to come in conflict with them, their direction may be avoided. Mustangs or wild horses, when moving from place to place, leave a trail which is sometimes difficult to distinguish from that made by a mounted party of Indians, especially if the mustangs do not stop to graze. This may be determined by following upon the trail until some dung is found, and, if this should lie in a single pile, it is a sure indication that a herd of mustangs has passed, as they always stop to relieve themselves, while a party of Indians would keep their horses in motion, and the ordure would be scattered along the road. If the trail pass through woodland, the mustang will occasionally go under the limbs of trees too low to admit the passage of a man on horseback.

An Indian, on coming to a trail, will generally tell at a glance its age, by what particular tribe it was made, the number of the party, and many other things connected with it astounding to the uninitiated.

I remember, upon one occasion, as I was riding with a Delaware, upon the prairies, we crossed the trail of a large party of Indians traveling with lodges. The tracks appeared to me quite fresh, and I remarked to the Indian that we must be near the party. "Oh, no," said he, "the trail was made two days before, in the morning," at the same time pointing with his finger to where the sun would be at about eight o'clock. Then, seeing that my curiosity was excited to know by what means he arrived at this conclusion, he called my attention to the fact that there had been no dew for the last two nights, but that on the previous morning it had been heavy. He then pointed out to me some spears of grass that had been pressed down into the earth by the horses' hoofs, upon which the sand still adhered, having dried on, thus clearly showing that the grass was wet when the tracks were made.

At another time, as I was traveling with the same Indian, I discovered upon the ground what I took to be a bear track, with a distinctly-marked impression of the heel and all the toes. I immediately called the Indian's attention to it, at the same time flattering myself that I had made quite an important discovery, which had escaped his observation. The fellow remarked, with a smile, "Oh, no, captain; maybe so he not bear-track." He then pointed with his gun-rod to some spears of grass that grew near the impression, but I did not comprehend the mystery until he dismounted and explained to me that, when the wind was blowing the spears of grass would be bent over toward the ground, and the oscillating motion thereby produced would scoop out the loose sand into the shape I have described. The truth of this explanation was apparent, yet it occurred to me that its solution would have baffled the wits of most white men.

Fresh tracks generally show moisture where the earth has been turned up, but after a short exposure to the sun they become dry. If the tracks be very recent, the sand may sometimes, where it is very loose and dry, be seen running back into the tracks, and, by following them to a place where they cross water, the earth will be wet for some distance after they leave it. It is well to remember whether there have been any rains within a few days, as the age of a trail may sometimes be conjectured in this way. It is very easy to tell whether tracks have been made before or after a rain, as the water washes off the sharp edges.

In trailing horses, there will be no trouble while the ground is soft, as the impressions they leave will then be deep and distinct; but when they pass over hard or rocky ground, it is sometimes a very slow or troublesome process to follow them. Where there is grass, the trace can be seen for a considerable time, as the grass will be trodden down and bent in the direction the party has moved; should the grass have returned to its upright condition, the trail can often be distinguished by standing upon it, and looking ahead for some distance in the direction it has been pursuing; the grass that has been turned over will show a different shade of green from that around it, and this often marks a trail for a long time.

Should all traces of the track be obliterated in certain localities, it is customary with the Indians to follow on in the direction it has been pursuing for a time, and it is quite probable that in some place where the ground is more favorable it will show itself again. Should the trail not be recovered in this way, they search for a place where the earth is soft, and make a careful examination, embracing the entire area where it is likely to run.

Indians who find themselves pursued and wish to escape, scatter as much as possible, with an understanding that they are to meet again at some point in advance, so that, if the pursuing party follows any one of the tracks, it will invariably lead to the place of rendezvous. If, for example, the trail points in the direction of a mountain-pass, or toward any other place which affords the only passage through a particular section of country, it would not be worth while to spend much time in hunting it, as it would probably be regained at the pass.

EXPERIMENTS WITH FOOD.—From experiments made by celebrated chemists, we find that in bread, every 100 pounds' weight is found to contain 80 pounds of nutritious matter; butcher meat, averaging the various sorts, contains only 31 pounds in the 100 pounds; French beans, 80 pounds; peas, 23 pounds, greens and turnips, which are the most aqueous of all vegetables used for domestic purposes, furnish only 8 pounds of solid nutritious substance in 100 pounds; carrots, 14 pounds; and what is very remarkable, as being in opposition to the hitherto acknowledged theory, 100 pounds of potatoes only yield 25 pounds of substance valuable as nutritious. According to this estimate, 1 pound of good bread is equal to 3 pounds of potatoes; and 75 pounds of bread, and 30 pounds of butcher meat, are equal to 300 pounds of potatoes. Or, again, 1 pound of rice, or of broad beans, is equal to 4 pounds of cabbage and 3 pounds of turnips. This calculation is considered correct, and may be useful to families, where the best mode of supporting nature should be adopted at the least expense.

THE LANGUAGE OF YOUNG LADIES.—One cannot inveigh too much against the use of exaggerated, extravagant forms of speech by young ladies—saying splendid for pretty, magnificent for handsome, horrid or horrible for unpleasant, immense for large, thousands or myriads for any number more than two. "Were I," says a clever writer, "to write down for one day the conversation of some young ladies of my acquaintance, and then to interpret it literally, it would imply that, within twelve or fourteen hours, they had met with more marvelous adventures and hair-breadth escapes, had passed through more distressing experiences, had seen more imposing spectacles, had endured more fright, had enjoyed more rapture, than would suffice for a dozen common lives."

GIPSIES IN ENGLAND.

A MAN whom I knew happened to lose his way one dark night in Cambridgeshire. After wandering up and down for some time, he observed a light, at a considerable distance from him, within the skirts of a wood, and, being overjoyed at the discovery, he directed his course toward it; but before reaching the fire, he was surprised at hearing a man, a little way in advance, call out to him, in a loud voice:

"Peace, or not peace?"

The benighted traveler, glad at hearing the sound of a human voice, immediately answered:

"Peace; I am a poor Scotchman, and have lost my way in the dark."

"You can come forward, then" rejoined the sentinel.

When the Scotchman advanced, he found a family of gipsies, with only one tent; but, on being conducted further into the wood, he was introduced to a great company of gipsies. They were busily employed in roasting several whole sheep—turning their carcasses before large fires, on long wooden poles, instead of iron spits. The racks on which the spits turned were also made of wood, driven into the ground crossways, like the letter X. The gipsies were exceedingly kind to the stranger, causing him to partake of the victuals which they had prepared for their feast. He remained with them the whole night, eating and drinking, and dancing with his merry entertainers, as if he had been one of themselves. When day dawned, the Scotchman counted twelve tents within a short distance of each other. On examining his position, he found himself a long way out of his road, but a party of the gipsies voluntarily offered their services, and went with him for several miles, and, with great kindness, conducted him to the road from which he had wandered.

The gipsies, in cooking, make use of neither pot, pan, spit, nor oven. They twist a strong rope of straw, which they wind very tightly around the fowl, just as it is killed, with the whole of its feathers on, and its entrails untouched. It is then covered with hot peat ashes, and a slow fire is kept up around and about the ashes till the fowl is sufficiently done. When taken out from beneath the fire, it is stripped of its hull, or shell of half-burned straw rope and feathers, and presents a very fine appearance. Those who have tasted poultry cooked by the gipsies in this manner say that it is very palatable and good. In this invisible way these ingenious people could cook stolen poultry, at the very moment, and in the very place, that a search was going on for the pilfered article.

The art of cooking butcher-meat among the gipsies is similar to that of making ready fowls, except that linen and clay are substituted for feathers and straw. The piece of flesh to be cooked is first carefully wrapped up in a covering of cloth or linen rags, and covered over with well-wrought clay, and either frequently turned before a strong fire or covered over with hot ashes till it is roasted, or rather, stewed. The covering or crust, of the shape of the article inclosed, and hard with the fire, is broken, and the meat separated from its inner covering of burned rags, which, with the juice of the meat, are reduced to a thick sauce or gravy. Sometimes a little vinegar is poured upon the meat. The tribe are high in their praise of flesh cooked in this manner, declaring that it has a particularly fine flavor. These singular people, I am informed, also boiled the flesh of sheep in the skins of the animals, like the Scottish soldiers in their wars with the English nation, when their camp-kettles were nothing but the hides of the oxen, suspended from poles driven into the ground.

The only mode of cooking butcher-meat bearing any resemblance to that of the gipsies is practiced by some of the tribes of South America, who wrap flesh in leaves, and, covering it over with clay, cook it like the gipsies. Some of the Indians of North America roast deer of a small size in their skins among hot ashes. An individual of great respectability, who had tasted venison cooked in this fashion, said that it was extremely juicy and finely flavored. In the Sandwich Islands, pigs are baked on hot stones, in pits, or in the leaves of the bread-fruit tree, on hot stones, covered over with earth during the operation of cooking. It is probable that the gipsy art of cooking would be among the first modes of making ready animal food, in the first stage of human society, in Asia—the cradle of the human race. Substitute the leaves of trees for linen rags, and what method of cooking can be more primitive than that of our Scottish gipsies.—Simson's History of the Gipsies.

THE GLACIAL PERIOD.—At first it seems evident that toward the close of the tertiary period the climate of a large portion of the northern hemisphere was gradually growing colder and colder. In all likelihood the land was somewhat higher than it is now, and as this cold increased, the loftier mountains would become perennially enveloped with snow and glacier, and the surrounding seas with an annual covering of ice. Under this increasing rigor all the more delicate tertiary plants and animals would succumb, and those endowed with greater elasticity of constitution would shift ground to lower and more southern situations. As the cold still increased, the ice-sheet seems to have spread itself even over the lower grounds, to have pushed its way out to sea, and during the thaw and currents of a brief summer to have been drifted off in floes and bergs, as the ice is now, from the coasts of the arctic and antarctic regions. At this stage the terrestrial flora and fauna would be at their minimum, and paralleled, perhaps, by what we now find in Greenland and the islands of the Arctic Ocean. During this setting-in of the glacial epoch, the land, as we shall shortly see, seems to have been gradually subsiding, and this subsidence went on to the extent of 1,800 or 2,000 feet below the existing sea-level, converting a large portion of what is now Europe and America into series of frozen straits and ice-clad islands. When the land seems to have been at its greatest depression the cold appears to have attained its greatest intensity, and at this stage we have the zenith and turning-point of the glacial period. After the lapse, perhaps, of ages, a reverse action sets in; the land begins to be re-elevated; a new cycle of temperature commences; and the cold, though still clinging in snow and glacier to the higher hills, is less felt along the lower grounds and neighboring seashores. By and by, as the elevation continues, the glaciers melt away from the hill-sides; the icebergs and ice-packs disappear from the seas; the general climate improves; plants and land animals in newer species gradually take possession of the land and the existing order of things is imperceptibly established. Such seems to have been the setting in, the creeping on, the culmination, and the departure of the glacial epoch.

ANECDOTE OF GEN. SCOTT.—The New York correspondent of the Boston Journal, relates the following: "The term 'Fuss and Feathers,' applied to the old chief, grew out of nothing personal, for he was a man whose personal tastes were very simple. But he was very exact in his discipline, and he required every officer while on duty to be dressed according to his rank in the minutest thing. Gen. Hamilton, who was on his staff, related to me the other day a very characteristic anecdote. The general's head-quarters in Mexico comprised two rooms, one opening into the other. In the rear room Gen. Scott slept. One night after the general had retired, one of the staff wanted some water. It was in the front room. The evening was warm and the hour late, being near midnight. The officer started to go in in his shirt sleeves. He was cautioned against the experiment as a dangerous one, for if the general caught him in his quarters with his coat off he would punish him. The officer said he would risk it; that the general was asleep, and he would make no noise. He opened the door softly, and went on tip-toe to the water pitcher. He had no time to drink before he heard the tinkle of the bell, and the sentinel outside of the door entered. 'Take this man to the guard-house,' was the brief order, and the coatless officer spent the night on a hard plank under guard."

LORD CUILTE'S REVERIE.

"Slow steal the shadows round the hall,
The sunrays slowly fade,
Adown the heavy curtains fall
Of purple and brocade.

"The faces of my lordly race
Are pictured on the wall;
In lip and eye the serpent trace
Of sin is over all.

"As false as fair those dainty dames,
As false those knights of old,
Than loose from out their massive frames
Of lustrous white and gold.

"There is an atmosphere of doubt
Hangs over house and race,
A subtle film that steals about
The glory of the face.

"And yet 'tis love alone forefend
Thine absolute repose,
Ah! love alone so sweetly blends
The lily and the rose.

"All modestly those fringes fall
Adown thy blissful cheek,
O'er berald eyes that blazon all
The love, love may not speak.

"Oh, modestly their sister stars
Wheel up the steep of night
Their troop of pale adscript cars,
And trembie out of sight,

"If mortal gaze be too intense
On night's star-jeweled mine;
More exquisite that subtle sense
Of purity in thine.

"And never lord of lordly Guilte
Brought home a fairer bride,
Oh, never graced with lordlier hilt
The rapier of his pride!

"Yet, oh! the brides to Guilteford Hall
Have brought their share of shame.
I wot the fairest on the wall
Was but a worthless dame.

"The fairest, save thyself, of all
The ladies of my name:
Of all the beauties of Whitehall
Amid their scarlet shame—

"Her legal lord was twice forsworn
On his false gartered knee:
She fell between her love and scorn;
A gallant, faith, and free.

"His ire was that he might not speak:
He smote—and I wot
The bloody gash across her cheek
Was not a beauty spot."

CHAPTER XVI.—AN UNEXPECTED INVITATION.

I CANNOT think that the postman, in this my district, W., ever deals out Birth and Death, or Happiness and Misery, and Ruin and Competence to every morning of his life, save Sundays, to one or other of his fellow-creatures, those ever twinkled receive a letter; otherwise, he could not surely go about his work with such methodical impassibility. I have watched him taking his morning round—the one which is the most big with fate, says Cocker, comes by the afternoon post except bills and invitations—I have often watched him, I say, distributing his momentous missives, and not a letter there, whether he hands in the black-bordered envelope, which the fingers of the recipient do not venture to open, but hold in their trembling grasp, while the lips murmur a silent prayer: or the scented billet-doux, which the lover tears asunder in his haste, but the maiden hides in her bosom, that she shall be alone. Nothing interests him except a registered letter, at which the understanding that he must know it brings its welcome with it; he grumbles and repines, because he has to wait while we sign our name. And, by-the-bye, he must know that those enormous oblongs he brings are bills, he has not so much as an "I'm sorry for you;" and as unfeelingly as possible, he will ask, which sets tingling all the blood in one's body, which sets affect him nearly so much as a trifle of munificent generosity, which, if unburned for which, he is quite prepared to take the urgent document away again unopened: he doesn't care happence—yet, he does care sadly happence, and that's all. Upon Valentine's Day, indeed, he may show some signs of human sympathy, but that is a mere conventional and passing enthusiasm, and one which is incidental to his profession.

Now, the country postman is a very different person from this red and blue automaton of the town, and does not hold himself so high above human affairs. Homo sum. He is a letter-carrier, and he considers nothing which letters contain to be beyond his sympathy, or out of his best. If you want to get acquainted with a country neighborhood, I know of no better plan than that of accompanying the postman in one of his morning rounds. What an interest he takes in the letter for Widow Clearall, the hard-working, honest soul, who comes out of the cottage and down to the garden gate with her bare arms damp from the washing-tub, and her three chubby children hanging round her skirts, and who thinks it must be a mistake, for who, alas! is there left to write to her now, and, indeed, for the matter of that, whoever did write, for her poor dear John was no scholar. But the postman assures her that for her it is, and for no other, and lingers whilst she breaks the seal, and learns with genuine pleasure that a bit of money, it seems, is coming to her, about which John always used to talk with a certain vagueness.

Then away by the short-cut through the park, where the deer do not raise their heads at the sound of the well-known footfall on the path, nor the hares at their morning toilet misstrike for a moment his letter-wallet for a game-bag; and so by the range of stables to the back-door of the Hall, where, if the footman is not in the way, the cook relieves him of the Hall-bag, which she unlocks with her fleury fingers, and then calls master, those for missus, and that on foreign paper for the absent young lady with a grin, which our peripatetic friend recognizes, for does he not know all about her engagement to the young soldier-officer in the Indies?

At the Manor Farm, again, he has a friendly chat with the goodwife, whose husband is away at the market in town, and who takes counsel with him as to the propriety of opening that letter with the Westportown postmark, which she finds among the rest on the heifer, and ought to be seen to at once; but finally decides to abide by his advice, and to "let it be," particularly since Mr. Leasehold is so very sanguine in the respect of "never thinking anything can be properly seen to except by himself." He is not in such a hurry at a poverty-pinched cottage, but delivers his stoppage, mind you, he steps out with each vigor that conversation is rendered well-nigh impossible—but that he has a cheery word for all he meets; and when he approaches the house of Farmer Grimes, the Pampas Cottage, he finds time to remember to omit to wind his horn; and when the lady of the house, in deepest mourning, herself steps forth to meet him, his voice has something in it which expresses his sympathy.

Thus it happened, at least, with the postman from Westportown—and Westportown has its late ailment, and therefore perhaps more full of the talk of human kindness than usual, upon a certain morning in autumn, as he was making his accustomed burn bad stood by him upon a certain occasion when he had been wrongfully accused to his superiors by Old Granny, Mr. Absentee's agent and bailiff, of having kept back some letter for twenty-four hours, in order to save himself trouble in the delivery, and who were consequently much neglected at Pampas Cottage, nor was the offer of a glass of ale in inclement weather altogether unprecedented at that hospitable little house.

"Any letters for you, ma'am, this morning," observed he, respectfully—"one on 'em franked." And if ever a face was wiked, it was that it may bring you some comfort in your trouble, dear lady," it was the face of that genial postman.

This good fellow was well aware that he was speaking to one whose husband had been mysteriously snatched away but a few days before, and whose child had been as strangely stolen from her; yet he deemed that a letter which was franked by a nobleman, and came to her in a large coat of arms upon it, must needs contain consolation. The other person he had by no means an aristocratic appearance. In the postman's speech, it was not so easy to turn out a neatlooking note to order, and the individual who had folded this particular document had either possessed a very indifferent eye for rectangles, or was unacquainted with the mathematical fact that still not well with his feet instead of his hand; for in a number of those dirty creases upon it, each of which, like a crocodile, is a monument of a day of failure and disappointment; and when all had been smoothed out, undone of which foolscap is capable, the wafer had been swelled with the moisture employed, and then hammered down with a penny. And yet, without any further clinging of paper to moping companion, it was a glance at its more modest companion, that was the first to attract the eye of Mrs. Hepburn rested with anxious suspense.

"Thank you," said she, and while the man still lingered—"thank you, and good-day;" but she was not quite sure that it was a suggestive appreciation, which might easily have been misinterpreted like the folding, by a tolerably plastic foot, and which was apparently not to be taken to an extent inconceivable by those who have not witnessed the modern method of transferring forme to dimensions.

"It is the same handwriting," murmured she, "which warned me truly that—of my poor husband's fate. And I have no correspondent save him now. What, then, if it offer some crumb of comfort—perhaps about my Milly?"

Reader, have you ever had a letter in your hand directed to yourself, and only waiting the touch of your scissors, or the quick rush of paper, to open it? Have you ever had a letter in your hand with a little writing within it, which you have no doubt contained the whole world about some preparation, thought or spoken, of the heart, and which the Wandering Jiace would have ventured to irrupt—perhaps to rend—with fell Holies. If so, you may remember that, notwithstanding your curiosity and heaven's mercy, you delayed that supreme moment again and again, and even wished, perhaps, meanwhile to interest yourself in matters of no concern—as in the children playing in the street, or in sparrows fighting for a straw. Thus was it with Mildred Hepburn as, with that prepossessing letter in hand, she turned her attention to its fellow-writer, expecting to find in it, she knew not, cared not what, but something that might help her to put off for a few moments longer the plucking of the fruit of that dread knowledge-tree. But no sooner had her eyes lit upon the handwriting, than, with an inarticulate cry of hate and pain, she ran toward the house, exclaiming:

"Marion! Marion!"

Mrs. Carey, who had been watching her from the window, was by her side in a moment.

"S :!" exclaimed the wretched woman, "this is the writing of Grace Clifford! Not content with gloating over the ruin she has wrought, she must needs write to tell me that it is her work. Yes—I tell you, yes; you do not know her yet, nor what her remorseless hate is. It would not seem to her to be complete unless she wrote: 'Niece Mildred, I am even with you now. That was my hand which struck you through those you loved.'"

"If she writes that," said Mrs. Carey, gravely, "she confesses her villainous crime, and incurs the punishment."

"Ay, true," granted Mildred. "Her cunning is as great as her hate, Marion, let me know it by them, by some less direct means—that is all. Take the letter. It chills my blood to touch the paper over which the fiend has wrestled! What is it that she says? What cruel gibes? What subtle stabs? What lies, if I am so, I care not what she says. She cannot harm me now. Open and read it, then, should I not her wound my care with her barbed weapon?"

Mrs. Carey took the letter, opened it, and read it slowly to herself.

"It is full of malicious, barbarous and base," groaned she. "She hints, I fear, that Milly at his Clifford——"

"Then let me hear," interrupted Mildred, passionately. "Nay. I will be calm, dear Marion. Please to read it out. One likes to know about one's dear ones—even if they die. What news is there of my little unprotected darling in the hands of that woman?"

"Even she-wolves, as one reads, have sometimes been kind to babes," returned Mrs. Carey, hopefully. "I cannot think that any bearing the name of woman would harm a child like yours."

But Mildred only shook her head, and signed that she should read the letter out:

"NIECE MILDRED—I think that I have now no cause to owe you any grudge. However great may have been my wrongs in the first place, when the duel has been fought, the combatants, although in sorrow, must be friends, not deadly enemies. They may even act together when their interests happen to be in common, which chances to be our own case. It is of importance to both that you should come at once to Cliffe. You will have nothing to fear in so doing, either from hate or love. My wrath is quite burned out; while as for Rupert, he is at present so busy in making a nurse more than ever. If the ties of relationship which bind you to me are inconvenience do not move you to accept this invitation, we are not without another little attraction to offer. I what I believe to be such. But this shall be a secret 'til you come."

"Ay, she holds my child," groaned Mildred, as Marion ended—"she, as I have seen boys who have robbed an ouzel's nest carry home its young, and place them where the mother may hear their cries, and so bemad it. She gathered through her own loving instincts, so does the soul of mine but her fell trap for me with my very flesh and blood. Well, well, I will go—I care not for myself what happens to me; and if I see my Milly once again——"

"Mildred Clifford," interrupted Mrs. Carey, solemnly, "the thing which we do in our despair is rarely right. Moreover, there is scarcely anything that does not more affects ourselves only, and no other. While you live and are free, your child has a friend to avenge, if not to protect her. Think not of yourself in the case of avenging. This woman feels this, and therefore desires to get you into her power. She has made a mistake, and I think, by your letter, that you have also been out-run her prudence, and carried her within reach of the law. There is much to explain in this letter, which I pray to be explained before I judge and jury. But what is that other letter which you hold in your hand?"

"I had forgotten it," answered Mildred, sighing; "although, before I recognized Grace Clifford's hand, it seemed of urgent moment. It is from Rupert, and is one of the many he writes. You may read it also, if you please. There is nothing to be warned of now, and, alas! nothing to be told that will move you."

"But this is very strange," said Mrs. Carey. "Look you, the postmark is the same with that borne by that letter from your aunt. Why, this comes from Cliffe Hall, likewise!"

Certainly, at top of the page were scribbled those words of date, and the postmark was the same as in Mrs. Clifford's communication. The rest of its contents were as follows:

"DEAR MILDRED—I have not childless woman, my heart bleeds for you. I know what I would hitherto, and I have failed. Nevertheless, let me at least prove to you my sympathy. Mrs. Clifford's letter will presently ask you to come hither, relying on your love. Disregard it. Milly, indeed, is here, safe and well. You will, doubtless, suspect a trap, as I do. Nevertheless, I pledge my honor, it is for herself that Grace Clifford has set it. Come hither, and you will find your child when watches now over your child will then watch over you also. I have warned you in vain; but, as you have bitterly learned, not without there having been need of warning. I beseech you, put faith in me, and, for the sake of my dear child's sake, I could have saved your husband's life, I would have done so, as God is my judge; nor in this do I boast, since the murderer Stevens (for he was such) would have done as much, as I by could to have saved his worthless self. That man was Gideon Carr; the worst danger now is from one who menace you and yours in the person of Grace Clifford. Rely upon three fingers—Grace, Clement Carr, and the Author. They are all here, but I am here also. Come, then, without fear, and you will find your child.—RUPERT."

With downcast head, and hands clasped as if in prayer, Mrs. Hepburn listened patiently, as penitent before a priest, only at the word "murderer" a shiver seized her limbs as sickles the poplar when its leaves turn pale before the bitter East. When all was read, she took the letter from Mrs. Carey's hand and kissed it.

"I have faith in this man," quoth she, "who has taken holy upon him vows and for fulfilment."

"What! and yet you have never seen him, nor can even guess who he is?" cried the lieutenant's wife.

"Yes," said Mildred, firmly. "Is not that the very definition of true faith? This is no pretense or stratagem, I am sure. It never could have entered Grace's heart, with all its cunning, to snare me thus. There is no approach to that for any good, not even its seeming."

"But how strange, Mildred, that you can make no guess at who this friend may be; for kindness, not like that warmth which comes from silver to mount the tube, unconscious of what sort of fuel it is, whether from sun or fire, sets the heart at once inquiring from whence the genial glow proceeds that has so moved it. Friend recognizes friend, for instance, no matter what disguise he does his loving service. All love is one, dear Mildred, to the humblest. Have you, then, left none at home to whom you can accuse of honest fealty?"

"No one more than another, dear Marion," answered Mrs. Hepburn, thoughtfully. "They were all respectful to me—nay, even kind; but they could not forget, I think, that I was this woman's niece. They liked the Clifford race, their natural lords—and especially their late master, Ralph—but not the interloping Carrs. No; I cannot fix upon a single face in which so much of pity as this letter breathes has ever shown itself."

"Then I would not go to Cliffe, dear Mildred," exclaimed Mrs. Carey. "Remain here; or, still better, come to me. Do not trust to the revenge. I want my child, my Milly. If she would but say, 'Mamma, come and well,' I would promise never to molest her more."

"So would not I, then," cried the lieutenant's wife, with flashing cheeks. "What! forgive the wretch who set a man to slay my husband? No; had she twenty lives, she would need to look to her child. And if, in truth, she sat above the law, then without the law would I exact the penalty. I have no child, 'tis true, nor, as I hope, may I ever have a child, if, having borne it, it should make me thus forgetful of my husband's wrongs—pardon me, Mildred; I have in some unbalanced, but a tutored living—I know that it is to be forlorn like that. Or, perhaps, like thee, I should sit down content with any show of comfort that the destroyer might permit me to retain, and almost thankful that so much was left."

For a minute or so, over Mildred's face passed traces of some painful inward struggle, but presently it grew calm, and even smiling. "I love you for your kindness, Marion, quite as much as for your charity. Some day, perhaps, you—how you will know how much I thank you for it; how my heart yearned toward yours. Perhaps, again, after this day and night, I shall never see you more; then God will thank you for me, and far better. May it be long, indeed, ere sorrow do shadow your dwelling, and may loss like mine be never known to your true heart. Nay, do not weep, dear Marion; it is over your part, not mine, to play the comforter; and that you have done so, and that you still do, repays human love with love divine. May He suffice us, in Heaven, if not here, to meet again."

"But what do you, Mildred?" murmured Mrs. Carey, through her tears. "Whither are you going?"

"I start to-morrow morning, Marion, for Cliffe Hall."

CHAPTER XVII.—THE SLEEPING CASTLE.

THERE are few things that try the tender human heart so cruelly as the refusing a benevolence from which Death, or even Absence, has taken away the power to bless. Home: for however dear the external aspects of nature may be to us—and to some they are very dear—it is the associations which it possesses with our loves and friendships which, after all, forms their most sacred charm. The wood may wave as gravely, the fountain flow as brightly, and the lake reflect peaceful sky as faithfully as of yore, but there is something missing to the inward eye, which mars their beauty and renders completely forlorn what had stripped the trees of every leaf, and robbed the stream of its song, and the mere of its silver flood. Nature seems cruel then:

"Ye banks and brae o' bonnie Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair!
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae weary, fu' o' care!"

is a thought that stabbed many a breast before Burns set it to words expressed in

"Ye'll break my heart, ye little birds,
That wanton through the flowery thorn!
Ye mind me o' departed joys,
Departed never to return."

Never—never. And yet the sun shines as in the days when it was wont to gladden us, nor has the treasury of knowledge in which it is set a star.

"From end to end," writes another poet, very truly, "from the Arabian Ploughman, but equally susceptible of this divine regret—" from end to end of all the landscapes underneath, I find no place that does not breathe some gracious memory over my friend." But while he was with us, what had we to do with memories? All is changed to us, although the scene remains the same—lovely as ever, and ready to enchant new eyes; the heartless beauty even upon us, who have found out her falsehood. Art nature is not false for being fair. It is we who are altered, and not she. It is spring with her again, as it was with us once—ah, me, how long ago! —for she renews her youth-time yearly. The summer odors are as sweet now as then, and borne by the same bright clear airs, which drive the self-same seas of meadow-grass, although their shores may shift a little (as those of ocean do) from copse to cornfield. The cradles of fresh moss, with their coverlets of wild-flowers, invite us as of old—only we are no longer children. The shadows flicker and pass athwart the face of the pool, and fade away into light (like a good man's death), exactly as they were wont to do; but in the faithful depths we see a wan, worn face, and the white head, where once the smile was mirrored and the crown of flowers. The garden, to our eyes, has become a wilderness, nay, a very place of tombs, beneath each of which is buried a dead joy.

Thus was it with Mildred Clifford, as her long, lonely journey northward drew to its close, and through the windows of the post-chaise she began to discern the well-remembered scenes amid which her love had ripened for him who was no longer with her. She had traveled all night, and at early dawn Ribble had shot up before her fair and green, with its great wall of limestone looking in the distance like a mural crown; Ribble, within which her troth had been first plighted. Then for many an hour her way lay through a land of rocks and streams, where every stone might have borne Raymond's name, and every runlet babbled it, so instinct was it with his memory. The spring-time seemed to mock her with its joy. It was nearly mid-day when the wheels began to rattle over the uneven village street that led to the Hall gates. The last time they had done so it was when she fled with her lover on the very eve of her threatened marriage with Rupert. Strange to say, she felt less terror in thus returning alone to brave the malice of her aunt and the anger of him she had so slighted, than upon that occasion. She had then feared for Raymond, and listened for the clanging hoofs of the pursuer with a sinking heart; but now against him Grace Clifford had done her worst, which was so bad that even she was glutted with it · while was not Mildred there to be her child's protector—preserver from she knew not what, fellow-guardian with she knew not whom—and did it not behoove her above all things not to fear?

The post-chaise had drawn many a familiar face of child and woman to the doors of the hamlet, but the park itself, seen over the sunk fence, appeared unusually destitute of life for such an hour: no keeper with his gun, no laborer with ax in hand about the plantations, no blue-aproned bearer of vegetables from the kitchen-garden, no message-boy loitering on the path that led to the village—no external sign of life, in short, such as is ordinarily visible about a great country household, was there. The porter at the lodge, too, could not easily be roused; and while she waited, through the gilded iron gates the long avenue showed strangely desolate. As the cottage-door opened, she drew back mechanically, for she knew the man would start to recognize the face of runaway "Miss Mildred as was;" but she could hear his well-known voice in expostulation with the post-boy.

"You know, my man, it's no use your bringing anybody here at this time," quoth Giles the porter. "Why can't you let a poor devil, who scarcely remembers what a night's rest is like, take a little sleep?"

"It is a lady, and I did not like to tell her," replied the other, in a tone so low that Mildred could scarcely catch the words.

"Nay," grinned Giles, "but that only makes it worse. The Master will have no such folk within his doors."

"Ay, but she comes to visit Mistress Clifford."

In a moment the gates were thrown back, and through her vail Mildred could see the porter drawn up in that most uncomfortable of the attitudes of respect, and shading his eyes with his hand, as though the glory of the exalted personage to whom he was doing honor was almost too great to look upon.

The deer, that had been wont to keep at a considerable distance from the avenue, were now feeding close beside it, and cantered nimbly off as the chaise rattled by; while the rooks, more easily moved than of yore, rose in a single cloud from the swinging branches, and like a household roused by night-alarm, inquired of one another hoarsely what was wrong; whereupon, some answered "Thieves!" and some cried "Fire!" and others (who seemed half asleep) murmured "Both! Both!" As the visitor drew nearer to the house itself, the peacock on the terrace began to scream; but Mildred remarked to herself how strange it was that, save the deep bay of the blood-hounds, not a note came from the deep distant kennel where the foxhounds lay, and from whence such a tumult had been wont of old to issue in the daytime at the echo of hoofs from the courtyard. No sound of human tongue was heard, no cheerful noises such as the morning brings to every dwelling: no human face came to the blinded windows of the upper floors, and those beside the door were shuttered close.

"Is there death here?" asked Mildred of the post-boy, letting down the glass with a trembling hand, and thinking with agony of a small white face, growing pointed and thin, and cold little hands, which she had not been in time even to put crosswise over the sinless breast. "Speak, man, and tell me the whole truth."

"Well, ma'am," returned the young fellow, mitigating the Craven dialect for her benefit as well as he was able, "it's what I can't insense you about in a crack, but I'll not lee to ye. The Master, you see, he's odd, and will have nothing done in the daytime. All the folks here gets up at eve and goes to bed in the morning. It is mackly that they're all asleep, and will give me time to tell the tale before they answer the bell. Some folks hes lile brains, and some's an outshut; and Mistress Clifford, she has brains for hersel as well as for Squire Rupert."

"But he must be stark-staring mad," exclaimed Mildred, involuntarily, "thus habitually to turn night into day."

"You've about hit the sticklebutt, ma'am; but 'mad's' a hard word and a bad one (here he looked cautiously around him), to speak of hereabouts. Besides we can't be fresh when there's so much gear going. It would not be wise in the mistress to lock him up like the rest of 'em. Better have a bairn with a mucky faace than wesh its noas off."

"Then this poor gentleman is only suffered to be at large to serve the purposes of another?"

"Nay, ma'am," returned the post-boy, apprehensively, "I know nothing mysel—I only tell what I have been told; and if the great folk here should come to learn it, they would tak encouth at poor Toby Drayson."

"But what a dreadful hypocrisy, what an acted lie must all things here——"

"Tush, ma'am, dinna flite," interrupted the other; "if leeing were choking, thear'd be hard gasping everywhere. And again, I say, speak not o' what I told ye. Ye braad o' me, I see, and have an honest, kindly heart, or I should never ha' spoken. But what name shall I say? for here is somebody coming at last."

"Mrs. Raymond Clifford."

"Saints and soldiers! What are ye braad o' them? Then I wish I'd never spoken. But folk ses out when ther i' drink; and indeed, indeed ma'am, I made too free with the liquor this cold morning."

"Do not fear," returned Mildred, smiling. "I am not of their race, although of their name; nor am I and Mrs. Clifford such friends, although we are relatives."

"Then, for any sake," returned the man confidentially, "let us shog back again to Lancaster, while yet we may. Wae worth ye, if ye stay here, and be an unfriend of the mistress. Come; for your kind face, and the trouble in it, I will take ye back, and risk all—ay, though there's an ill-looking devil on the bridge yonder—I wonder where he sprung from?—loitering there for no good, and as much as to say: 'What we have stolen, that we keep.' Say the word, and I'll ride him down like muck. Let him take care of his taahs."

"Thank you much," returned Mildred, gratefully; "but I have come hither of my own will, and am not afraid to stay here." Nevertheless, as she looked back in the direction indicated by her new friend, and beheld the gaunt form of the man Cator standing upon the narrow way, as though indeed to forbid her egress, she felt that she had need of all her courage.

The next moment the door was opened by Mrs. Clifford.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—A WEEK'S REPRIEVE.

"You have come at last, niece; I have waited for you long," said the Lady of Cliffe, letting fall her ice-cold syllables one by one, like drops from a petrifying spring. "If I do not take your hand, it is not because I am not glad to see you."

Resolute, severe, unbending as ever was Grace Clifford, in voice and gesture; but her fair features had suffered change. The brow was no longer smooth, and the lithe form had lost its rounded grace. Trouble, and what is worse than trouble, the anxiety of guilt—the dread solicitude of one who drives a chariot on a city wall, unfenced on either side, and dares not for his life look right or left, but always to his plunging steeds—had worn at last her wondrous youth away. Moreover, she seemed to take no pains to keep it; her attire was loose, and her fine hair unbraided, although it was plain she had not been roused from her bed, as other inhabitants of the Hall had been by this time. And indeed Grace Clifford, it was said, now never slept. Perhaps, had Ralph been alive, she would have contrived to retain her marvelous beauty, but now, as though aware it was of little use to her, she neglected it, unwomanly in that as in all else. A look of scorn, which had sat upon her when she first appeared, faded away as she gazed in Mildred's face and marked its calm resolve. Twice had her niece essayed to speak, and twice had failed, but it was easy to observe that her inability did not proceed from fear. Even Tobias Drayson, who was himself by no means free from apprehensions, could see that, as, after lifting the luggage into the hall, he threw into his farewell scrape at the door a more genuine sympathy than could have been expressed from all the bows that Lord Chesterfield ever made in his life.

"Stay one moment," cried Mildred to this friend of three hours' standing, who was about to leave her in the keeping of her mortal foe. "There may have been some mistake here, after all. Mrs. Clifford, where is my child?"

"She is in Lucy Cator's charge—a servant new to you, I think, but very faithful. Must you nee is see her now?"

"Here, and at once!" returned Mildred, resolutely. I will not stir, except to leave this house, unless I see her—unless I hold her in my hands."

The hideous thought that had already pierced the mother's breast was again at work; she dreaded lest this fiendish woman, keeping her promise to the ear, might presently give to her orphaned arms her Milly—dead.

"Your child is safe and well enough," returned Mrs. Clifford, with a sneer; "this bell will bring her in three minutes. There!" She rang it. "But do not look so haggard, niece, for be sure I did not ask you to Cliffe Hall to play the mourner."

The cruel shaft sped not home; the mother had no ears save for the sounds she hungered for—the echo of a tiny footfall and the babble of a baby tongue. Tobias, too, with head aside, awaited them with not a little interest; and presently they came.

"Run, then—run to mamma," cried a woman's voice, not unkindly, and then was heard the pompous stagger of an infant's feet, and the crow that bespeaks pedestrian confidence; and like an arrow from the bow, forth darted Mildred, and caught her child up as it strained, like hound in leash, to meet her from its nurse's hand, and hugged it to her breast, and kissed and fondled it, and rocked it to and fro, with murmurous, inarticulate joy.

No sooner had the first gush of grateful happiness passed away, than her eye glanced toward the door. It was closed; Tobias was standing by it no longer, and there was a dull sound of wheels.

"It will be better both for you, niece, and for your child," said Mrs. Clifford, in her sibilant voice, "not to think any more of what I read in your mind just now. You have foiled me once, it is true, but once with me is enough."

Mildred trembled.

"You fear," continued Mrs. Clifford, triumphantly, but speaking still so low that not a sound reached the nurse's ear; "you fear, and you are wise. You dare not risk so great a stake as that (she pointed to the infant, clutching in blind love it's mother's cheek) upon a losing game. Mind, I would not have you marry Nephew Rupert."

"Marry him!" That was all Mildred said; but had she cried, "Thou murderess, with hands yet dripping from my husband's blood, how darest thou speak to me of marriage?" she could not have expressed more hate and loathing than did her shrinking form, that seemed to fear pollution from the woman's touch, and poison from the very air she breathed in common with her. "Marry him!"

"No, niece; that is no longer necessary. But see you speak him fair, and promise what he asks for. There is no harm in humoring a madman. Thanks to you, Rupert has never been himself since when you broke your faith with him and me, and fled—as did your false mother before you—from kith and kin, to link yourself with their sworn enemy. I cannot quench the anger of my eyes the while I speak of it, but I have forgiven you this, and Rupert has forgotten it. He deems that every morrow is his marriage morn; and, therefore, that the night may pass the quicker with him than if, on a sleepless pillow, he lay longing for his gipsy bride, he turns it into day—hunts, shoots and fishes by moonlight, or by torchlight if there be no moon, and makes the name of the Mad Clifford a wonder and a jest the country through. And he is mad, too; so mad, niece, that if I did but tell him, 'That is Mildred's child, she that is widow of thy brother,' he would pluck her from thy arms, and dash her brains out on yonder courtyard stones; and yet the law would hold him harmless. But the law stirs not of itself; and if I have his name set to a certain parchment, written out and ready for his signing more than two years back, and which he would have signed upon the very day on which he called you his—you ungrateful girl—I say that even now, should he but sign it, there being no greedy heirs to wrangle with me and dispute my rights, the thing would hold, and all this goodly heritage, on which I have fixed my eyes these many years, and have yearned after as you—weak fool—have yearned after that babe these ten days, shall henceforth be mine—mine—mine!"

Grace Clifford clasped her hands as though she were invoking a blessing from High Heaven upon her sinful soul—so rapt in greed, that for a moment she forgot the very presence of her niece. Then suddenly she swooped upon her with: "Thou darest not thwart me, Mildred; thou darest not come between me and such a prize! If loss of all thou lovest—who has already lost so much, and canst afford to lose so ill—has terror for thee, play me not false again! When wilt thou see Rupert?"

"Alas, Aunt Grace, I fear ——"

"When—when, I say?" exclaimed the pitiless woman, not stormfully, as the winds beat and the rains fall, but fiercely, as the hailstones rattle and hiss. "To-day, to-morrow? A week hence, if you will have it so; but when once named, see you depart not from the time. I will not brook postponement for an hour."

"Then I will see him now," quoth Mildred, resolutely. "Here, at once. I am ready. Let him come."

"Fool, would you have him rend you limb from limb, you and the child as well? You know not what you ask. No, nor yet to-morrow. Those sunken cheeks must be plumped out, those eyes harbor no tears, those mournful garments be exchanged for others befitting one on the threshold of her bridal. A week hence it shall be. You hear me, girl? I do not mince my words; but do you heed, I will not take your silence for consent. Speak--speak, I say. What! you are contumacious? Lucy, take her child."

As the woman stepped forward to obey her mistress, Mildred cried, with passion: "I hear, I heed. I will do all you ask if I have still my child; without her, nothing. Rupert and you may rend me limb from limb, as you have said, but I will not be parted from my child!"

"Good," returned Grace. "For a week, then, you shall have her to yourself, and after that, if the parchment be but signed, shall take her whither you will; if not, then you will not be much together, you and she. Do you understand me, Mildred?"

"Yes, we shall be parted like my husband and myself," returned Mildred, hoarsely. "Let me go hence to my chamber. I cannot bear to look upon your wicked face."

"You are no flatterer, niece; but that does not affect me. My presence shall not vex you longer now, nor any more, unless your own conduct calls for it. Lucy, show Mrs. Raymond Clifford to her room, and see you never leave her night or day, as I have already charged you. Remember, a week hence, and you meet Rupert Clifford as his betrothed wife. Have I your word, Niece Mildred?"

"You have, Aunt Grace," answered Mildred, resolutely.

For is not "a week hence" a precious boon to be rejected by no human soul in present peril, and least of all by a woman?—a very eternity of comfort, a space wherein a score of unlooked-for buds of hope have time to spring up, any one of which may blossom into the flower Safety?

A FREEDMAN'S WEDDING.

The richest affair of the season came off at the office of Judge Starr. In order to give the reader a full insight into the case, it is necessary to start at the Mayor's Court, in which the case of an unhappy pair of old darkies was brought up for adjudication. It appeared that the venerable old couple had been living together as man and wife, but she said, "widout circumference of law." They brought a voluminous string of charges against each other, and taxed the Mayor's patience beyond endurance. The Court being unable to make head or tail of the affair, turned the case over to the Freedman's Bureau. They shot out for "de Buro," and the trial was at once taken up. After hearing all the facts in the case, that tribunal decided that they should be lawfully married forthwith, and placing them under guard, sent the bride and groom to the office of Judge Starr, for that functionary to carry out the sentence of the Bureau. When they got to the Esquire's office, the guard simply stated to Judge Starr:

"Here's a couple for you to marry."

"All right!" replied the humorous justice; and the guard, not having an invitation to the wedding, retired.

"Just step in the back room," said the justice, "and I'll splice you in grammatical style and apple-pie order."

The couple followed him to the room in the rear of the front office, and after explaining the duties and obligations, he requested them to join hands.

Bride—"I isn't gwine to do it; I doesn't want to hab nuffin to do wid dat nigger."

Groom—"I isn't 'ticlar about marryin' wid de gal. I never lubbed de wench."

This protest opened the Esquire's eyes like "two full moons in the harvest." He asked what was the meaning of it, and just then a representative from the Bureau stepped in, and informed the justice that they were ordered by the Freedman's Court to be married, and he came up to see the sentence executed.

With this understanding, Judge Starr told the happy couple to join hands, which they did after much persuasion, and the following scene ensued:

Justice—"You take this man to be your wedded husband, to love, honor, obey, etc.?"

Bride—"No, I doesn't; I wouldn't hab a four-acre lot of such trash."

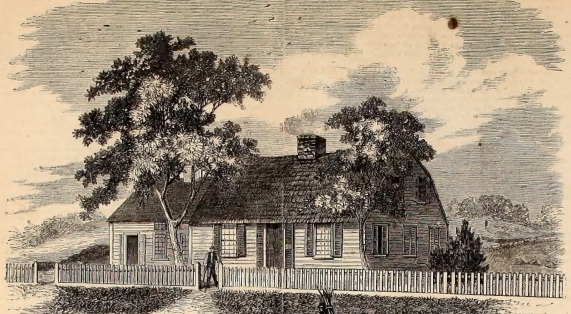
Freedman's Bureau—"Yes, we do, Squire. We take him. Go on with the ceremony."

Justice—"And do you take this woman to be your wedded wife, to love, cherish, etc.?"

Groom—"I tole you dat I isn't 'ticlar. I isn't hankerin' arter de crow. I can lib widout de ole gal."

Freedman's Bureau—"Certainly, we do take her—of course we do--suits us to a single allspice. Hurry up the cakes."

Justice—"Then I pronounce you all man and wife, and may the Lord have mercy on your souls."



Mussels as an Article of Diet.—This is one of the most important molluscs which the sea produces, even the oyster being scarcely of more value to the nation; for it is largely used for food, being palatable, mostly nourishing, and sold at a cheap rate. Its chief use, however, is for bait, its attractive properties being well known to all those who have had practical experience of sea-fishing. No one need be in want of a bait so long as he can find a mussel; and even when the lug-worm is employed, the mussel is often added to tempt the fish more powerfully. The cod-fishers depend almost entirely on this mollusc for success in their labors, and for their service alone the mussel is bred by millions in preserves, technically named "gardens." The details of this animal and its economy are extremely interesting. Generally, the mussel is a wholesome and nutritious article of diet. I have made many an extemporized luncheon on this mollusc, opening one shell by means of another, just as one walnut is cracked with another. It is equally good when stewed, fried, scolloped, or otherwise cooked; but it has one drawback—at distant intervals a batch of mussels turn out to be deleterious, and produce most unpleasant symptoms in the consumers. They are attacked with a singular variety of symptoms; they have nettle-rash breaking out all over the body with astonishing rapidity; they become giddy, are seized with a kind of fit, and then fall insensible. Sometimes they are partly paralyzed, and sometimes they are seized with asthma. In many cases the symptoms have become so aggravated that the sufferer has been unable to bear up against them, and has died. And the most remarkable part of the business is, that no one knows the cause of these symptoms, no one knows how to detect the poison-bearing mussels, and no one precisely knows how to give relief from the suffering which this mysterious poison inflicts. The popular idea—and it is certainly a specious one—is, that the deleterious mussels are those which have been scraped off the copper bottoms of ships, and have been sold by the laborers in the docks. But as there are many instances where this remarkable disorder has proceeded from mussels that were undoubtedly taken from rocks or out of "gardens," this theory falls to the ground.

The Maoris of New Zealand.—The race is melting away; and if there were no more war, and the Europeans were to leave the country to-morrow, the extinction of the Maori, in an exceedingly brief period is as certain as anything human can be. A very few figures will show this. In 1842, according to the best estimates which could be made, the authority of missionaries and other long residents in the country, their number was 114,000. In 1850 a well-informed Wesleyan missionary estimated them at 70,000. In 1858 a government census, generally supposed to be in excess, returned them at 55,970. The war and natural causes have, by this time, probably reduced them to 45,000. Carry on the calculation, and it is evident that the certain extinction of the race, except a few individuals, is a thing which many of us may live to witness. The one great cause of this has been, and is, their utter disregard of all those social and sanitary conditions which are essential to the continuing vitality of the human race. The result is, the constitution of the Maori is absolutely decayed, and they do not produce children to replace the current generation of adults.

Old Paterson, whom Scott saw reviving the inscriptions on the tombs of the Covenanters, went to America, and became the grandfather of a Paterson, whose widow married the Marquis of Wellesley. The sisters of that Mrs. Paterson married the Duke of Leeds and Lord Stafford. The direct blood of Old Mortality went in another and as remarkable a direction. His granddaughter, Miss Paterson, was the first wife of Jerome Bonaparte. The marriage was never "legally" annulled, and a son who sprung from it, the great-grandson of Old Mortality, is now on the staff of his cousin, the Emperor of the French.

Flight of Birds.—A correspondent, writing on the subject of the speed of birds, says that, as the result of numerous observations on this interesting topic, he has not the slightest hesitation in saying that the peregrine falcon is capable of attaining a speed of from 150 to 160 miles an hour; that the flight of the wood-pigeon is from 90 to 130 or 140 miles an hour; that the rock-dove is capable of accomplishing still more; and that the flight of the swift is as rapid as that of the wood-pigeon.

A Dinner from a Countess's Hair.—Horace Walpole relates that when the beautiful Countess of Suffolk married Mr. Howard, they were both so poor, that they went to Hanover, before Queen Anne's death, to pay court to the future royal family. Having a party to dinner, and being disappointed of a remittance, the countess was forced to sell her hair to furnish the entertainment. Long wigs were then in fashion, and her hair being very long, fine, and fair, produced her twenty pounds.

THE BOWEN HOUSE, COVENTRY, RHODE ISLAND.

THE BOWEN HOUSE IN RHODE ISLAND.

In the town of Coventry, Rhode Island, about two miles from Summit Station, on the Providence, Hartford and Fishkill Railroad, and about twenty-five from the city of Providence, stands the old Bowen House, the scene of our present sketch. It was built by Israel Bowen, some years before the opening of the Revolution. Like the farm-houses of colonial days, it is a small, unpretending structure of a story and a half, with but four rooms on the first floor, and the usual huge stone chimney occupying a prominent position in the building.

In the year 1774 old Mr. Bowen had a remarkable dream, which left a deep impression on his mind. He dreamed that he saw a large army marching up the lane past his house, and that the soldiers made a halt on his own land. Their leader was a man of noble and commanding carriage, and his manner left a pleasing impression on the dreamer's mind. Israel related this to his family the following morning, with much seriousness, and he afterward frequently referred to the circumstance, and often expressed the belief that it was the forerunner of some event, as intelligence of the opening incidents of the war, one after another, reached his quiet rural home. In the course of the following year, after the British had taken possession of Boston, the old man died, and his house and farm passed into the hands of his son Nathan.

On the 17th of March, 1776, the British evacuated Boston, and the army and munitions of war were transferred to the ships and transports in the harbor, and the vessels soon dropped down to Nantasket Roads. Gen. Washington at once, by letter, informed Gov. Cooke, of Rhode Island, of the movements of the British troops, and that it was his belief that their next attempt would be "against New York or some other southern colony." He then adds: "However, I should think (though I do not believe they have any design against Rhode Island) that it would be advisable to keep a strict look-out, and submit it to you whether it may not be proper, against the time you apprehend they might arrive, to call in a number of the militia, and have them posted in proper places. I do not mean to direct the measure, but only mention it for your consideration."

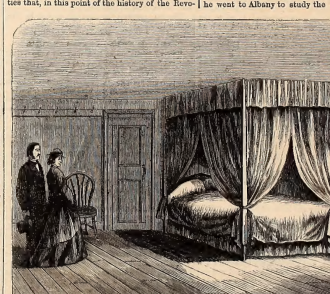
This intelligence aroused Gov. Cooke's apprehensions, and he at once responded in great concern at the exposed position of the colony, begging the Commander-in-Chief, if he saw fit to order any of the troops in the vicinity of Boston to the more southern colonies, that he would direct their march to Rhode Island, by the sea-shore, that they might be at hand in case of an invasion.

About the first of April, Gen. Washington ordered Greene and Sullivan to march toward Providence with their commands, where he himself arrived on the evening of the 5th. Gens. Greene and Sullivan probably reached the city on the previous day, and they were followed by a detachment of Gen. Spencer's brigade (Col. Parsons's regiment) on the 6th. The remainder of the brigade, without doubt, arrived on the next day. As there seemed to be no special call for the troops to tarry in Rhode Island, they were ordered to proceed immediately for New London, by way of Norwich and New London. The Commander-in-Chief tarried for one day, and a grand entertainment was given in his honor at Hacker's Hall; but he departed on the morning of the 7th, accompanied by Adjutant-General Gates and several other officers, and must have rejoined some portion of the army at Coventry. History, however, is silent as to the details of this march; but one tradition reveals some pleasant incidents connected with it. Mr. Bowen's descendants declare that the troops did, in the course of this march, move down the lane (referred to in the dream of Israel) past the Bowen House, and bivouacked in one of Nathan's fields. It is also asserted that they stopped there an entire day. During this time, Washington's headquarters were in Nathan's house, and the room which he occupied as his bed-chamber is still regarded as an almost sacred apartment. In fact, it has ever since been preserved as the "spare chamber," and the antique bed now occupies the same position in the apartment that it did when the great man then rested his head upon its humble pillow. A few rods from the residence of Nathan stood the farm-house of Jebabod Bowen, a brother of Israel. Jebabod's little son, Joseph, then between three and four years of age, accompanied his father to the camp. It was a strange sight to the child. He expressed great fear of the soldiers, as he viewed their rough features and heavy muskets, and timidly clung to his parent; but the General, with much tenderness, took him in his arms, and spoke very pleasantly to him, assuring the little fellow that the soldiers would not harm such boys as he. He also invited Joseph to dine with him, and not only invited him, but compelled him to take a seat at the table, and treated him with so much attention, that he completely won the boy's confidence, who, eventually, lost all fear of the troops. He even left his home alone, and wandered to the quarters of the good man, as well as to the borders of the camp; and he afterward related how the General raised his chamber-window, and gave orders to the man, at the same time repeating the commands to his mother. Joseph also described a big-whiskered fellow, who paced to and fro at the entrance to the camp, and who asked him if he folks did not raise tobacco; and the child fastened his story by begging his mother to allow him to carry out a parcel of the article, which was at that time stowed away in the barn. His request being granted, away he ran with his arms full of crude tobacco, to present to the soldiers.

It was with a feeling of regret that Joseph saw the General mount his horse and ride away. As the army resumed its march, the boy perched himself on the garden-fence and eagerly watched the receding ranks till the last glittering bayonet was lost in the distance.

Although M. Bowen lived to the ripe old age of seventy-eight, he never forgot the visit nor the attentions of Gen. Washington, and all the incidents of the arrival and bivouac of the troops were ever fresh in his memory. He always referred to their circumstances with enthusiastic pride. What a volume it speaks in the praise of the Father of his Country that, amid the corroding cares and anxieties that, in this point of the history of the Revolution, must have been pressing upon his mind, he could consecrated to show such marked attentions to a child! How consistent that true greatness is often manifested in little acts, is verified in this tradition. It is another exhibition of that innate nobleness of heart which led Washington, amid the honors of an entire populace, to pause and bless the infant Irving.

On the 6th of April, as already intimated, Col. Parsons's regiment, being part of Gen. Spencer's brigade, passed through Providence, en route for New York. As the Commander-in-Chief and suite did not leave the city until the following morning, it is probable that he overtook Col. Parsons at Coventry, or fell in with the remainder of Gen. Spencer's brigade, which was following close on Parsons's heels. In view of these facts, our tradition does no violence to history; and when we take into consideration the fact that Washington did not reach New York until the 13th of April, there is no doubt that a little halt was made at Coventry, it being the Sabbath.



An addition has since been built upon the Bowen House, and it has been otherwise improved; but the chamber which Gen. Washington occupied has never been subjected to any alterations. The bedstead, however, on which the General slept, has been removed, it having been bequeathed to a daughter of Nathan, while the house was willed to one of his sons. But another bed of antique pattern was set up in the same corner of the room, and care has always been taken to preserve the same order in the arrangement of the other furniture as was observed in the days of the Revolution. The daughter, long since married, now resides with her husband on the farm adjoining the Bowen estate, where the old bedstead is preserved with a reverence coequal with that cherished for the name of Washington, and is shown to visitors with pleasure. A Boston antiquarian recently made a liberal offer for its purchase; but the family have set a value upon it that is not estimated by dollars and cents, and will by no means consent to its removal.

The only relics of the army which have been preserved are a large tin-box and a cartridge-box. The former was carried at the hind end of the army wagon, and was used for a feeding-trough; the latter, tradition says, belonged to one of the colored soldiers, and it is quite probable that Sambo received a whipping for losing it.

Joseph Bowen was never called to be a soldier, but he was always greatly interested in the militia affairs of his town. He was early commissioned colonel, and for years held that position at the general musters with a great deal of pride. His youngest son, Caleb T. Bowen, however, was among the first to enlist in the War for the Preservation of the Union, and served until the dawn of peace. He was severely wounded at Antietam, and was afterward taken prisoner, and endured many hardships in the rebel prison-pens; but he retired from the service, breveted colonel for meritorious conduct.

F. X. GARNEAU, THE HISTORIAN OF CANADA.

THE ROOM IN WHICH WASHINGTON SLEPT, AT THE BOWEN HOUSE, APRIL 6, 1776.

F. X. GARNEAU.

On this page we give the portrait of the late Mr. Garneau, the distinguished historian, who died at Quebec, C. E., on the 5th of February last.

His early career was not particularly remarkable, though it was characterized by the conscientiousness and strict integrity that shone conspicuously throughout his whole life. He was eminently fitted for the task of historian. He was a lover of labor, pains-taking to excess, and possessed a mind remarkable for its inquiring turn, together with a breadth and liberality of views rarely to be found.

It was in 1840 that Mr. Garneau, after having contributed several light poetical effusions to the literature of Canada, began in earnest his great work. The three years he had spent in England, France and Italy, had afforded him unparalleled facilities, by searching the public archives—in Paris especially—to collect materials, new and reliable, for the history of the colony. Later on, he went to Albany to study the contents of the valuable state papers which had been compiled in the French archives. His work embraces a complete history of Canada, from its first settlement down to the present time, and has been universally recognized as a standard authority.

On the 5th of February last, the élite of Quebec, without distinction of race or religion, followed the remains of F. X. Garneau to the new Belmont Cemetery, where a national subscription will shortly mark, by an appropriate mausoleum, the last abode of a great, good citizen, and an able writer.

SEAL OF THE SOCIETY

For the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Few organizations have accomplished more in a quiet way than this society. The gentlemen connected with it are active, earnest, and fearless, and, without any parade, have effectually put in operation all the provisions of the laws they were appointed to enforce. We are no longer shocked by witnessing the barbarous scenes that for years disgraced our city, and were more suited to the latitude and civilization of Dahomey than our own.

If men will act worse than brutes, they cannot do so with impunity, and the prompt arrest of a few offenders has wonderfully diminished the number of offenses. All thanks to the kind feelings and active exertions of the members of the society. On page 268 we give a fac-simile of the seal adopted by the society, and impressed on all its official proceedings. The emblems indicate the object the society has in view and the character of the work it is doing.

A HINDOO FAKIR.

THIS is one of the so-called holy men of India. According to the belief of the Hindoos, these are the very holiest characters, who cannot do anything wrong, and are therefore worshiped by the people. They spend their time traveling from city to city, and in the guise of sanctity really do great harm wherever they go. They carry a bag, in which they place the money and food collected from their deluded admirers. They are really great knaves, and would not be tolerated in any country where superstition did not sway the multitudes.

As their influence and existence depend upon keeping the masses in ignorance, the Fakirs have been found the most bitter opponents to the progress of civilization and Christianity. Our illustration shows the fantastic dress and appearance of one of these impostors, and it is difficult for us to conceive how such repulsive barbarians can secure the regard and confidence which are so universally accorded to them. Modern intelligence and enlightenment are gradually forcing their way even into India, and in a few years these Fakirs will lose their power, and be remembered among the relics of the past.

DESPERATE ENCOUNTER BETWEEN TWO SNAKES.

THE display of anger in animals, in their native state, is often terrible and majestic. There are many of them that never meet without a battle, resulting in the death of one or both of the combatants. The following description of a fight between two snakes, witnessed by a gentleman in Virginia, illustrates very forcibly the terrible fierceness of animal passion:

He was sitting one day in a secluded spot, when his attention was engaged by a strange sort of rustling noise at some paces distant, and looking round, he beheld two snakes of considerable length, the one pursuing the other with great celerity through a hemp stubble-field. The aggressor was of the black kind, six feet long; the fugitive was a water-snake, nearly of equal dimensions.

They soon met, and in the fury of their first encounter, appeared in an instant firmly twisted together, and whilst their united tails beat the ground, they tried with open jaws to lacerate each other. Their heads were compressed to a very small size; their eyes flashed fire; and after this conflict had lasted about five minutes, the second found means to disengage itself from the first, and hurried toward a ditch. Its antagonist instantly assumed a new posture, and half creeping, half erect, with a majestic mien, overtook and attacked the other again, which placed itself in a similar attitude, and prepared to resist.

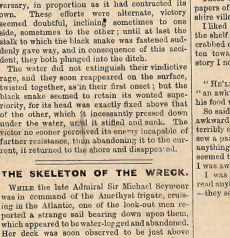
The scene was uncommon and beautiful, for, thus opposed, they fought with their jaws, biting each other with two utmost rage; but notwithstanding this appearance of mutual courage and fury, the water-snake still seemed desirous of retreating toward the ditch, its natural element. This was no sooner perceived by the keen-eyed black one, than, twisting its tail twice round a stalk of hemp, and seizing its adversary by the throat, not by means of its jaws, but by twisting its own neck twice round that of the water-snake, he pulled it back from the ditch.

A DESPERATE ENCOUNTER BETWEEN TWO SNAKES.

To prevent a defeat, the latter took hold likewise of a stalk on the bank, and by the acquisition of that point of resistance, became a match for his fierce antagonist. Strange was this to behold; two great snakes strongly adhering to the ground, mutually fastened together by means of the convolutions which lashed them to each other, and stretched at their full length, they pulled, but pulled in vain; and, in the moments of greatest exertion, that part of their bodies which was entwined seemed extremely small, while the rest appeared inflated, and now and then covered with strong undulations, rapidly following each other. Their eyes appeared on fire, and ready to start out of their heads.

At one time the conflict seemed decided; the water-snake bent itself into great folds, and by that operation rendered the other more than commonly outstretched; the next minute the new struggles of the black one gained an unexpected superiority; it acquired two great folds likewise, which necessarily extended the body of its adversary, in proportion as it had contracted its own. These efforts were alternate, victory seemed doubtful, inclined sometimes to one side, sometimes to the other; until at last the stalk to which the black snake was fastened suddenly gave way, and in consequence of this accident, they both plunged into the ditch.

The water did not extinguish their vindictive rage, and they soon reappeared on the surface, twisted together, as in their first onset; but the black snake seemed to retain its wonted superiority, for its head was exactly fixed above that of the other, which it incessantly pressed down under the water, until it stifled and sunk. The victor no sooner perceived its enemy incapable of further resistance, than abandoning it to the current, it returned to the shore and disappeared.



THE SKELETON OF THE WRECK.

WHILE the late Admiral Sir Michael Seymour was in command of the Amethyst frigate, cruising in the Atlantic, one of the look-out men reported a strange sail bearing down upon them, which appeared to be water-logged and abandoned. Her deck was soon observed to be just above water, while her lower mast alone was standing. Not a soul could be seen aboard, but there was a cub-house on deck, which had the appearance of having been recently patched with old canvas and tarpaulins, as if to afford shelter to some forlorn remnant of the crew.

It blew at this time a strong gale, but Sir Michael ordered the ship to be put about, and dispatched a boat, with instructions to board the wreck, and ascertain whether there was any being still surviving whom the help of his fellow-men might save from death. The boat rowed toward the drifting vessel, and while struggling with the difficulty of getting through a high running sea, close alongside, the crew shouting all the time as loud as they could, an object, resembling in appearance a bundle of clothes, was observed to roll out of the cub-house against the lee shrouds of the mast. With the end of a boat-hook they managed to get hold of it, and had hauled it into the boat, when it proved to be the trunk of a man, bent head and knees together, and so wasted away as scarcely to be felt within the ample clothes which had once fitted it in a state of life and strength.

The boat's crew hastened back to the Amethyst with this remnant of mortality, and so small was it in bulk that a lad was able, with his own hands to lift it into the ship. When placed on deck, it showed for the first time, to the astonishment of the crew, traces of remaining life. It tried to move, and the next moment muttered, in a hollow tone, "There is another man."

The moment Sir Michael heard these words he ordered the boat to push off again for the wreck. The sea having now become smoother, they succeeded this time in boarding it, and, on looking into the cub-house they found two other human bodies, wasted, like the one they had saved, to the very bones, but without the least spark of life remaining. They were sitting in a shrunken posture, the head of one resting on a tin pot, in which there was about a gill of water, and the hand of the other reaching to the deck, as it to regain a scrap of food which had dropped from his nerveless grasp. The unfortunate men had lived on their scanty store until they had not strength enough left to lift the last morsel to their mouths, and had remained for many days in this condition; and the boat's crew, having completed their melancholy task, returned on board, where they found the attention of the ship's company engrossed by the efforts made to preserve the survivor. Sir Michael committed him to the special charge of the surgeons, who spared no means which humanity could suggest to achieve the object of creating anew, as it were, a fellow-creature whom gaunt famine had stripped of almost every energy. For three weeks he scarcely left his patient, giving him nourishment with his own hand, and at the end of three weeks more the "Skeleton of the Wreck" was seen walking on the decks of the Amethyst, and, to the surprise of all who recollected that he had been lifted into the ship by a cabin-boy, presented the figure of a man nearly six feet high.

THE SKELETON OF THE WRECK.

A Sunday a Century Ago.

AN old brown leather-covered book, the leaves yellow, the writing scarcely legible from time and decay, evidently an old, neglected MS. To the fire, or to my private shelf? Which?

These were my reflections, as I looked over the papers of my late uncle, the rector of a Somersetshire village.

I liked the look of the book, and decided for the shelf; and I had my reward, for I found in the crabbed characters a simple story, evidently written toward the close of the writer's life. This story I now transcribe into a more modern style.

"HE'LL be fit for nothing," said my father; "an awkward booby who holds his awl and cuts his food with his left hand."

So said my father, and so, alas! I felt. I was awkward. I was fifteen; thick-set, strong, but terribly clumsy. I could not make a collar, nor sew a pair of blinkers, nor stuff a saddle, nor do anything that I ought to be able to do. My fingers seemed to have no mechanical feeling in them. I was awkward, and I knew it, and all knew it.

I was good-tempered, could write fairly, and read anything; but I was awkward with my hands — they seemed to have wills of their own; and yet I could dance as easily and lightly as any of my neighbors' sons.

"I don't know what he's fit for," said my father to the rector of the parish. "I've set him to carpentering, and he cuts his finger nearly off with an ax; then he went to the smith, and burns his hands till he was laid up for a month. It's all of no use; he spoils me more good leather in a week than his earnings pay for in a month. Why cannot he, like other Christians, use his hands as the good God meant him to? There! Look at him now, cutting that back strap for the squire with his left hand!"

I heard him; the knife slipped, and the long strip of leather was divided in a moment, and utterly spoiled.

"There now! look at that. A piece out of the very middle of the skin, and his finger gashed into the bargain."

The rector endeavored to soothe my father's anger, while I bandaged my finger.

"You'd better let him come up for that vase, Mr. Walters; I should like a case to fit it, for it's very fragile, as all that old Italian glass is; and line it with the softest leather, please."

And so I went with the rector to bring back the vase, taking two chamois leathers to bring it in.

We reached the house, and I waited in the passage while he went to fetch it. He came back with a large vase, tenderly wrapped in the leathers. Alas! At that moment there came from the room, against the door of which I was standing, the sound of a voice singing—a voice that thrilled me through—a voice I hear now as I write these lines—so clear, so sweet, so pure; it was as if an angel had revealed itself to me.

I trembled, and forgot the precious burden in my hands; it dropped to the ground and was shattered to pieces.

How shall I describe the rector's rage? I fear he said something for which he would have blushed in his calmer moments, and she came out.

She who had the angel voice—his niece—came out, and I saw her. I forgot the disaster, and stood speechlessly gazing at her face.

"You awkward scoundrel! Look at your work. Thirty pounds! Fifty pounds! An invaluable treasure gone irreparably in a moment. Why don't you speak? Why did you drop it?"

"Drop it?" I said, waking up. "Drop what?" And then it flashed upon me again, and I stammered out, "She sang!"

"And if she did sing, was there any occasion to drop my beautiful vase, you doubly stupid blockhead? There, go out of the house—do, before you do any further mischief, and tell your father to horsewhip you for a stupid dolt."

I said nothing, did nothing, but only looked at her face, and went shambling away, a changed and altered being. There was a world where horse-collars and horse-shoes, demons and mortices, right hands or left, entered not. That world I had seen; I had breathed its air and heard its voices.

My father heard of my misfortune, and laid the strap across my shoulders without hesitation, for in my young days boys were boys till eighteen or nineteen years old. I bore it patiently, uncomplainingly.

"What is he fit for?" every one would ask, and no one could answer, not even myself.

I wandered about the rectory in the summer evenings, and heard her sing; I tried hard to get the old gardener to let me help him carry the watering-pots, and when I succeeded, felt, as I entered the rector's garden, that I was entering a paradise. Oh, happy months, when, after the horrible labors of the weary day, I used to follow the old gardener, and hear her sing. My old, withered heart beats fuller and freer when the memory comes back to me now.

Alas! alas! my awkwardness again banished me. She met me one evening in the garden, as I was coming along the path, with my cans full of water, and spoke to me, and said:

"You're the boy that broke the vase, aren't you?"

I did not, could not reply; my strength forsook me. I dropped my cans on the ground, where they upset and flooded away in a moment some seeds, on which the rector set most especial store.

"How awkward, to be sure!" she exclaimed. "And how angry uncle will be."

I turned and fled, and from that time the rectory gate was closed against me.

I led a miserable, unhappy life for the next three years; I had only one consolation during the whole of that weary time—I saw her at church and heard her sing there. I could hear nothing else when she sang, clear and distinct, above the confused, nasal sounds that came from the voices of others—hers alone pure, sweet and good. It was a blessed time. I would not miss a Sunday's service in church for all that might offer. Three good miles every Sunday, there and back, did I heavily plod to hear her, and feel well rewarded. I shared her joys and heaviness. I knew when she was happy, when oppressed; as a mother knows the tones of her child's voice, to the minutest shade of difference, so I could tell when her heart was light and when sad.

One Sunday she sang as I had never yet heard her; not loudly, but so tenderly, so lovingly; I knew the change had come—she loved; it thrilled in her voice; and at the evening service he was there. I saw him. A soldier, I knew by his bearing, with cruel, hard, gray eyes. As she sang, I knew it. I detected a tremble and gratitude in the notes. I felt she was to suffer, as I had suffered. Not that I sang; I had no voice. A harsh, guttural sound was all I could give utterance to. I could whistle like a bird, and often and often have I lain for hours in the shade of a tree and joined the concerts of the woods.

One day I was whistling, as was my wont, as I went through the street, when I was tapped on the shoulder by an old man, the cobbler of the next parish. I knew him from his coming to my father for leather occasionally.

"Sam, where did you learn that?"

"Learn what?"

"That tune."

"At church."

"You've a good ear, Sam."

"I've nothing else good, but I can whistle anything."

"Can you whistle me the Morning Hymn?"

I did so.

"Good—very good. Know anything of music, Sam?"

"Nothing."

"Like to?"

"I'd give all I had in the world to be able to play anything. My soul's full of music. I can't sing a note, but I could play anything if I were taught."

"So you shall, Sam, my boy. Come home with me. Carry these skins, and you shall begin at once."

I went home with him, and found that he was one of the players in the choir of his parish, his instrument being the violoncello. I took my first lesson, and from that time commenced a new life. Evening after evening, and sometimes during the day, I wandered over to his little shop, and while he sat—stitch, stitch—at the boots and shoes, I played over and over again all the music I could get from the church.

"You've a beautiful fingering, Sam, my boy—beautiful; and though it does look a little awkward to see you bowing away with your left, it makes no difference to you. You ought to be a fine player, Sam."

I was enthusiastic, but I was poor. I wanted an instrument of my own, but I had no money, and I earned none—I could earn none. My parents thought, and perhaps rightly, that if they found me food and clothing I was well provided for; and so for some twelve months I used the old cobbler's instrument, improving daily. It was strange that the limbs and fingers, so rigid and stiff for every other impulse, should, under the influence of sound, move with such precision, ease and exactness.

"Sam, my boy," said the cobbler, one day, "you shall have an instrument, and your father shall buy it for you, or the whole parish shall cry shame upon him."

"But he don't know a word of this," I said.

"Never mind, Sam, my boy, he shall be glad to know of it;" and he told me his plans.

At certain times it was customary for the choirs of neighboring churches to help each other, and it was arranged that the choir of our parish should play and sing on the next Sunday morning at his parish church, and that he and his choir should come over to our parish for the evening service.

"And you, Sam," said he, "shall take my place in your own church; and, please God, you do as well there as you've done here, it will be the proudest day I shall know, Sam, my boy, and your father and mother will say so, too."

How I practiced, morning, noon and night, for the great day; how the old man darkly hinted at a prodigy that was to be forthcoming at the festival; and then the day itself, with its events—all is as vivid before me as if it were but yesterday.

The evening came; and there, in the dimly-lit gallery, I sat waiting, with my master beside me.

"Sam, my boy," said my master, "it's a great risk; it's getting very full. There's the squire and my lady just come in. Keep your eyes on your book and feel what you're playing, and think you're in the little shop; I've brought a bit of leather to help you," and he put a piece of that black leather that has a peculiar acid scent in front of me. The scent of it revived me; the memory of the many hours I had spent there came back to me at once, and I felt as calm as if I were indeed there.

She came at last, and service began. Oh! that night! Shall I ever forget its pleasures?—the wondering looks of the friends and neighbors who came and found in me, the despised, awkward, left-handed saddler's apprentice, the prodigy of which they had heard rumors. Oh, it was glorious! The first few strokes of my bow gave me confidence, and I did well, and knew it, through the hymn, through the chants, and on to the anthem before the sermon. That was to be the gem of the evening; it was Handel's then new anthem: "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

It began—harsh, inharmonious, out of tune—I know not why or how; but as it progressed, a spell seemed upon all but her and myself; one by one the instruments ceased and were silent; one by one the voices died away and were lost, and she and I alone, bound together and driven on by an irresistible impulse, went through the anthem; one soul, one spirit seemed to animate both. The whole congregation listened breathless as to an angel; and she, self-absorbed, and like one in a trance, sang, filling me with a delicious sense of peace and exultation, the like of which I have never known since.

It came to an end at last, and with the last triumphant note I fell forward on the desk in a swoon.

When I recovered I found myself at home in my own room, with the rector, the doctor and my parents there, and heard the doctor say:

"I told you he would, my dear madam; I knew he would."

"Thank God!" murmured my mother. "My dear boy, how we have feared for you."

What a difference! I was courted and made much of. "Genius!" and "Very clever!" and "Delightful talent!" such were the expressions I now heard, instead of "Stupid!" "Awkward!" and "Unfit for anything!"

My father bought a fine instrument; and I was the hero of the village for months.

It was some days after that Sunday that I ventured to ask about the rector's niece.

"My dear boy," said my mother, "the like was never heard. We saw you there, and wondered what you were doing; but as soon as we saw you with the bow, we knew you must be the person there'd been so much talk about; and then, when the anthem came, and we all left off singing and they all left off playing, and only you and Miss Cecelia kept on, we were all in tears. I saw even the rector crying; and, poor girl, she seemed as if in a dream, and so did you; it was dreadful for me to see you with your eyes fixed on her, watching her so eagerly. And then to look at her, staring up at the stained glass window as if she could see through it, miles and miles away into the sky. Oh, I'm sure, the like never was; and then, when you fell down, I screamed, and your father ran up and carried you down and brought you home in Farmer Slade's four-wheeler."

After this I had an invitation to go up to the rectory, and there, in the long winter evenings, we used to sit; and while I played, she sang. Oh, those happy times! when she loved me, but only as a dear friend; and I loved her as I never had loved before or could love again. I do not know the kind of love I had for her. I was but a little older than she was, but I felt as a father might feel to his daughter; a sweet tenderness and love that made me pitiful to her. I knew she loved a man unworthy of her, and I think, at times, she felt this herself, and knew I felt it.

I was perfectly free of the rector's house at last, and we used to find in our music a means of converse that our tongues could never have known. Ah, me—those days! Gone! Alas! they are gone.

She left us at last, and in a few years her motherless child came back in her place, and as I again sit in the old rectory parlor, years and years after my first visit, with her daughter beside me singing—but, alas! not with her mother's voice—all the old memories flood back upon me, and I feel a grateful, calm joy in the openly-shown respect and affection of the daughter of her whom I loved so silently, so tenderly, and so long.

I sit in the old seat in the church now and play; and, once in the year, the old anthem; but the voice is gone that filled the edifice as with a glory that day. I feel, as the sounds swell out, and the strings vibrate under my withered fingers, I am but waiting to be near her under the old yew tree outside, and it may be, nearer to her still in the longed-for future.

SARDINES.—The lovers of the "little fishes biled in ile" should know that the fish which furnishes them with such a delicious repast belongs to the herring family. The popular name was given to it by Cuvier, who was the first to assign it to a distinct place in the finny tribe. He called it sardinia, from which it is known as the sardine. Sardines are caught principally along the coasts of Brittany and, to a less extent, in Portugal. The fisheries employ a large number of men and women. The fishing vessels—of eight or ten tuns each, and carrying a crew of from six to ten—go out two or three leagues from the land, and watch for shoals of fish. When they see them, they spread their gill-nets for them, and scatter on the water the bait that has been prepared, and which consists of the eggs and flesh of fish, especially of cod and mackerel, and sometimes of salted fish. Large quantities of sardines are taken in this way. Some are salted on board and others are carried on shore, and either sold fresh or prepared for shipment. For the latter purpose, they are salted and packed away in tin cans, with melted butter and olive oil, which is poured upon them in almost a boiling state. The cans are sealed up to prevent the air reaching the fish, and are then ready for shipment.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

"PRAY, sir," said a judge angrily to a blunt old Quaker, from whom no direct answer could be obtained, "do you know what we sit here for?"

"Yes, verily, I do," said the Quaker; "three of you for four dollars each day, and the fat one in the middle for four thousand a year."

DEFENDING HIS HONOR.—A merchant signed a temperance pledge, but his friends seeing no improvement in his habits of life, remonstrated, as in duty bound. He defended his honor, and to wipe off all stain, produced the document which he had signed, and showed that it was invalid, as it was without a government stamp.

WHY is a church singing-book like a school-house? Because it is full of little hims.

"I can't say the same thing," said Dick, "about you."

"You might," said Tom, "were you reckless as I am, and as careless of saying the thing that is true."

A CHURCH in Baltimore has its motto upon the outer walls, "To the poor the gospel is preached." One morning these words were found painted under it, "Not here, though."

FOOTE has left his verdict against medical mysteries, in his whimsical definition of a physician, whom he describes as "a grave, formal animal, who picks our pockets by talking unintelligible stuff in a sick man's chamber, till nature cures or medicines kill him." Howbeit, blessing and honor, say we, be upon the head of the true physician, of whatever creed, for his is ever a work of mercy and love. As Lamb says: "There is healing in the very creak of his shoes, as he comes up the stair." There be those, however, in every community, who, in circulating their quack nostrums, care little whether they make the well sick, or the sick sicker.

"Do you eat well?" asked one of our modern pill-venders, who was in the process of manufacturing a patient.

"Yes, very well."

"Do you sleep well?"

"Yes."

"Eh?—you do, eh? That's not exactly the thing for one in your condition! I'll do away all that for you. Take four of these every morning, and four after dinner. You'll soon see a change!"

A GENTLEMAN was always complaining to his father-in-law of his wife's temper. At last, papa-in-law becoming weary of these endless grumblings, and being a bit of a wag, replied:

"Well, my dear fellow, if I hear of her tormenting you any more I shall disinherit her."

The husband never again complained.

"JOHN, I am going to church, and if it should rain, I wish you to come with the umbrella for me; however, you need not come unless it should rain downright."

The gentleman went. It did rain; but John had gone to the other end of the town to see Mary. His master came back with drenched garments, and a look of implacable anger.

"John," said he, "why didn't you bring the umbrella?"

"Because, sir," replied John, "it rained slanting."

A PRUDENT and well-disposed member of the Society of Friends once gave the following friendly advice:

"John," said he, "I hear thou art going to be married."

"Yes," replied John, "I am."

"Well," replied the man of drab, "I have one little piece of advice to give thee, and that is, never marry a woman worth more than thou art. When I married my wife, I was worth fifty dollars, and she was worth sixty-two; and, whenever any difference has occurred between us since, she has always thrown up the odd dollars."

A GOOD story is told of Bouvart, a celebrated French physician. On entering one morning the chamber of a Marquis, whom he had attended through a very dangerous illness, he was accosted by his noble patient in the following terms:

"Good day to you, Mr. Bouvart; I feel quite in spirits; I think my fever has left me."

"I am sure it has," replied Bouvart, drily. "The very first expression your lordship used, convinced me of it."

"Pray explain yourself."

"Nothing is easier. In the first days of your illness, when your life was in danger, I was your dearest friend; as you began to get better, I was your good Bouvart; and now I am Mr. Bouvart. Depend upon it, you are quite recovered."

REFLECTION BY AN IRISH LOVER.—It's a great pleasure to be alone, especially when you have your sweetheart with you.

MRS. DOWDY says that one of her boys don't know nothing, and the other does. The question is, which knows the most?

"OH, she was a jewel of a wife!" said Pat, mourning over the loss of his better half; "she always struck me with the soft end of the mop!"

"HAVE you no shame, sir?"

"No, neither of us have any; you, because you have no sense of shame; and I, because I never do anything to be ashamed of."

"HAVE you decided whether to make your son a soldier or a lawyer?"

"No; but I w[ill] as soon as I can settle in my own mind whether it is best for him to live upon the blood and misery or upon the vices and follies of his species."

AT THE CONFESSIONAL.

THERE is something amusing and gratifying in witnessing the utter discomfiture of our late enemies and revilers in Europe. Men and periodicals, who, for years, only spoke of the United States as a thing of the past, and its system of government as an exploded fallacy and unsuccessful experiment—who sneered at the prowess and deplored the prostration and bankruptcy of the country, have now notably altered their tone, and are fain to confess that they were short-sighted, ignorant, prejudiced and utterly wrong in all their vaticinations and conclusions. The latest penitent at the confessional is the London Morning Post, one of our bitterest defamers and opponents. It pleads, as a sort of excuse for its errors of judgment, that, at the outset, the war "appeared to be one of those tremendous convulsions which come once in an age to herald a new order of things"—just as if it had not, in fact, not only heralded but brought about a new order of things. By what other designation can we characterize the emancipation of four millions of men and eternizing a nation? The Post continues:

"That we did not estimate correctly either the resources or the tenacity of the great Western people and their noble representative, Abraham Lincoln—the representative of their energy, their simple firmness, their downright courage—is now very plain to us all. We were mistaken. We have learnt what the Americans knew before, but of which we were previously ignorant—that we were both unacquainted with the character of the American institutions and the Americans themselves. This is our offense plainly stated. It is one of which the rest of the civilized world is as guilty as ourselves. * * * Historical precedent led us to presuppose that the Union must fall to pieces; and, probably, the shrewdest divination was exercised by those Germans of small means and large faith who invested their savings in American securities at a time when 'greenbacks' were looked on doubtingly; for these Germans trusted to their instinct, and instinct was the only thing to rely upon at that period. * * * The hereditary animosity toward the mother country which Americans supposed to exist among themselves has really no existence. The idea of it sprang from a consciousness of strength and a spirit of rivalry, and, perhaps, some recollection of old wrongs. But that recollection, at any rate, should be put aside, now that they have had experience of the trials of government; nor can the rivalry endure after the display of their strength, which created admiration and amazement as a thing unexampled in the world's history."

A MONSTER ENTERPRISE.

AWAY up in the Sierra Nevada mountains, so high that water and air lose their respective gravity, and sticks of wood refuse to float on its surface, is a beautiful sheet of water, called Lake Tahoe, by 1,500 feet the highest body of water on earth ever navigated by a steamboat. Surrounded by mighty peaks, whose summits are clothed in mantles of eternal snow, while they look down on valleys where eternal summer reigns, this lovely lake seems beyond the reach of civilization, and consequently doomed to solitude forever.

But science has already seized upon it as a fit subject for another of her triumphs, and a daring engineer, one Colonel A. H. Von Schmidt, has determined to turn its vast volume of water to a practical use. He has incorporated a company with a vast capital, and will actually commence the work at once of tunneling the mountains to draw its pure waters to the California side. The waters are to be turned into the channel of a stream and carried to the hills which skirt the valley of the Sacramento, thence through the canal among the Placer mines, down the level of the Capital City; thence across the valley toward the coast range, and ultimately to San Francisco. This enterprise would, if carried out, supply a dozen interior towns with delicious water of a purity unknown elsewhere, provide the miners with water to carry on their work during the dry season, irrigate thousands of acres of now unproductive land, making it to blossom as the rose, and lastly, supply for all time to come the teeming millions who will inhabit San Francisco.

It will be a life-time to carry out the plan in all its details, but Von Schmidt, who engineered to completion the Spring Valley Water Works, by which San Francisco is supplied with water from a distance of forty miles, is confident of its feasibility. The route by which the water would reach San Francisco is nearly two hundred miles long, but nevertheless Von Schmidt is thoroughly in earnest, and as we said, proposes to commence work immediately. To any man who has scaled the dizzy heights of the Sierra, and seen the tremendous obstacles to be overcome, the project looks like the freak of a disordered imagination; but the child may be already born who will live to see it a fact accomplished. Quien sabe?

AN ENCAMPMENT IN THE LYBIAN DESERT.—By night the desert is more romantic than by day, but at the same time more dangerous. As the power of sight is now limited, the circle of safety is contracted to the most immediate neighborhood, and both during the march and in the encampment every one tries to keep as close as possible to his fellows. By day the caravan consists of but one long chain; by night this is broken up into six or eight smaller ones, which, marching close together, form a compact square, of which the outmost lines are occupied by the stoutest and boldest. By moonlight the shadows of the camels, as they stalk along, produce a curious and impressive effect. During the dark, starless night everything is full of horror, and to go one step distant from the side of the caravan is equivalent to leaving the home circle to plunge into a desolate solitude. In the halt by day each one occupies whichever place may please him best. At night, on the contrary, a compact camp is formed under the direction of the Kervan bashi. The bales of goods are heaped up in the middle; around them lie the men; while without, a wall of defense, the camels are laid, tightly packed together, in a circle. I say laid, for these wonderful animals squat down at the word of command, remain the whole night motionless in their place, and, like children, do not get up the next morning until they are told to do so. They are placed with their heads pointing outward and their tails inward, for they perceive the presence of an enemy from afar, and give the alarm by a dull rattle in the throat, so that even in their hours of repose they do duty as sentinels. Those who sleep within the rayon find themselves in immediate contact with these beasts, and, as is well known, they have not the pleasantest smell. It often happens that the saline fodder and water which these animals feed upon produce palpable consequences for such as sleep in their immediate neighborhood. I myself often wake up with such f-ecess. But no one takes any notice of such things, for who could be angry with those animals, who, although ugly in appearance, are so patient, so temperate, so good-tempered and so useful!

CHINESE JUGGLING.—While walking on the bank of the river near the junction with the Grand Canal, I saw some clever Jugglers, a very common case of age as they are to be met with in every city and serpent manner. He commenced by sticking a piece of common wood, which he broke in two. He presented the pieces for examination, and found it to be an ordinary shop-boiled bamboo. Having done this, he put on his head a wicker basket, between his lips, and stacked them slowly into his mouth, and to all appearance, swallowed them. He then walked round the circle with his mouth open, and allowed people to look into it; but nothing was to be seen of the needles. He then took a crystal ball, about the size of a walnut, and placed it between his teeth, drew it into his mouth, and to all appearance swallowed it. He opened his mouth, and it was not visible. He then made an effort as if bringing it up from his throat, and ejected it from his mouth, repeating this performance several times. He next took a long piece of thread, passed it up one nostril, and brought the end out of his mouth, moving it backward and forward up the two ends—he one nostril and the his nose fell, the other out of his mouth. He then pulled the string out altogether, introduced it again into his mouth by swallowing it in, and seemed to swallow the whole piece of string. He again swallowed the crystal ball, ejected it, and immediately afterward drew the thread out of his mouth with all the secrecy of acting upon it. This is really a very clever trick, showing wonderful powers of moving things over a long distance—the more so, as he was talking the whole time. A great amount of skill is exhibited, and no small degree of quick must be run in performing the trick, as the needles have not room for a lengthened concealment, where the needles that had been introduced into the throat are really thrusted, passed down and became impacted in the back part of the throat, and caused death the 4th day afterwards.

Latest Phase of the Mexican Question.

AFTER many and sometimes bloody encounters with imperial troops in Mexico, made up of French, Austrians, Belgians and renegades, the legitimate forces of the Republic have gained a decisive victory, which must have a very important bearing on the course of events and the fate of the country.

On the 16th of June, the imperial commander started a train of merchandise from Matamoras for Monterey, valued at $2,000,000, escorted by 2,000 men, with fourteen pieces of artillery. It was attacked between Camargo and Meir by the liberal forces under Gen. Escobedo, the escort defeated with the loss of 500 men killed and wounded, 800 prisoners, and all the artillery. The train was taken entire. The imperialist commander, Gen. Olivera, was wounded, and only escaped capture by a precipitate flight. In all respects the victory of the Republicans seems to have been complete and emphatic.

One of the most significant features of the fight was the defection of two detachments of native infantry and cavalry, previously in the imperial service, and who came over bodily to Escobedo—thus proving that Maximilian cannot rely on any but his European stipendiaries, without whom he cannot remain a day in the country.

This victory, besides seriously weakening the imperial forces in North-Eastern Mexico and on the Rio Grande, will inspirit the Republican army, which has now obtained a much needed supply of military material. We are not surprised, therefore, to hear, as we do, that the imperialist commander seriously contemplates the evacuation of Matamoras and the North-Eastern Mexican States. Indeed, they are no longer tenable. The whole available imperial force on the Rio Grande is said to be 400 men in Matamoras and 150 in Bagdad—a force utterly incapable of holding its position. Should the imperialists abandon this region, they will never return, and the Republicans will have a secure base from which to push their operations toward the capital.

Simultaneously with the intelligence given above, comes the news of the entire evacuation of the State of Chihuahua by the French, who are concentrating toward the city of Mexico, preliminary to the final evacuation of the country. It cannot be long, therefore, before the authority of the Republic will be completely and permanently asserted over the northern half of Mexico.

This is the beginning of the end, for the correspondence just published, between the French Minister of Foreign Affairs and the imperial authorities, gives no hope of any further aid of men or money from France. The principal hitch is the hitch financial. January 14th, M. Drouyn de L'huys informs M. Dano that "the advances we have more than once made cannot be renewed, and the Emperor will ask no new sacrifices from France." On the 15th he reverts to the matter with still more emphasis, and reproaches Maximilian that not only had he been unable to furnish the resources to keep up the French army in Mexico, as it was stipulated he should do in the Miromar Convention, but that he had even called on France to pay the expenses of the home adminstration. "Our budget," continues the French minister, "does not give us the means of supplying this deficit. Mexico being unable to pay for the troops we are keeping upon its territory, it will be impossible for us to maintain them there. As to asking from our country new supplies to this end, I have already explained to you our views on that subject. As I told you, public opinion has pronounced, with an authority from which there is no appeal, that the limit of sacrifices has been reached."

In other words, no more money can be given, nor any more men. Those already in the country are to be withdrawn. So much for France. As for Austria, she has stopped the sending out of men, on the expostulation of the United States, with which she cannot afford to quarrel. The mock empire is, therefore, without any permanent or effective support, and is doomed to a speedy and ignominious downfall. Its only hope is in the insane and wicked quarrels, already beginning, of the republican leaders.

Love of Morbid Excitement.

WHOEVER was the author of the saying, "Let me write the songs for the people, and I care not who makes the laws," he has commonly received the credit of having been a profound observer. But we are not informed whether the songs were to have followed the popular taste, or to have led it; whether they were to create a feeling, or to express one already formed; in short, whether the songs were to be causes or effects. Probably it would have been found in practice that such method of instruction only reflected the lights it borrowed, or concentrated, as it were, in one focus the scattered rays of popular sentiments, which might otherwise have been dispersed and lost. It will hardly be disputed that between songs for the people and their amusements, the latter are, in these modern times, the best indications of popular tendencies, and would be preferred by supreme authority, could such be supposed to exist, as the more powerful means of influencing the public mind.

Even in such a case, the question still arises, Shall the prevailing tastes of the day be followed, or the attempt be made to guide them? And practically it would be found that if the fashion of the day be to keep amusement and improvement apart, the attempt to force their combination would be to make both so tedious and dull, that "a beggarly account of empty boxes" would be the only result. "Sacred dramas" become a contradiction in terms. Hannah Moore and Garrick are each very well in their way; apart, they are admirable, but the combination is nauseous.

We are thus free to consider popular amusements, as they stand, by themselves, and without relation to any ulterior aims. It is not difficult to classify the attractions that nightly draw our citizens in crowds from their homes, but at present we are concerned only with the class that may be called the spectacular combined with the emotional. Now, we ask ourselves what is the source of the attraction in the perilous exploits of the whole genus of acrobats? It can scarcely be maintained that the frightful danger to which the performers expose themselves is not a very large ingredient in the excitement—pleasurable, we suppose, it must be called, for how otherwise would it be sought after?—which their feats produce. Were it known that, in his loftiest flights, the performer was so secured by cords that a fall became physically impossible, the public interest would no doubt be chilled. Who would care to see a tight-rope performance only a few inches above the ground, or be awed into breathless silence by a leap in mid-air, if he knew that no danger attended a miscalculation of eye or hand? We all know the story of the Englishman who followed the lion-tamer through Europe, and attended every exhibition, in the full expectation that some time or other the lion would bite off the man's head, and how, one night, made nervous by knowing he was so followed, the unfortunate man tickled the lion's palate, and the involuntary closing of the ponderous jaws decapitated him like a guillotine. We are not told what amount of gratification the Englishman received by witnessing the catastrophe he had waited for, but when we know the more a man risks his life, the larger the crowds are that gather to see him, we cannot help thinking they would be immensely increased if it were certain an accident would take place and some daring vaulter would perish miserably.

So universal, however, has been the fondness of such exhibitions in all ages, that it may be worth while to examine the origin of a feeling so widely spread. We trace in the gladiatorial combats of ancient Rome, in the Spanish bull-fights, and in the modern gymnastics, the existence of a human element as essential to the attractions of the shows. We are not informed how the combats of beasts in the Roman amphitheatre "paid," but excepting as a novelty, we can imagine they did not "draw," while the combats and deaths of the gladiators never ceased to attract. In the bull-fight, the chulos and picadores have their means of escape, and their scratches and bruises only excite merriment; but it is when the matador advances, unattended, into the ring, to encounter the animal tormented to the highest pitch of rage, that the excitement of the spectators rises to the extremest point with the knowledge that the man must either kill or be killed. Wherein lies the difference in principle between the interest excited by exhibitions such as these, and that excited by our modern substitutes for such games? It is true, we do not ask for any sacrifice of life, but we have shown that the possibility of a catastrophe, the dreadful risk run by the performers, is just as essential an element in the modern circus as in the ancient games. It may moderate our censures of the barbarism of the pagans when we see how nearly our own passions resemble theirs.

This love of strong excitements in exhibition finds its analogy in strong excitements in literature and art. In their effects on the mind, sensation novels may be classed with sensation performers. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that the class of mind that craves excitement in the sensation novel is similar to that which seeks recreation at the New Bowery or Jones's Wood, but the public performance has the added advantages of scenery, music, and a crowd. We may regret that there are so many people who find amusement in strong mental excitements, but we shall cease to wonder at it when we consider that the fierce struggle for existence that goes on constantly in large cities requires an equally strong alterative in its hours of unbending. It is not given to every one to complement his days of labor by nights of study, and to condemn the popular appreciation of such exhibitions as we have described is merely another way of setting forth the evils of civilization, which yet has its compensating good.

MR. BAYARD TAYLOR, the well-known traveler and author, has gone on a trip to the great Central Rocky Mountain region of the continent, and will visit and describe Colorado, Idaho, and the other growing Territories of the Far West. Mr. Taylor will correspond with the Tribune and Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, supplying us with pen and pencil sketches of what is most striking in the line of his travel, whether in the way of scenery, incident, adventure, or manners and customs. The first of his letters, dated from Kansas, has already appeared in the Tribune. Among other things, he mentions the rapidity with which trees are spontaneously covering the bare plains of the West, now that the Indian practice of burning over the ground annually is stopped:

"Here I first witnessed a phenomenon of which I had often heard—the spontaneous production of forests from prairie land. Hundreds of acres, which the cultivated fields beyond had protected against the annual inundation of fire, were completely covered with young oak and hickory trees, from four to six feet in height. In twenty years more these thickets will be forests. Thus, two charges made against Kansas seemed to be disproved at once—drought and waste of lumber, the former being exceptional, and the latter only a temporary circumstance."

THE news of the Fenian invasion of Canada has reached England, where the prompt and effective intervention of the President is highly appreciated and praised. The London Times says: "It would be impossible to exaggerate the good faith, the friendliness, the sincerity and the regard for mutual obligations which have prompted these energetic and decisive measures. The American Government has acted in a manner which even exceeds anything that could reasonably have been expected from the most friendly nation."

THE Liberal or Republican element in Europe seems to be strangely overlooked by the ruling powers of Europe now at war. This element, although silent, is not indifferent, and may not be long inactive. The Hungarians bide their time, and it may not be long before they may be joined by the enthusiastic Italian volunteers under Garibaldi. These may land under the protection of the Italian navy, which is more than a match for that of Austria. Meantime, Kossuth appears on the scene. He has addressed the following letter to his former followers: "A great number of my fellow-countrymen from different parts of Italy have asked me what they ought to do under the present circumstances, and it being impossible for me to reply personally to all, I declare by these presents, that, in my opinion, all those of my fellow-countrymen employed in military service or any other duty would do well to remain where they are, and await patiently the course of events. Those, on the contrary, who have no occupation, who are fit for military service and have a wish to enter it, will do well to enlist in the Hungarian legion. They may, besides, be all convinced that if affairs become developed so as to offer a field of action to their patriotic zeal, due notice shall be given to them."

THE law of primogeniture, that principal bulwark of the British aristocratic system, is now attacked in the British Parliament. The vote on a proposition for its abolition, lately taken, showed 281 for its retention and 84 against it—about three to one. But we know reforms, like revolutions, never go backward. The wedge has entered; in due time it will be driven home.

TOWN GOSSIP.

THE uncertainties of legislation, and the easy manner in which some petty justice may checkmate the enactments of the law-making authority of our commonwealth, have been signally and unhappily manifested during the week. The Excise Board attempted to restrain the sale of liquor within certain bounds that they deemed salutary, and which the better portion of our citizens cordially approved, and for a short period their efforts were successful. But, presto! a certain city official, in the plenitude of his wisdom, discovered that the Legislature made a huge blunder—that the excise law was unconstitutional—and therefore granted an injunction, restraining the Board from any interference whatever with the highly respectable and becoming business of furnishing lager and other beverages.

This matter of granting injunctions is a curious one: When some local or personal interest is seriously affected by statute, the aggrieved party applies at once for an injunction. No sooner is it asked than obtained, and then all the courts must act upon its validity; and in the end injunction triumphs.

The Board of Health has been badgered by this same monstrum horrendum. The cholera had reached our shores; many nuisances existed that would nourish and aggravate the disease; the Board properly ordered their removal; but just here the injunction intervened, defeated the purpose and suspended the prudent operations of the Board, and left the city at the mercy of the pestilence whenever it may break out seriously.

Now this is a legal curiosity peculiar to New York, and one that we would commend to Mr. Barnum. We are sorry its application is so restricted. If it would only lower our rents, diminish our grocery bills, and give us the necessaries of life at something like reasonable prices; if it would prevent the over-crowding of our street cars, and suppress a hundred nuisances that are almost intolerable, we would hail the injunction with joy. But such does not appear to be its province. All we know of it is, that it has restored an order of things we had deprecated, and proved that the dictum of one man is paramount to the enactments of our Legislature and the expressed desires of the wisest and best of our citizens.

The anniversary of our national independence was celebrated with such hearty enthusiasm as has not been witnessed for several years. If patriotism is manifested by burning powder and making a noise, then New Yorkers are beyond a peradventure pre-eminently patriotic. But under all this outside display there was a deep and earnest feeling, such as only freemen could cherish, and a large appreciaton of the privileges and benefits accruing to us in consequence of the great event in the world's history the day commemorated.

Of course there was a general suspension of business, and the multitudes sought enjoyment in a thousand ways. Young America, with his supply of fire-crackers and other combustibles, kept up such a din as comported with his ideas of liberty. Excursion boats, plying hither and thither, were crowded with those of more quiet propensities, who gladly escaped from the tumult of the city, and found relaxation and enjoyment on the water, and at the various places of resort in the vicinity. The various public gardens were thronged during the day, and the theatres and places of amusement, by extra performances, afforded their quota of entertainment to all who preferred a heated saloon to the free open air. There was something suited to every taste, and though the whole city was on a rampage, and everybody strove to assert his independence by doing as he pleased, the police had little to do besides making their ordinary rounds, and there was a wonderful degree of quiet, amid the general disquiet, and of order despite disorder. The early part of the day was beautiful; a shower in the afternoon interfered somewhat with the festivities of the occasion and postponed the usual display of fireworks till the next night. The ninetieth anniversary of our independence has shown that we are not insensible to our privileges, and that no lapse of time will deaden in the hearts of the American people those emotions of patriotism that animated their forefathers, and secured the glorious heritage they now possess.

The summer days, so pleasant to dream of and read about, bring with them the oppressive heat of which we so loudly complain, and many discomforts, but as yet we have not suffered greatly, and there is no more than the ordinary amount of sickness. The cholera threatens us, and occasionally claims a victim; proper care on our part will disarm the dreaded pestilence of its horrors and power.

During the week the theatres have not brought out any novelties. The Ravels at Niblo's, and the Buislay family at the New Bowery, in their peculiar feats, have perhaps been the chief attraction. With concerts in the open air, and music in the Central Park, the relish for other entertainments is somewhat diminished.

Mr. Stephen Massett has been giving his pleasant, piquant, and peculiar entertainments at several provincial towns, and has really triumphed over the thermometer, by drawing crowded houses with the mercury over the nineties. H. C. Watson's poem, "So my Lady Rides in her Carriage," as recited by Mr. Massett, is one of the gems of his entertainments.

The Buislay Brothers are still creating considerable excitement among all those who love the horrible and daring. The ascent of the Spiral Mountain is one of the most splendidly terrible feats we have seen. We had not the nerve to follow the artiste in his apparent insane wish to be dashed to atoms, but a friend who was born without nerves and insensible to fear, informed us it was a triumph. In a short time Manager Corbyn removes to Niblo's, where the Buislay Family will perform for a brief season, and give the fashionable world an opportunity of witnessing their extraordinary entertainments.

OIL.

WE frequently read of manufacturing establishments being set on fire and consumed by the heating of some portion of the machinery. A journal is not properly oiled, or entirely neglected, and the increased friction produces an effect similar to that of a blast furnance. Proper attention to a matter apparently so trivial would save an immense amount of property, and avoid many of those business derangements that arise from such slight causes, entailing privation and suffering both serious and wide-spread. The machinery needed oil, nothing more; it was properly constructed and properly adjusted, but it did not work smoothly, and the friction proved its destruction. And there are many parts of the machinery of our social system that in like manner require lubricating to insure harmony and happiness; for, just as in the large factory the neglect of a single pivot caused the destruction of the whole structure, so in everyday life and intercourse there are minor matters, often disparaged or entirely overlooked, that give rise to half the disquietude and wretchedness that afflict the world. The fact is, society needs oil; it has its rough points, that require daily lubrication—its friction, that impairs the smooth and regular movement of the whole mass, and imposes upon each individual more than his due share of annoyance and burden. The unhappiness in the world does not arise so much from any defect in the constitution of things as from our own shortcomings, and these shortcomings unfortunately affect others as well as ourselves. A gentle word, a generous act, a manly attention to the wants of others, cost but little, yet how wondrously they charm the pathways of life; they are the oil that keeps the complicated machinery of human society in good working order, and without which it creaks and jars in the most discordant manner. Nor shall we lack opportunity of contributing our part to the common weal, of furnishing the oil that will make time and events glide on smoothly. The family is the basis of all society, and just as individual households are virtuous, refined, intelligent, considerate, will the community possess these characteristics. The stream cannot rise above the fountain; the mass of mankind cannot greatly surpass the average excellence of each component part; and yet there are many men who, in public, would scorn to make such exhibitions of themselves as they constantly display in their own homes. They reserve all their amenities for strangers; they are polite and gentlemanly abroad, morose and selfish under their own roof; they would be deemed most self-denying and considerate among their chance associates; their families may starve for sympathy and attention. Now it is just here that the lubricating process is a necessity; here is friction that, neglected, will endanger the very foundations of our whole social system—yet a friction that is most overlooked and disregarded. Why should I be less polite in the company of my wife and children, and less thoughtful for their enjoyment, than I am with those whom I meet from time to time, and who have no especial claim upon me? Why should I carry the anxiety and worry of business to my fireside, and by my moroseness and taciturnity embitter the only hours in which I can find relief from the burdens I bear, and chill and damp the only affections that can lighten a heavy heart? Because they are mine, shall I immolate them upon the altar of indifference and selfishness? I would be worse than brute to act thus, but is not such a too common experience? Do not thousands of hearts ache because they are crushed by those who should cherish them, and are not thousands of homes worse than desolate because of the want of those common attentions and courtesies we would deny to none but those we profess to love? It is against this domestic friction we would lift the voice of warning; it is at home we should apply the oil of gentleness, thoughtful regard, and generous appreciation of the efforts of our loved ones to be to us all we would desire, and to do for us all that would make living a perpetual joy.

Domestic infelicities have become proverbial, but in the majority of instances they grow out of those little failings, those slight frictions hardly perceptible at first, that we might readily avoid, and that, neglected, soon destroy our peace. And so to all the relations of life and intercourse of society, we will find occasions for either increasing or diminishing this friction, that may become dangerous. Some people seem to take pride in individualizing themselves; they possess marked peculiarities, and are anxious to let all the world know it; if by chance you trespass upon their comfort or convenience, they will bristle up like a porcupine; they select the choice seats on cars and boats (it is usually asks them a question, they reply with a gruffness they regard dignified, but which is simply churlish and inbred; they are really nuisances, which we tolerate because we have to, but which we shun when we can in passing them. Now, we meet such characters daily, two courses are before us. We may oil the connections upon which they have thrown sand, and continue the smooth and proper working of our social machinery, or we may add to the disagreement their existence causes, and thus increase the difficulties we would remove. We shall accomplish the first of these, by overlooking what annoys us, refraining politeness for politeness, and manifesting a gentle, considerate bearing under any and every provocation; we shall achieve the second by meeting meanness with meanness, selfishness with selfishness, returning harsh words for harsh words—and increasing all our real characters, and coming down to a level we despise. But this hardly pays; we will find oil more convenient and less costly. There is nothing promises better as an investment, and its returns will always be certain. "Love your enemies, forgive and do good;" you can laugh at Wall street; its bulls and bears cannot affect the value of your stock, which is always above par, and which never depreciates below.

You go to a hotel, and all the waiters hurry and bluster, and many of the appointments unsuited to your tastes. You fret and scold, but in vain; you may lose your temper and gain your point, but you will have a little oil to this rusty, dry machinery, and in an instant all will work charmingly; your wants will be anticipated, your comfort enhanced manyfold. As a matter of strict principle, you may object to this practice from a question of expediency and economical convenience, it will command your approval. Besides, the practice involves no sense view of life which we have, they are and ignores the obstructions, and it is this view with which we are all most concerned. Try the same experiment in your family circle; manifest as agreeable as possible to all the inmates of the house; throw off your reserve, and be the agreeable and considerate gentleman that you would in a stranger's house, and see what a princely income of happiness you will enjoy.

Use oil liberally, constantly; smooth the asperities, destroy the friction, that now drives you very from what should be the dearest spot on earth, a loving and loved home. In your business, by the way, through all the intercourse with society, do not forget the value of oil, giving that attention to little things that will bring out the full importance of great ones, and presenting upon the grand principle of living wisely, that, while you secure your own well-being, you will promote the happiness of all others with whom you come in contact.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—At the celebration on the Fourth at Philadelphia, Major-Gen. Meade was presented by the Union League of that city with a gold medal. The medal is composed of the finest gold, and weighs one pound and a half. On the obverse side is a figure representing head of the hero of Gettysburg. Surrounding the head, in inscribed, "To Major-General George G. Meade." Beneath, Gen. Meade, by the Union League of Philadelphia, as a token of the gratitude of his countrymen." On the reverse side is an elaborate artistic design, surrounded with the motto: "The victor of Gettysburg and the defender of our State, the faithful soldier of our country."

—St. Louis papers of the 13th ult., report the recovery of $21,000 which was stolen from the car of the United States Express Company a short time since. The principal robber was arrested on suspicion and led to confess the whole affair, and to disclose the place of deposit of the money, which was found under a brush heap, about four miles from the scene of the theft.

—We have reports of an unusual number of severe storms and tornadoes. Not long since a tornado passed over Oil Springs, Canada West. A house was recently erected, was blown to the ground. Much damage was done to orchards and oil works. During the tornado a boiler burst, killing one man and severely injuring another. The storm also passed over Detroit, doing a great amount of damage. The force of the storm here up and down for the route.

—New Orleans papers record the sale of the residence of Mr. Margaret Brown, at that city. It is the most expensive dwelling in the city of New Orleans, having cost $50,000 in gold, before the war. It sold for $45,000 currency.

—George Peabody, it is said, has Yale College next on the list of testamentaries. He is to commence next spring the erection of a building for a geographical cabinet, with such accommodations as a museum, laboratory and philosophical lecture room.

—The English Mechanic details the passage of the falls and rapids of the Columbia River by the steamer Shoshone, it being the first time a craft of any sort of size was ever performed. No accident happened to the venturesome party, who risked life and limb to add to the exploration.

—The various organizations of the Odd Fellows in Cincinnati have united in the enterprise of purchasing a lot of ground whereon they propose to erect a building that shall equal in grandeur of architecture and size any public building in the United States.

—Rev. Isaac Augustus B. Street, of New Haven, left handsome donations to Yale College in his will. He gave to the Yale corporation the Rev. Mr. Street's law furniture, &c., all complete, the proceeds of its sale to go for the completion of the Hall of Fine Arts. The buildings were likewise given to the same corporation, to be sold and the money to be invested.

—Some burglars, who entered a drug store at Nashville, Tenn., to commit robbery, partook of a bottle of acid, which fell on the foot of one, burning it to the bone, and making it impossible for him to leave the store. He cowardly compassions deserted him, and he was discovered in the morning by the police and sent to jail.

—The prospects for a famine in the Western States are poor. The Cincinnati Gazette says that in Indiana the wheat is good, but the corn is wonderfully backward. Thousands of bushels of potatoes have been planted and are doing well. Oats—a fair crop. In Illinois the spring, is excellent; corn, splendid; fruit, an average crop, and farmers are in fine spirits. There is no danger of a scarcity if the weather continues favorable. The hay prospect is fair.

—The Roman Catholic clergy of the diocese of Boston have just subscribed $75,000 toward the erection of the new cathedral in Boston. It is expected that four years will be required to complete the structure.

—A select committee of the Ohio Senate, appointed to take counsel with the board in regard to preparing measures for the completion of the railroad, have reported a progress complete of the State, in its session. An interesting report is expected at the next session.

—The Hibernia Fire Company of Philadelphia propose to visit the International Exhibition in Paris in 1867 and take with them their engine and 1,500 feet of hose. The excursionists will number seventy-five men, and the estimated cost of the trip is $700.

—Extensive beds of peat exist in Wisconsin, and business men of Milwaukie are beginning to make an article of commerce of it. A New York firm has manufactures fifty tons of dry peat per day. The peat is ground fine, pressed into bricks, and dried in the sun.

—Statistics of 609 Congregational Churches at the West show that more than one-fourth of the whole number of male members served in the Union army during the late rebellion, including ministers and lay ministers. About one in six of those in the service lost his life.

—A suit recently came up in the San Francisco courts, concerning the question of the boundaries in that city where coin and bond property consisted the only property. The Supreme Court has just rendered a decision, which was concurred in by the conductor, Sigrist, to the effect that the companies must take the greenbacks at par.

Foreign.—In 1864-65 the numerical strength of the British army was 220,000 men, exclusive of those that were: Volunteers, 16,866; re-engaged men (after discharge), originally enlisted for 21 years, 1,240; re-engaged, before liberation, 105,684; making a total of 124,977, there remaining for service in the regular ranks—about thirty-four per cent. of the whole army. Of these, 3,000 were for corporal punishments in the French army during the same year. Charged with crime, 1,000; acquitted, 1,000; convicted, 1,000; convicted, light-acquitted, 1,007.

—In the diary of the Japanese mission who visited England in 1862, it is noted that at Dover they were required to pay "a piece of Spanish dollar" evidently intended for "hip, hip, hurrah!" and the writer adds, "The Englishman is not close, but he has a very peculiar laudatory expression."

—A correspondent has this story: "The Abbé Paradis, 63 years of age, principal chaplain at Rixfere, was walking in the Rue Vandamme, in the quarter where he lives, accosted by a gentleman, who asked him the hour. He replied, 'Five minutes past midnight.' 'Good much obliged, I am ready—sustain me!' And before this letter could be finished he received a ball in his left breast, fell backward, and fell to the pavement dead."

—At the recent dinner of the Royal Geographical Society in London, Sir Roderick Murchison made his bow to the ladies present in the following manner: "I have ventured to call them the 'better half' of the society, but I am not for 'hip, hip, hurrah!' and the writer adds, "The Englishman is not close, but he has a very peculiar laudatory expression."

—A correspondent has this story: "The Abbé Paradis, 63 years of age, principal chaplain at Rixfere, was walking in the Rue Vandamme, in the quarter where he lives, accosted by a gentleman, who asked him the hour. He replied, 'Five minutes past midnight.' 'Good much obliged, I am ready—sustain me!' And before this letter could be finished he received a ball in his left breast, fell backward, and fell to the pavement dead."

—There is a rumor here, purporting to come from Paris, by way of Vienna, that the Emperor Napoleon has asked for more money, threatening to abdicate if it was not forthcoming. It is said that Napoleon Napoleon had sent word to Mexico, to his General there, to let him alone, and then his wife and child would be sent to see who they would have next.

—It appears from a report of the military department of Switzerland, just published, that the Swiss army amounts to 170,000 men, and is divided as follows: 2,929 engineer corps; 17,393 artillery corps; 4,314 cavalry; 145,364 infantry; and 1,000 sharp-shooters.

—Last year 186,620 mariners, 747,870 hirths, and 491,360 deaths were recorded in England.

—Another case of bigamy, of a singular case lately came before the French tribunals. A young girl of about 18 years of age was married against the will of her mother and sister, for the sole purpose of drinking champagne at the wedding feast, champagne the opulent physicians, and proved to be attached by the young girl to the champagne. The physicians, in the extreme youth inside the physicians to hope that her stay be soon terminated.

—The Paris papers record the most fantastic suicide of a man who is supposed to have been an Englishman. He had taken a room at a hotel where he there arrived at the Hotel de Fleurge, at Lille, an exceedingly gentlemanly appearance, and about forty of age, carrying a cane of coal. He addressed himself to the waiter, and asked for a bottle of champagne. He with a strong English accent, that he intended to spend the evening in his room. He then inquired for his name, that he might insert it in his register of the hotel. Having done so, and seen that all was quiet, he was unnecessary, for he meant to depart early next morning. He then asked for a glass of fresh water, after which he retired to his chamber. Next day, at the usual hour, the waiter, according to custom, brought to think of his guest of the former evening, and to ask what he would have for breakfast. He knocked at the door, but no reply. He knocked again, but no sound was heard in the chamber. After knocking for some time, he opened the door, and was horrified to see the gentleman stretched dead upon the floor, and sitting at a table, his elbow leaning on the table, and his head on his hand. Supposing him ill, he called for medical aid, but on approaching him, he found that he was quite dead, and that from a blood corpse. A pistol was lying beside him, and on the table was a carpet-bag, which contained a change of linen, and only twenty four in it. Death was caused by a pistol-shot wound in the left temple. On the table in the room were the ashes of several papers he had burnt, and on the table there was a letter, in which the deceased was lying: "I beg the proprietor of this hotel to accept the following sum for the annoyance he is causing him, and I beg him to have me decently buried, even if, as I suppose, I die a felon, by committing my last wishes, he will earn my deep gratitude." He also left a letter addressed to the authorities, in which he desired to be buried in his clothes, and that no funeral—P. W. I wish to be carrying on the corpse, as I have no money to pay with me." Nine hundred francs in gold and ten napoleons in silver were found upon the deceased. He also a silver hunting-watch, marked with the makers' names, Squire & Lander, N. Y., round his neck was a massive gold chain, attached to it a beautiful locket, containing a photograph of an old gentleman very like the deceased, and also one of a young lady, about twenty years of age. He had no other details at his disposal, but the massive gold rings on his fingers. One of them had engraved on it the following characters: "F. W. to C. W." The other was having surrounded with a garland of ribbon, and on the top of the ribbon was a small red heart. He was about five feet nine inches in height, of a blonde complexion, with moustache, beard, and hair carefully cut. He was dressed in black clothes, agreeably to his request, put in a tin box and put in the cellar with him.

THE GREAT FIRE IN PORTLAND.

THE most terrible conflagration that ever occurred in New England took place in Portland on the night of the 4th inst., and lasted from about one o'clock in the afternoon, and spread with fearful and terrific rapidity.

The fire swept clean through the city, destroying everything in its track so completely that the lines of the streets can hardly be traced, and a space of one and a half miles long by a quarter of a mile wide appears like a forest of chimneys, with fragments of walls attached to them.

The wind was blowing a gale from the south, and a tremendous sheet of flame swept along before it, devouring everything in its passage, and the utmost exertions of the firemen, aided by a steamer and hand engines from several other places, could only succeed in preventing the flames reaching a new district.

Many buildings, perhaps fifty, were blown up to check the flames; but the inhabitants could scarcely do anything to save their effects in the upper part of the city, saving such goods as they could carry, though the lower part of the city was employed with excellent effect in moving goods.

The Custom-House being fire-proof, escaped, though greatly damaged, but all the records in the upper story are probably destroyed.

The splendid new Post-office country building on Congress street, which was nearly fire-proof, was considered safe, and in it were stored the furniture by the neighboring residents, and then it was swept away with all its contents.

Half the city is destroyed, and that half includes nearly all the business portion, excepting the heavy wholesale houses in Commercial street.

It is estimated that about 2,000 buildings are burned, and property destroyed to the amount of $10,000,000, with about one-half insured.

Thousands of persons are houseless and destitute, and are encamping in the streets and open lots and other places for their relief. All the banks and newspaper offices, but the city were destroyed, and the scene of desolation has rarely been witnessed. We give in the illustration a view of the city and the burnt district.

RECEPTION OF THE BATTLE-FLAGS OF PHILADELPHIA.

THE Fourth was a memorable day in Philadelphia, for there the Keystone State received back from the hands of her victorious sons the flags that for four years bore proudly in the carnage of battle, and carried in triumph over a hundred victorious fields of conflict. From Gettysburg to Canton, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, the loyal sons of Pennsylvania carried, and brought back in triumph, the flags presented to them by the loyal women of the old Keystone.

It was an occasion of rare historic interest, and no more fitting place to carry into effect the grand ceremonials could have been chosen than the shadow of Independence Hall.

At nine o'clock, the procession was formed, under the direction of Major-General Hancock, and was composed of the remnants of the various regiments that had carried the flags, and at ten o'clock the procession started on the line of march through the designated streets to Independence Square. Every window and standing place along the route was occupied with interested spectators, who greeted the veterans and their tattered colors with cheers, waving of handkerchiefs, and many distinguished officers in the line was the brave General Meade, who, just three years before, had driven the invader from the Pennsylvania, and saved that very city through which he now rode so joyously. Arriving at Independence Square, the procession of the day began. First there was music by the band; then an address by the Chairman of the General Committee. After an appropriate prayer by the Chaplain of the "Keystone Zouave Banner," General Meade presented the colors to Governor Curtin, to be placed in the archives of the state, a trophies of the valor and patriotism of her sons. We have not room for the eloquent presentation address of General Meade and the admirable reply of Governor Curtin.

Such a pageant has ever been witnessed in our country. It was one calculated to inspire the heart, and to awaken the noblest and purest of patriotic emotions. There was no tardiness or movement on the part of those leaving charge of the processes. Promptly at ten o'clock the line was formed, and moved off under thanks to the gallant Hancock.

The procession was two hundreds and thousands of people gathered along the route, and was in great contrast to the manner in which our civilian parades are usually conducted. The enthusiasm of the occasion was spontaneous and whole-souled, and the cheers that greeted the veterans, the flags, and the speech of Governor Curtin, showed plainly the esteem in which they are held by a grateful community. Taken altogether, April 4, 1866, will be a day long remembered by the present generation.

In our illustration we have a view of the scene in the Square at the time of presentation. Our Artist is under special obligations to Major-Gen. Meade, and Maj. Gen. Evans, of the Committee of Arrangements, likewise to Mr. King, for courtesies and facilities in making his sketches. The position in which the decorations are arranged reflects great credit on the gentlemen to whom they were entrusted.

THE OFFICERS OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BASE BALL PLAYERS.

THE present number of our paper introduces to the notice of the world a series of illustrations of base ball notabilities which in future will be a specialty of the INTERMARKEN NEWS.

The game of base ball has unquestionably become an institution of the country, and one specially to be encouraged in the progress of every recurring close of the community, not only for the fact of its being a healthful and manly exercise, but because it promotes out-door sports, but one that recommends itself as a most valuable auxiliary to the important object all have in view, of improving the physique of our youths and of supplying a healthful exciting out-door pastime which is wanted to take the place in this country that cricket does in England—in short, of a game for the million—a national game.

From a game to occupy a leisure hour or two of a summer afternoon, base ball has become a recreation and an exercise which has monopolized the attention of the out-door sporting classes of our citizens for days to an extent which has led to its becoming quite a fever throughout the length and breadth of the land, the out-door sports-loving classes of our citizens and pleasures, from the school-boy of twelve to the literateur and divine, for there is no more valuable physical exercise for those of sedentary habits or occupations than the self-same base ball, and there is no game which more completely calls into play every muscle as a favorite pastime by the most fastidious members of the community, as most devoted advocates and exemplar of strict religious habits. But without further comment on its moral or physical attributes, we will proceed briefly to describe the characters which are so admirably delineated in this week's paper.

The group embraces portraits of the officers of the National Association of Base Ball Players, elected at the last convention. These consist of Mr. John Wildey, President, and well-known to the citizens of New York as our efficient coroner. He is a member of the "Mutual" B. B. Club of this city; has always taken a lively interest in the game, and contributed largely to the improvement of the fraternity.

Mr. Mortimer Matthews, first Vice President, represents the Lowell (Mass.) Club, though a resident of this city. He is known to the base ball players here as Chairman B. B. matters, but owing to an accident, is now prevented from taking an active part in the game. His reputation as a skillful player is national, and in a number of matched games he has always displayed signal skill, and generalship in the position in which he was placed.

Mr. M. C. Sexton, the representative of the Empire Club, of St. Louis, one of the largest clubs of the South-west, is the second Vice-President.

The Empire Club has furnished several experts, and is recognized as the champion club of the West, and will doubtless retain the position a while, until the laurels are wrested from it by greater skill.

Mr. A. H. Rogers is the Corresponding Secretary and a representative from the Resolute Club of Brooklyn, New York. Mr. Rogers is held in high estimation as a gentleman and efficient officer, and assumes the laborious duties of his position in a manner highly satisfactory to the Association.

The "Resolute" is one of the leading clubs of Brooklyn, and contains many brothers of the skill in friendly contests with prominent clubs throughout the country. Mr. Rogers was unanimously re-elected to the office which he has held for the last two years.

Mr. F. J. Conaes is the Treasurer of the Association, and a representative from the Eagle Club of this city. Mr. Conaes was also re-elected, which is the best evidence of the estimation in which he is held, and a worthy tribute to his faithfulness.

The Eagle is one of our oldest clubs, and ranked among the first of the B. B. organizations. In its matches with other clubs, the games have been conducted in the most gentlemanly manner which has rendered ball-playing so popular, and given it a national character. Mr. Conaes's knowledge of Base Ball matters and interest in the sport, together with his gentlemanly deportment toward all with whom he is officially brought in contact, makes him a high position in the estimation of the B. B. Fraternity.

We intend to continue our series of portraits of the leading B. B. players of clubs outside of the National Association weekly.

In our next number we will give the portrait of Mr. Daniel Sanford, Catcher of the Central City B. B. Club, Syracuse, N. Y.

NO PASSES.

THE attempt of certain railroad companies to obtain passes free occasioned some very ludicrous incidents. The following paper corroborates the following manner: The suspension of one of the established features of our railroad system:

"Recently the passes issued by railroad companies, and which have been heretofore given generally to all who asked for them, have been withheld, and the result has been a great dearth of travel at once set in. There has evidently been a great deal of unjustifiable use of the printed passes, and the railroad companies have been the victims. Now, the passes will be given only to those who have a real need for them, and who will have very city through which he now rode so joyously. Arriving at Independence Square, the procession of the day began. First there was music by the band; then an address by the Chairman of the General Committee. After an appropriate prayer by the Chaplain of the "Keystone Zouave Banner," General Meade presented the colors to Governor Curtin, to be placed in the archives of the state, a trophies of the valor and patriotism of her sons. We have not room for the eloquent presentation address of General Meade and the admirable reply of Governor Curtin.

"THE SERENA."

"I behold in the perspective a vision. I see a railway track. It is straight-set. The long line of track, fading into the misty distance, is broken and wavy, suggestive of gradual hillocks and undulations. Now, a train engine comes slowly into view, laboriously dragging its heavy burden after it. Now, it is lost to the vision of the beholder. Now, it is seen, a speck of crooked bold and a whoopy whistle greets my ear, and the train comes rushing on. Now, it is lost to the vision, and only voice of the conductor still exclaiming, 'No Passes!'

The New Jersey Editorial Convention at Belvidere, N. J., and Excursion to the Delaware Water Gap.—From Sketches by David B Gulick.

THE PLACE OF RENDEZVOUS—THE WARREN HOUSE, BELVIDERE, NEW JERSEY.

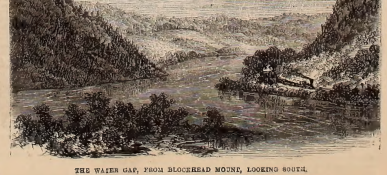
THE ASSEMBLY AT THE COURT HOUSE, BELVIDERE—MR. HENRY MORFORD RECITES HIS "THREE DAYS IN SCOTLAND."

THE NEW JERSEY EDITORIAL CONVENTION.

On the 28th ult. the New Jersey Editorial Convention met at Belvidere, and went on an excursion to the Delaware Water Gap. Of the pleasure connected with the occasion, our special correspondent gives a graphic account, and we insert his letter in full. Our illustration shows the place of meeting, a view of the convention, a scene at the Court House, and some points of interest around the Water Gap:

"The events of the past three days have been crowded together with such rapidity, as to leave me almost in a state of bewilderment. I will attempt briefly to condense them in the order in which they occurred. So to begin: Having received instruction to accompany the excursion, I made such preparations as my limited time would permit, and on Thursday, the 28th ult., at twelve o'clock noon, I took my departure from New York city by the Central Railroad of New Jersey for the rendezvous, Belvidere. The rain, which had been falling since Wednesday evening, had cooled the intensely heated atmosphere, laid the dust, and rendered the traveling endurable. We sped along through the country at an average rate, through thriving towns and villages, 'fertile fields and meadows green,' until we approached near Clinton, when we were startled from our ease by the signal from the engineer to 'Put on the brakes!' The signal being repeated in quick succession three or four times, added to the excitement; heads popped out of the windows; affrighted passengers started from their seats; some rushed for the doors; some one shouted 'Train a-comin'!' some one else shouted 'Oh, Lord!' and confusion generally reigned within. I must confess I felt considerably startled on looking out and discovering that we were approaching a train of cars but a short distance in advance of us. The brakeman worked vigorously, applying all his strength to the wheel, and at last, the momentum being overcome, we halted a few rods in the rear of an immense coal-train, which had been detained, owing to the breakage of a coupler.

"A delay of a few moments to repair the damage, and we started on again, and arrived safely at Easton, Pa., about four o'clock, P.M. Here we were obliged to remain until the departure of the Belvidere-Delaware train at seven, P.M., from Phillipsburg, just across the Delaware river. We occupied our time in a visit to the Lafyette College and grounds, and a general survey of the town and its picturesque surroundings, with which we were much pleased.



"At seven o'clock P.M. we resumed our journey along the banks of the Delaware river, and as completely absorbed were we with the diversified views, the resplendent sunset, the quiet, flowing river, a pair of blue eyes, two rosy cheeks, and such a delicious pair of lips—at least, they looked so—that we arrived at Belvidere before it seemed possible we could have traveled fifteen miles. At Belvidere, the Warren House was our first object of search, whither all were to repair—according to circular—to report to Mr. John F. Babcock, the Secretary of the New Jersey Editorial Association, who would assign all such as had complied with the suggestion published in the circular issued to the invited guests, viz., 'to signify their acceptance, and thereby promote their convenience in obtaining quarters at the hotel,' to their respective rooms. We, i.e., the body of delegates, soon arrived at the Warren House; and such as had notified the secretary were, without delay, assigned to rooms. Quite a number, who had neglected to notify of their coming, were, consequently, obliged to undergo some little delay until accommodations could be found among the residents of the town. As might be expected, these people blamed every one else but themselves. The infallible Babcock never rested until he had secured accommodations for all. Great was the tumult at the Warren House on Thursday night, on the arrival of nearly two hundred fatigued and hungry travelers. The parlor was full, the hall-way was full, the dining-room was full, the rooms up-stairs were full, and the shop was full. The citizens reported the town was full; and I have no doubt they thought so, for it was not until long after their accustomed hour for retiring that the tumult of voices and the tramping of feet ceased in that usually quiet little village.

"Supper was partaken of 'without ceremony;' after which as many besides the delegates as chose repaired to the Court-House, where a meeting was held for the transaction of the business of the association, at the conclusion of which the announcement of the programme for the next day was made, as follows: Breakfast at the Warren House, at eight o'clock; at nine o'clock, a meeting of the delegates and friends, together with the citizens of Belvidere, at the Court-House, when Mr. Henry Morford, editor of the New York Atlas, would entertain them with a reading of his 'Three Days in Scotland.' At half-past eleven the delegates were to assemble at the railroad depot, and start on the excursion to the Water Gap, there to spend the day, according to their inclinations, until half-past six, when all would return to Belvidere, and at half-past nine P.M. engage in the festivities of the editorial dinner; and at twenty minutes past six A.M. on Saturday start on their homeward journey. Such was the general outline of the proceedings and announcement, which having been concluded, we repaired to our various lodgings, and sought the wooings of the drowsy god.

"Early, in fact very early, on Friday, A.M., we were astir, and after a general survey and making a few notes of Belvidere, which—and in this instance especially—is appropriately named Beautiful View, we accepted the generous invitation of our host, Mr. Craine, to participate in a drive through the suburbs' which lasted some two hours, and afforded us great pleasure, besides giving us a splendid appetite for our matutinal meal, which, I beg to assure you, was entered into with gusto.

"Breakfast over, we repaired to the Court-House as per programme, where we found the delegates and citizens of Belvidere crowding into the hall, which was soon filled, when Mr. Morford read his interesting sketch, entitled 'Three Days in Scotland;' this proved a very pleasant as well as instructive feature. The speaker was frequently interrupted by genuine and well-deserved applause on finishing some well-rounded or rhetorical passage, while the lighter or humorous portions elicited hearty laughter.

"It was found necessary, though, to omit a considerable portion of the reading, owing to the lateness of the hour, and as many had some preparation to make previous to starting for the Water Gap, we adjourned to meet at the depot at half-past eleven o'clock to continue our journey. In the interim of our adjournment at the Warren House we were entertained in a manner not set down in the programme.

"Among our guests was Banvard—you know him—he of the panorama celebrity — the artist, traveler, linguist, humorist, and how many other ists I will not stop to enumerate. Well, he and a few other genial spirits had taken possession of the veranda of the Warren House, and were holding forth in high fashion, to the great delight of the assembled multitude.

"You know how he tells a story; with what enthusiasm he enters into it; how minutely he gives every little detail, and how admirably he mimics. Well, it would have done your very soul good to have heard the various narrations of that half hour.

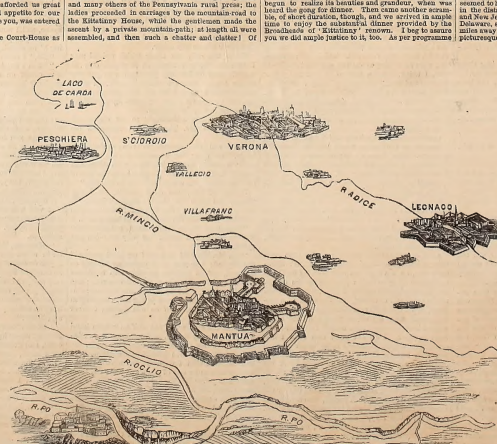
"First, Banvard tells one of his thrilling but laughable escapes from the Bedouins; this reminds Morford of an adventure in London, which is admirably told and elicits great laughter. 'Ah,' says Beach, 'I had a similar occurrence while in Paris,' and then we have his story, to which, after we have had another good laugh, Towny replies, in a rather gruff voice—for mind you, Towny doesn't feel first-rate this A.M., having been one of the unfortunates who didn't respond to the secretary's invitation, and was obliged to sleep on a soft board, and consequently rested poorly, or as he said, 'he didn't rest at all.' 'You got out of that well, but I had a more singular adventure than that.' So he commences by saying, 'We were in latitude so and so,' when the announcement was heard: 'Passengers for the Water Gap—train leaves in ten minutes,' which immediately caused a stampede for the depot. While waiting here, the lovely creasure with the 'ler' whisking blue eyes, rosy cheeks, and delicious lips, suddenly appeared upon the scene; the emotions of the previous evening were only intensified by her presence. It will I sought a friend for an introduction. Know me I must. 'Where there's a will there's a way' is an old axiom, and I determined to find the way. But while I was revolving this in my mind, the train arrived. We were soon on board, on our way to the celebrated Water Gap, where, after the usual delays attendant upon change of cars at one station, and stoppage of fifteen minutes for lunch at a second station, we finally arrived about two o'clock.

"Here we were met by the representatives of the Southern New Jersey press, the Philadelphia guests, and many others of the Pennsylvania rural press; the ladies proceeded in carriages by the mountain road to the Kittatinny House, while the gentlemen made the ascent by a private mountain-path; at length all were assembled, and then such a chatter and clatter! Of course everybody was hungry and wanted their dinner immediately, but disappointment awaited us here owing in a great measure to the fact that our company had, by the addition of the morning arrivals, increased to about double the number originally anticipated. A delay was necessary in order to make provisions for so many hungry tourists.

"It was soon announced, however, that dinner would be ready in half an hour, the interim being filled up by speech-making by various persons and a general sight-seeing by the entire company. Away we went scrambling up the mountain, some one way, some another. The time to remain being short, we were determined to make the most of it. Directly, we came to a broad plateau, from which, extending far away to the north, we feasted our eyes on one of the loveliest of views, the beautiful Delaware River placidly rolling toward us far away beneath us, on either side of which, on hill and mountain-side, the rich fields of grain were gently waving their golden crests. Far away in the dim distance, seeming almost like a summer cloud in the soft atmosphere of the noonday, could be distinguished the Pocono Mountains. Beneath us, far down the mountain-side, seeming almost like fiery serpents, came long trains of cars, laden with coals, creeping, though swiftly, and occasionly hidden in part, sometimes wholly from view, in the deep foliage, and at length winding off through a curve until lost entirely from view.

"It seemed like a fairy vision, and we had but fairly begun to realize its beauties and grandeur, when was heard the gong for dinner. Then came another scramble, of short duration, though, and we arrived in ample time to enjoy the substantial dinner provided by the Broadbends of 'Kittatinny' renown. I beg to assure you we did ample justice to it, too. As per programme of arrangements, 'no ceremony' was observed. Dinner concluded, a large number of the delegates, members of the New Jersey press, by the kindness of Mr. Jesse Greven, photographer, repaired to his gallery on the mountain-side, and were photographed in a group. The picture is a most genuine and faithful one in every respect, and our friends will have in their possession points of interest, and I would here say that there seem to be almost innumerable. The Messrs. Broadhead kindly furnished us with a list of the most celebrated views, seventeen of which lie within a distance of from three hundred yards to three miles from the Kittatinny House, and are reached by mountain-paths on foot. Beside these are fifteen different drives, ranging from two to twelve miles, and over which the scenery is constantly and rapidly changing. We were all accompanied with the varied beauties of this romantic spot, and it was with reluctance we at length retraced our steps, admonished by the fact that at half-past six P.M. we were to return to Belvidere.

"We bade adieu to our host, and were once more on the road. The evening was delightful, and as we passed through the various windings of the Gap—now around the Bloodhead Mountain—then Mount Tammany came in full view, and we finally passed through the great gorge between the Jersey Mountain and Mount Minsi, into the beautiful valley southward. From the platforms of the cars, and proceeding from the windows, could be seen innumerable beads taking a last fond look at the gorgeous old hills as they lay there in their solemn grandeur.



"The train flew swiftly on until we arrived at Manunka Chunk junction, where, from high up on the hill-side, we took our final leave of the Water Gap. The sun was just setting, and the richly tinted purple, crimson and gold-streaked clouds paused, or so seemed to hang reluctantly over the scene—while far off in the distance lay the mountains of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and rolling between them the historic valley of the Delaware, slowly wending its tortuous way for miles away through the lonely valley, studded with its picturesque cottages and farm-houses, from whose smoke from the chimneys of which, seen here and there lazily ascending from behind little clusters of dark-green trees, gave us a panoramic picture of such rare and exquisite merit as to defy description.

"Banvard was in ecstasies. His tongue could express but few utterances to his thoughts. Morford, though, declared 'he had been better at sea,' to which Banvard replies by saying: 'Well, he should see what you saw at sea, that we came here to see, and not to sail.' This little pun was just being deciphered, when we heard the train slacken speed, and further contemplation of the subject was rudely interrupted.

"We arrived at Belvidere and were received (though not officially by a large delegation of the citizens, who escorted us to the Warren House, where we immediately commenced the necessary preparation for the Editorial Dinner which was to conclude our festivities. At about nine o'clock the company were fully assembled, and entered at once upon the duties before them.

"The bountiful dinner which had been prepared in Crane's best style, was duly enjoyed; then came the feast of reason and flow of soul. The ceremonies were presided over by Mr. Wurts, of Paterson, the Vice-President, owing to the absence, occasioned by illness, of Mr. Hood, the President, and after the usual amount of speeches and singing, at about twelve P.M., we adjourned.

"A few hours' sleep and we were again astir in Belvidere, after which we started for home. At twenty minutes past six, on Saturday, we bade adieu to Belvidere, and in company with several choice spirits, among whom was the dear creature with the blue eyes, who, by the way, I am now privileged to call my friend, we started on our journey home, via Trenton and Philadelphia, at which city we made short visits to the Mint and Independence Hall, and from which we took our departure on the Camden and Amboy road, arriving here on Saturday evening, delighted with our trip to the Water Gap."

PLAN OF THE QUADRILATERAL OF FORTRESSES IN AUSTRIAN ITALY.

TIME.

There are lovers ever ranging, there are converts ever changing,
There are quarrels aye estranging that make empires shake and nod;
And for ever craftily sorrow shrouds the day and blights the morrow,
And no change to that we borrow in this hated breath of God.

There are fates on favor hinging, there are counsels ever cringing,
There are moths for ever singing in the candle-light of gold
There are knaves for ever raiding, there are hucksters ever trading
And a thrill of following wherein love is bought and sold.

There is hate and there is slander, there is pomp and there is pander—
Blood-fevers that meander through the swollen veins of life;
There are lives ever clicking, there is cant and spittle-logging,
And a thrill of fellow-kicking in the grinning of the strife.

There 's a pride of fame and faces, there is pride of rank and races,
And the pride that most debases us—the demon-pride of might;
When this earth is rent and crumbled, and our prides have blanched and stumbled,
He will only ball the bumbled as the victors of the fight.

There are men in silks and ermine, there are men in rags and vermin,
And the difference how determine, save from silks and rags alone,
Until we are all weighing in the scale that knows no slying—
Knows no unfurnished swaying—when God's knowing shall be known?

There are women ever shrinking from the woman that is sinking—
From the sister that is drinking the red abyss of shame,
And link to link beliuking of our chain with no harsh clinking,
Stealin the tamper of our thinking, till our souls are God's in name.

Yet for ever from our doing is the primal good of cunning,
That it rings a dreadful ruing and the back unto the wood;
And though sins are ever seeding, there are hearts for ever bleeding,
And for ever in our needing do we bend and pray to God.

So for ever we are coping, and for ever we are groping,
But for ever we are hoping in this wilderness of crime;
And our trust for aye will linger—Woe is but God's purest finger
Raised before this young infringer—naughty, cradled baby—Time.

HOW HE DID HIS DUTY.

My father was dying—my dear father, who had never spoken a harsh word to me, or given me an unkind look. I stood by his bedside that gloomy afternoon, waiting as impatiently as my poor father was, for the arrival of Edgar Thorold, the dearest friend of his youth. When the doctor a week before, had pronounced his recovery impossible, he had said:

"I will send for Edgar Thorold. To him alone can I entrust my little flower, when I am gone."

The vesper bell of the afternoon, and my long course of night watches, combined to render me drowsy, and in spite of my anxiety I fell asleep. I was roused by the opening of the chamber-door, and by the voice of my dear old nurse sobbing, in a whisper:

"Miss Jessica."

The sound roused my father as well as myself, and he cried out, eagerly:

"What is it, nurse?"

"Oh, sir, I thought you were asleep, and did not want to disturb you," she replied; "but Mr. Thorold is come and has asked for Miss Jessica, so that she might tell you of his arrival when you awoke."

"Go, Nelly, and bring him to me at once, dear," urged my father, and down-stairs I went.

My heart was beating, and I hesitated a moment before I opened the door of the room where my future guardian was. He, however, did not perceive my entrance, and as he stood gazing thoughtfully on the ground, I had an opportunity of noticing him, while unobserved myself.

How shall I describe him as he at the time impressed me, a girl of seventeen? His figure was the tallest I had ever seen, and was magnificent in its massive proportions; the carriage of the head and chest was haughty; the face was not handsome—it was perhaps too stern for that, but the noble brow and dark eyes were far more impressive than any mere regularity of feature. The short mustache on the upper lip, and the thick curly hair were still black, although the owner had numbered nearly eight-and-thirty years. To finish my imperfect description, there was an air of command about the whole face and figure, which would have rendered Edgar Thorold noticeable even in an assemblage of kings.

A movement which I made in closing the door roused him from his reverie, and I, ashamed of being caught staring thus rudely, exclaimed hurriedly:

"Oh, Mr. Thorold, I am so glad you are come!

My poor father is very anxious to see you. Will you please come to him at once?"

He advanced toward me, and laying his hand kindly on my head, and with a smile that lightened up his own face, making me wonder how I ever could have thought him stern-looking:

"So you are my little friend Nelly!" said he; "why, I was silly enough to half expect to see the little toddling thing who used to greet me with chubby outstretched hands, and affectionate kisses, years long ago. Ah, well, Time's flight has transformed me into a gloomy, elderly man, and you into a grown woman. But I am keeping you waiting; Miss Grant; I am quite ready to accompany you to him whom you wish to go."

Somehow, the "Miss Grant" pushed on my ear; it did not seem right that this stately man, my father's oldest friend should address me thus ceremoniously.

"Call me Nelly, still, please," said I, on a sudden impulse. "You are my father's friend, and will, I hope, be mine."

"With God's help, my child, I will," was the earnest reply; and, somehow, from that moment I never felt afraid of Mr. Thorold.

As soon as we entered my father's room, he rose in bed, and stretched out his hand with a glad cry of welcome. Edgar Thorold was by the side of his couch in a moment, and I could see that his piercing eyes were dim as he looked on his sick friend.

"Jessy, Jessy, my darling," said my father. I quitted the room, heartbroken to behold that my only remaining parent was so soon to be taken from me, but still with a feeling of comfort that the guardian to whom I was to be committed was one so apparently well able and willing to protect and befriend me.

All was over, and I was an orphan. I was stunned at first by the blow, and was beginning to take to the full sense of my great loss.

It was the day of the funeral, and my unnatural calmness had at last given way, and I was shaken by a storm of sobs.

"Don't, pray don't, Miss Helena," said nurse; "you'll be ill if you cry like this. Pray, don't."

"Leave her alone, Mrs. Wathina," said Mr. Thorold, who had entered unperceived. "Tears do not kill, and they will relieve the child's heart. Come with me; I want to speak to you about the packing up, and your young lady will be better left to herself."

There was no gainsaying Mr. Thorold's will—it was absolute; but as nurse followed him from the room she muttered, "Disagreeable, I call it."

All the remainder of the day she was inveighing against Mr. Thorold's hardness of heart and want of sympathy. Yet that night, when I retired to rest, my guardian said, gently, "Try to remember, Nelly, that your father is not beneath the turf, but in a land where there is no more weeping, where all tears shall be wiped away, and where all things will become pure;" and for his sake, my child, rejoice—then you will not grieve so much on your own account. Good night, little one."

Was he, after all, so very unsympathizing? I certainly did not think so; and as I felt that, for his sake, I should labor to be cheerful for our future residence in the house of my guardian.

At last we arrived and were domesticated in the old Virginia mansion.

Time softens the grief of the most afflicted.

I was no exception to the general rule. I still thought daily and almost hourly of my dear dead father; but by the time I had been a month in my new home, I began to think of him without the bitter tears I at first shed. I had the consolation that he was "not lost, but gone before."

From me, he will be reverently spoken of; I was not unhappy; indeed it would have been strange if I had been, for its master treated me with a courtesy and kindness that was more than one usually so cold, stern and reserved. The very servants, too, were all willing to do my slightest wish—at first, I think, from a sort of respect for the young orphan, and afterward from real liking. Even the children there made friends with me, for Pluto, Mr. Thorold's dog, was ragged that he could not with pleasure when I appeared: and Snap, the little smooth-coated terrier, never showed his vicious little teeth at me.

I had explored every nook and corner of the old house except the library, which was Mr. Thorold's sanctum. Now, I was a true daughter of Eve in the fact that, of all places, the library was the very one which I wished to see. Books were a spoils and indulged as I had been all my life, scarcely had sufficient hardihood to enter that room without an invitation. One day, however, I found the library door, it stood invitingly open, and the apartment was unoccupied. In I walked, like a second Lady Godiva, but no horrible fate befell me for my boldness in my entry. I only beheld a handsomely furnished, well-stocked library.

After examining the books around me for some time, I glanced upward, and on a shelf, far above my reach, I saw a copy of a work which I had been reading to my poor father a few days before his death. To drag the library ladder of light, polished wood to the shelf, and commence the task of ascertainment, and I was soon comfortably perched on the top round, with my elbow resting on the shelf, while I looked through the book, and at last taken from its place. I do not know how long I had stood thus, but after a time a noise below startled me, and I looked down, and saw Mr. Thorold. Surprised, alarmed, and a little ashamed of my very undignified position, I made a hasty movement, which caused me to lose my slight foothold, and I should have fallen to the ground but for the outstretched arms of Mr. Thorold, who caught me as I was falling, and placed me gently on my feet.

"Well, little lady," said he, smiling, "you looked like a bird perched up there; but unfortunately the wings were absent.

"I think, Mr. Thorold, I felt more like a culprit than a bird in wrong-doing," I replied. "I know I ought not to have entered this room without permission; but poor papa gave me the freedom of his library, and, in fact, used to direct my studies himself for two hours every morning, so you must forgive my intrusion, please, and set it down to the force of habit."

"I do hope, Nelly," said my guardian, "you will enter every room in this house as freely as if it belonged to your father; and as to your studies, if I can supply your father's place, and render you any assistance, I shall be only too happy to do so."

"Oh, that will be delightful," I said; "I will come to-morrow morning, if you are not otherwise engaged, May I?"

Mr. Thorold acquiesced to the arrangement, and from that time I went to the library for two hours every morning, and never did girl have a kinder or more able tutor. Things that had before been dark to my comprehension, became clear as daylight when Mr. Thorold explained them.

I generally reached the room before my guardian, and amused myself until his arrival by decorating his writing-table with flowers, which I gathered in my early morning walk. In acknowledgment of this, Mr. Thorold said one day: "My room used to be the favorite resort of the house, before you came, Nelly; but you and your flowers make it quite bright and pleasant."

On the very same morning that he made this remark, I encouraged, perhaps, by it, said to him, "as I put away my books after my studies: "You always tell me, Mr. Thorold, that after sitting at my books I ought to have a gallop; now, do you know, I think it would do you just as much good as it does me. Please order your horse and ride with me. "Besides," I added, "it is such dull riding out with no one but old James with me."

"Poor little one!" he replied, as he gently stroked my hair; "of course it is dull." Then he added, in another voice, "I suppose I must not be less gallant than old Squire Doubletone in 'Rob Roy.' He, you know, said that 'there was but one woman at the Hall, and he would not have her die for want of having her own way.' So, let you should pine, Nelly, you must have your own way; and if you like to ride with me, child, I will be ready to accompany you when you come down."

Thus it came about that Mr. Thorold acted as esquire to me every day, and every pleasure he made them to me. He took me to all the social festivities in the neighborhood, and introduced me to every beautiful view within twenty miles round.

And so my time passed pleasantly away. Walking, studying, riding, and (a very little) working, made the days glide by as if on wings. And in the evenings, when the shades were falling, I used to go into the "long" drawing-room, and play over my favorite sonatas, till nurse would come in and say she did not like my music little parlor, saying that "I should get quite low-spirited if I sat any longer playing that queer music in that great dull room."

One evening I had just finished playing one of the sweetest and saddest of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," when I heard something like a sigh in the room. I started, and looked round, and saw my guardian walking quietly from the door, as if he had been there for hours. I took no notice of this; and often afterward, in the shadowy twilight, used to see him at the other end of the long apartment; but as he appeared to wish to remain unobserved, I never spoke to him, and I daresay he thought I was ignorant of his presence.

Among the few families with whom I became acquainted, was that of the Masons. The two young ladies of the house—Constance and Clarissa—were pleasant, intelligent girls, and I liked them thoroughly. Months sped on. The spring had come and gone, and summer was once again gladdening the earth. I had been in Virginia a year, and in that year I had grown and grown so to love my new home, that I almost felt as if I had never known any other.

There was one thing which pained me; I fancied—oh, how I prayed it might only be fancy!—that of late my guardian was growing colder and more stern. The slight chill which I descried myself to sleep when this thought came over me, and I always finished by scolding myself for indulging in such fancies.

It wanted but a fortnight to my eighteenth birthday, and Mr. Thorold had reminded me of it.

"You will be eighteen in two weeks' time, Nelly," he said, "and you must celebrate the event worthily, so you had better go down and consult Mrs. Mason and the girls as to the sort of entertainment you would like on the occasion."

I thanked him, and off I started, for I was young, and liked the idea of a grand birth-day celebration. I consulted the Misses Mason, and told the girls what Mr. Thorold had kindly said.

"How good of him!" said Mary; but Constance was silent. I asked her why she did not speak.

"Mr. Thorold is out of my good graces!" she replied; "he was very severe on Clarissa's calumnies, and he told her he wished to introduce me to society, because I was all very nice; but then he added, 'for of course the difference in our ages prevents us from being any company to each other.' Just as if he was getting tired of you, Helena?"

I could not answer. I felt as if an unseen hand was grasping my throat, and choking me. Constance, however, did not wait long for a reply.

"As soon as he was gone," she continued, "I told him that I thought you were very nice, and tired of him as he was of you; and she said, 'You must not judge Mr. Thorold harshly; he is too much absorbed in memories of the past to care about the society of young girls; and doubtless he will be glad to be relieved from the responsibility of Helena's guardianship.' Still, I don't like him for it."

Somehow the communication of Constance had totally destroyed my enjoyment in thinking of my birthday, but I forced myself to join in the discussion, and it was finally decided that a ball was to be the entertainment, and that Mrs. Mason was to make out the list of guests to be invited, subject, of course, to the approval of my guardian.

I was glad to get away from the Masons, and when I reached home I shut myself in my bedroom, and gave myself up to a good fit of crying.

"So," thought I, "my guardian wants to be rid of me! He need not fear; I will not be a burden on him longer than I can help."

In pursuance of this feeling I behaved as coldly as I well could, and I only wonder that Mr. Thorold noticed it at all; but he did not, or at all events he did not appear to do so.

My birthday morning came, and with it a packet from Mr. Thorold, which, when it opened it, proved to be a necklet and pair of bracelets of large pearls, with diamond clasps. The present was superb, but I would rather should not have had it, so sorely was I hurt by that Constance had told me. However, I expressed my thanks for the gift when I met my guardian at breakfast.

"I am glad you like the ornaments, my dear," he said, kindly; "I hope to see you in them tonight."

Nurse was very important as she bustled about my dressing-table, and when she had put the finishing touches, she declared her opinion that I looked "like an angel." If any angels wear floating robes of soft lace, with tiny bouquets of blush rose-buds—if they have wings, which are ornamented in the same way—if they deck themselves with beautiful pearls on their arms and throats—and if they ever gaze with large, wondering, brown eyes at their own images, as reflected in a mirror of glass, then, perhaps, I may have resembled one, but not otherwise.

I am afraid I was discontented that night, but I know I was grateful. I could have embraced my slight girlish figure for one of more queenly dignity, and my fair, delicate skin, for one of more glowing brilliancy.

I cannot describe that first ball, for I am almost ashamed to confess that, in spite of all drawbacks, I thoroughly enjoyed it, and felt a heedlessness delight at the gay scene. I had partners without end, and, I am sad and indifferent, but among the very best, handsomest, and most admired, was Reginald Harmer, the eldest son of Ralph Harmer, whose estate adjoined Mr. Thorold's. Mr. Harmer was a capital partner; he danced well, and talked better, and my girlish vanity was not a little tickled by the fact that the handsomest man in the room would evidently rather dance with me than with any other lady.

After that, Mr. Harmer was a constant attendant, and society smiled significantly when it saw each gentleman's stately head bent down to catch every word addressed to it. But I was glad, for my guardian grew colder day by day. One morning nurse came to me and said:

"Mr. Thorold sends his compliments, and will you step down to the library as soon as you have breakfasted."

I hastened over my toilet, and drank my coffee in a scalding state, wondering, meantime, what my guardian could want with me so early. When I had finished my hasty breakfast, I betook myself to Mr. Thorold's sanctum. In my hurry I forgot to knock at the side door entrance, and as I my guardian standing by the open window, with such a strange expression on his face—a look of weary sadness—that I was overpowered, and hardly to me to sce. I hastened forward, but in doing so I encountered a footstool and roused Mr. Thorold from his reverie. He turned round, and came toward me.

His indignation has chased the roses from your cheeks, Nelly," said he, with a grave smile; "but I have something to tell you which I think will bring them back again."

He took my hand, and placed me in a seat as he spoke, and I wondered what he had to say to me.

"I have received what has been here this morning?" he asked, when I was seated.

"No," I replied.

"I have come to tell you," said he. "Mr. Harmer called on me to say that his uncle—his mother's brother—has sent for him on rather important business, and that he has left home at present from here for about a month. He, however, could not go without telling you how dear you are to him, and asking you to be his wife. He will wait any time you wish, if you will but accept his suit. Now, I have not seen, he came to me, to tell me how he was situated, and to beg me to plead his proposal before you, which I now do. He told me that he had already waited till his return, but he could not bear to think that meantime some other one might win your love. He was obliged to employ no one but himself, for, as he told me, he had a most delicate affair to settle."

"Of course, Nelly," he continued, "it is a matter in which you must consult your own heart, for you do not love Reginald Harmer, you shall not be troubled about him again; but if you do, I can only say you could not choose a worthier, more manly young man, and no one would be more positive in in every way more suitable. If you accept him, I have no doubt you will be happy. What do you say, Nelly?"

A burst of tears was my only reply. Mr. Thorold soothed me as he might have soothed an excited child, and begged me to be calm and to speak. As I sat there, sobbing, it passed through my mind that Reginald Harmer very well, but I certainly did not love him. Then I remembered that somehow, I know not why, I never should love anybody, so I might as well say "Yes," at once, and thus end the matter. I therefore sobbed myself quiet, and then said:

"I—I—like Mr. Harmer very much, but—"

"But what, my dear?" asked Mr. Thorold, as I stopped.

I never expected this," I replied.

"This, however, has come, and what will your reply be?" said my guardian, gently. "Will you except the office? Because, if so, I have Mr. Harmer's town address; and if you write, I will enclose the letter in one from me. We have no right to keep the young man in suspense."

"I will write and accept Mr. Harmer's offer this evening," replied, in a choking voice; "just now I could not hold a pen. It will surely be time enough if the letter goes by to-morrow morning's post?"

"Quite time enough, my dear little Nelly," said Mr. Thorold; "and now I think you had better lie down awhile, for you look sadly upset by this surprise. God bless you, my child!" he said, opening the door for me to pass out.

I rushed to my room, locked the door, and, throwing myself on the bed, gave way to a passionate fit of weeping, which so exhausted me that I fell asleep. When I awoke it was evening, and the sky, which had been bright in the afternoon, was now lowering and overcast; the weather was as gloomy as my feelings. I rose, bathed my eyes, and went into my pretty sitting-room, to endeavor to write my letter to Mr. Harmer. I found there there, wondering at my laziness in going to bed after having once risen.

"You look quite ill, Miss Helena," she said, kindly; "going to bails don't suit you, let me get you a cup of tea; perhaps it will set you to rights."

I took the tea, but did not feel at all set "to rights" by it; and when I had finished the meal, I still felt quite unequal to the task of writing the letter, so I took up my hat, and told some of them I should have a stroll in the grounds. She offered no objection, so I went.

I wandered aimlessly about, feeling hopelessly wretched, without knowing why. In this frame of mind I passed through the gate into a pleasant lane. I strolled on nearly half a mile, when I was roused from my gloomy meditations by a sound which I should have recognized anywhere—the clatter of the hoofs of Mr. Thorold's thoroughbred mare. But there was something strange in the mad rapidity with which they came forward me, and, as I was wondering at this, the mare passed me at flying speed, her bostrils distended, her eyes like balls of fire, and—riderless!

My heart gave a wild leap, and I should have shrieked, but that my tongue seemed too parched to move. Great Heaven! what has happened? Was he dead? If so, I cared not to live; and in that moment of bitter agony I learnt the secret of my own heart—that one hair of Ralph Thorold's head was worth more to me than all the world besides. I had but one idea—that of finding him; so, as soon as I could move, I hurried on as fast as I could run. I know not how far I had gone before I saw a dark object on the side of the road. I turned sick at the thought of what it might be, and then hurried to the spot. It was Mr. Thorold, his face white and senseless, his noble head lying in the dust, and his majestic form still and apparently lifeless. I knelt down by his side—I raised his head—I pillowed it on my bosom—I rained warm tears on his brow. "He shall not die—my love, my noble love! But he did not stir.

"Oh, merciful Father!" I cried, in my agony; "if he is dead, take me, too. I cannot live without him; he is all the world to me!" and the hot tears rushed from my eyes.

As if the warm drops upon his face roused him, there was a faint quiver of the eyelids, and, with the horrible fear of his death removed from me, began to dread lest he should see how great that fear had been. He removed my face to a respectful distance; and, as his dark eyes opened and gazed at me inquiringly, I said, in as quiet a tone as I could command my voice,

"I think you have been thrown from your horse, Mr. Thorold. I hope you are not seriously hurt. Can you speak? can my help? or shall I run to the nearest cottage for assistance?"

"I certainly have been thrown," was the reply. "But I think I was only stunned for the time by the blow on my head."

As he spoke he rose to his feet, and I saw that, though white and trembling, he had sustained no serious injury. Overcome by the happy revulsion of feeling, I burst into tears, as I exclaimed:

"Thank Heaven!"

"Before I can thank Heaven for preserving a life, which had not an hour ago seemed worth a less to me, I must ask you something, Nelly," said my guardian. "When I was lying there I was aroused by passing words that made me think I was either mad or in Heaven. Did you speak those words, Nelly, or was I really dreaming?"

The blood rushed to my cheeks, and I hid my face in my hands, forgetting that I thereby revealed the truth as plainly as I could have done by words. At all events, Mr. Thorold needed no words to tell him, for in a moment I was gathered in his strong arms, my head upon his bosom, and he was kissing the tears from my eyes.

"Look up, my own, my darling," he whispered. "Let me read the truth in those sweet eyes. Oh, Nelly, how I have worshiped you for many months, till I grew frightened at the strength of my love! How hopeless I was; for how dared I dream that my young love would ever think of caring for an elderly, gloomy man like me? Then, Nelly, you almost mad I was when I had to be the bearer of another's message of love, and had, in honor, to urge his suit! I think I must have been blind with misery to-night not to have seen through it, but, thank Heaven!—which has given me back not only life, but something to live for—I am spared to know at last what happiness means."

I scarcely know how we reached home. I know, however, that the next morning Mr. Thorold showed very little traces of his accident of the previous evening, but that he joined me in the library, and helped me to compose a kind letter, declining the honor proposed by Mr. Harmer.

"My darling," said Mr. Thorold, tenderly, as soon as the letter was finished, "I will take you down to the Masons' now; so tell nurse to pack a few things, and let James bring them to you, for I am going to send you there for a time."

"Oh, why?" I exclaimed, in surprise.

"Because, my pet, I am going to New York," he replied; "and while I am in town I shall order a wedding trousseau for a certain young lady of my acquaintance, so that her marriage may be celebrated as soon as I return. Are you willing, love?"

I was willing, and he knew it; so we went down together to the Masons' to break the important news, and the surprise of Mrs. Mason, especially of Constance, may be imagined, but, as novelists say, cannot be described.

The wedding took place before a month was out, and I have never since known a grief or the shadow of one. In fact, if unfailing love and devoted tenderness, even to watchful care, and manly, chivalrous protection, may be allowed as evidence, then truly has Edgar Thorold, my noble guardian, thoroughly done his duty.

LOVE.

(VERSES OF THE 16TH CENTURY.)

WHAT is love, that idle the world
Talks so much about it?
What is love, that neither you
Nor I can doe without it?
What is love, that it should be
As changefulle as the weather?
Is it joy? or is it paine?
Or is it both together?

Love's a tyrant and a slave,
A tormente and a treasure;
Havinge it we knowe no peace,
Wantinge it, no pleasure.
Wouldst we absume it if we coulde?
In sooth, I almost doubt it!
Faith! I'd rather have the pangs
Than live my life without it!

THE DOUBLE RUSE;

OR,

THE CAPTAIN'S CORRESPONDENT.

BY COUSIN MAUDE.

"And these are your real sentiments, Captain?"

"Certainly, Jim. Why should they not be?"

"I don't know; only it seems so strange that you should really contemplate marrying that little girl whom you have never seen."

"But I have corresponded with her now two years, and I know her to be truthful, and a girl of good sense, good education, and, as you will allow, by her picture, she is beautiful, and—"

"Oh, nonsense, Jack! I don't want to hear of the virtues and accomplishments of this paragon of yours. I presume, quite likely, she is some woman well skilled in the art of husband-catching."

"Woman! she's only a girl of nineteen!"

"Well, I don't doubt but she has made you believe that; but wait until you see her, and then, if you don't want her, in order to keep her heart whole, I'll marry her myself."

"I shall want her; you need not build any hopes upon that. But, Jim, do you know that I am really anxious to find out whether she would love me as I appear, as I had never written her?"

"Are you really anxious to know, Captain? If so, just let me have your picture to take with me. If we do hook go; let me personate Captain Ellis, and you, Lieutenant Wharton, and see which she will fancy most."

"But, Jim, she has my picture, you know, and we don't look much alike, even if you are my cousin."

"Bah! Jack; you are afraid to trust yourself; you are afraid I will win the pretty darling away from you."

"I am not afraid of losing Allie, bless her heart! and I will agree to this change of character, providing only one thing. If you learn her to love you, you shall marry her. I will not have her trifled with."

"Why, Jack, I believe you do love her!"

"Never mind that. Here is this letter to Allie; see if it will do."

The persons we have introduced to the reader are named, respectively, Captain Jack Ellis and Lieutenant Jim Wharton. They were cousins, and were now passed by the army blue. Both tall and well-proportioned, black hair and eyes, mustache and "imperial," and both so much alike as to be enough to have been brothers. They were cousins; and firmer or more intimate friends could not be imagined.

Two years before my story opens, the regiment was quartered at Lagrange, Texas, and camp life becoming dull, among the boys, it was frequently the case, advertised for correspondents. Lieutenant Wharton was one; Captain Ellis was another. Each thought it a good joke when lieutenant received a dainty epistle, signed "Allie Wilde," Captain Ellis begged for the privilege of answering it; which was granted, Wharton looking in wild-eyed wonder to see his stoical friend so interested in the answer of the white paper-and-dainty chirography. Since that time, no matter under what circumstances no was placed—how ill, how much of a bore, how unfavorable for business—a letter from Allie was hailed with the greatest delight, and answered with as little delay as possible; Jim, at first, laughed at him a little, but finally ceased, and said nothing.

He had asked and been granted the privilege of paying her a visit, "when the war ended;" and now that it was ended, and the angel of peace spread her broad wings over the nation, purified and redeemed from its sins, he thought seriously of redeeming his promise before commencing the practice of his profession, as a civil man of a lawyer.

Jim had studied and commenced the practice of medicine before leaving Rochelle, Ill., and had not yet settled back into the old place. But in what had formerly been his office, they were discussing the question of Jack's visit to Hildelide, Mich.

The passage in the letter referring to Jack's visit, and which we have said he requested Jim to read, was in these words:

"I am coming to see you, Miss Allie, if I may; I would like to know my cousin, Lieutenant Wharton, of whom I have so often written you. May I, and will you provide some lady fair to entertain him?"

Jim passed the letter back to him, and said, laughingly:

"Well, Jack, that will do nicely; and if I fall in love with Allie, you may have the other girl."

"No, you don't, young man! I am not afraid. Allie will not love you while she must not!"

"Well," said Jim, rising, "let's talk of something else; you are too serious and sensible. It is five, and you must go home with me to dinner."

So, arm in arm, the two friends sauntered down the street, leaving in the post-office on their way where they deposited Allie's letter.

In a few days came the answer. Allie and her cousin, Minnie Weston, would be happy to entertain the gentlemen, and should expect them immediately. So, with as little delay as possible, the "boys" left for the "north march," as they styled it; and a bright October night found them comfortably seated on the piazza of the Hildelide House, enjoying their favorite weed. Jack had already dispatched a note to Allie, informing her of their arrival, and intention to call at eight.

So he and now the boy bearing the note and see Allie for ourselves, without the aid of Jack Ellis's partial eyes. In the parlor, on the piano-stool, lily trifling with his keys, and talking to Minnie, who stands near, sits Allie. They are both fair and petite, with soft brown, flowing curls of golden hue, and eyes the color of the June sky; but in Allie's eyes there is a tenderer light, a deeper soul. She seems not to be saying on the negative side of some question; and the sparkle in her eye, and the rich bloom on her cheek, betoken some excitement. She is just saying to her cousin:

"Oh, Minnie, I cannot! It would be so wrong!"

"But you would like to know, would you not, whether he would have loved you, if he had not read you through your letters?"

"Oh, yes; I should like to know!"

"Well, then, don't be so bashful. Let me assume your place, and you entertain Lieutenant Wharton. Allie!" I mean the captain with his whiskers."

At this moment they were startled by a peal of bell; and the next, a servant entered with a note, which Allie, to whom it was handed, took and opened nervously, and, as soon as the servant left the room, she exclaimed:

"Oh, Minnie, they've come! and are going to dine at eight!"

"Then we must go immediately and make some addition to our toilet," said Minnie, consulting a little gold repeater in her belt; "it is now half-past seven."

Away they girls flitted, and in half an hour were ready to receive their guests. They came up the walk, looking provokingly handsome in the moonlight, and the girls, who were secretly on the lookout, saw them first.

"Which is Captain Ellis?" asked Minnie.

"I don't know; they look so much alike, I cannot tell. Wait, and we will soon see!"

And then, ere the gentlemen were announced, the ladies had glided to their seats and taken up books, seemingly absorbed in their contents although no gentlemen had come five or six hundred miles for a glimpse of their fair faces, and were seeking a resting-place at the door.

As the servant announced, "Captain Ellis and Lieutenant Wharton, Miss Allie," Minnie arose, as Allie could prevent her, and, turning to Jim, said:

"Captain Ellis?"

Jim bowed and introduced—

"My cousin, Lieutenant Wharton, Miss Wilde!"

Minnie, in her turn, presented—

"My cousin, Captain Ellis, gentlemen," and so the double ruse was accomplished.

We will not further intervene. When the boys reached their hotel, Jim exclaimed:

"Jack, your Allie has done for me! She is perfectly charming! I shall always vote for leaving her. I love her already. Why don't you speak, man?" he added, after a pause, during which Jack sat with his head in his hands, and said nothing. Thus abjured, he raised his head.

"Jim, I wish I had not consented to this arrangement. Do you know that I am more than half in love with Minnie? To-night, as I sat by her, I could have kissed her, and only refrained from the fear that she would tell Allie!"

"Pshaw! man, why need you be so squeamish? I think I can console Allie if you should like Minnie better. So you have had a fair chance to fall in love with Minnie? To-night, as I sat by Allie, I could have kissed her, and only refrained from the fear that she would tell Minnie!"

"Then, seeing Allie's grave looks, she threw herself on the floor at her feet, and said:

"Now, Allie, please don't put on such a look. I assure you I won't marry the captain, even if he should propose!"

"Oh, Minnie, I am so sorry!" said Allie, penitently.

"What! sorry I won't marry him? Well, then, I will! I'll do anything, if you will only put off that woe-begone expression."

"You will?" Then confess to Captain Ellis that you are Minnie Weston, and let me once more be Allie Wilde."

"Oh, no, Allie! Can't do that. The sport is just commenced. It is such fun to see Lieutenant Wharton looking—as we say he thought he'd have to 'cousin' me one of these days; then, to see his eyes wander back to you, as if he thought—Ah, how provoking in him!"

The blood rushed to Allie's cheek at this sudden question, and she answered, flatteringly:

"Indeed, Minnie, he is very agreeable."

"Oh, you sentimental little thing! Confess, now, that you like him better than the captain," cried Minnie, mischievously.

"I am afraid I do," answered Allie, sorrowfully; "and it is wrong, for I have led the captain to expect differently. Do, Minnie, tell him who you are."

"Why, he knows who I am," answered Minnie, laughing. "I am Miss Allie Wilde, at your service, Monsieur. Allie, do you suppose I am going to give this up, now? No, my dear, you must keep to the character you have assumed; and it strikes me that we had better put our bodies there also, for we must be fresh and sweet for that ride to-morrow. Au revoir, ma chere Minnie." And the little mischief bowed herself out of the room.

The ride was followed by parties, dinners, long rambles, and evening calls, and tete-a-tetes; but after the first proposition neither Allie nor Jack proposed to their respective "cousins" that they should be made acquainted with the other's society, and asked for no other companion. Occasionally a qualm of conscience would visit one or the other, but it was more of, and they gave themselves up to the delirium of loving.

Such was the time allotted for the visit were away. The last evening they were spending with Allie, Jim and Minnie had gone for a promenade by moonlight in the grounds about the house. Allie, at the piano, was playing one of Mendelssohn's airs. Jack had wandered away, and at last seated himself by her side, and broke out impatiently:

"Minnie, please stop that music, and listen to me." She looked up in amazement, and he continued: "I have come here; I have something I wish to tell you."

Then, as she obeyed him, he drew her down to his side and encircled her with his arm, while he said:

"May I, Minnie?—may I tell you how much I love you, and how wrongly I have acted?"

"Wait one moment, Mr. Wharton," said Allie, drawing away from him; "I have a confession to make to you, which I am resolved, for I assure you it was not my fault. It was my cousin's proposition. I am not Minnie Weston. I am Allie Wilde. Minnie is the lady to whom you are engaged, and she resembles me in the introduction; and—"

"Not a word more, darling! I thought I saw the soul in your face that I had often seen in my Allie's letters."

"How! Did you read my letters?"

"I did, indeed, and had the best right in the world to do so, darling. I have been playing a ruse. I am Captain Jack Ellis!"

"But Minnie?" said Allie, imagining that Jim and Minnie are imprisoned in the dark moonlight somewhere," answered Jack. "Ah, here they come, now."

Allie, with his accustomed assumption of carelessness, walked up to the sofa, with Minnie on his arm.

"Congratulate me, Captain Ellis," he said, laughingly; "Miss Minnie Weston has promised to be my wife, and you have every right to wish Allie Wilde as much good fortune. Ah, you look sheepishly happy. I say, Minnie," he continued, turning to his companion, "we have been at our ruse; and so out of our double rude comes a double wedding at last."

The next morning the boys left town; and last Christmas there was a merry double wedding at the house on College Hill, and the boys bore their Hildelide brides away to their home in Texas. And that's what came of the double ruse; and so vanished the captain's correspondent. And so, reader, ends our story, and the sunshine, trailing golden splendors across the Western sky, and shining in gladness on their happy homes, we leave you good e'en, and like happiness, dear reader.

In the examination of an Irish case for assault and battery, counsel, in cross-examining the witness, asked him what they had had at the first place they went to. The answer was:

"Four glasses of sod."

"Four what?"

"Two glasses of wine?"

"Then what?"

"One glass of brandy."

"And then?"

"A flight, of course."

DANDY with a huge beard offered himself to a young lady, who refused him, on the ground that she would never marry such a beast. Whereupon the would never marry such a beast. Whereupon the dandy went home and had his whiskers cleaned, and then removed the beard. So she declined him the second time on the ground that he was now more barefaced than before.

TIM question. Does getting drunk ever advance one's happiness? would seem to be put to rest by the Irishman who went courting when drunk, and was asked what pleasure he found in whisky.

"Oh, Nelly, it's a frate satisfy, to see two of your swate purty faces instead of one!"

A WOMEN man, when told that he was about to die, said he was "Glad of it; he was tired of getting his shoes and stockings on and off." And this is about what his wife reckoned to at about 70.

NEVER DESPAIR.

"DESPAIR of nothing!" Tis a noble, wise,
And philosophic hope: counsel'd to rise
To issue from a Solon's lips, and such
As might not e'en the sapiency belie
Of Israel's gifted king.

How poor is he
Who fits high worth ignores! 'Tis drear to mark
A being gifted with undying powers
Yielding each cherished hope, such lofty aim
To difficulty: at sight of ills
No greater than his fellows have o'ercome,
Dishonoring the name he wears from sires
By weakly fainting where he might command!

Fale shrinking brother! wherefore thus neglect
The opportunity so richly thine
Of shoving the proud front of manliness?
What, what are troubles, but forces meant
To challenge thy sublimest faculties,
To bind thy powers of body and of mind
In firmer union for thy lasting weal,
And to exalt thee o'er the throng inane,
Who, 'midst a superfluity of good,
Exhibit life in piteous barrenness?
Shall dull despondency, shall cowering fear,
Pervert their glorious end and tendency?

Oh! never despair! In those priceless words
Are light and life, and love, light and life for thee,
If, while antagonists beset thy path,
Thou make them thy unfailing battle-cry!
Oh! walk thou with it, lofty-minded soul!
To sterner, bolder, healthier impulses;
And, girding to the task each latent power,
Which, as a Man, thou hast, mighty for good,

Hurl back the sullen, scowling fiend, Despair,
To seek shades more congenial: Up! look heart,
And learn to blush for thy unhallowed mood!
The path to honor's noblest laurels lies
Where ardent hopes defy the sturdy fight,
Where barriers frown that must be overthrown!
None, none may win those laurels unopposed.
Shame not thy manhood by the weak belief
That nothing thou hast lost may be redeemed,
Nothing that seems beyond thy reach attained.
Success is prone to smile upon the brave.
Who wills to do, and dare, and suffer aught,
In purpose fixed, in spirit undismayed,
Shall gain the good he's set his heart upon,
Or perish as a hero—at his work!
And he who struggles hopefully for aught
Of which his inward monitor approves,
Or whether he be smitten in the fray,
Or carve his way to the inviting goal,
Shall find within himself a sure reward.

The world presents no nobler spectacle
Than that of one unfriended and forlorn—
Not seeking or expecting outward aid—
Attacking with indomitable will
Each foe that doth his progress intercept,
Or: Laving, all unhelped, a passage forced,
His spurn back from the danger, Energy,
And, trampling down each yielding obstacle,
Gains, with a hero a pride, the long-sought goal.
Yea, whether this or that be, he hath made good
His right undoubted to be called "A Man."

The Spectre of Cliffe:

OR,

THE FAIR LADY OF THE SHROUD.

By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," &c. &c.

CHAPTER XXIX.—A GENTLE JAILER.

LUCY CATON, the woman who was appointed to be Mildred's attendant, and also her jailer, was one of those persons who are always middle-aged. Like the wicked dwarf in the fairy-tales (although she was by no means a dwarf), she looked as though she had been born into the world very gray and wrinkled, and yet with a beady bright-ness about her eyes that seemed to promise an eternal youth. If it was impossible to imagine her a child, it was equally hard to picture her bowed down and wrinkled with age. Like the horse we buy at fourteen, and work for six years, and boast (and believe our boast) that he is young and as strong as ever, she had looked capable of doing domestic service for several generations yet to come; the most prudent mother would have hired her to preside over the nursery of young children, with no fear that she would soon (alas! alas! for the poor human, who has no paddock to take her ease in, and has even the kindest friends to be happy release, when past work) become "unequal to the situation." She had been only recently taken into Sir Ralph's service, but she came of a stock upon whom that lady could rely. Her brother Joseph had been year by year establishing himself in the good graces of the Lady of Cliffe, and since Gideon's death he had grown to be something more than a servant. She could count upon him to execute projects, from the consequences of which Clement shrank in fear, and although he was much vexated at the latter, where, indeed, her brother could scarcely be indu-duced to stay without him, she had retained him at Cliffe Castle by the force of her own reasons.

Much of this Mildred guessed, and on that account, as well as from the odious relation of domestic spy in which she stood to herself, was inclined to regard her new acquaintance with great disfavor. But there was one thing which much mitigated this feeling—Milly was fond of Lucy. With that strange waywardness that belongs to infancy, and which might at times almost lead a mother to imagine that her own child was a changeling, no sooner had the three arrived in the large chamber allotted to their use, than Milly stretched her little arms to her new nurse. Lucy stood with her hands by her side, not offering to take her from her sharp protector, and still the child struggled toward her, as though it would have said: "Now, let me go to her; now, do; for though I am well aware you are my mother, and the person to cling to in the presence of an ogress, such as she who has (I am delighted to see) just taken herself off, yet I do owe this singular-looking female an apology for my ap-parent desertion of her. Now, she sides her civil she has been to me while you have been away. I really must go to her." A flash of wounded pride immediately succeeded to gentle cheek; but she stepped forward, and gave her child to Lucy, saying:

"You have been very kind to her, I see; may God reward you for it."

For an instant the whole face of the gray woman was lit up with pleasure, as suddenly as a gleam which one turns the wrong way before one turns it out—then, as quickly, became as hard and wrinkled as a winter's road.

"Mrs. Clifford bade me treat the child with every care, and I shall do so, madam, coldly. "That was to be one of my chief duties."

"And what is expected of you else," inquired Mildred, her pride renewed with this reply, "besides this hired care?"

"I am to wait upon yourself, ma'am, returned the other, her face relaxing into a smile as she laughed and gurgled at her kisses, like the rich wine escaping from the flask, and babbling of the vintage that whereof it was the pride a score of years ago.

"That I waiting' means waiting, does it not? —means playing the spy upon me night and day?"

"Not hard words! Mrs. Clifford said, ma'am," replied the other, quietly. She spoke with a humility that disarmed her interlocutor. It could not have been the result of fear, because she should behave with such respect and gentleness. Besides, what could she know of the wrongs that had been done her? Mildred answered her: No! It was manifestly unfair to treat this woman, who was only doing her duty—and that with delicacy and kindness—as one responsible for the actions of her mistress.

"You are right, Lucy, and I am wrong," said Mildred. "I will not blame you for anything. If you know how cruelly I and mine have been treated, you would make allowance for me, I am sure."

Lucy bowed her head, but without speaking.

"I want, however, to know exactly the position in which I stand," she said to her new domestic companion. But am I to be also kept an indoor prisoner?"

"You may walk about the park, wherever you please, madam—that is, if I am with you; but not upon the other side of it, or into any part of it."

"Your orders are precise enough," said Mildred, bitterly. "Now, tell me—I have a foolish fancy for seeing Bibble Cave to-morrow—do they pre-clude it?"

"No, madam, they do not."

It was with Mildred as much as this answer came her face was turned away from her whom she addressed, for at those words her features changed from shrinking gloom to a flush of joy and of exultation. Nor was it at once that she could trust herself to yoke her rapturous thought with sober words.

"Lucy, I do not know if you have ever loved and lost, as I have done; but if so, when I tell you in that cave all the first vivifying influences of my fear from lips that now are dumb, you will understand the prayer I am about to make to you to permit it; I purchase your silence with a bribe of my own sex and friendless, you will indulge me in what is at present a harmless whim. I wish to see Bibble Cave alone. To me and to my child, that place is hallowed; you would not surely break in upon your sister at the altar-steps, and mar her prayers?"

The woman's face melted at this appeal like snow before the sun, then froze again as quickly as before.

"There is no outlet to the cave, save one," con-tinued Mildred; "and from that you can watch. I will exit your duty by remaining at the entrance; you will have us both secure."

Lucy shook her head. "Let us talk of something else, madam, if we must needs talk; but you cannot but be weary with your long night's travel, here is refreshment, and here is your child. Let me lie down upon your bed and sleep, as all at Cliffe are sleeping now."

"Not until you have promised what I ask," pleaded Mildred, passionately. "It is a small favor, perhaps, to you, but to me—to me—oh! you cannot guess what value I set upon it! Come, promise me, and I shall sleep in peace."

"No, madam, I cannot," said Lucy, gravely: "your very earnestness forbids me to say 'yes.' You will not be safe without my presence. From Bibble Cave there is no retreat besides the one of which you speak."

So finished was Mildred with her recent joy, so full did she grasp the woman's meaning, that with-standing her grave tone, for the heart, when hopeful, is as disinclined as childhood, self to contemplate the dreadful void of death. "What outlet, Lucy?" then when she did not answer: "Do you think that I would dream of death, and so escape?—having just found my child, would leave her motherless once more? Or drown her also? Assuredly her innocent soul would flee to heaven, while my own would suffer separation from her—incessant pang of hell—for ever? Do you think that, Lucy?"

"I did think so, dear madam; but I do not now. I see that I may promise what you ask with safety. Now, pray, eat a little, and then to bed."

"I cannot eat, good Lucy; I am too happy. This child is precious food to me, and also satisfies my soul with rest; but I will lay me down, that you may sleep. What does she call you, for I do not know this room?"

"The nearest is the one by which we entered, opening upon the little gallery that runs by Mrs. Clifford's chamber; and the upon the stairs that leads to the Clock Tower and the Western Postern."

"But is not that a third door beside your bed-head?"

"Yes, madam, and locked on the inside, as all the others are. It leads like the first."

"But not immediately?" said Mildred, with up-braiding. "Lucy, you have a room between."

"There is a bedroom, madam."

"And is it occupied? Who sleeps there?"

"My brother, William Caton."

In her new-found child, in the seeming kindness of her attendant, and in the budding of a secret hope that was based upon the answer, Mildred had almost forgotten that she was a prisoner; but at the hated name of that unscrupulous servant of Sir Carne, she arose, as once, as from a baseless dream, to the full consciousness of her unprotected state, and of the danger that in it were threatening her. "Give me the keys, and let me put them beneath my pillow, woman!" she cried, harshly. Then, dominated refusing to smoke, she lay down outside the bed-clothes, clutching her child to her bosom, while her sleepless eyes wandered from door to door.

Hour after hour went by in perfect silence, save for the singing of the birds, which had not as yet embraced silence, and for the inverted hubbub of Cliffe Hall, ere Lucy's deep-drawn breathing convinced Mildred that her jailer was asleep. Milly had long been overcome by the sweetest slumber. If she could only rise without awakening either, and reach the postern by one of her precious charges, while yet no human creature was astir!—once in the village, she would be safe enough, or what seemed safe by comparison with such a neighbor as that woman's brother. The postern had no lock, she knew, but only bar and chain, which she could unfasten. Softly she drew with key in hand, and keeping her eyes fixed upon Lucy, opened the second door without noise, then lifting up the sleeping child, set forth as silent as a ghost, and flitted down the stair.

Not five minutes had elapsed ere she returned, and, pale and trembling as before, stole into bed again, with beating heart. In her hand she held a slip of paper, which she had found, newly scratched-out, as she was still wet—upon the postern:

"In your life, do not open this door. You will escape, swele lady, but not by such means. I am watching over you. Having had faith in me thus far, it will reward you. YOUR WELL-WISHER AS BEFORE.

"Destroy this lest it cost me mine."

This Mildred read and re-read until every word was hers; then tore the paper into a thousand fragments, and placed it in her bosom. Like a charm, it stilled its throbbings; and presently the slumber, deep, drew down her eyelids with its viewless hand, and smoothed the care from offher troubled face.

CHAPTER XXX.—A BROKEN NIGHT.

NOT until the weary fall asleep and wake again after an interval of repose are they aware how fully conscious of the extremity of their past fatigue. Ere they give way to sleep, it seems to them that they are weary, but not exhausted; but when something arouses them after a few hours, then they know, by harsh evidence, how near their overtaxed limit strength have been to collapse. The muscles are stiff, the limbs powerless, the eyelids heavy as lead, the brain torpid, and only the pain and difficulty quickened to thought. Our whole being piteously, and yet drowsily, de-mands to be left alone in that autochamber alike of death and Life—Nature's "little longer." A little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more waking of a heavenly kind. When, under such circumstances, some importunate sound compels our reluctant attention, we are long before we can have it to the end. Then, and before we wake, it sometimes suggests dreams in which we seem to live a lifetime. Thus Mildred Clifford, dead to every sense save that of hearing, was roused in her arms, lay, dreamless as the dead, for hours, and then began to know that she was a prisoner in an enchanted castle, and that Love lay by wicked and malignant Grace, assisted by certain evil demons

Gideon Carr, to wit, and Clement and William Caton; but it was the last friends outside, and, in particular, Lieutenant Carey (always in complete armor and visored as to the face steed), who was the gauged (by himself) without the walls, and passing his time very agreeably, as it seemed, in sum-moning the castle to surrender. Unsupped, to surrender to his clemency. Nor was the garrison backward in the trumpeting business (without which, indeed, the art of romance, and especially warfare, is not), with neat finish and admirable execution. Your Mildred's prescient spirit signed to the strangers in the Bailey's bill to slaughter and trumpets, but still the brazen clamor continued until it fairly woke her. It was deep night, but through the open window she looked down on the court-yard, flushed a lurid glare.

"Fire!" was her next thought that dragged her by the strong arm of terror from the bed, and made her put aside the blind with hasty fingers, remembered by the flame. A strange sight met her gaze. The space was thronged with men and horses, shown by the light of flaming pine-torches. In the midst of the throng the clang of spurs and hoofs, filled the dark air with a weird, unnatural din; and, while she looked, the hounds came trot-ting from their kennel, and the crack of whips broke forth, and then, again, the sharp, short summons of the horn.

"Do not be alarmed, dear madam," cried Lucy, from her bed; "the Master is only setting forth to hunt. I suppose it seems strange enough to you, though we at Cliffe are getting quite used to turning night into day."

Strange, yes, strange indeed; for though the sight and sounds were in themselves not unfamiliar to Mildred, she scarcely recognized them under the changed circumstances. It almost seemed as though these persons were engaged in some un-hallowed rite, some impious attempt to turn God's gift of darkness from its proper use and pur-pose. In such a parody of the blessed morn, appeared something sacrilegious; so ill did the borrowed light depict the dawn; so diametrical the noises that strove in vain to wake the sleep-ing world. Of course she dumb that should have been alive with Nature's waking sounds, though what sounds were made, she echoed like one misunderstanding; so that the sympathy-stirrer of the scene itself were ceaseless, although islanded in a boundless silence; and though the torches flared and blazed, and every leaf and tree from the stone, a mighty belt of darkness encompassed all.

"And is this scene enacted every night?" asked Mildred, half to herself.

"Yes, madam, every night, far into spring, and long after the dawn of day. Sir Ralph is devoted to hunt. At first, the novelty of the thing attracted many folk; but now the Master hunts alone, save for his own people. Wet or dry is all the same to him, and even for frost he cares not. I am told that it is a generous sight to see his reckless riding—he that was once such a bookworm, and averse to all outdoor sports, until——"

"Alas! not until he has?" interrupted Mildred, pitifully, "who mounts the black horse—it is Raymond's own Black Diamond—at the Hall steps? Why, he moves like an old man; like a poor soul him into the saddle. How worn and thin he looks, and how deadly pale!"

"Ay, madam, and so he always looks, except, they say, when he is at the full gallop, ahead of all the field, and thinks himself alone; then some that have been near him say he cries out words of things, threats against this and that man, and even against his mistress—or breaks into mad songs; while ever his face becomes more to look exactly like what his great-great-grandsire, Guy, was—and his ancestor whose picture hangs in the gallery—him, you know, as leaped into Hell Gates; and, what seems stranger still, he takes a pleas-ure in black colors, and plays on a harp which had heaven knows whither. Three nights ago, he made Black Diamond take the stone wall into Poor Robin Hollow, where never man or horse dared go before, and galloped in and out among the chasms until William seized his bridle, and led him out by force."

"I thank your brother for that deed," cried Mildred, fervently, "if for naught else. All are moving off, and I will not see him. Milly, if he not there now, to see his master does not come to harm?"

"He serves Mrs. Clifford, madam, not Mr. Rupert, unless by her command, and perhaps she has ordered it, in her mercies."

"I forgot," returned Mildred, coldly. Is it her pleasure that we arise now like the rest of the household, or wait for morning?"

"You will please yourself, madam; but the child has always kept its usual hours since it has been in my charge, and if you do not find the loneliness—for the days are very long and lone here—"

"By no means," interrupted Mildred, bitterly; "the faces are few indeed at Cliffe whose absence I shall mourn. Nay, do not cry, my darling, my sweet Milly. I am not to be had again, all yet once more to forget our sorrows."

"The child is hungry, madam," observed Lucy, in the same deprecating tone which she had so often used before; "I have food for her in the cupboard, and please let me see and give it here." Not waiting for an answer, she got up, and striking a light—for the last glimmer of the torches of the revelers had burnt had to flare—passed away

—set milk and bread upon the table. "Will you not take something yourself, dear madam?" en-treated she, anxiously. "I have meal and wine here which are not poisoned. For your child's sake, you should not starve yourself."

"Are you afraid for me or for?" replied Mildred, searchingly. "If not a friend, I beseech you do not mock me with this lip-service. Stay—now tell me! Have you heard from—from——" she stayed and scanned her face—"are you my Well-wisher?"

Not a feature changed, not a ray of intelligence gave token that Mildred's words were spoken in the simplest sense she answered: "Yes, madam, indeed I am. What should not be so? Then suddenly perceiving the key, which Mildred in her agitation had left in the door leading to the gallery, she added with fervorous joy: "I must be praised that you are here alive! You have opened yonder door. It may be you are a sleep-walker, and have had the key; but, madam, the means of what you do. Be sure you never venture forth in daylight without me by your side. At earliest dawn, they and the blood-hound Satan—Red Rufus —who is so terrible to strangers."

"But I did not meet a blood-hound when I came hither."

"No, madam," answered Lucy, with hesitation, and hanging down her head; "it was loosed after-ward, and is always so to be; I heard my mis-tress say so."

"Then she is a prison, indeed, from which it is death to attempt to flee!" exclaimed Mildred, vehe-mently. "Has this lady whom you serve, then, the right to pronounce such a sentence?"

"Your Aunt Grace charged me, remember, not to leave you, madam, night or day, and with me you are secure. Let us talk no more about it now, for I myself took her to Rufus, and the huge hound licked her baby-hand in love, which having done, he is her friend forever."

"Thanks for that, Lucy," quoth Mildred, shud-dering still at the peril to which she had so nearly exposed herself. "I will not strive to free myself again. I will trust to God alone, and such help as He may send me; and I will trust in you, Lucy although you promise nothing, for I do think you wish me well."

Then Mildred ate a little, and presently dis-rebel, and once more laid her weary head upon the pillow, and slept so soundly, that she never heard the Night Hunt coming home across the echoing bridge, nor woke again till it was broad bright day.

CHAPTER XXXI.—THE HIDDEN TREASURE.

How unchanging are fair Nature's features! Time, which destroys all our poor beauty, does but heighten hers; while even the torch of War, which lays the homestead waste, and kindles into ruin all that Man has built, or form, or planted, leaves her scarcely scathed, and swift to repair damage, covering the bloodiest grave with green. Crime, and Wrong, and Woe affect her nothing. She supplies this life's stage with matchless scenes, let the actors play what they will, and smiles upon the direst tragedies as on the peacefullest domestic dramas. Never did spring morning dawn more brightly, or scatter into a more glorious day, than that which on the morrow bade in vain the inmates of Cliffe Hall rise from their shameful sleep, and smote Grace Clifford's pillowed but unrestful face with unaccustomed blushes. Eden itself, be sure, was not less fair after the Fall, than when it pleased the innocent eyes of our first parents; and Hilda towered as nobly in the sun, and flashed its hundred streams as bright and purely as though no curse, nor Cain, had ever vexed the house of Clifford.

"How will you love old Ribble, madam!" said Lucy Catar, as Mildred's eyes devoured the glorious hill as the three crossed the park.

"Ay, that I do," replied she, with eager passion; then added, less warmly, "look how the cloudberry dyes its very crown, as though the sunset lingered there? How beautiful it is!"

"Yes, madam, but very cruel. Its boggy fells have smothered poor folk before now—and others have spent weary years in jail for hunting on its slopes the wild red deer, before the Cliffords built them in."

"Do you remember that, Lucy?"

"Ay, that I do, madam; and when the tenants hereabouts—of whom my father once was one, before the evil days came on us—were all called "firestary," and sworn to clamish and destroy the vert and venison. It was an old-world place in those days, with old-world customs, such as you have never heard of. We were very simple folk. There was not such a thing as a timepiece in all Cliffe, save that in the Clock Tower of the Hall, and the young master's hunting-watch, which struck the hours. Poor Mr. Cyril, how well I mind his showing me that toy! As for glasses to tell the weather,—Yo mountain was the only glass we had.

If Ribble's head do wear a hood,
Be sure the day will not be good;

that was all we knew about the weather."

"But if the Cators are Cliffe people, how is it that they came to serve the Carrs?"

"Well," returned Lucy, hesitatingly, "they thought, I suppose, to better themselves. Besides, we didn't occupy the place long. It had been used, so, and for poor people it was not so pleasant to live hereabouts. Too many talk of law, but in those days what the Clifford said or did, nay, what his steward or bailiff even chose to say; if a man lied on either side he was sure to find out the park, some forester would take him by the collar, and beat him like a dog. Look there, my tender gentleman before me, listening to the beck—some wandering artist, I suppose, by his portfolio. Well, in the times I speak of—— But here Ralfe comes. Then no fear, madam, he always runs to us thus to bid "Good morning."

"Take the child," cried Mildred. "There is fear, I say. The dog is angry—furious."

"By Heaven, and so he is," exclaimed Lucy. "He is tracking some one, but not us. Alas, it is that wretched man. He will tear his own soul." Then, raising her voice to its full pitch, she cried: "Fie—for shame—peace and hide."

The person addressed was too far off to catch her words, although the sound attracted him. But he looked up and saw the dog, whose manifest errand it was not difficult to understand. With nose to ground, the mighty creature came on at headlong speed, now swerving this way, now the other, as the careless footsteps of the man had loitered devious, but never stopping for one instant.

"Flee, for your life!" screamed the two women with one voice; and the man turned and fled, but not up-stream. A little wading in the water, and then one of the numerous hollows in the waver-worn rock would have concealed him safely, at all events, until Lucy could have come up and called the beast; but instead of that, he climbed the eastern bank, and made for the boundary-wall of the deer-park. Up to that time, a hoarse deep bay had ever and anon broken like a knell upon the women's ears; but the instant the man's head showed himself, the dog was dumb, and ran straight as arrow from the bow.

A terrible cry escaped from Mildred's lips, and she covered her eyes with her hand.

"The man runs very fast," said Lucy, comfortingly: "it is possible that he may be able to reach the wall first, and that Rufus cannot leap it."

"But if he does!" moaned Mildred.

"Then Heaven have mercy on the poor doomed wretch!" answered Lucy, fervently. "He is not one of the Cliffe people—a stranger seeking the cave, perhaps without a guide—and the brute will—But he nears the wall. With what strength and speed the fear of death has winged him! He climbs it, and the dog springs after him, but falls and falls; and now he springs again. Alas, he has dragged himself to the very summit, and—— Oh my God!"

"What, what? I dare not look, Lucy. I charge you, tell me what has happened."

"A miracle!" cried Lucy, joyfully. "A moment ago, and I should have replied, "A murder." But the dog comes back again; he has not known the man, although I know him not, who, as I thought, knew everybody hereabouts. See, he comes this way, panting like a puppy-dog at a joyful, because he has found a friend, and one, too, who has authority to bid him come and go. I should not have deemed that any man was William, and the poor Master himself, could have had such power over Rufus."

With red tongue lolling low, wide jaws, and chest all flecked with foam, the huge beast thundered up: but his eyes were no longer flaming as at each link of the chain cast behind as before with brutish hate and lust of combat. But panting and lolling, he stood, and when he gave him Mildred's hand to kiss, in token of fealty.

"Now you are friends," quoth she; "you need never feed him more.—But who was that old acquaintance, Rufus, you have just parted from? I protest that I am somewhat curious to know him."

—But if—for you look very pale, madam—this scene has been too much for you, let us go home, and postpone your visit to the cave, which, indeed, you now may not find solitary. I cannot think what could have brought the man hither, unless he met us; for he is as safe as an unlocked as locked."

"Thank you, good Lucy, but I mean to as I have purposed," returned Mildred, resolutely; "I feel better now."

Nevertheless, she henceforth moved with trembling, and scarce could hold her little one, as she stooped to pluck the wild-flowers by the way—the early ones, at any rate, for the sun was now come to her as though it were not scentless), and the white sorrel, striped with blue; or strive to gather the golden saxifrage (which grows not here as to rob the butterfly's wings of their rich bloom), and babbled of all the glory of the spring in her unknown tongue. Anon, as she grew more used to herself, the snow-white bird-cherry dropped like a bridal garland; while in front, nature had spread a carpet of forget-me-not.

"How fitly these grow here!" said Mildred, with swimming eyes. "Will you wait for us here, Lucy, and gather them? Rufus, too, is taking rest from the heap which always lay within the antechamber—will lead me for two hours and more."

"I will wait, madam," returned the other. "I will trust your word not to rob yourself of God's good gift of life; you have too much of it, I know not, lady—how much of happiness it even yet may have in store for you."

Mildred's head drooped as she answered: "That is true, good Lucy; and you will never repent this day, I think."

She stooped down, for she was taller than the other, and kissed her cheek, which was like a shrivelled apple, that had, however, retained its ruddy hue. Then, having let the dog scent her hand and steel, she took her way with her astonished pair into the heart of Ribble, with expectation higher and higher at each step that she took that was the first to explore its hidden glories; for her was true tragedy of Earth or Fairyland that could compare with that she will now leave her in the cathedral chamber—thence from the darkness, with a joyful cry, to emerge into the light of sunshine—her Raymond, loved as only those are loved who have been lost, mourned as the unreturning dead alone are mourned, but found, and hers once more.

CHAPTER XXXII.—HIDDEN IN THE CAVE.

When Gideon Carr had looked down upon his victim from the Beacon Cliff, he saw that, as he thought, within a few seconds of death; and then, like a bloodhound, he had elsewhere an instant, he no longer beheld him clinging to the bare white wall, he naturally imagined that he had fallen down upon the rocks below, which would have been the case with nineteen out of twenty in strait like that of Raymond Clifford's; but years of wrestling with the wild fell-side had seen use, had made his sinews lithe and strong as steel; and running (where no horse could follow) at the top of his speed, he came to the hill-fox, had made his limbs as supple as any bird-catcher's, who gains his bread at peril of his neck; and being therefore, as it were, born a fearless rock, to cheer his hounds upon the otter, had given him an eye to see as his wits, on the slender rope, appears to totter, and to fall from the giddy crowd below him. And though as brave as any that drive breath, Raymond Clifford was not of the mortal foe. a touch with whose walking-stick or finger-tip must needs have been his instant death-blow.

He was by no means so exhausted, or at least so near to exhaustion, as he seemed; and, taking advantage of Gideon's momentary glance aside, he slid down along this almost perpendicular track as slowly as fast and headlong he had seemed to arrest the force of gravity. At last—that is, after such a second of time as might count against a year of ordinary life—he felt that he had stopped himself. Above him hung the frowning brow of the precipice, under which his sideways course had brought him, so that he was quite hidden from his enemy's sight. He had just possessed himself of that fact, when, from the depths below, came up the innumerable flocks of sea-fowl, as though to resent his intrusion into their almost aerial dominions. The touch of a passing wing would have set him falling, like another Lucifer, through space: their hideous and unctuous cries, as they flew, would have deafened, stunned the solid earth, shook his very soul within him, and closing his eyes, he waited for the moment, as though for the stroke of doom. Upon the sloping ledge on which he lay, never before had any creature bigger than a bird found footing; a few more inches, and it terminated, as Raymond found out afterward, without a rim, a crack, or nodosity—smooth, as though a carpenter's plane had levelled it. If he had known it then, even his iron nerves might have given way, or proved unequal to the task that lay before him. But he had but to hasten on, to climb up the slope to which he clung with foot and finger, he steadily turned them to the cliff alone, notwithstanding that there seemed once devil within him that prompted him to glance into the unfathomable deep, and so to perish. Then he perceived upon his left hand, and so close that he could touch it had he dared to move, a ledge broad enough, and long enough to contain his body, and which seemed to widen with its depth. To the mens sana, reasoning in its arm-chair, or, indeed, to the most experienced the adventurer of level ground, his getting into this hole would have seemed merely the exchange of a speedy death for one somewhat certain, although more lingering; but to Alva, stretched on that ledge of death, it appeared (so comparative is the estimate of life and death) the haven of security—a consummation scarcely to be hoped for, so intense was his desire to attain it. Yes, that five-foot orifice in the precipitous sandstone wall of white seemed to him like the gate of heaven.

Slowly as a small creeps, writhing as a worm crawls, and trailing his whole body along the ground, as one in pain, Raymond dragged himself into the golden sand, which, from its warm and muscle failed together, and he lay for a little like one dead—to all appearance as though he had fallen from the precipice, a fragment of the rock upon that pebbly beach. When consciousness returned, he found himself in an excavation of considerable size, the roof of which was sufficiently high to permit him to stand upright. From this dark recess the broad blue sky showed bright, and, as he gazed, the sea seemed to shine more joyously than Raymond had ever seen them; the very waves, across which had not as yet by any means subsided, had now a note of gratulation for his ear, and thankfully he throbbing brow refreshed with the cool breeze, they softly fanned, which had whispered to him but a few minutes back of Death. Then, with the sense of present safety, arose that of future peril. How was it possible that he should ever escape from such a prison? It was most unusual, he well knew, for any cave to have more than one issue—more than the rocks and inlets; and even if they did so, how was he to draw attention to himself in such a strange and unfrequented place of durance?

Moreover, if even he should make people aware of his being in such a predicament, by what means could he obtain food? Long before they could dig down to him through the solid rock he would have perished of hunger. He came, to his astonishment, or so to himself attempting to escape by the same road, his brain reeled at the very thought of it, and he shrank back into the cave. But the extent of the peril to which he had been so lately exposed, and, having seen it, his whole being revolted at the idea of encountering it over a second time in the like manner. What he had heard of the wondrous agility of the bird-catchers in these parts of the country was true, but as he well knew how the rock above him overhung his place of refuge, and felt, with a sinking of his whole heart, that not even those human spiders by was impossible.

Gideon, however, most occupied Raymond's thoughts, and racked him with fears lest he should to attract the attention of his fellow-creatures, and for his own sake, that Mildred and her child might be warned in time of the treacherous design of Gideon Carr. To foresee misfortune and to avert it—there, and to be powerless to avert it—there is no anguish bites like that. It is the very nightmare of reality—a curse that falls like shame upon the brave heart. Even now, How should he let her know her danger? Should he pencil it out a score of times upon the backs of the letters which happened to have with him, and trust them, like the Sibyl's leaves, to the winds, in hopes that one at least might flutter to their feet? Alas! the wind was now blowing from off-shore, and forebode even that promiseless project. Or should he enclose a letter in a bottle, and cast it into the sea, and pace to the beach below, on the chance of its attracting the attention of some passer-by? where neither pleasure nor business brought a human creature from one month's end to another! Sick at heart with his helplessness, in a place of such rich scenes, Raymond turned wearily away from the mocking sunshine, and sought the gloom of the interior of the cave.

As he did so, it struck him, for the first time, how strange it was that there were no sea-birds, nor any traces of them, in a place so much suited, adapted for their purposes than the precarious ledges all about him, which were swarming with eggs and callow young. What could have kept out such tenants from so convenient an abode? No accumulation of dust and kind could harbor in such a position, while eyrie of hawk or harbor in certainly was not. His third footstep struck against something soft, which he carried with some difficulty, though without resistance, to the light, when this riddle in natural history received its solution.

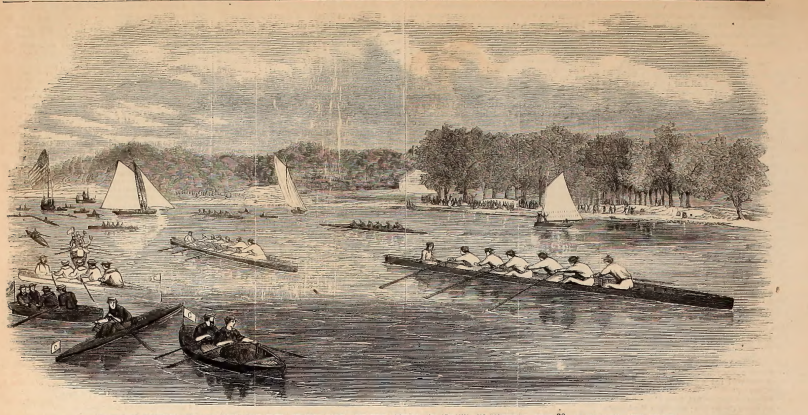
The reason why the guillemots avoided the cave was, because it was the occasional resort of man, or, at all events, bore tokens of his presence. What Raymond had dragged forth was a large bundle, neatly packed in sail-cloth, and containing a large quantity of foreign ince. Half-a-dozen similar packages were arranged in a semi-circle, at the back of the cavern, along with two or three bales of rich and handsome shawls. These costly articles were not very useful to Raymond in his present situation, except that, combining, they formed a by no means despicable bed. Their chief value to him lay in the fact that they needs must have a mortal owner, and, probably, some mechanical means of communicating with his property. It would have been a speculation of considerable importance to Raymond, had his own interests been alone at stake, as to when this communication took place, with respect to his bodily safety; but the needs and cries are at times much necessities of life as Brussels lace and Cashmere shawls, and his anxiety was not for his wife and child swallowed up all other cares. Again and again was he grave accustomed to the semi-darkness of his retreat, he minutely examined the walls and roof in search of some means of egress, by which he could make his way to the nearest Cottage, first to protect his dear ones, and then to bring help to himself, and was sold with. Disappointing, too, how far beneath the surface the cave was excavated, and how solid the rock. To observation any opening needs must be, made at the back of the Beacon Down, he was satisfied that nothing of the sort existed. Secrecy was evidently the main consideration with those who stored their goods in such a place as that in which Raymond now found himself; nor had he any doubt that he was in a hiding-place of smugglers, as they called themselves, persons in authority, among whom the law and the whole part of the community stigmatized as smugglers. It was the knowledge of this that made his Sunday friends were part-owners of these very goods, which, indeed, they had no right to belong to any one individual. This, however (as it seemed to Raymond at the moment), was a matter of secondary consequence. Shawls and lace might belong to the smugglers of the law or not; all that concerned him was, that they were clear of to be the owners might send to fetch them—although by what means he could not say so much as guess—the dreadful morrow, on which hung the fate of Mildred and her child.

But the curtain of night descended slowly upon the cavern, and the hours of which Raymond wore on without a sound, save the monotonous murmuring of the sea and the shrill scream of the herring-gull and kittiwake.

THE QUADRILATERAL.

As the attention of the world is now turned to Europe, about to be convulsed with the direst shock of contending armies, and especially to that part of it which is Italian dominion, we give a sketch of this interesting spot, together with the position of the noted fortresses which guard it.

In a late number we endeavored to explain the reasons why the statesman and people of Italy look to add the province of Venetia to the Italian kingdom, and why Austria, now in possession of that province, should desire to retain it. We have now to refer to the great obstacle lying in the way of any power which may attempt to wrest Venice from Austria by force of arms, and to the military requirement to be usually known as "The Quadrilateral."



The Quadrilateral is properly applied to any figure possessing four sides, and, consequently, four angles or corners. In this case it has reference to a figure of four sides, formed by the fortresses of Peschiera, of Venice, and which form the corners of a rough quadrilateral figure, as it were, the boundaries of which are Peschiera, Verona and Legnago; and these mutual positions in relation to each other will be understood by reference to the map, as soon as one reference to the accompanying neat.

Up to the year 1859, the fortress of Peschiera hardly was ceded to Piedmont, and it became a permanent fortress of the kingdom of Italy, the empire, on the one hand, and of Piedmont—or, as we should say, of Italy—on the other. The Adige, rising in the Alpine mountains are the natural boundaries of states, and in the Quadrilateral, the Adige flows from the lake of Mincio, which will be seen marked upon our map. The fortress of Peschiera, at the Lake of Garda source of the Po, the latter the greatest of Italian rivers. At the above-mentioned lake of Garda, which is the largest of the lakes, is the fortified town of Peschiera, and twenty-two miles to the southward, as it covers the left bank of Mantua, round which the Mincio forms a lake, and which is the second fortress of the line.

The line of the Mincio between Peschiera and Mantua is the weakest part of the Quadrilateral. The second line is bounded by Verona on the north and Legnago on the south, the distance between these towns is 25 miles, the distance of twenty-three miles. On the south the river Adige flows from the Austrian territory from the north of the Italian kingdom.

Verona, the most important element in the strength of the Quadrilateral, as their passage alone would prevent a hostile army advancing to the line of the Mincio in force. But the great strength of the position is, of course, to be found in the fortresses, and to be powerful forces which mutually support each other. They are so far apart that the attacking army in attempting to lay separate sieges would have to be undertaken, if the position was properly defended, by a force which, at the same time, so near together, that, if one were attacked, the garrison could forward from the other troops for its assistance. Again, no enemy could attempt to advance on Venice, or to threaten the line of the Adige, unless he were in force sufficiently numbered the Quadrilateral; for such a movement would be a flank movement, and would be in the teeth of the troops which would be against the most elementary principles of warfare. Peschiera, Verona and Legnago are the fortresses of the Quadrilateral are, therefore, not only strong of themselves, but they are also a strong defense for the Austrian empire; and this is why Austria desires to retain the Quadrilateral, and why the position of Italy would then have been pursued to the completion of the Austrian line of fortresses, and would have placed her own dominions, while its sister province, Lombardy, was free.

Large sums have been expended by Austria upon the works of the four fortresses, and every thing that art can suggest for their care has been taken to strengthen them in every possible way. Verona is the largest town in the Quadrilateral, and the garrison is capable of accommodating twenty thousand men. Peschiera and Legnago are of less interest from their size than the Quadrilateral. The population of the former is about three thousand, and of the latter, six thousand.

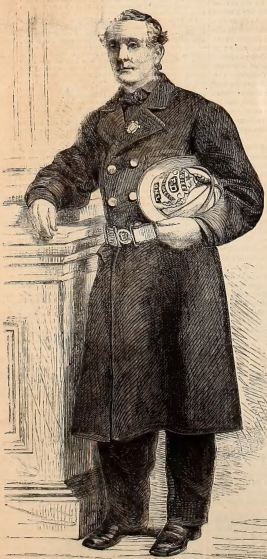
BOAT RACE BETWEEN THE ATALANTA BOAT CLUB, OF NEW YORK, AND THE MUTUAL, OF ALBANY, ON SATURDAY, JUNE 30, AT HOBOKEN, NEW JERSEY.

BOAT RACE OFF HOBOKEN.

THE advocates of physical culture must be highly gratified with the many evidences that their views are so generally received with favor and their principles so constantly put in practice. There is now no lack of opportunity for the development of skill, agility and muscular powers, and we are rapidly making out-door sports our most popular entertainment.

Men of all classes are turning their attention in this direction, and the various clubs that make athletic exercises a speciality are composed of some of our best citizens.

This fact insures their respectability and renders their public exhibitions both popular and attractive. On this page we give a sketch of a spirited rowing match between the Atalanta Club of this city and the Mutual, of Albany or the supremacy in the art of sculling, and as a test of skill in handling the oar, which took place on the Hudson river, opposite Hoboken, on the 30th of June. The Atalanta is composed of amateurs, and is regarded as the most proficient club in this vicinity.



The Atalanta Club provided a commodious barge for the accommodation of their numerous friends, also a band, whose sweet strains added greatly to the attractions of the occasion.

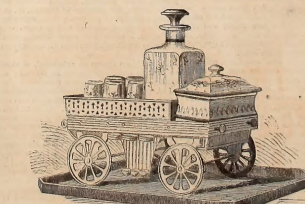
On both sides of the river the banks and piers were lined with crowds of anxious spectators, eager to watch the contest, while the course was dotted with numbers of small craft of every description. Several clubs of the city likewise were present, and the Columbia had their splendid six-oar shell in position, as if awaiting a challenge to test their prowess.

The two competing boats were six-oar outriggers, manned by picked crews from each club. The race commenced shortly after five o'clock, the Mutuals having slightly the start, and going off with a short, quick stroke, while the Atalantas took a longer, steady pull, which in the end proved successful. A slight breeze prevailed, and as the boats dashed along amid the cheers and salutations from the spectators on the river and shores, the scene became most exciting.

The stake-boat at the upper terminus of the race-course was stationed off Forty-fourth street, on the Hoboken side, the entire distance being three miles, going and returning. A signal gun announced the rounding of the stake-boat, which was accomplished by the Atalanta about two boats' length in advance of her opponent.

This advantage was continued on the return, and the Atalanta came in five lengths ahead, having performed the quickest time on record for amateur clubs —three miles in eighteen minutes and forty-three seconds. Fifteen seconds later the Ivanhoe rounded, and received, together with the winning boat, the deserved applause of all who witnessed the really exciting and successful trial of amateur skill and muscle. They then returned to New York, all parties well satisfied with the result. In the evening the members of the Mutual were entertained by the Atlantas with a dinner, which was given in their honor at the Park Hotel, Hoboken.

DAVID M. LYLE, ESQ., CHIEF ENGINEER OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT OF PHILADELPHIA, PA.



COFFEE URN PRESENTED TO JEFF. DAVIS, BY HIS FRIENDS IN FRANCE.

COFFEE URN AND TENDER PRESENTED TO JEFF. DAVIS.

WHILE the Confederacy gave promise of some thing like permanence, the friends of its President, in France, presented to him a unique and costly coffee urn, an illustration of which we give in this paper. It is composed of china, and is made in the form of a locomotive engine and tender. The wheels are heavily gilt, and appear like solid metal. In front of the engine is the inscription, "Confederate States of America," surrounding the different flags, and the motto: "Aide-toi, Dieu t'aidera." A lamp is placed beneath, to heat the water, which passes through the smoke-stack, containing the coffee, and, after being filtered, is drawn off in the usual manner. The engineer is represented by a small figure holding a bell. The entire urn is most beautifully finished, and adorned in the highest style of modern art. The tender is also made of china, and contains a decanter, with glasses and sugar-bowl. Beneath the bowl is a music-box, and under the decanter a receptacle for cigars. The various parts of the tender are gilt, to correspond with the urn.

Previous to the evacuation of Richmond, many articles in the Presidential mansion, that could not readily be packed and carried away, were disposed of at auction, and among them was this beautiful urn. It attracted the attention of a gentleman of taste, who became its purchaser, and, some time afterward, presented it to President Johnson, in whose library it now stands, as an ornament and not an article of use. As a beautiful work of skill it will always be admired, while its peculiar history invests it with a special interest.

TENDER TO THE COFFEE URN PRESENTED TO JEFF. DAVIS.

THE DOG CHUM.

THIS dog belongs to a Mr. Dodnell, Baysworth, England. Every morning he takes the bell off the stand by the kitchen door, and carrying the thong of leather to which it is hung in his mouth, calls up the workmen, by ringing it at their bed-room doors. He possesses a great variety of amusing and useful accomplishments. Put the most dainty and tempting morsel under Chum's nose, and say, as he looks at it, the word, "Mine!" and he will guard it, but neither eat it himself nor allow any one to touch it but his master or the one who put it in his charge; but if the word, "Yours" is uttered, then Chum instantly shows that he understands the morsel belongs to him.

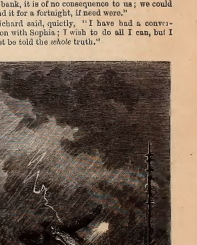
Chum is very playful, and has a habit of jumping up and taking off his master's or the apprentices' caps in sport, but he knows both when to begin and when to end his sport; not before and not after as he allowed does he thus frolic. He can be both merry and wise, a combination that many so-called rational creatures often fail to attain. Chum is so accustomed to see the family assemble to the reading of the Scriptures, that at the opening of the Bible he knows his place, under a chair in the corner, and there he stays, perfectly still, during family worship. But his greatest merit, perhaps, consists in his being a messenger. His master has another house and shop a little distance up the street. Chum goes all the messages between the two shops. He carries a basket in his mouth—a little one when it is only a letter or a small parcel that he has to take; a large basket when he takes packages or the dinner of the young person who serves in the upper shop. If his master or mistress, on sending him, says, "Make haste back!" he understands and obeys the order. They know at the other shop that he must not stay, for he shows signs of impatience and haste in depositing his burden.

Chum's education has been conducted on the principle of love. The little treat and the word of encouragement, combined with patience and firmness, have trained him, and as no harshness has ever developed his angry feelings, he is full of affection. Children especially he delights in. On the Sunday and Infant-School festivals Chum is looked for with the greatest interest, and he enters into all the sports, giving and receiving pleasure as merrily as any one. It certainly would not be safe for any one to attempt to take Chum's basket or parcel away from him when he is going his messages. He can growl and show a terrible array of white teeth, and eyes that are in a moment like two flames. So, while in trust, he is not meddled with, to the injury of the property he carries. But he knows that he must not show ill-temper, and of this an evidence was lately given.

He had been very active, both at his messages and in carrying things in the house, and was lying down comfortably before the fire, at his master's feet. His mistress passed him, and the skirt of her dress touched his face; he lifted up his head impatiently, and gave a low growl, something like a sharp threat. "Oh, Chum, you unkind dog, to behave so to me!" said his mistress. Chum reared himself instantly, and looked around the room as if confused. "Bad dog!" said his master, gravely. Then, sitting on his haunches, Chum raised one of his fore-paws and rested it on his master's knee, while he dropped his head and care nearly to the ground. If ever contrition was expressed by a dumb creature, Chum showed it then, while his paw on his master's knee was like a hand uplifted to ask pardon. I thought I had seen all the changes of feeling that an intelligent child might experience, who had done wrong for first shame, then sorrow, then entreaty. Of course Chum was forgiven, and then, having thoroughly fondled his master and mistress, he stretched himself comfortably, and slept—as wise and honest a dog as any in England.

STREET BEGGAR IN CARACAS, VENEZUELA.

THE DOG CHUM ARousing THE WORKMEN.



STREET BEGGARS IN CARACAS.

While street-begging is often a great nuisance in many of our cities, it is not so thoroughly systematized and connected with so many peculiar adjuncts as in some other parts of the world. Here it is exotic, rather than indigenous; our fast notions do not encourage mendicancy, and when every one, rightly disposed, can find something to do, beggars have few opportunities of success. A beggar mounted would be an impossibility in the United States, but in South America such a spectacle is quite common.

Our illustration shows one of these peripatetic philosophers in Caracas. When we remember that a horse or a mule may be had for the catching, our surprise at the apparent indolence and impudence of the alms-seeker will give way to amusement at his ludicrous appearance. He, however, piles his calling assiduously, and spends his days as happily as many whose circumstances are more in accordance with proper views of civilization and refinement.

SINGULAR DEATH BY LIGHTNING.

The number of persons who fall victims to the fearful thunderbolt is comparatively very small, and we have less to fear from the sublime contests of the elements than from many apparently insignificant forces. Since the introduction of the telegraph, some singular occurrences have proved the terrible power of an agent, that, generally so obedient to man, sometimes becomes his master and enemy. Such an incident is shown in our illustration, and took place recently in Illinois. A Mr. Whitton, a railroad engineer, making one of his accustomed trips, had occasion to stop his train, in consequence of the telegraph line being thrown down by a storm. He was in the act of lifting the wire from the track, when a flash of lightning struck the line at that point, tearing it into small pieces, and instantly killing Mr. Whitton. The men who saw the accident state that they observed a ball of fire, as large as a man's fist, issue from Whitton's breast. He was buried on the spot where he was killed. The operator states that this was the most terrific storm of lightning he ever witnessed.

SINGULAR DEATH BY LIGHTNING.

DAVID M. LYLE,
Chief Engineer Philadelphia Fire Department.

Mr. Lyle was born in Philadelphia in the year 1818. After arriving at proper age he was apprenticed to the trade of house-painting, at which he worked until 1861. He then received from the Collector of the Port of Philadelphia an appointment in the Custom House, where he remained for about four years, when he retired, and now devotes his whole attention to the duties of Chief Engineer of the Fire Department.

In the year 1838, he became a member of the Fairmount Fire Company, and so continues until the present time. He was an engineer (or director) of that company for about nineteen consecutive years, and also a member of the "Investigating Committee" for about the same period. He has represented his company as a "Delegate to the Fire Association" for the past seventeen years, and still holds that position.

He was also an Assistant Engineer of the Fire Department for two years, and has held the present position of Chief Engineer for three consecutive terms, making in the aggregate eight years.

In his own company (the Fairmount), he has held all minor and important positions since his election as a member thereof, being, as above stated, for the space of twenty-eight years.

In 1846 he was placed upon the Honorary (or Exempt) roll of the Fairmount, and has also been elected a life member of many of the companies throughout the United States.

During the rebellion, the Philadelphia Fire Department took charge of the removal of all sick and wounded soldiers and sailors arriving in the city. These numbered about 180,000. The department placed this duty under Mr. Lyle's superintendence, and during the entire time it was faithfully performed both by the Department and its Chief. In all the relations of life Mr. Lyle commands the respect of his fellow-citizens, and the admiration of those officials with whom he is brought in contact.

The Run on the Bank.

In the town of A——, one hundred and fifty miles from New York, Mr. Sydney was the banker, as his father and his grandfather had been before him—all of them honorable men. His daughter was engaged to Richard Winton, the highest merchant of the place, but though twenty years older than Miss Sydney, her father made it a condition of his consent that Mr. Winton should realize thirty-five thousand dollars in addition to the fifteen thousand dollars he gave her as a marriage portion, so as to make up fifty thousand dollars to be secured in the marriage settlement.

Of this sum Mr. Winton had already paid in thirty-three thousand dollars to Mr. Sydney's bank, and after a round of visits to various agents, from whom he had received sums due to him very nearly amounting to the remaining two thousand dollars, he rode up one afternoon to Mr. Sydney's counting-house, to pay it into his account.

It was market-day in the country town, and the thoroughfare appeared to be unusually crowded. As he dismounted from his horse a gossiping acquaintance accosted his arm.

"Have you heard the news? They are gone stark, staring mad in New York. Some of the stock-jobbers whom they call bears (that is, fellows who seek to stamp down the prices of everything) are driving down all before them. Sydney's cashier has taken advantage of the disturbance to bolt, with all the cash he could lay hands on. There is a run on the bank, and it is thought impossible that Sydney can stand."

Richard Winton winced his informant a hasty good-morning, and hurried away to Mr. Sydney's private house. He saw his betrothed. She bothered to meet him, and gave her hand. It was cold and clammy in his clasp.

"Tell me, Sophie, the simple facts. How much is gone, and how far may I rely on the statements I shall hear at the bank? You know how earnestly I wish to support your father, but I must not sacrifice you. Only let me know the truth, for I cannot act in uncertainty."

"You must be governed by your own judgment Richard. The reports are exaggerated grossly; but more than enough is true. My brother William is gone to New York to fetch supplies. If he return with them in time for banking hours to-morrow, and if you do not draw out, all is safe. Otherwise, the doors must close, and my poor father—you know his feelings—he is frantic already at the disgrace of having the bank run upon; what would he be, then, if it stopped?"

"Is William certain to get the supplies?"

"We hope—we believe so; but go and judge for yourself. Do not save us at your own expense!"

"My love, the question is how to save you—whether by seeking to prop up the bank, or by snatching from the scramble the means of providing home and comfort for you and yours afterward." He kissed her forehead with solemnity and affection, then hastened from the room to communicate with her father.

It was with some difficulty that he gained admission to the private room of the bank, where Mr. Sydney was evidently embarrassed how to receive him.

"Let me speak with you in private for a moment," said Richard.

"Surely, surely, my dear sir;" and, as he led the way, "this senseless panic is indeed an annoying business—but a mere annoyance. As for the bank, it is of no consequence to us; we could stand it for a fortnight, if need were."

Richard said, quietly, "I have had a conversation with Sophie; I wish to do all I can, but I must be told the whole truth."

his master with a note. He glanced over the writing, and threw it to Richard in a rage.

"Look at that from Jones Wimperly, the greedy shark! So he must come, too—he that I have helped times after times with hundreds upon hundreds, when his bond was worth no more than his word. He, forsooth, must regret to have 'a particular occasion for his uncle's legacy now in my hands!' I tell you what, Richard Winton, make your election, and don't spend your cool reason upon a frantic man. Do you desire to draw out the whole or any part of your property intrusted to me? It lies between you and this Wimperley. Both demands cannot be met; and if one must be preferred, I would rather it were yours. Speak, I say, sir."

"And I say, speak, sir," replied Richard, in a voice of calm authority. "Answer me two questions rationally, and then I will tell you my decision. What reason have you to suppose that your New York bankers will send you the required remittances back by William?"

"My reason for supposing that they will is, that he carried with him ample securities to justify them in doing so without risk."

"And you solemnly assure me that if he does so return with the supply of cash you have asked for, you can hold on?"

"Mr. Winton, forgive my emotion. I care little about lessening my private property or even my children's; but I pledge myself you shall suffer no ultimate loss. On the faith of an honest, though most wretched man, you shall not—all I want is time."

"Then send Wimperley his money; and let us both go together into the cash office and pay away with both hands to all applicants. Just send a messenger up with one line that I am writing to Sophia, and fill me out a bumper of that Madeira; then to our desks."

The news spread rapidly that Mr. Richard Winton, after he had been closeted with Mr. Sydney, and had examined into his affairs, had satisfied himself that all was safe, and was helping the bank to his uttermost. This tended powerfully to allay the public panic, which was, in truth, one of unreasoning distrust. The doors of the bank were kept open an hour beyond the usual time, in the full confidence that the night mail would bring William and ample supplies for the demands of the morrow. Alas! the mail arrived, but no William nor any tidings—no parcel, no letter.

Mr. Sydney relapsed into all the agonies of irritation and despair. It was only by threatening to withdraw his promise of the afternoon that Richard Winton persuaded him to take an opiate and go to bed. Then Richard Winton proceeded to take measures for the morrow. His mind rose to the occasion which the weaker mind sank under. Had the request for temporary assistance, coupled with the offer of securities, been addressed in the first instance to the leading men in the neighborhood, the money might have been raised at once, and much painful anxiety been spared. But Mr. Sydney's selfish pride could not brook such a request to men whom he was in the habit of meeting on more than equal terms. He would rather apply to strangers at a distance, and so he sent his son to New York.

When he rose from his bed the next morning, after the strange, unhealthy slumber caused by the sleeping draught, he seemed scarcely conscious even when awake. He signed his name and looked and spoke more like a moving automaton than a living man. The demands upon the bank gradually grew less both in the number and amount, but still they did not cease altogether, and still William Sydney returned not. The alarm as to what could cause this delay was becoming utterly intolerable, and Richard Winton was in the act of proposing to Mr. Sydney that he himself should hurry off to New York and see what had become of William, when a sudden trampling sound was heard at a distance. As it grew nearer, loud huzzas and the noise of carriage-wheels filled all in the bank with excitement. Rushing to the door, they saw a carriage draw up, which the crowd was greeting with hearty shouts. Opening the door from the inside, and without waiting for the steps to be let down, the first person who sprung out was William Sydney, looking like one risen from the dead. The next who got out of the carriage was a stranger, with pistols in his hands, but looking calm and self-possessed. The third, for whom help was needed, as he was heavily ironed, was the delinquent cashier. The remaining and heaviest part of the contents of the carriage were two strong iron-bound bullion chests.

"Am I in time?" asked William Sydney, in a sepulchral voice.

"You are in time?" answered Richard Winton, "but what in the name of heaven detained you?"

"At the moment I was starting back with the supplies, I got a clue to the whereabouts of that wretched runaway. He was on shipboard, and if not caught at once, must have escaped. I got a search-warrant, and accompanied by this officer, I tracked him out and brought him off, with most of his booty, too. We have come along like fury since we secured him—neither eating, drinking, sleeping, nor scarcely speaking—and now I should like to go to bed till Christmas. Take care of Mr. Higson"—(that was the police-officer)—"he has done his duty like a man. That's all I have to say."

THE Scientific American says: "The unpleasant odor produced by perspiration is frequently the source of vexation to persons who are subject to it. Nothing is simpler than to remove this odor much more effectually than by the application of such onguents and perfumes as are in use. It is only necessary to procure some of the compound spirits of ammonia and place about two tablespoonfuls in a basin of water. Washing the face, hands and arms with this, leaves the skin as clean, sweet and fresh as one could wish. The wash is perfectly harmless and very cheap. It is commended on the authority of an experienced physician.

A SONG OF SUMMER.

WITH MUCH RHYME AND MORE REASON.

BY C. D. GARDETTE.

You Bards may sing of "jocund spring;"
Of "dewy mead," and "tuneful choir;"
Or hymn the praise of "summer days:"
My muse strikes quite a different lyre.

A fig "for meads besprent with beads
Of dew!" You'll find, when you are old, sirs,
As I, that naught, forsooth, is brought
From such damp rambles, save a cold, sirs.

Talk as you please of "murmuring bees:"
Their honey always makes me sick, sirs!
And why not sing about their sting?
Perhaps you never felt its prick, sirs?

Then there's the hospitable (!) wasp
(Whose house, if you approach, you'll mourn it;
Although 'tis o'er your very door!)
And his sharp relative, the hornet!

Recline at ease beneath the trees;
Draw forth your novel, and attack its Absorbing plot—by Jove! the spot
Is on a nest of "yellow jackets!"

Climb o'er a stile—intent the while
On some sweet sylvan meditation,
And—hark! a roar!—and straight before
You charges down some bull of Bashan!

From woods and brakes crawl sudden snakes:
Burrs clutch you: in your flesh thorns rankle:
You tread on toads; and in the roads
The choking dust is over ankle.

But "star-lit eve brings soft reprieve."
Oh! does it? Faith, a different tale you
'll tell, when, as you light your gas,
A myriad insect foes assail you!

Musquitoes, gnats, claw-winged bats,
Huge beetles, floundering, buzzing, turning,
In eyes, mouth, hair; and all the air
Foul with the smell of bugdom burning!

Nay, when you've fled at length to bed,
Of "balmy sleep" you're far from certain;
For, ten to one, some long-bill'd dun
Sneaks under your musquito curtain!

Besides, the heat—but why repeat
The endless trials of the season!
I simply wrote to make a note,
With much of rhyme, yet more of reason!

A NEW ENTERPRISE.

Zoological Garden in New York—Capital $2,000,000—A Free Museum.

THE want of an extensive Zoological Garden in America has long been felt. Several efforts to establish one have been made from time to time, and a few years since the New York Legislature granted a charter and allotted a space in Central Park for that purpose; but the gentlemen who had the subject in hand were inexperienced in this line of business, and they found, upon investigation, that the great expense attending the purchase and maintenance of a complete collection of living animals, placed in a well-arranged Zoological Garden, always far exceeds the receipts. Hence, while as in France and Italy, these institutions are the property of their respective Governments, and are kept up at a large annual outlay, similar establishments in London, Amsterdam, Vienna, etc., are owned and supported by associations of wealthy gentlemen, who contribute large sums annually from their private funds, in addition to all moneys received from visitors. These considerations have hitherto deterred responsible parties from embarking in such a hazardous and expensive enterprise.

Some years since Mr. Barnum visited all of these institutions abroad, and investigated all the details of their management, original cost and daily expenses, and finding that none of them were self-supporting, he announced his intention, at a future day, to establish a Zoological Garden in connection with a Museum, believing that a constant succession of novelties which he could introduce into the latter department would attract such multitudes of visitors as would make the whole a source of pecuniary profit, especially as he proposed duplicating his living animals, and would thus be enabled, during eight months in a year, to dispatch a Menagerie through the country, as he had already done, at a profit.

The burning of the American Museum in July last afforded a good opportunity for Mr. Barnum to inaugurate his long cherished enterprise. His increasing years, although as yet he is but fifty-five, and more particularly the wealth accumulated by his successful career as a caterer for public amusement, caused him for a moment to pause and weigh the advantages of a life of ease and retirement. Professional bias, and probably a degree of pride in founding an establishment which would reflect honor on a career which had been so creditably pursued for nearly a third of a century, soon, however, led him to determine a course of action. Before the bricks of his burning Museum were cold, he sold his land lease of the premises for $200,000 cash, and forthwith started a new Museum farther up Broadway. His adaptation to the business, coupled with a lavish outlay, and his extensive and valuable business connections, at home and abroad, enabled him to collect a larger number of interesting curiosities than it would seem possible to get together in so short a space of time. But from the beginning of his new enterprise, Mr. Barnum's whole study has been how best to arrange a permanent and ever-increasing Zoological Garden in connection with his Museum. The public will be glad to learn that this he has at last satisfactorily and successfully accomplished.

A combination has been formed by uniting Barnum's Museum and the famous Van Amburgh's Menagerie, which is owned and managed by experienced showmen of wealth, and which at present consists of two immense traveling zoological collections, containing specimens of nearly every living bird and animal that has ever been exhibited. A charter for an association, with a capital of two millions of dollars, has been obtained from the Connecticut Legislature, and thirty acres of land have been purchased in the vicinity of Bridgeport, Connecticut, on which are being erected suitable buildings and glass edifices for breeding and acclimating rare animals, birds, &c., and for training some of them for public performances. The present stockholders of this colossal association are all men of great practical experience as public caterers, and all personally engaged in conducting the public exhibitions. In fact, it is determined that no position in connection with this establishment, involving responsibility or sound judgment, shall be filled by any person who is not a man of experience in the business and of good habits, this being considered the best plan to secure efficacy in every department. This combination is to be known as the "Barnum and Van Amburgh Museum and Menagerie Company," and these two establishments will form the nucleii about which is to be reared the most comprehensive place of amusement and instruction which has ever existed on this continent.

At a future day an entire square or more, higher up town, will be required for this mammoth show. Until such an establishment is reared, a new building, of forty by two hundred feet, adjoining the present Museum, has been secured. In the immense series of halls now open, and to be immediately erected, almost every rare and curious thing, from all parts of the globe, will be gathered. Living animals from every region and clime will be confined in cages proper for their exhibition; and besides all these, a feature in public amusement never attempted by any one but by Mr. Barnum, will be introduced, in the shape of whales, sea-cows, walrus, seals and the many wonderful creatures of the deep, plashing in their native element, and swimming about in gigantic aquariums. Preserved specimens in every branch of natural history, and scientific curiosities of every description, will be provided, and will not only yield pleasure to the merely curious, but will also render substantial gratification to the student. Relics of "ye olden time," to remind us of the times, manners and customs of our ancestors, and curious things to give us an idea of the habits and methods of life of foreign nations and savage tribes, will also be collected, and cannot fail to be interesting as well to the pleasure-seeker as to the antiquary and philanthropist.

Living human phenomena, giants, dwarfs, Albinos, specimens of Indian tribes, etc., will, as of yore, ring the endless changes which always insure something new and interesting at each visit to the Museum, even if it is made every week day in the year.

Equestrian and acrobatic entertainments, pantomimes, spectacle, panoramic, scenic and optical novelties, a gallery of paintings, music and the moral drama, will be important features in the new institution, while occasional dog-shows, bird-shows and poultry-shows, will vary the attractions to please all tastes. We are glad to add that the proprietors will keep the prices down to those hitherto charged for admission to the Museum.

A noble feature in the establishment, and one which Mr. Barnum prides himself upon as of vast and growing service to this and future generations, is, that an interesting portion of this immense concern is to be thrown open to the public, to be enjoyed, under proper restrictions for the preservation of order, like the Louvre, in Paris, the British Museum, in London, and some other Governmental Museums abroad, free of any charge for admission. Many gifts of curiosities from American citizens and others abroad have been received, and it is probable that, when this feature is generally known, many more will be found to gravitate toward the great collection, so that ere long we may find, among hosts of lesser curiosities presented, contributions of paintings, sculpture, armor, and other valuable donations, which may even rival the famous "Elgin Marbles" in interest. All these are to be properly labeled and catalogued, with the names of donors, and collected into a free department, which is to be maintained by the Company, at their own expense, and by the profits arising from the other departments. Contributions to this department have been commended by many gentlemen of distinction; and it is believed that not only ambassadors, consuls and commercial agents, as well as American ladies and gentlemen traveling abroad, will gladly send some interesting contributions to this free National Museum, but that foreigners and their Governmental Museums will furnish some memento, so that Kings, Queens, and, perhaps, the Pope, will be in some manner represented among the articles of interest therein deposited for public gratification. The Museum was the only place of amusement which the Prince of Wales visited in America, and it is not unlikely that his Royal Highness will take pleasure in sending a tangible evidence of his remembrance of that visit.

It is quite possible that, in the course of years, the whole collection of animal curiosities will be thrown open free, and kept up at the expense of this Company.

Mr. Barnum sails for Europe on the 18th of July, to secure curiosities and to confer with agents, who have been at work for months in procuring the materiel for this enterprise, some of whom have already traversed large portions of Africa and Asia in search of rare animals and other novelties.

Among his latest purchases is the entire collection of the late Gordon Cumming, the great lion-slayer, consisting of the heads, horns, tusks, skins, etc., of African animals slain by this intrepid hunter, and made historic by his reckless daring and unerring rifle. This enormous collection was bought at a public sale in London, at a cost to the Museum of four thousand pounds.

THE MIRACLE OF BRACCIANO.

WHENEVER ancient Rome was in peril, and the patricians wished to arouse the masses to the full sense of the impending danger, a miracle was wont to occur. An ox spoke, or wondrous apparitions appeared, or mysterious clangor broke the silence of night, and an awe fell upon the commonalty highly conducive to obedience or self-sacrifice. The priests, who have preserved so many of the traditions of the Old World, who never, for example, to this day forget that Rome is the only historic centre of a sovereignty based on a universal instead of a national idea; the one spot whose relation with Warsaw or New York is imaginatively as complete as with Florence, seem to have retained this weapon of statecraft also. They have just performed a miracle, and an exceedingly effective one, which has awed the lower populace of Rome, and stirred up Voltairian Frenchmen to careful investigation—a double effect, which enables us to see for once clearly how ecclesiastical miracles are got up.

A brigand of a peculiarly atrocious character, known to have been guilty of repeated murders and horrible acts of cruelty, fell recently into the hands of the Papal authorities. Although very unwilling to inflict capital punishment, the authorities thought this man's crimes too great for endurance, and he was sentenced to decapitation at Bracciano, a little town about twenty-six miles from Rome. The guillotine was erected, and on the 23d of May the criminal was led to it and bound down in the regular way, between two upright slides, in which the heavy knife runs. The instrument was set in motion and the knife began to descend, when the sides suddenly slipped together into the form of a V, so as to prevent the descent of the knife on the throat, which lay protected by the converging beams. The machine was so disarranged that hours must elapse before it was again in working order, and the crowd, at once superstitious and hostile to the law, clamored for a reprieve. The Pope, on hearing of the occurrence, of course accepted it as a Providence, and ordered the wretched man to be set free, a mercy received by the brigand with the sneering comment, "Oh, these confounded priests are going to make a miracle!" Immediately after Rome was inundated with a printed report of the occurrence, which is now before us, and which attributes the entire series of incidents to the personal interposition of the Blessed Virgin. This narrative is not the work of an ecclesiastical sensation-monger, but is hawked publicly about Rome, where nothing, not even a card of invitation, can be printed without the previous imprimatur of the Grand Inquisitor, and its circulation has been openly promoted by the officials.

The document contains the account which the powers who preside in Rome wish to disseminate amongst the population, and actually circulate by means that, according to the law of Rome, are obtainable only through their agency and by their favor. Upon this head there is not the possibility of raising a doubt. The shape and language of the publication are equally characteristic and unambiguous. It forms a broadside, with a coarse woodcut of the Virgin at the top. We there read how the criminal received the announcement of the fatal hour in meditative silence, his sole ejaculatio having been a sentimental regret that his executio should contaminate the virgin purity of the month of May, consecrated to the service of the Madonna. On leaving the prison, we are told that, as he passed an image of the Virgin, the culprit instinctively looked up to it with fervor, saying, in a half-suppressed tone, "Ah, were I not really to die thus, I know that it is to the Madonna that I should owe this grace!" And now comes the culminating moment of the hour. Having "mounted the scaffold and recommended himself to God for the last time, he laid his head beneath the horrible knife; with a firm hand did the executioner loosen the edged blade, which came down swiftly, when, on touching the victim's neck, it stopped without injuring the same, one voice alone being heard in the awful silence, the voice of the sufferer, who, alive and unhurt, was addressing himself to the Mother of God with the words, "Evvive Maria!" It will be observed that here we have a circumstantial narrative of all the details of the supernatural incident, for the sharp-edged knife is spoken of as having actually come down upon the neck af the condemned, and there to have lain on it with the gentleness of an innocuous feather ruff, through the merciful intervention of an all-powerful Virgin Mary, who had been touched by the criminal's sentimental reverence for her particular self. It is as complete and striking a piece of supernatural effect as can be conceived, and we are not astonished to be informed that the imagination of the devout and the brigand classes has been specially inflamed by the incident, and thrown into an exceptional transport of excitement. In fact, the composition has been a successful piece of authorship, and has had a decided run in Rome, where the brigands and assassins now being enrolled, almost publicly, by the ex-King of Naples, are naturally rejoiced at so unmistakable an intervention of the divine power on their behalf. If they may commit crime, yet be saved from its consequences, enlistment pays, and enlistments, consequently, are increasing rapidly.

The success of the scheme would have been complete, but for one untoward incident. It happens that Bracciano lies within the territory still occupied by French troops, and General Montebello did not altogether approve either the miracle, the Virgin Mary not being a properly authorized State official, or the excitement it had caused in Rome. He availed himself of his military authority to order the matter to be investigated by secular persons; and we have reason to know that the result was a report that the man's life had been saved by the slipping together of the vertical beams—an occurrence absolutely impossible unless the affair had been previously arranged with the executioner. Of course that report will not reach the Romans, or probably the Pope; the latter of whom will continue to regard the affair as a merciful accident, and the former as a proof positive either that the Virgin favors the cause of the ex-King, or—which is more probable—that devotion to her will excuse even Bourbon brigands from the consequences of their crime. It is not often that the genesis of an ecclesiastical miracle can be so clearly traced, or that the priests venture to invent so little. In this instance they have adhered to facts with commendable closeness, the single falsity being that the intervention of the Virgin is substituted for that of the executioner and those whom he obeyed. It is quite possible, even, that the brigand, though he did not believe in the miracle, did put up the prayers to the Madonna, with which a Southern Italian prefaces every act, good and bad, almost, as it were by instinct, and as readily among crowds as when alone.

ALBERT N'YANZA.

THIS is the name given to a great lake in the interior of Africa, which is one of the reservoirs feeding the Nile. Mr. Barker, a traveler, who visited it in 1864, gives the following account of his first view of its waters:

"The sun had not risen when I was spurring my ox after the guide, who, having been promised a double handful of beads on arrival at the lake, had caught the enthusiasm of the moment. The day broke beautifully clear, and having crossed a deep valley between the hills, we toiled up the opposite slope. I hurried to the summit. The glory of our prize burst suddenly upon me! There, like a sea of quicksilver, lay, far beneath, the grand expanse of water—a boundless sea horizon on the south and south-west, glittering in the noon-day sun; and on the west, at fifty or sixty miles distance, blue mountains rose from the bosom of the lake to a height of about seven thousand feet above its level. It is impossible to describe the triumph of that moment; here was the reward for all our labor—for the years of tenacity with which we had toiled through Africa. England had won the sources of the Nile! Long before I reached this spot, I had arranged to give three cheers with all our men, in English style, in honor of the discovery; but now that I looked down upon the great inland sea lying nestled in the very heart of Africa, and thought how vainly mankind had sought these sources throughout so many ages, and reflected that I had been the humble instrument permitted to unravel this portion of the great mystery when so many greater than I had failed, I felt too serious to vent my feelings in vain cheers for victory, and I sincerely thanked God for having guided and supported us through all dangers to the good end. I was about 1,500 feet above the lake, and I looked down from the steep granite cliff upon those welcome waters—upon that vast reservoir which nourished Egypt, and brought fertility where all was a wilderness—upon that great source so long hidden from mankind; that source of bounty and of blessings to millions of human beings; and as one of the greatest objects in nature, I determined to honor it with a great name. As an imperishable memorial of one loved and mourned by our gracious Queen and deplored by every Englishman, I called this great lake 'the Albert N'yanza.' The Victoria and the Albert lakes are the two sources of the Nile. * * * The beach was perfectly clean sand, upon which the waves rolled like those of the sea, throwing up weeds precisely as seaweed may be seen upon the English shore. It was a grand sight to look upon this vast reservoir of the mighty Nile, and to watch the heavy swell tumbling upon the beach, while far to the south-west, the eye searched as vainly for a bound as though upon the Atlantic. It was with extreme emotion that I enjoyed this glorious scene."

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THERE is an editor out West, who, when he is short of matter, sends out his paper with one side or page entirely blank, merely drawing his subscribers' attention to the fact by a note—"This space will be very useful for the children to write upon."

MR. COPLEY, the celebrated portrait-painter, and father of the late Lord Lyndhurst, once met a lady in the street, who said to him:

'Ah, Mr. Copley, I have just seen your likeness, and I kissed it because it was so much like you."

"And did it kiss you in return?" he asked.

"Why, no," was the reply.

"Then," said Copley, "it was not like me."

MOTHER—"Now, George, you must divide the cake honorably with your brother Charlie."

George—"What is 'honorably,' mother?"

"It means that you must give him the largest piece."

George—"Then, mother, I'd rather Charlie should cut it."

"WHAT is the reason that men never kiss each other, while the ladies waste a world of kisses on the feminine face?" said a foolish poet to a lively girl the other day. The young lady answered:

"Because the men have something better to kiss, and the women haven't." The gent saw it immediately.

Works of Nature.—In a state of health the intestinal canal may be compared to a river, whose waters flow over the adjoining land, through the channels nature or art has made for their passage; but when, as long as it runs on smoothly, the channels are kept pure and healthy; if the course of the river is stopped, then the water in the canals is no longer pure, but soon becomes stagnant. There is but one law of circulation in nature. When there is a superabundance of unwonted fluid in the intestinal tubes, and costiveness takes place, it flows back into the blood vessels, and infiltrates itself into the circulation. To establish the free course of the river, we must remove the obstructions which stop its free course, and those of its tributary streams. With the body follow the same natural principles—remove the obstructions—the same law works with BRANDRETH'S PILLS, which never injure, but are always effectual for the perfect cleansing of the system from feulness or disease. Chastellar's White Liquid Enamel,

For Improving and Beautifying the Complexion. The most wonderful and perfect preparation ever offered to the public. The only beautifier that will not injure the skin. The only beautifier pearl-like tint, that is only found in youth. It quickly removes a Sun Burn, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, Moth Patches, Sallowness, Eruptions, and all impurities of the skin, and by using for a short time, will make white and clear as alabaster. Its use cannot be discovered by the closest scrutiny, and being a vegetable preparation it is perfectly harmless. It is the only article of the kind used by the French, and is considered by the Parisian indispensable to a perfect toilet. Upward of 30,000 bottles were sold during the past year, a sufficient guarantee of its efficacy. Price only 75 cents. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of an order, by BERGER, SHUTTS & CO., Chemists, 282 River Street, Troy, N. Y.

6,000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS. Three sell at sight. Sample by mail, 25 cents; a great profit. Send 15 cts. and get 95 pages of 3 articles; or 25 cts. and get 95 pages and a sample. Address

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 565—VOL. XXII.] NEW YORK, JULY 28, 1866. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

What We May Sell to Belligerents.

WHEN two-thirds of what is called the civilized world is in war, or on the eve of war, questions of international duties and national rights obtain, naturally, special prominence, particularly when, as in our own case, we have had them forced on us in an unprecedented manner through the course of a long and bloody war. We know pretty well what most contemporary nations regard as international obligations, and what they claim to be national rights—rights belonging to themselves. It is important to us, in view of existing and impending exterior disturbances and complications, to understand what our rights and privileges are. The interests of a very large part of our citizens are, and may be, involved in an instant determination of what they may do and may not do, as between the many belligerents now engaged in war.

We are a ship-building, cannon-casting, arms-manufacturing and powder-making, as well as a cotton and gold and grain-producing people. We have the best and most abundant timber of any people in the world for constructing ships, and the most skillful mechanics for using them. We have, exceptionally, the best iron of any country for certain kinds of guns, which, in other respects than in the quality of their iron, are believed, at home and abroad, to be superior to any in the world. Our small arms are claimed to have a corresponding superiority. For these reasons they will be sought for by nations engaged in war, precisely as our pork and beef and flour will be sought for to supply armies in the field with rations.

Now, what are our rights of traffic in these articles? Are there any restrictions imposed by our laws? Have any been established by our courts, or grown, through common consent and practice, into rules for our guidance? And if we have any rights, ought they to be set aside, or can they be set aside by Executive interference?

Answers to these questions, as we have said, are important just now, and especially in view of the extraordinary, unwarranted, and oppressive delay of the United States officials in deciding the case of the Meteor, seized six months ago, and still held, without privilege of bond, to await the tardy action of an octogenarian judge.

We will venture to say there are in our ports at this hour more than a hundred agents of foreign governments (some of which are belligerents, others not), awaiting, with the money in their pockets which is to enrich American industry, the decision in the case of the Meteor. The seizure of that vessel, and the astounding pretensions of the officers of the government engaged in her prosecution, have unsettled the notions of the public as to their rights, and palsied for the time a branch of traffic against which there is no law, which is right in morals, and the legality and propriety of which have been uniformly sustained by the ablest lawyers, astutest statesmen, and highest judicial tribunals of the land.

We know not, nor do we much care, what will be the decision, in the case of the Meteor, of a petty court and a fossilized judge, for no one supposes an adverse determination by such an authority would stand the test of the inevitable appeal to the vigorous and masculine intellects of the superior courts.

But, we repeat, we cannot permit an important branch of business, for which the present ought to be eminently the season of prosperity, to languish because of doubts or

U. S. SOLDIERS GUARDING THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK, AT PORTLAND, MAINE, AFTER THE CONFLAGRATION.

uncertainties as to our rights, in the matter of traffic in ships and arms.

If not known, it should be known, that the traffic in ships and arms, and all conceivable kinds of munitions of war, is legally, by prescription, and by the highest judicial decisions of the land, absolutely free. We may sell freely to each and every belligerent all the things above enumerated, and the authorities of the United States have no right of interference. They can only interfere at their peril, and may be mulcted, as was the collector of New York in Madison's time, in $100,000, for interfering with a vessel worth but $30,000.

An eminent jurist of Boston, Mr. George Bemis (whose writings on international law, apropos of questions which arose during the late war, have given him a wide and well-founded reputation), has done good service in epitomizing what are the rights of our people in matters of the kind under notice, and in enforcing and illustrating what is the American law and has been the American practice.

What this question of what should constitute American neutrality came up under Washington's Administration, in 1793, Jefferson, Randolph, and Hamilton were members of the Cabinet. On the distinct issue set forth in these words: "The United States being a shipbuilding nation, may they sell ships, prepared for war, to both parties?" the opinion of Jefferson (Secretary of State) was, that "they may sell such ships in their own ports or carry them for sale to the dominions of both parties;" but the decision of the Cabinet was, that they might carry them to the dominions of both parties for sale. It must be observed, however, that the question referred to ships "prepared for war," armed, provisioned and (probably) manned—in short, to fully equipped war vessels.

On the 15th of May, of the same year, Jefferson wrote officially:

> "Our citizens have always been free to make, vend and export arms; it is the constant occasion for the livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings—the only means, perhaps, of their subsistence—because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, could have but few effects. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice."

Three months later, Hamilton, in his "Instructions to Collectors," wrote:

> "The purchase within and exporting from the United States by way of merchandise (understood thus in the original), articles commonly called contraband, being generally the warlike instruments and military stores, with which all the parties at war, and is not to be interfered with."

In 1794, a year later, Congress passed the first Neutrality law, under which a case came up of a ship charged with its violation. This case was decided in August, 1794, by the Supreme Court of the United States, which declared that:

> "It is not a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States to sell to a foreigner (even to a home agent), a vessel built in this country, though suited to be a privateer and having some equipments calculated for war, but frequently used by merchant ships."

Twenty-two years later (in 1816), Spain made great complaint to the Government about the depredations committed on her commerce by vessels built in the United States. These complaints Mr. Madison, then President, referred to Mr. Rush, Attorney-General of the United States, who reported:

> "I am aware of no law of the United States that can prevent a merchant or shipowner selling his vessel and cargo (should the latter even consist of warlike stores), to a citizen or inhabitant of Buenos Ayres or of any part of South America; nor will it, do I think, make any difference whether such sale be made directly, in a port of the United States, with immediate transfer of the possession thereupon; or under a contract entered into here with delivery to take place in a port of South America."

Following upon this opinion of the Attorney-General, President Madison called the attention of Congress to the state of our statutes upon the subject, and recommended more stringent precautions against permitting vessels, already prepared for war, going out of American ports, without first giving bonds not to engage in hostilities or cruise against friendly powers.

Acting upon the President's recommendation, the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Forsyth (afterward Secretary of State) was chairman, on the 14th of January, 1817, reported a bill with the following title:

> "A bill to prevent citizens of the United States from selling vessels of war to the citizens or subjects of any foreign power, and more effectually to prevent the arming and equipping vessels of war in the ports of the United States, intended to be used against nations in amity with the United States."

By the first section, "If any citizen of the United States . . . shall fit out and arm . . . any private ship or vessel of war, to sell the said vessel or contract for the sale of said vessel, to be delivered in the United States or elsewhere to the purchaser, with intent . . . to commit or commit hostilities upon the subjects . . . of any prince or state with whom the United States are at peace, such person shall be punished" with fine and imprisonment, etc.

Congress, however, refused to pass this provision, showing a determination not to interfere with the traffic in vessels, whether equipped for war or otherwise, and left our shipowners free to carry on their ordinary traffic in ships as a branch of legitimate industry.

In the same sense and to the same purport was the decision of the Supreme Court in 1822. Judge Story, speaking for the whole court, in the case of the Santissima Trinidad, said;

> "There is nothing in our laws, or in the law of nations, that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation."

A later decision in 1832, "The United States vs. Quincy," affirms this decision in almost the same words. During the Crimean war our ships were largely employed by the different operation of transporting troops, etc., and in answer to some complaints on the subject, President Pierce said:

> "The laws of the United States do not forbid their citizens to sell to either of the belligerent powers articles contraband of war, or to transport soldiers or munitions of war, or to build, equip, and arm vessels for that purpose; although in so doing the property exposes his property to some of the hazards of war, his acts do not involve any violation of the sovereignty, nor of themselves implicate the Government. Thus, during the progress of the present war in Europe, our citizens have, without national responsibility therefore, sold gunpowder and arms to both belligerents, freighted the destination of those articles, Our merchantmen have been, and still are, largely employed by both the great Britain and France, in transporting troops, provisions and munitions of war, for the principals and for military operations, and in bringing home the sick and wounded soldiers. Our mercantile and our passenger marine is not interdicted either by the international or by our municipal law, and therefore does not compromise our neutral relations with Russia."

This chronological summary shows what has been the principle and practice of the country from its foundation, and establishes that Americans have a free right of traffic in ships and in all articles of munitions of war, except to To enlist men, organize expeditions, and plan campaigns within our borders is in violation of our neutrality laws. Articles "contraband of war" are also liable to be seized by belligerents in transitu, libeled, and, if the libel be sustained, be confiscated. But there is no authority whatever to prevent Americans from sending out of the country anything that either belligerent may desire or have the ability to pay for. Any attempt at interference by the Government or its officers against the exercise of this right, would be a usurpation and an outrage on the well-established rights of the people.

Injunctions.

Ir is a sad thing for a country when the laws are made in the interest of one class alone, and are used as the engines of oppression; when, in addition to the double, treble, less, they become their scourge. But it is still sadder when in a free country, the perversion of the laws comes from those whose duty it is to administer justice. Justly, the sense of injustice is heightened by the feeling of our having been betrayed. It is not the laws, or the agents who execute them, who wrought the injury; it has come from those on whom we relied to carry them into effect, and our disappointment is in proportion to the love of duty we had found in them.

Pride in our judiciary is one of the notions we derive from our English ancestry, and it was eminently natural that, in the struggle between the court and the people, between a feudal aristocracy and the classes gradually freeing themselves from its benumbing influences, between power and weakness, between wealth and poverty, there stood a power arrayed with attributes superior to those of mail-clad knight or feudal lord, before which all were equal, and whose edicts none could evade. The judges, whose high office it was to give force and vitality to the law, could not be deemed or suspected when they placed beyond the reach of corruption, suspicion of which has, we believe, never soiled their ermine. So far as human institutions could distinguished the Bench, it was not to be expected that our own country whose judiciary system was to a great extent molded after that of England, would allow itself to be far excelled.

We have no need to repeat here the names of the illustrious men who have done honor to the judiciary of our State, and whose achievements were no less the glory of their country than of their age. They are familiar and dear to every American mind.

It was an evil day for us all when the heat and fury of politics touched, and in touching, defiled the chaste majesty of justice. And that day is not so long since, but most of us can recollect the way in which the profanation was effected. "Rotation in office" and "universal suffrage" were the two ideas which at that time were pressed upon the public. The former was only the corollary to the war-cry of "To the victors belong the spoils," while the latter, though by no means new in principle, had been subject to certain limitations, of which we shall have more to say presently. When it was to proposed to apply these principles to the judiciary of the State, men stood aghast, not alone at the boldness of the measure, but at the fatal consequences that were apparent. And there is no more notable instance of political empiricism on record than the argument (if so it may be called) of the prime-mover, advocate of the great change, which amounted to this—"Let us try the experiment; if it does not succeed, we can easily return to the old system"—as if government were something so new, it could only be done by guess-work—as if the problem of man's selfishness had never before been wrestled with, as if it had to be made the subject of an experiment, of the results of which, as was foreseen by every one but the rigorous advocate of "trying," "following," we are all now so heartily ashamed.

There cannot be a doubt that it is to the degradation of the judicial office that we owe the recent extraordinary applications of the power of injunction. To our non-legal readers we may explain that this is a power granted by the law of the State to judges, to be exercised only in extreme cases, where, if no relief to life or property of one party is imminent, by reason of the acts of the second, or when, during the litigation, the parties are active in a legal decision as to the rights of the two parties, the acts of one might cause irreparable injury to the other. We have no space to illustrate, by cases, the application of this law, but our readers will observe that one essential element in it is, that the injury threatened, and which it is sought by injunction to prevent, shall be irreparable; that is, it must be of such a nature that, should a decision of the court, before which the case is subsequently tried, be to the effect that the damage must be repaired, it will be found actually impossible to repair it, or make due atonement. If the apprehended damage be slight, or even, if heavy, of a kind for which money can make amends, and satisfaction in some form or other be rendered, and neither life nor health be endangered, a judge has no right to issue an injunction. Another noteworthy point is, that the issuing of an injunction is absolutely at the discretion of the judge, and that, too, on hearing only one side; it may be set aside by a judge of concurrent jurisdiction after hearing both sides, or by a judge of a superior court on the appeal of the party against whom issued, and a partisan and therefore corrupt injunction, though in force only a few hours, produces a great part of its intended effect. Every could be of man devise a better system for the corruption of judges than the one now in vogue in this State and city? By corruption we do not mean the gross and indecent way of paying a certain sum of money into an "itching palm," but holding out, by way of inducement to render decisions which is bias toward the interest of the electors, the promise of their votes when he shall present himself for re-election. Thus—to our shame be it said—it is a common talk of Judge X being elected in the liquor interest, Judge Y in the contract interest, and so on; and Judge X, while on the bench, naturally leans to those interests which are identified with his past, and he fervently hopes will be with his coming election. It is his part to deserve the confidence of his friends. They elected him once, and can do so again. They have become to him a constituency, of which he is the representative. They are his clients, and he their advocate. What a farce, to call such a man a judge, or to expect him to refuse an injunction, or anything else, when the interests of his friends are at stake.

The more pompous and high-sounding the reasons for granting an injunction, the better of course. To say that your friends' groceries will be ruined if the organ-grinder in a very worthy man, a contractor, a friend of yours, and who accidentally has great influence in your ward, will find himself a much poorer, and therefore a less influential man at the next election, if certain recent laws are enforced, would be too shameless a reason to assign. The lawyer, however, is not content with the unconstitutionality of the laws licensing or restraining the friends and electors of the judges. This word not only sounds well, but carries us at once into the realm of fiction which proves irresistibly attractive to some minds. It also gives occasion to ventilate a large quantity of clap-trap—useful to refer to at the next election—and we need hardly say that Hackett's and Cardoza's law is in the inverse ratio of their fluency.

We have said that the law leaves the granting or refusing an injunction to the discretion of the judge. This pre-supposes that so extraordinary a power will only be exerted in cases where its use is obviously demanded to defeat some grievous wrong, and one would think that if such a case existed, its urgency would be equally apparent to all. Yet we find, in the late Excise injunction cases, that some judges granted the process, while others refused it. This cannot be ascribed to the "uncertainty of the law," which warns people from becoming entangled in it. It is rather the inglorious certainty that in some cases the law is administered without fear or favor and in other cases it is not.

What is the remedy for all this? The power of issuing injunctions cannot be taken away without opening the door to most palpable evils, present and future; and it only remains to change the characters of the men to whom this power is entrusted. It may be a humiliating confession to have to make in this our municipality, the system of universal suffrage is a failure. But when one department after another has been reformed, by taking it away from an influence that was found so debasing, it is hard to defend the once popular doctrine. If we have excluded it from any share in the government of the Police, the Fire Department, of Fire, of Excise, of the Central Park, why should we allow, in the highest functions of government, the Judiciary, the administration of the laws—an element which we have excluded from the comparatively inferior offices because it was corrupt and brought forth nothing but evil? The election of judges was professedly only an experiment. It has been tried and has failed, as all acknowledge but those who profit by it. Our Judges of Common Pleas will not, however, have been elected in vain, if their late unwarrantable assumptions of power for party purposes lead to the crushing out of pretentious, together with the system which raised them to the seats they have disgraced.

"LL.D."

Excellence, proficiency, skill, or signal ability in any department of science or literature, or in the profession, is the reward when the man who achieves them to an appropriate honorarium and reward. A soldier finds promotion and honorable returns for bravery and martial achievement. The first step in this his reward in the recognition accorded to him through titles conferred by bodies competent to judge of his merit. The second is that of the lawyer. The good and beneficent man finds recognition in the gratitude of men, in monuments and testimonials, in ovations and other means of public respect.

All recognition should be appropriate, or it becomes ridiculous. If Dr. Cheever and Dr. Bellows were to be dubbed Major Generals, or even Brigadiers, in acknowledgment of their ability as divines and the excellence of their sermons, the world would be apt to convulse with laughter. The same would be said had a thing happen lately quite as absurd, and quite as revolting to the "fitness of things."

The Yale College man Mr. George Peabody acquired by industry, enterprise and close economy, a fortune in London, which he has dedicated with rare good sense and judgment to charitable, educational and other public purposes. This has given him a consideration greater and more to be desired than would attach to mere wealth. It has opened to him a social relationship and public recognition which hoarded wealth could never give. It has brought him a rare compliment from royalty in England, and in this country a welcome, such as should attend on worthy deeds. In fact, his reward has been and is appropriate and ample. It would be an unmeaning, and not insulting and contemptible, flunky and snobbish act on the part of Mr. Welles to recommend him as Rear Admiral, as it would be on the part of Mr. Stanton to recommend him to the Senate for a Brevet Brigadiership! And yet Georgetown College has committed precisely this folly—insulting to Mr. Peabody, and bringing itself into ridicule—by dubbing him LL.D! Some one suggests it should be "L. S. D!"

We believe Yale College "made a fool of itself" by conferring "LL.D." on Andrew Jackson. Such stupidities, however, are generally and happily confined to the class of "learned institutions" known as "one-horse."

One of the inevitable results of the war between Austria and Prussia will be the absorption and extinction of four or five minor States, and the horde of little principalities, duchies, electorates, and the rest of the political and geographical nonsense, by means of which Germany was subdivided, and which have inundated Europe with "serene highnesses," and titled drones and adventurers. The sooner they disappear, the have to take to teaching dancing or music, or to some other useful or apparently useful avocation, the better. A little wood-chopping or market-gardening would do them good. Prussia has done "a good job" in dispossessing a dozen or so of this contemptible crowd. Not one of their "serene highnesses," however, died at his post, or even fought a single engagement. The King of Hanover was besought by his butchers to remain and accept the Prussian reform, but refused resolutely, and went, leaving his Queen to do the best she could with the Prussians. Smaller people scuttled after him, "Adjutant-General Dubrichwitz, head of the war party, forgetting to buckle on his sword." In Hesse the Elector tried to take away the national treasure, but the theft was prevented by the people, and in Saxony the King made no attempt whatever at resistance. The general aspect of the people seems to be tranquil. They are not delighted, for the Prussian hand is known to be heavy, but they are not irritated, and either obey the recruiting officers or fly from them. The royal arms have been taken down in Saxony, to be replaced by the Prussian, without tumult, the Hanoverians are disgusted with their Court, and the Hessians, of course, prefer any Governor to the Elector. Count Von Bismarck has at least cleared Europe of these dynasties, which after six hundred years of sway leave not a subject willing to die on their behalf. They have not all been at all times irretrievably bad. Europe owes much both to Saxony and Hesse, for they protected the burly monk who first broke the charm of a Universal Church. Two of the dynasties have done much for art; one has been a refuge in days of oppression for German literature; all save Hesse have done something to make an essentially sensuous people believe the mind greater than the body, to keep alive in a military race the healthy faith that learning is nobler than military skill. But they have all resisted the development of a free national life; all have helped to dwarf the minds they have so assiduously refined; all have resisted the natural development of a race which probably contains within it the largest possibilities of original and noble life. All have striven with their utmost energies to keep up the evil faith that heaven has committed the guidance of mankind to the members of a limited caste, now so interwoven as to be almost a single family, which, possessing for a thousand years a monopoly of the highest form of action, has in that time failed to produce one benefactor to mankind. In the long stream of European history not one of this caste has ever received by popular acclaim the epithet "Good;" but one lives in history under the title of the "Wise." So intensely has the evil effect of the Princelings' influence been felt, that for fifty years no subject of theirs has risen high enough in the mental world to think out a political reform without making their extinction the inevitable datum of his dream. And now they are gone, gone without a blow on their own soil for the independence of which they were so proud, and though the real battle has yet to be fought, we still, reading by the light of history, believe they can never return.

LIBERIA is essentially an American colony. Its statistics have therefore a special interest to our people. The whole population of the colony is estimated at 74,000, of whom 14,000 are ranked as civilized. The whole number of votes polled at the last election was 1,220. The value of the exports last year was $500,000; of imports, $420,000. The export of sugar was 350,000 pounds; of coffee, 18,000 pounds; of palm oil, 750,000. Eighty persons are engaged in the cultivation of sugar. There are seventy missionaries in the country, and there are five religious denominations of Christians—Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopal and Congregational.

A SENSIBLE project is on foot to remodel the City Hall Park. It is proposed to build the new Post-Office at its lower extremity, and make it a monumental structure worthy of the metropolis of America. It should be of marble, with a central covered court, in which the mail-bags may be loaded and unloaded, with no obstruction to the surrounding streets, and with entire security. The trees should be removed from the remainder of the park, the dusty basin, absurdly called a fountain, abolished, Beekman and the other cross streets carried through, and the whole space paved. In the centre of this should be raised a fountain (with real water), something like that in the centre of the Place du Concorde in Paris, with, perhaps emblematic statues or groups, properly disposed in other parts of the area. As for the brick-dust statue of Washington ("Rest perturbed spirit!"), let it be prayerfully consigned to the obscurest corner of some remote stone-yard, or set up on the extremest point of Sandy Hook to frighten off the cholera.

THE latest news from Europe confirms the views we have elsewhere expressed, as to the result of the war on the minor German States. This will aid the extinction of a knot of dynasties of which Europe and the world is heartily sick, and which ought to have perished in 1815, and whose single useful function of providing consorts for Europe will not be wholly stopped by their expulsion from power.

THE general physical deterioration of the race in France has been the subject of much comment and speculation. The matter came up recently in the French Legislature on the question of a new military conscription law. M. Glais-Bizoin pronounced the existing law essentially vicious, and the term of service (seven years) entirely too long. He complained that young men were drafted into the army at precisely the age when men are most disposed to marry, and that at the end of their term of service they have generally contracted habits and ideas repugnant to the married state, or else married after having been broken down by age, dissipation or exposure, or all combined, giving parentage to puny and diseased families. He attributed the small percentage of increase in the population of France, and its alleged deterioration physically, to these causes. "It must be attributed," he said, "to the system which carried off a million of men, condemned to celibacy, and those the most healthy and vigorous in the country. What was the remedy for such a state of things? He thought it was to be found in an adoption of the system practiced by two neighboring countries—Prussia and Switzerland—namely, a service of two years, or three at most." To this may be added some interesting statistics relative to the city of Paris. Population, according to the last general census, (1861,) 1,696,141. In 1864 the births were 53,835, of which 27,231 were males, and 26,604 females; of the total number of children born, 38,967 were legitimate, and 14,868 illegitimate. The number of deaths was 44,913.

THE real success of Prussia, thus far, in the war with Austria, is not so much military as political. Austria may prevail in arms, but nothing can undo the effect of the great political revelation that has been made in Europe. Wherever the Prussians go in North Germany, they go really as friends and not as enemies. They have shown that it is true that the Courts, and not the people of North Germany, are against them; and they have shown that these Courts have no hold over their subjects, have won neither popular respect nor affection, and that the whole structure of those petty Kingdoms and Principalities is rotten. It was no great matter that the Hanoverian fortress of Stade, garrisoned by less than three hundred men, surrendered without a fight to an overwhelming force of Prussians. But it is a great matter that when the garrison marched out they immediately fraternized with the Prussians, and that both conquerors and conquered immediately melted their heroic souls in the beloved beer of their common Fatherland. The population of Hanover went out a mile or two to meet "the enemy," and escorted them in the most affable manner to a central position beneath the windows of the palace, where the Queen had been left by the great descendant of the Guelphs to examine leisurely this easy extinction of the dynasty.

BOOK NOTICES.

PRISON LIFE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.—This is the title of a book tastefully published by Carleton, from the pen of Dr. J. J. Craven, who was physician in Fortress Monroe, and, consequently, of the State prisoner, from May 25, 1865, to December of the same year. It consists of descriptions of Mr. Davis's treatment, modes of life, and ailments; and reproductions, with ejaculatory and generally highly appreciatory remarks of Mr. Davis's conversations, speculations, observations, and fancies. If Mr. Davis has failed to convince mankind at large of his greatness, he certainly has not failed to impress his whilom physician with the conviction that he is a statesman, philosopher and sage. Henceforth the name of Craven will be named only in connection with those of Boswell and Montholon.

Barring the flunkeyism that makes Dr. Craven believe that the ordinary common-places, and simplest platitudes of Mr. Davis are something quite out of the way, original and valuable, the book is readable enough. It is not uninteresting to know how prisoners charged with great crimes behave themselves when in confinement. The Sunday papers know this, and give their readers highly-colored accounts of the prison life of Bill Sykes and his compeers. These, however, seldom take the shape and proportions of books, but sometimes reach the dignity of a pamphlet—especially when Sykes has been ushered into Paradise through the gateway of the gallows.

Mr. Davis's disquisitions on matters and things will not astonish the world, as they seem to have done this doctor, to whom, nevertheless, we are obliged for preserving the arch-rebel's account of the ant-lion, which is decidedly the best thing in the book:

"Finding my curiosity excited, Mr. Davis then described the ant-lion with much minuteness and pleasant humor, saying it was next to the bee as an interesting study in natural history. It is about the size of a small, elongated pea, three legs on each side, a forceps proportionably immense arming its head, and between these nippers a sharp stiletto, which can be drawn in or thrown out at pleasure. It is found all along the Southern coast, and would seem to have a difficult problem in supporting life. It is painfully slow of movement, always walking backward, and dragging its heavy forceps on the ground behind it; while the ants, on which it chiefly preys, are extremely active. Nature, however, has compensated by subtlety what the ant-lion lacks in spring. It digs a funnel-shaped hole in the fine sand of the Southern coast, circular at the top, of an inch diameter and an inch in depth. At the bottom it secretes itself in the sand, only its forceps protruding. These pitfalls are located about an inch or so from the stems of shrubs or tufts of grass—the ants flocking to these latter, because finding in them a species of grass-louse called the ant-cow, which the ant milks by suction as its favorite food, the cows not resisting lest worse befall them, and not appearing injured by the process.

"While the ants are thus hastening to their food, some one of them will approach the brink of the ant-lion's pitfall, and instantly the fine sand of the edge gives way, precipitating the unwary traveler to the bottom. Here he is seized by the forceps and firmly held, while the stiletto is driven through his body. His juices are soon sucked dry by the secreted monster of the cave, and then with one jerk of the forceps the carcass is flung up and out two or three inches beyond the edge of the funnel—a distance as much as if a man were thrown one hundred and fifty times his length. Should the ant, when first tumbling, escape the grasp of the forceps, and seek to clamber out of the trap, the ant-lion foils the attempt by jerking little jets of sand on the body and across the path of his flying victim, who is soon stunned, bewildered, and, losing his grasp on the slippery sides, falls back, a helpless prey to his destroyer.

"Mr. Davis, when on the coast of Georgia, many years ago, had often spent hours in watching them, and their whole performance could be witnessed by placing one in a cigar-box, half filled with fine sand, and dropping in some sugar or a dead locust to attract the ants. The ant-lion would not be in the box half a day before commencing to earn his livelihood by digging out his trap. So great was the habit of subtlety in this insect, that, when moving from place to place, it always burrowed along, just a little beneath the surface of the sand; and he had heard, if compelled to cross a stone, log, or other obstruction, that it seized a chip or leaf with its forceps, thereby covering its body, as it slowly and painfully toiled backward. This, however, he could not verify from personal observation."

FOOTLIGHT FLASHES.—WILLIAM DAVIDGE: American News Co.—The mere fact that so sagacious a firm as the American News Company has published the volume is prima facie evidence there is something in it. It is not as novel and entertaining as the reputation of the writer as a comedian would lead us to expect, but it is a very readable, pleasant volume. The style is somewhat crude, but Mr. Davidge is an inexperienced author, and will improve in time. He writes, however, very directly, and if he would not think quite so much of his literary wit it would vastly improve him. One of the chief merits of the book is that it lets us into some of the "behind the scenes" secrets, which all like to read of. The book is freely embellished.

HUMANITY TO HORSES.—GOODENOUGH HORSE SHOE CO.—This is an interesting pamphlet, showing the defects in the common mode of shoeing horses, and describing a patent shoe that obviates them. No animal deserves better of man than the horse, and he is too frequently given over to some ignorant boors, who has no more idea of the delicate structure of the animal's foot, which he cuts and hammers as if it were a block of wood, than he has of a sculpture or painting. We hail with pleasure any movement that will direct proper attention to this neglected subject, and cordially approve of the views held forth in this publication.

TOWN GOSSIP.

WE do not know that the fervid patriotism and the burning powder of the Fourth had any effect upon the atmosphere, but certain it is that shortly afterward we endured such a scorching as seldom falls to our lot, and began to fear that the earth had gone off at a tangent, and was hurling us in a direction that would enable us to determine the long-disputed theories about the composition of the sun. There was a rush for the country, and its fields and groves; everybody who could get away from the streets, that seemed avenues of fire, hastened off; while others gained a little respite by crossing the ferries and taking a short trip on the excursion boats.

The effect of such extremes of temperature on the public health are disastrous. Many fell victims to sun stroke, and many others were so overcome and prostrated that weeks will not restore them to their accustomed vigor. Strange to say, none of our Judges tried the force of an injunction upon this palpable invasion of personal comfort and general well-being! We respectfully submit that here was a case in which no one would question the propriety of using that lately-invented legal guillotine, and that would never be referred to the Court of Appeals.

The great question now discussed in social circles is, Where to spend the summer? The sea-shore, the springs, the mountains, all present their varied attractions, and woo the wearied denizens of the metropolis with different appeals. A sojourn at any of them would contribute to health and comfort, and yet the getting away is attended with no small degree of vexation. There is the preparation for the journey, the refurnishing of wardrobes, and the hundred nameless little things requiring attention, in order that the trip may realize all that it promises; there are the weeks of anticipation, and all the anxieties preceding the season—these make a labor of recreation, and stifle enjoyment.

In fact, we believe the great object of recreation is sacrificed by the absurd determination to carry the excitement and style of the city to our summer resorts. There should be a time when we could entirely cut loose from everything that taxes our energies and burdens our thoughts; but if we make the short respite gained from business and labor a constant round of fashionable dissipation, we might as well remain at home. If we would substantially recuperate our wearied energies, a sojourn in the country, among the woods and fields, and amid the rustic simplicity of agricultural life, would prove far preferable to a season at Saratoga or Newport. And sensible people are beginning to appreciate this fact, and in casting about for a summer abode, to select some quiet farmhouse, where, for a time, they can lay aside all conventionalities, and in place of the frivolities of the watering-places, draw inspiration from the simplicity of nature, and drink in health and vigor from her unfailing fountains.

Especially does such a course commend itself to those of moderate means, who, in those times of tariffs and taxes, find it necessary to practice a rigid economy to live within their resources.

There are daily cases of cholera in the city, but the sanitary precautions that have been taken prevent anything like an epidemic form of the scourge, and preclude a panic among the people. The fact is, there are many diseases constantly prevalent that are far more fatal than cholera, but we have become so accustomed to those that we hardly give them a thought. During the four days of excessive heat last week, there were seventy deaths from sun-stroke in this city and in Brooklyn, an immensely large mortality, yet every one feels that by prudence he may escape danger from this cause, and therefore there is no alarm. Consumption claims its scores of victims each week, raging with equal power in summer and winter alike, and we accept its existence as a matter of course. And so we shall find that the best preventive of cholera, if we are correct and careful in our habits, is that equable condition of mind that does not yield to groundless fears, and meets exigencies when they arise.

There are some places that soon gain their growth and maturity. Like a young Miss at boarding-school, they are finished after a very summary process, and their importance becomes of little account. Not such is New York. Here, the march of improvement is ever onward, and as business and wealth increase, they require a constantly new condition of things. Hence there is an unceasing tearing down and building up. Structures that a few years ago were considered massive and elegant, are now unsuited to the times, and must give place to others more ample and ornate.

The old landmarks are fast disappearing and a new city is springing up on every side. And it is a rather singular fact that the churches are the first objects of this iconoclasm. Whether or not there is an irrepressible conflict between the enterprise of business and the requirements of religion, we shall not undertake to determine; but certain it is, that Christianity, as an organized power, has abandoned the lower half of our city and allowed its temples to become the seat of the money-changers.

Of our Central Park we are justly proud; it is "a thing of beauty," accessible to every one; it is country garnished and beautified in the midst of the toiling, sweltering city. Here one can breathe freely; and then, to all the attractions of scenery, shade, rambles, etc., the Commissioners have provided music and its enchantments on certain days each week, giving to the million such an entertainment as they could not find elsewhere.

Aquatic sports, ball-playing, the turf, and other outdoor diversions, are the most attractive amusements at present, and in consequence, the theatres are less liberally patronized.

The Ravels completed a very successful engagement at Niblo's last week, and give place to a short season of the opera.

The Buislay Family, notwithstanding the state of the thermometer, have continued to thrill the multitude with their wonderful feats at the New Bowery. Those fond of trying the peculiar experiment of making the hair "stand on end," should by all means see the Buislays, who apparently set at defiance all the accepted laws of natural philosophy and ignore gravitation entirely.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The return of the number of immigrants that arrived at Quebec from the 1st of May to the 15th of June, 1866, shows that the total for this period was 17,255, against 6,930 for the corresponding period of 1865, showing an increase this year of 10,315. Of the total, nearly 11,000 were Norwegian, mostly bound for the Western States. British immigrants form but an insignificant proportion of the whole.

—— The decease of Prof. Mussey, one of the most learned, scientific and practical surgeons in New-England, is widely lamented. He was connected with Dartmouth College, at Hanover, N. H., from 1814 to 1838, subsequently removed to Cincinnati, and gave up practice about ten years since. One of his sons, Dr. W. H. Mussey, was United States Medical Inspector during the war, and another is Brevet Brigadier-General R. D. Mussey, who was at one time Private Secretary to President Johnson. Prof. Mussey left directions for a post-mortem examination of his own body.

—— Mr. James Shea, a rich old bachelor of St. Louis, died recently, leaving the bequest of $100,000 to the Hospital of the Sisters of Charity, in that city, in which institution, when poor and friendless, he had received medical care and nursing.

—— At the public celebration of the Fourth at New Orleans, Mayor Monroe, in introducing the reader of the Declaration of Independence, took occasion to say that he differed from one expression of opinion in that document, to the effect that all men were created equal. The nigger could not be considered the equal of the white man; and as the writer of the Declaration, Mr. Jefferson, was a slaveholder, it stood to reason that he never could have meant to include the nigger in that assertion.

—— Timothy Nelson, an old negro, formerly a servant in the Washington family, died at Suffolk, Va., recently. He was ninety-four years old. He helped to cut a canal leading from the western margin of the Dismal Swamp to Drummond's Lake, an enterprise projected by Gen. Washington.

—— On the 11th of August next, the old folks of St. Louis propose to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the first grant of land covering the site of that city. It is proposed to form an Historical Society, and to secure an authentic history of the city from its first settlement.

—— The Charleston Courier gives an account of the decoration of the graves of the rebel dead at Greenville, S. C. It says over a thousand persons participated in the exercises. The order of procession embraced eleven young ladies clad in white, and representing the several Confederate States. Most of the stores of the village were closed, and the bells of the churches were tolled.

—— The steamer Goldfinch has just arrived at St. Louis from the mountains. She says new diggings are being discovered and considerable gold is being secured, but reports large numbers of young men out of work, many offering their services at $40 per month, hardly enough to pay their board. Every boat that arrives from that quarter brings down a perfect museum of living animals, bears, wolves, goats, prairie dogs, buffaloes and eagles, owls, cranes and other zoological and ornithological specimens.

—— Major John Tyler, a son of Ex-President Tyler, delivered the annual address last week at Commencement exercises of William and Mary College, at Williamsburg, Va. His subject was "Virginia and the Destinies of the American people under the providences of God," and after showing how much greater Virginia has been than New England, he declared that we are now entering upon a new era, and that empire is the solution of history.

—— A few days ago three Catholic priests and two students were drowned in Annapolis Bay. They had started out on a boating excursion, when one of the party, Father Classens, accidentally fell overboard, and in attempting to rescue him, the boat was capsized. Only two of the party were saved.

—— The city government of Portland is taking steps to effect a number of improvements in the way of changing the streets and laying a park in the burnt district.

—— Seventeen families, numbering eighty persons, lately passed through Cottonwood, Kansas, eastward bound. They were fugitives from the Mormon paradise, and among them was Dr. H. Bates, a prominent Mormon, for some years clerk of the Twelve Apostles, and one of Brigham Young's Secretaries.

—— Geo. A. Mitchell, of Turner, Maine, the inventor of the copper tips for children's shoes, and his son, six years of age, were drowned near their residence lately. The father was endeavoring to save the life of his son who had got beyond his depth.

—— The intense heat a few days since proved fatal to large numbers in this city and Brooklyn, as will be seen by the annexed record. The following exhibits the number of cases of sun-stroke, thus far reported, for this city and Brooklyn:

	New York.	Brooklyn.
Friday, July 6	2	1
Saturday, July 7	14	5
Sunday, July 8	43	6
Monday, July 10	10	7
Total	61	13

Making a grand total of seventy-four cases in both places.

—— The first vessel of the codfish fleet arrived at San Francisco on the 7th inst. from the Ochotsk Sea, with 31,000 fish.

—— Judge Howell, of New Orleans, has issued a proclamation calling together the Louisiana State Convention of 1864. It was this convention which declared the State free, and elected Hahn Senator and Wells Governor, under the influence of federal occupation.

—— Mr. Peabody arrived in Montreal last Saturday in a special car provided for him by Ex-Governor John Gregory Smith, of Vermont. On arriving at the Bonaventura station he was met by several distinguished gentlemen and Canadian officials, and soon after drove to his quarters at St. Lawrence Hall. An elaborate and formal demonstration was intended, but he declined it. On Sunday he attended Church at the English cathedral, and declined as far as he could seeing any visitors. He goes to the Saguenay River to enjoy salmon fishing for a few days.

Foreign.—The last census taken at St. Petersburgh, Russia, shows that the population amounts to 539,122, of whom 313,483 are men, 225,679 women.

—— A feeling prevails in Paris and London to the effect that the war, so far as Italy was concerned, is almost ended; but the Florence dispatches state, their people are determined to conquer.

—— The London Times indicates very plainly that Austria could now afford to treat for the cession of Venetia to Italy, and thus detach her from the alliance with Prussia. The writer calls indirectly on Napoleon as a peacemaker to "bend" Italy to this course.

—— Le Nord, of Brussels, expresses the semi-official opinion that the Czar of Russia inclines toward Napoleon's plan of a powerful armed neutrality, regrets the non-assemblage of the Paris Congress, and awaits eventualities.

—— An English agricultural journal publishes a ludicrous calculation, founded on the theory that there are one rat and ten mice per acre in England. The vermin thus amount to 91,116,000, which would consume 182,232 bushels of corn daily, or 4,116,167 quarters and four bushels in the half year, namely, one hundred and eighty-two days and a half; and this would supply 5,831,424 people with a two-pound loaf each daily for six months, or 2,915,712 people daily with a two-pound loaf each the year round.

—— At a newspaper office in Sydney, Australia, is a tablet informing visitors that the editor cannot be spoken to unless paid for his time. Persons desiring an audience are invited to buy a ticket of admission at the door of the waiting-room—one hour costing ten shillings; half an hour, six shillings; fifteen minutes, three shillings, and so on.

—— Eight hours' work, eight hours' play, eight hour's sleep, and eight shillings a day, is the motto of an association of workmen in Lancashire, England.

—— There are in the whole of Europe 1,480 theatres. Of these there are 337 in France, 168 in Spain, 159 in England, 152 in Austria, 112 in Germany, 76 in Prussia, 44 in Russia, 34 in Belgium, 23 in Holland, 20 in Switzerland, 10 in Sweden, 8 in Norway, 16 in Portugal, 10 in Denmark, 4 in Greece, 4 in Turkey, 3 in Roumania and 1 in Servia. In Italy there is one theatre for every 75,000 of the inhabitants.

—— Everybody (says a Paris correspondent) knows conscripts, when examined by a council of revision, are stark naked. A short time since, Viscount Maller, Sub Prefect of Valenciennes, was President of the Council of Revision. A number of young conscripts had been examined, when, to the surprise of everybody, a man, fifty years old, with an immense beard and gray head, came stalking, perfectly naked, into the room. The gen-d'arme, whose business it was to introduce the conscript, had become so tired seeing naked people, he really saw no more, so listless were his eyes, and had let this old fellow in unconsciously. The Sub-Prefect exclaimed, angrily enough: "What is the meaning of this joke? What does that man want?" The peasant replied: "Why, you see here, Mr. Sub-Prefect, I've got something to say to you—something important. I have tried every way to get at you, but never could. I was told you were going to preside at the Council of Revision here to-day, and as I wanted to see you, I put on the proper costume, and here I am, Mr. Sub-Prefect, and what I want is—I want you to diminish my taxes!"

BRIGHAM YOUNG, CHIEF OF THE MORMONS.

BRIGHAM YOUNG.

MORMONISM is a great anomaly in American history. Opposed to our institutions, repugnant to our sense of decency, at variance with all our notions of virtue and propriety, derided and persecuted, it has grown and flourished, and become a formidable power in the land, which we find more expedient to tolerate than to overthrow.

When Joe Smith was killed, in 1844, it was generally supposed that the "Saints," whose principles and practice were anything but saintly, would never again effect an organization, and that their whole system, like some foul cancer, had been eradicated from the body politic; but the mantle of Smith fell upon an able and worthy successor, who had the genius to devise and the will to execute great things. That successor was Brigham Young, whose portrait we give on this page. Whatever we may think of his character and principles, he certainly possesses all the elements of a great leader, and he has succeeded in giving to his system an influence and prominence worthy of a better cause. Shrewd, imperious, unscrupulous, he is just the man for the place, and probably no one else could have formed from the same material such a massive and homogeneous structure. Salt Lake City, which has grown up under his direction and supervision, is one of the wonders of modern times, and it has become such under the imperious sway of the great Mormon autocrat.

The desert has been changed into a garden, immense wealth and resources have been created; and while exalting the power of the church, this master spirit has not neglected those material and less spiritual matters that constitute the elements of influence in the world. While requiring of his followers and subjects industry and simplicity in living, he himself is not insensible to the advantages of luxury and style, and his aim has been to impress the minds of the Saints with the notion of his own greatness and power, and the necessity of implicit obedience to his commands.

This fact is exhibited in the character of the public buildings and improvements, which are massive and imposing from their size, but destitute of architectural beauty and proportion. Zion House, his own residence, and the Theatre, are shown in our illustration. In our Eastern cities they would be rude, uncouth, intolerable; in Salt Lake City they are monuments of labor and energy expended under unfavorable circumstances, and triumphing over almost insuperable obstacles. They are the expression of the peculiar civilization of the region which, trampling upon the better instincts of our nature, cannot aspire to the refinement in art that springs from virtue and intelligence. The crowning work of Brigham's ambition will be the grand Temple which he is now erecting, and of which we give two views in our illustration. The grand feature of this structure is its size; it suggests nothing of skill and taste and progress; it is simply a massive pile of materials, that may excite curiosity, but can never inspire devotion.

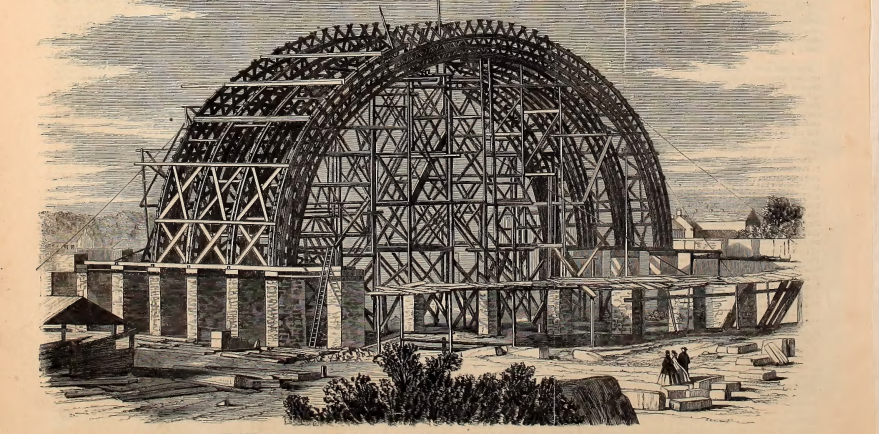
The building is in the form of an ellipse, with an extreme length of 200 feet, and width of 100; extreme height of roof, 75 feet; height of ceiling, 68 feet. The immense roof-frame rests upon 44 cut stone piers, about 12 feet apart and 30 feet in height, which gives 48 feet of spring to the arch. The 44 bents, or principal rafters forming the arch are composed of six thicknesses 2½ inch plank, framed like lattice-work, strongly pinned and bolted, and tied by 10 horizontal cross timbers on the outside, upon which the small rafters for the sheeting will be laid, and 15 similar cross timbers inside, to which the ceiling joists will be nailed. The 15 half bents, resting upon the 15 piers in curve at each end, join diagonally upon the apex of the arch of the two outside parallel bents.

The stand will be in the west end; the floor to be level for a distance of sixty or seventy feet in front of the stand, thence gradually rising to the east end, where the seats will be eight feet above the level. It is estimated that the house will seat about ten thousand persons. For freedom of ingress and egress—a very material consideration where large audiences are concerned—ample provision has been made in the folding-door appointments of the entire space, between the nine piers in line on either side. A cornice eight feet deep will surmount the stone work.

In the majestic, towering, self-supporting roof of this building, there will be consumed nearly one hundred thousand feet of lumber. When finished, it will present the appearance of a ponderous half globe, with sides slightly compressed; and though of the plain, rather than the grotesque order of architecture, from its vast proportions and striking originality of design, will make its impression upon the beholder, and stand as an imperishable monument of magnificent zeal and unparalleled unity on the part of an infatuated people.

For nearly twenty years Brigham Young has been the great Apostle of Mormonism. He has made the system what it is, and he will long be remembered as an evidence of what can be accomplished by an unbounded confidence in one's own resources, and an unswerving devotion to a simple end, together with a bold determination never to be discouraged by opposition, or yield to any obstacle. Young is now far past the prime of life, being about sixty-five years old, and must soon find his vigor impaired by the increasing weight of years and the cares incident to his position. Whether a system he has done so much to advance and establish will long survive him is a matter of doubt; but that it must soon yield to the common sentiment of our civilization few will deny. If it do not fall with its own weight, it will certainly be driven away before an enlightened and healthy public sense of propriety and right.

OUR BASE BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.



We this week commence the series of portrait illustrations of notable players in the fraternity, the first one given being that of Mr. David Sanford, of the Central City Base Ball Club of Syracuse, N. Y. We shall give these portrait pictures in the order in which we receive them, the Central City Club being the first one to reply to our circular which was sent round to every Association Club in the country. If any Clubs have not received one, we hereby notify them that we shall be happy to hear from them in relation to the history of their organization, and the name and special qualifications—moral as well as physical—of the gentleman whom they consider the best general player in their Club.

DAVID SANFORD, "CATCHER," CENTRAL CITY B. B. CLUB, SYRACUSE, NEW YORK.

Previous to the visit of the celebrated Excelsior Club to the Western part of New York State in 1860, base ball was a game comparatively unknown. But the masterly displays of the beauties of the game afforded by the Excelsior nine during their tour, created quite a furore for it among the young men of the State from Albany to Buffalo, and among the clubs that began to enter into the spirit of the exercise, was the Syracuse Club, which was first organized in 1858. When the war of the rebellion broke out in 1861, and the mimic conflicts of the ball-field were changed to those of the blood and carnage of the battle-fields of grim "visaged war," the Syracuse Club, like others of the fraternity, laid by the bats and balls and took up the musket and bullets, and until 1865 the club lay dormant. In that year, however, it was reorganized, and at the last Convention of the National Association, entered the Convention as the Central City Club of Syracuse, N. Y., and is now one of the flourishing organizations of the Western portion of our State. So much for the club. Now for its best general player, Mr. David Sanford, the catcher of the first nine of the club.

Mr. Sanford is a young man under twenty years of age, of medium height, compact build, and possessed of considerable muscular power. He is agile in his movements and naturally graceful, and plays the game from the first inning to the last, win or lose, as earnestly and attentively to the interests and good name of his club as if his whole heart was in the contest. With accurate eye for measuring distances, he watches he movement of the ball from the start, and batting it readily with either hand on the fly, or sharp from the ground, throws it accurately to the point where it is required. Being specially qualified to fill the position of catcher, to that he is generally assigned; but he can play a base beautifully, and he is valuable in the field. His accurate throwing to bases from the catcher's position is a feature of his play, his precision being up to the mark of that of George Wright, of the Gotham Club of this city, who stands unsurpassed in this respect. As a batsman he is a powerful hitter, and makes good average scores. Noteworthy as are his physical qualifications, however, we have specially to speak in praiseworthy terms of his moral attributes. Well educated, with ample means for all reasonable wants, and attentive to his business, as an ardent admirer of the game he devotes all his spare time to the manly exercise, it being his chief recreation while in season. Modest and unassuming, and a young man of strict integrity of character, he has won hosts of friends, as much by his gentlemanly deportment as by his skillful play. No one will be more surprised than himself on seeing this notice and the accompanying vignette. In conclusion, we append a few extracts from some of the Western New York papers commenting upon his play in matches which have taken place within the past year. In one of these games he went through the match without allowing a ball to pass him on which a base was made.

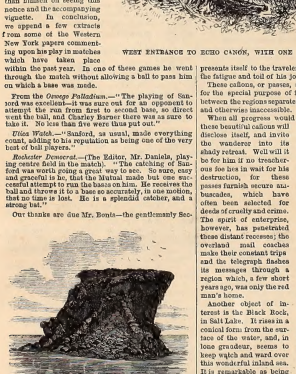
From the Geneva Palladium.—"The playing of Sanford was excellent—it was sure out for an opponent to attempt the run from first to second base, so direct went the ball, and Charley Barney there was as sure to take it. No less than five were thus put out."

Utica Watch.—"Sanford, as usual, made everything count, adding to his reputation as being one of the very best of ball players."



Rochester Democrat.—(The Editor, Mr. Daniels, playing centre field in the match). "The catching of Sanford was worth going a great way to see. So sure, easy and graceful is he, that the Mutual made but one successful attempt to run the bases on him. He receives the ball and throws it to a base so accurately, in one motion, that no time is lost. He is a splendid catcher, and a strong bat."

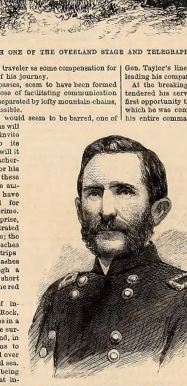
Our thanks are due Mr. Bonts—the gentlemanly Secretary of the Central City Club—for the prompt response to our circular.

Next week the portrait of Mr. Adam North, of the Empire Club, St. Louis, Mo., will be given, as the second of our series.

WEST ENTRANCE TO ECHO CANON, WITH ONE OF THE OVERLAND STAGE AND TELEGRAPH STATIONS, FORTY MILES EAST OF SALT LAKE CITY.

BLACK ROCK, IN GREAT SALT LAKE, UTAH TERRITORY.

ECHO CANON.



Our view of this famous pass, on the great route to the Western portions of the national domain, will convey some idea of the wonderful scenery that presents itself to the traveler as some compensation for the fatigue and toil of his journey.

These cañons, or passes, seem to have been formed for the special purpose of facilitating communication between the regions separated by lofty mountain-chains, and otherwise inaccessible.

When all progress would seem to be barred, one of these beautiful cañons will discloss itself, and invite the wanderer into its shady retreat. Well will it be for him if no treacherous foe lies in wait for his destruction, for these passes furnish secure ambuscades, which have often been selected for deeds of cruelty and crime. The spirit of enterprise, however, has penetrated these distant recesses; the overland mail coaches make their constant trips and the telegraph flashes its messages through a region which, a few short years ago, was only the red man's home.

Another object of interest is the Black Rock, in Salt Lake. It rises in a conical form from the surface of the water, and, in lone grandeur, seems to keep watch and ward over this wonderful inland sea. It is remarkable as being the only object that interrupts the wide expanse, as you look from the Mormon capitol.

To the tourist and artist this entire region presents grand attractions. Nature is revealed in all her moods, and he must be insensible who does not recognize and enjoy her charms, so lavishly displayed.

BRIG.-GEN. P. E. CONNOR, COMMANDING DISTRICT OF UTAH.

GEN. P. E. CONNOR.

BRIG.-GEN. P. E. CONNOR was born in Ireland, in 1820, and came to the United States with his parents at a very early age.

At the breaking out of the Mexican war he was living in Texas, and immediately tendered his services to his adopted country on the call for volunteers, being with the celebrated Captain Walker, of that State, the first volunteer officer mustered into service. He served on Gen. Taylor's line, and was severely wounded, while leading his company, at the battle of Buena Vista.

At the breaking out of the late rebellion he again tendered his services, on behalf of his country, the first opportunity that offered, and raised a regiment, of which he was commissioned Colonel, expecting, as did his entire command, to be called into active service East; but it was decided otherwise, and in the summer of 1862 he marched a column into Utah, where, with the exception of a shorter interval, he has since been stationed in command of the district.

In the winter of 1862-3 he undertook a campaign against the hostile Indians, who then infested all the lines of travel through the Territory, and at the battle of Bear River, fought on the 29th of January, 1863, he, with the troops under his command, gained a signal victory over the savages, completely breaking their power for mischief, and compelling them to sue humbly for a peace, which they still faithfully keep.

With his career in Utah against the power of Brigham Young the world is tolerably familiar, and it is sufficient to say that the policy he has inaugurated and persistently pushed forward, of developing the mines and encouraging "Gentile" immigration, is fast undermining the strongholds of polygamy, and will yet cause them to topple to their fall. While compelling the respect of his Mormon adversaries, he is probably by them the most warmly hated man in the world. Neither by threats or cajolery have they found it possible to swerve him from his duty to his country.

Gen. Connor is one of the many examples which our country affords of what great energy, joined with marked ability, may accomplish under the inspiration of institutions which second and encourage the attempts of the young and ambitious aspirants. Without wealth or political influence, but solely by his own unaided efforts, he has raised himself to a position of honor and affluence, to which his services and energy have richly entitled him.

SPIDERS.

In order to test what a spider could do in the way of eating, we arose about daybreak one morning to supply his fine web with a fly. At first, however, the spider did not come from his retreat, so we prepared among the leaves, and there discovered that an earwig had been caught, and was now being feasted on. The spider left the earwig, rolled up the fly, and at once returned to his "first course." This was at half-past five A. M., in September. At seven A. M., the earwig had been demolished; and the spider, after resting a little while, and probably enjoying a nap, came down for the fly, which he had polished by nine A. M. A little after nine we supplied him with a daddy-long-legs, which was eaten by noon. At one o'clock a blow-fly was greedily seized, and with an appetite apparently no worse for his previous indigestion, he commenced on the blow-fly. During the day and toward the evening, a great many small green flies, or what are popularly termed midges, had been caught in the web, of these we counted 178, all dead, and fast prisoners in the spider's net. Soon after dark, provided with a lantern, we went to examine whether the spider was suffering at all from indigestion, or in any other way from his previous meals; instead, however, of being thus affected, he was employed in rolling up together the various little green midges, which he then took to his retreat, and ate; this process he repeated, carrying up the lots in little detachments, until the whole were thus eaten, for the web and its contents were bundled up together. A slight rent of about an hour was followed by the most industrious webmaking process, and before daybreak, another web was ready to be used in the same way.

Taking the relative size of the spider and of the creatures it ate, and applying this to a man, it would be somewhat as follows: At daybreak, a small slingshot was eaten; at seven A. M., a lunch of nine A. M., a young cannibeagal; at one o'clock, a sheep; and during the night, 150 lbs. of ham, we believe, would be a very moderate allowance for man during the twenty-four; and although we find that the spider's appetite and digestion, we can readily comprehend how he might span five miles of web without killing himself, provided he possessed the necessary machinery.

AROMATIC TREES.—A very common tree in the Ilhas de Mata, is the Breu branco, which secretes from the inner bark a white resin, resembling camphor in smell and appearance. The fruit is a small black berry, and the whole tree—fruit, leaf and stem—has the same aromatic fragrance. By loosening the bark and allowing the resin to flow freely, I collected a large quantity, and found it of great service in preserving my insect collections from the attacks of ants and mites. Another tree, much rarer than the Breu branco, viz., the Umiri (Sumirium floribundum), growing in the same localities, distils in a similar way an oil of a most recherché fragrance. The yield, however, is very small. The native women esteem it highly as a scent. To obtain a supply of the precious liquid, large strips of bark are loosened, and pieces of cane left in each, and forcibly by visiting the tree day and pressing the oil from the bottom, a small pint, containing about an ounce, may be filled in the course of a month.

THE MORMON THEATRE.

"ZION", HOUSE, THE RESIDENCE OF BRIGHAM YOUNG.

TO MY WIFE AT THE SEASIDE.

Alone, in my own quiet office,
I sit and I smoke my cigar,
And I think of the "guid" wife who loves me,
But who has departed so far:
I think of her, lovely and noble,
And hopeful, and fearless, and true,
And I think of the blessing God gave me,
My own darling Fannie, in you.

The clock that you gave me, my dearest,
Points nigh to the "small hours'" chime,
And I sit in the arm-chair you gave me
On a long ago Christmas time;
And the smoke curls up from the ashes,
Fantastic in colors so blue,
As my heart is exhaling devotion,
My dearest, my sweetest, for you.

Ah, me! 'tis a pleasure unspoken
To feel that, wherever you be,
A heart that is true and unbroken
Is beating its life-throbs for me.
We know not our blessings when present,
And count them but paltry and few;
So while you were with me I knew not
How deep my affection for you.

And the children—how are they, I wonder,
As they sit by the side of the sea,
And hear both its murmurs and thunder?—
Oh, teach them remembrance of me.
And, darling, at morn, when the breezes
Blow freshly o'er waters so blue,
Let thy spirit be wafted toward me,
As my heart will be yearning for you.

The girl, with her wonderful sweetness,
The boy, with his calm, earnest eyes,
Oh, these are the jewels I cherish,
The blessings most highly I prize;
And their mother, who loves them so dearly,
So steadfast, and honest, and true—
God bless them, and keep them forever,
My children, my darling, and you.

"THAT'S ME;"

OR,

THE JEALOUS HUSBAND CURED.

"Where there is no love, there can be no jealousy," is a common saying, but how is it where love really exists? Is there not often good reason for becoming jealous? So old John Damon thought.

Perhaps John would feel insulted if any person should address him with the prefix of old, for he called himself a young man. True, his hair was white, but his form was that of an athlete. True, he had toiled in his own counting-house for thirty years of married life, but he often declared himself younger than he was the day he led his Matilda to the altar.

Now his fair spouse was ten years younger than her lord, and was a remarkably well-preserved specimen of forty. Indeed, she was quite handsome, and John appeared fully to appreciate her charms. He evidently became more fond of his wife each day, and up to the moment that their ages reached, respectively, forty and fifty, not a cloud of jealousy had ever darkened their sky. The husband had always been a paragon of devotion, and never was absent from his "lovey," even for a single evening, save on one occasion; and at the time referred to, he was compelled to make a voyage to the East Indies, in connection with his business, and for two years Mrs. Damon was left inconsolable.

But at the end of that time, John returned, rushed to "the bosom of his family," and recorded an oath that nothing, save a matter of life and death, should ever tear him from his home-joys again.

We made the remark, "the bosom of his family." John's family simply consisted of himself and wife, and a young niece of sixteen summers. Clara was an orphan, and had been adopted by the Damons, they being childless, a fact which they appeared much to regret. Clara was of a romantic turn of mind—even a little wild—but innocent and truly good, confiding and generous. She was almost idolized by her aunt, but her uncle, although he felt a sincere affection for her, declared that she, like all other young girls, wanted watching, and the idea of her having a beau before she was twenty years of age was thoroughly ridiculous. It should never be allowed so long as he was the master of his own house, and she its inmate.

John resided a few miles in the country, where beaux to Clara's liking were not as plentiful as in the metropolis. And so the master of the Damon mansion had been spared the necessity of kicking any one into the street on his niece's account.

One summer evening, just after the sun had sunk to rest, and the moon had arisen, throwing its soft and uncertain light among the huge trees by which the mansion was surrounded, John was walking in his garden. It was an unusual thing for him to be alone, but it so happened on this occasion. Suddenly he paused. Something had attracted his attention; something like the figure of a man. This figure was partially concealed by a large rose-bush which grew near the library window. John crept cautiously forward. He listened.

"If he is so suspicious, you must conceal my visits. I truly love you, and cannot live without you."

These words were spoken by the strange visitor. But he had scarcely finished the sentence, when he caught sight of John's crouching figure, and be started off in an instant, and was lost to view.

"Mysterious!" thought John. "Can't be that he was speaking to the servant. The young man was too genteel in appearance, and Biddy has no business in the library. Must have been Clara. And yet I saw a light at her window and herself standing by it, only an instant since. Good gracious! If it should be—Pshaw, John! You ought to be ashamed of yourself. Suspect Mrs. D., when she's been a paragon of patience and virtue for thirty years? Perish the thought."

John was about to turn away and enter his house, when he saw an arm partially extended from the window, the hand grasping a handkerchief, which it was waving to some object in the distance. A thought occurred to him. He clutched at the cambric, and secured it. But the arm was withdrawn in an instant. John sprang forward in order to get a sight of the person within the library, but the lamp on the centre-table was extinguished, and he only caught a glimpse of a female form.

He hastened to the hall door and entered. He threw open the door leading into the library, and from the rays of the hall lamp, he saw a female. He started back as a look revealed the fact that it was Mrs. D. Jealousy entered his heart in an instant. But he conquered his emotion, and entering the apartment, asked:

"Matilda, my lovey, how does it happen that you are in the dark?"

"Can it ever be dark where you are, Damon?" asked the wife.

"She calls me Damon without the prefix dear or the affix lovey," thought John, "and her voice trembles, too." But he asked again:

"Why did you extinguish the library lamp?"

"I didn't do it. It must have been the wind."

"There isn't wind enough to move the down on a goose," thought John, as he proceeded to relight the lamp. This done, he glanced at the handkerchief. He gave a convulsive start, and then began a search on one corner of the linen. The initials "M. D." were upon it.

John gave a yell which would have done honor to a Sioux warrior, and then commenced pacing up and down the apartment in the most frantic manner. This he continued for some time, much to the apparent astonishment of Mrs. D. At length, however, he approached his wife, and holding forth the cambric, he exclaimed:

"Your handkerchief, madam."

"Thank you, Damon. Where did you find it, dear?"

"In the garden, madam."

"I presume the wind blew it out of the window, for I left it on the book-case a few moments since."

Damon began to pace up and down the room again.

"What is the matter, Damon? Why are you acting so strangely?"

"Acting! That's it, madam. Fire and furies, death and the devil, madam! It's enough to make a man act."

"To what do you refer?"

"Othello, madam. You've seen Othello played, havn't you?"

"Yes. He became jealous of his wife without cause, and killed her."

"Did he—without cause? Well, I'm jealous, and am going to play the Moor without cause."

"But I hope you won't murder your wife."

"Don't know, madam. When I get excited, I don't know what I might do."

"Well, if you really are going to act, I suppose you will remain in the city late in the evening. Of course you will take me with you."

"She wants to be left behind when I am gone," thought John. "I'll pretend to go. Good plan to catch the lover."

That night Damon made an effort to be cheerful. The next afternoon, he announced it as his intention to visit the city, stating that he should probably not return until late in the evening. Then he took his departure, after having coldly saluted Mrs. D., ordered Clara to her own room, and given his watch-dog a kick which sent him howling to his kennel.

That evening about eight o'clock Mrs. Damon entered the library, and took her seat upon a sofa near the window. Once or twice she heard a slight sound which momentarily attracted her attention. Then she was startled by the figure of a young man, who leaped from behind the sofa on which she was seated, and made his way rapidly for the open window. Her surprise was too great for a moment, to cry out, even if she had felt inclined to do so. But she half suspected the real cause of the intruder's presence.

Scarcely had the young man reached the window, when the furious barking of the dog outside told him of danger in passing that way. He therefore returned, deeming it much more safe to face the mistress of that mansion than the animal.

"Do you usually enter and depart from people's dwellings by the windows, young gentleman?" asked Mrs. Damon.

"I usually do, so far as your dwelling is concerned!" replied the young man, in a good-natured tone.

"Usually!" echoed Mrs. Damon. "Then you have been here before?"

"Several times, madam."

"Well, sir, as yet I have never missed anything of value."

"But, madam, after a few more visits, you may do so."

"Then you are a robber?"

"I don't know as I can be called a robber in the common acceptation of the term. But as I have been robbed by an inmate of this house, I think I have a right to retaliate."

"And pray, sir, of what have you been robbed here?"

"My heart, madam."

"Indeed! And who has stolen away the heart of so handsome a young gentleman as yourself?"

"She is quizzing or complimenting me," thought the young man. "She calls me handsome. I'll be even with her." He, therefore, threw himself first into a theatrical attitude, and then upon his knees, exclaiming, in an extravagant manner;

"You, dear lady, you have my heart; and since you give me the assurance that I possess your own, let me suggest an instant flight from—"

"Thunder and Mars! I've caught you, have I?" cried Damon, as he burst open the door, and entered at that instant, almost bursting with rage He had just been in time to hear the last sentence of the young man, and to witness his position. Approaching the stranger, he exclaimed:

"So, sir, you propose an elopement with Mrs. D., do you?"

"Certainly I do," replied the young man, bursting into a merry laugh.

"And you, madam," continued Damon, turning to his wife, "may—shall leave my house in an hour. As for this upstart, I'll settle with him, just as soon as I can get my pistols."

Saying which, he again blustered from the room.

"You see that your folly is likely to create trouble," exclaimed Mrs. Damon, after her husband had left the apartment. "Now you will be kind enough to explain?"

"Certainly, madam. I thought you were making sport of me, when you called me handsome, and my words and acts were simply intended as a joke."

"But why did you visit the house at all?"

"I will tell you now, frankly. I became acquainted with Miss Clara nearly a year since. I called upon her once or twice at that time. I was then compelled to be absent for a time. Two weeks ago I returned to the city. I have visited Clara three times. The reason I did not come openly was, she informed me that her uncle would not permit it."

"You were here last night?"

"Yes, madam."

"And you saw Clara to-night?"

"I saw Clara standing at her own window, and spoke with her an instant. I had just entered this library through this window, when I saw you. I hid behind the sofa. But a moment after I saw Clara through the side door. She motioned me to leap out of the window. I felt satisfied that if I attempted to remain concealed, you would discover me. Indeed, knowing that your husband was in the city, or at least supposing so, I came to the conclusion to see you, declare my love for your niece, and pray you to use your influence with her fiery uncle in my behalf. I attempted to escape by the window. I thought if I could do so, and then enter by the door like a gentleman, it would appear much better. But you discovered me, and my situation was so extremely ridiculous, that I thought I might as well turn the whole affair into a joke, having been informed by Clara that you were a lover of fun."

"Well, you see the result of your fun. My husband finds you on your knees to me, declaring your passion, and proposing flight. He, of course, has a right to be jealous; and, no doubt, as soon as he returns, will shoot you. Will you call that a joke?"

"But I can explain to him."

"He may not believe you."

"Let me marry Clara, and then he will."

"Really, young man, you are not overstocked with modesty."

"Perhaps not, madam. I have always had to make my own way through the world, and as the markets have usually stood, I never found that article at par."

"I doubt whether you ever invested in it. But pray tell me, since you propose an alliance with my niece, who and what are you?"

"I believe my name is Edward Lamar. I was born in the East Indies, twenty years since. I have no recollection of my father, and my mother died while I was quite young. I received some kindness, however, at the hands of a gentleman, was placed at school for a short time, but my patron died, and I was left alone. I sailed for the New World. The war then raging opened a field to me. I connected myself with the navy, and now wear an anchor in its service."

"That is much in your favor. But what of your father?"

"I have heard but little of him."

"You were born in the Indies twenty years ago, you say? My husband was there about that time. Perhaps he knew your father?"

"Possibly. And all I know of him myself I will freely tell you."

"Proceed."

"I have been informed that my father was an American, and that, something over twenty years ago, he took passage from New York for the Indies. Among the passengers, there was a young and beautiful lady. During the tedium of a long voyage, my father and this young woman became much attached to each other."

"Very natural—quite natural."

"Yes, madam, so natural, that I am that gentleman's natural son."

"Indeed! And after this confession, do you still presume to press your claim for Clara's hand?"

"I certainly do, madam; and as the fault was none of mine, I certainly shall expect that a sensible lady like yourself will not raise it as an objection. Besides, I am sure that my father was respectable, for a likeness I have in my possession, of himself, has a noble appearance. Of course he don't look now, if he is still living, as he did twenty years since, when this picture was taken. Look at it, madam," continued the young man, presenting the painting.

Oh, no, I don't wish to look upon his face. He must be a horrible monster."

"But you say your husband was in India about that time. He may be able to throw some light upon my birth. I beg of you to look at the picture."

Mrs. Damon took the painting, glanced at it, and gave utterance to a half-suppressed shriek. But she quickly recovered herself, and said to the young man:

"Edward Lamar, I hear my husband coming; be kind enough to step into the next apartment; I will call you presently."

Edward obeyed. Scarcely had he left the library by one door, when John Damon entered by another. His eyes glared, he was pale, and his short, white hair stood erect. He expected to find his wife in tears, but she stood proudly erect to receive him. And she asked:

"Damon, have you come to order me from the house?"

"I have come for an explanation, madam."

"You shall have it—get me a chair."

The husband was somewhat astonished at the cool manner of his wife, but he did as she commanded him, and then took a seat himself.

"Proceed," he said.

"You will first proceed to question me, and I will answer."

"Very well. Did you not stand or sit by that window last evening, and hold converse with a young man whom I saw in this apartment a few moments since?"

"I did not."

"Did you not afterward signal the same person with your handkerchief?"

"I did not."

"Such proceedings I witnessed between that young man and some female. Who could the latter person have been?"

"No doubt, Clara."

"Humph! Perhaps you will deny that I found a young man upon his knees to you in this apartment, a short time since, and that I heard him speak of an elopement with you?"

"I will not deny this."

"You can't."

"Then you are really jealous?"

"I should think so."

"And you will drive me from your house?"

"Unless you make satisfactory explanations."

"I will do so. Listen to me, Damon. For thirty years I have been your wife; you never suspected me until last night?"

"Never."

"And have you never given me reason to suspect you?"

"That's a matter to be settled hereafter. Speak of yourself, madam."

"I will. Twenty-two years ago you sailed for India, leaving me behind."

"My absence was unavoidable, and I could not take you with me."

"I was left alone for two years, Damon?"

"With all your little comforts around you, Mrs. D."

"I was young?"

"Just eighteen when I sailed."

"You had often told me that I was beautiful?"

"What is coming now?"

"I was surrounded by flatterers?"

"I believe I'm going to faint," groaned Damon.

"No wonder, then, that I should ——"

"Hold, madam! don't speak the damning word until I get my breath."

Damon sprung to his feet, strode up and down the room, tore his hair, and beat upon his breast. But after a time he became more calm, and exclaimed:

"Go on, madam; speak, if you can bring your tongue to utter your own shame."

"It is with shame I speak it—the result of your absence was——"

"Was what, madam?" almost shrieked the frantic man.

"The result was, that young man you saw kneeling at my feet."

Damon was for a time speechless. He gasped like a person strangling, clutched his throat, and after the most desperate effort, cried:

"Where is his father? Show him to me. I'll tear him limb from limb!"

"He deserves it," coolly replied Mrs. D. "But here is the villain's portrait; take it; it will assist you in finding the fellow."

Damon seized the painting, and clutched it with a madman's gripe, as if the ivory was sensible of pain. He paced up and down the room with rapid strides, declaring that the instant he set his eyes upon the father he would annihilate him. But at length he paused near the light, and glanced at the painting. He started back—his anger appeared to vanish in an instant, and surprise take its place. The words which escaped him as he gazed upon the painting were simply:

"That's me!"

It was Damon's own portrait. But for all this, he found forgiveness; and Edward and Clara will, no doubt, be married in time. Damon has promised to take no more voyages to India without Matilda.

Fun at Home.—Don't be afraid of a little fun at home. Don't shut your house lest the sun should fade your carpets, and your hearts, lest a hearty laugh shake down some of the musty old cobwebs there! If you want to ruin your sons, let them think that all mirth and social enjoyment must be left on the threshold without, when they come home at night. When once a home is regarded as only a place to eat, drink and sleep in, the work is begun that ends in gambling-houses and reckless degradation. Young people must have fun and relaxation somewhere; if they do not find it at their own hearthstones, it will be sought at other and less profitable places. Therefore let the fire burn brightly at night, and make the homestead delightful with all those little arts that parents so perfectly understand. Don't repress the buoyant spirits of your children; half an hour's merriment round the lamp and firelight of home, blots out the remembrance of many a care and annoyance during the day, and the best safeguard they can take with them into the world is the influence of a bright little domestic sanctum.

Judge H———, of Northwestern Illinois, tells the following story of his early practice: "Soon after I commenced the practice of law I was engaged in trying a small matter of accounts before a justice of the peace, another young lawyer being employed on the other side. There was not much to be said, it is true; and about the time we got through with the testimony I noticed the justice figuring on a piece of paper and writing in the docket. As soon as the last witness was through I got up to argue my side of the case. The court, who was of a thirsty temperament, got up, and as he left the bench said, coolly: 'Young men, you can go on with your arguments; I will be in pretty soon. The judgment is $50!' We didn't proceed."

THE MOTHER TO HER SLEEPING BABE.

Sleep, baby, sleep: thy soft blue eyes,
Whose beaming looks I fondly prize,
Are closing now in sweet repose,
Unscared by pain or earthly woes.
Yes, sleep in peace: thy mother's breast
Pillows thy rest.

Sleep, baby, sleep: nay, do not start;
'Tis but thy mother's beating heart
Whose pulses throb against thy cheek,
Full of the love she need not speak.
Sleep, and dream on; thy mother's arm
Shields thee from harm.

Ah, dost thou smile? Are angels near,
Whispering sweet music in thine ear?
Bright ministers from God above,
Watching the children of his love?
Sleep safely now; their wings are spread
Around thy head.

Sweetly, my babe, thou sleepest now,
With parted lips and placid brow;
Not yet has pain or anxious care
Printed harsh lines of sorrow there.
Sleep, sleep in peace; thy mother's ear
Is list'ning near.

Omnipotent of earth and heaven,
By whom all earthly joys are given,
Thou only to a mother's heart
Can this undying love impart.
I thank Thee still for every bliss—
But most for this.

A Maori Love Tale.

The following narrative is a true one. It happened, not many years ago, in the most beautiful part of New Zealand, the Bay of Islands, so aptly named, and so well known as a regular resort of the American sperm whale fisheries for fruits, vegetables and supplies, in the end of the summer season, from the month of February to May.

The Bay of Islands, so named from the many beautiful little islets which bestud its blue, translucent waters, runs many miles inland, indenting the woody slopes with deep sheltered bays, where ships can ride in safety, untouched by any storm, as they idly rock on their smooth, glassy surface.

Scattered up and down these bays, and on its many islets, dwell one of the most powerful as well as most numerous of the Maori tribes, called the Ngapuhi. This tribe is perhaps the most warlike of all the native race, not excepting the powerful inland tribe of the Waikatos, their natural, hereditary and most bitter foes. Between these two great tribes perpetual warfare has ever existed, and many and varied the raids the one has made on the other, with alternate success and defeat on either side; and many are the Taurekas, or slaves, captured in those excursions, to be found in both tribes. Formerly but small mercy was shown to any so captured, especially if they happened to be old, weak, or children; mercilessly they were butchered, and then cooked. Only the strong, and those likely to be useful, escaped this fate, to be doomed to one of longer continuance, but perhaps scarcely less merciful than a swift and speedy death, for their after-life was to be one of perpetual slavery: not theirs alone, for their misfortune descended to their children, and their children's children after them. Henceforth their strength, their substance, the fruits of their toil, the offspring of their bodies, were all alike the property of their captor; they held their very life merely on sufferance, and existed only as long as it pleased the caprice or suited the interests of those who owned them.

Though originally of the same blood and kin, descended from the same great ancestor, Maori—owning one common father, speaking the same tongue, nurtured on the same soil, they became a distinct and marked race; they had, with rare exceptions, no voice in the affairs of the tribes, no influence in the counsels of the people—looked upon as so many tools to manufacture food and minister to the pleasures and wants, the whims and caprices of their lords and masters. In a word, they were Taurekas, or slaves—Taureka, a name most offensive of any to a free-born native New Zealander.

Well, nigh forty years ago, when the ships of the white men began to touch regularly at Kororarika, (the native name of the Bay of Islands) and exchanged muskets, and balls, and powder, for potatoes, and kunieras, and yams, the Ngapuhi, newly armed with the white man's thunder and lightning, more destructive in its effects than that of Jove of old, resolved to pay their old enemies, the Waikatos, a by no means friendly visit. War canoes were fitted out, skins newly tatooed and painted, feathers donned, and in all the other rude panoply of Maori warfare, they started on their expedition, part of them overland, by long and forced marches, and the remainder over the ofttimes boisterous seas, in large double-tree hewn canoes.

At length they all met at the agreed-upon rendezvous, and came suddenly on their unexpected foe. It matters not to the interest of my tale to tell of the onslaught upon so many comparatively defenseless victims. All in vain the Waikatos fought, undaunted by the new and fearful weapons of their invaders. Spears and clubs proved of small avail against the afar-off death-dealing powder and bullets. Many a brave foe bit the dust; many a young warrior sought and found in death his first and last laurels—alas! not of victory, but next best to triumph, a death on the field, fighting bravely for hearths and homes. Many a poor woman and helpless child fell victims to the ruthless fury of their unsparing destroyers. Many bodies were roasted and eaten. And many more, the strength of the unfortunate tribe, followed sadly and submissively their captors home.

The vengeance of the Ngapuhis being amply satisfied, their horrid cannibal propensity more than gratified, with booty and spoils of war in the shape of spears and clubs, stores of food and many captors, they betook themselves once more to their canoes, and paddled and sailed their seaward voyage home, where, after a few days' prosperous journey, they safely arrived.

Among the many captives taken, was a young girl, spared by the old chief, Kaiteke, her captor, on account of her birth as a rangatira nui's (great chief's) daughter, and her promise of great future beauty. Her name was Ataahua, (the form of beauty.)

To his whare or hut he took her, and confided her to the care of his chief wife, thinking her too young to excite jealousy among his numerous wives, and hoping, for the present at least, Waitua, his oldest one, would look upon her and treat her as a daughter. He was not deceived. Waitua's heart, savage though she was, warmed to the poor bereft orphan, and she took her under her protection and fostering care. The years passed, and the captive girl, in that fair, genial clime, quickly ripened into a dark-eyed, beautiful woman.

Another eye, however, besides the old man's, had noted her fast-growing charms, another heart was stricken with a warmer, stronger feeling than even that of the hot but old and passionate chief. That eye and that heart belonged to the old man's first-born and only son, Re-whare-wa, the only child of Waitua, his first wife, and Waitua herself favored her son, as a mother always will. Despite her strong suspicion, or perhaps, rather, owing to it, that her husband intended the damsel for himself, she gave her son every opportunity she could and dared, to see Ata, as she was generally called.

And Ata was not slow to mark the difference between the young, active, well-formed Re-whare-wa, and the old gray-headed, though still strong-willed and powerful Kaiteke. Naturally, she, too, favored the youth, and all the more, perhaps, that their meetings had to be secret ones, and at rare and distant intervals.

Many other eyes and many other hearts were alike smitten by Ata's dark eyes and blushing charms. All the young men of the tribe cast longing eyes toward her, but well knowing the superior claims of their head-chief and his son, could only look on afar off, and long in vain for fruit far beyond their reach.

Whether the old chief knew, or, "knowing, seemed not to know," with all a savage's innate secretiveness of word and thought, his son's too evident partiality for Ata, I cannot say; he neither by word or sign manifested any such knowledge. On the contrary, he seemed to make no objection to their intercourse whenever, which happened but seldom, he found them together. And so time passed, and the girl and boy loved each other with all the passion and warmth of youth's first love. At length the old man's health began to fail, and the time of his departure hence seemed to be drawing nigh.

One fine summer's day he asked his brother to give him his gun, ready loaded, as he would like to fire one more shot before he went forth to the land of spirits. His brother gave it him, and then the old man desired his wives to be sent for, as he wished to bid them all good-by, and Ata among the rest. As soon as the girl appeared with the other women, the old wretch deliberately raised the gun, and taking aim at her, fired. Uttering a loud shriek, the women rushed round her, expecting every moment to see her drop on the ground in the agonies of death. To their great surprise, she remained standing, quiet, and apparently unhurt. The gun had not been loaded with ball, for the chief's brother had guessed his intention, and thus frustrated it.

Then the old man wailed out his rage and indignation. "I am growing old and my authority is departing from me; the strength of my arm is failing, the sight of mine eyes is fast dimming, and my young men regard not my words. My own brother, the son of my mother, heeds me not. I go forth to the land of spirits unaccompanied, and the wife I had chosen to share with me the journey does not accompany me."

And then, as if rage and baffled intentions had put, for the time, fresh strength into his limbs, he started up, and throwing around him his flaxen mat, peremptorily ordered Ata to follow him. His "houi," or stone club, the symbol of his chieftainship, hung from his right wrist. Ata, folding closely around her her solitary robe of birds' skins, followed, trembling, his footsteps. None of the others dared to interfere, but silently watched the pair, as Kaiteke led the way to the edge of a high rocky precipice overlooking the sea, and on the top of which his kainga was built. As soon as they reached the overhanging ledge of the rock, Kaiteke ordered Ata to take her stand before him, and then pushed her off. With a loud, unearthly scream, the poor girl disappeared, and the other women, setting up a loud tangi, rushed down to the seaside to find her mangled body lying on the stones below. On reaching the beach, to their great delight they found it was high-tide, and saw the head of the girl out of the water, some distance from shore, and herself striking bravely and boldly out for a small island in the distance, and on which Kaiteke's brother lived.

This island they saw the girl safely reach and wade up out of the water to Hoani's hut, enter it, and there remain. Old Kaiteke saw none of it, satisfied that the girl was now his own, if not in this world, in the one to which he thought he had sent her. He stood a few moments longer on the rock, and then returned to his whare, or hut. Here, seating himself on the ground, he sang his parting song, which is still preserved among his tribe:

"I am falling, quickly falling, to the regions down below,
I have sent my love before me, I haste to follow now;
The shadows and the darkness have passed from off my soul,
The glory and the brightness before my vision roll;
I see the land of spirits, and she, the fairest of them all
Is calling, loudly calling—I hasten to her call.
My bitterest foes have fallen—they stand on yonder shore,
Awaiting now my coming—their lord and master evermore.
Farewell to ye, my people—a long and last farewell;
My deeds I leave behind me, for other tongues to tell."

Once more he rushed out to the rock, and casting himself off it, was dashed to pieces on the broken boulders below.

But not yet had Re-whare-wa gained his love. Hoani, his uncle, refused to give up the girl. He, too, had become enamored of her, and resolved, now he had her in his possession, to keep her. The poor girl, twice rescued from a fearful death, sat disconsolate, and pined for Waitua, who was to her as her mother, and her well-loved Re-whare-wa.

Very jealously Hoani guarded her and watched her; but love is even quicker and stronger than jealousy itself, and one morning the girl was missing. Hoani had that day, unfortunately for him, received a bottle of rum from a whaling ship, and not able to withstand the temptation, had drunk himself into a state of unconsciousness. In the silence of the night the girl once more swam across the channel, undaunted by the dark night, rough sea, or prowling shark, and favored by fortune, reached Tepuna, Re-whare-wa's village, in safety. The next morning, Hoani, taking with him some twenty or thirty of his young men, started to bring her back. They arrived at Tepuna, to find both the lovers were gone, whither none knew, or if knowing, would not tell. Shortly afterward Waitua disappeared, and for years naught more was heard of any of the three.

Hoani had been dead some time, and the loves of Ata and Re-whare-wa were fast being forgotten, when one day a young chief of the Ngapuhi, having lost his way in the forest, whilst pigeon-shooting, after wandering about two days and one night, came upon a smal clearing in the heart of the forest, on the banks of a small fresh-water stream. Approaching it, he saw two whares (huts); entering one, he found a very old, white-haired woman, nursing an infant, and two or three older children playing about inside the hut. Asking her name, he found it was Waitua, the mother of Re-whare-wa, and that here they had found shelter and a home. He staid until Re-whare-wa's and Ata's return from the forest, and next morning started back again, accompanied by Re-whare-wa, to his tribe.

Ahuareka, their grandchild, is at this present day the reigning beauty of the tribe of the Ngapuhis.

INCIDENTS OF THE GREAT FIRE AT PORTLAND.

No one who has not witnessed the ruins of a great fire like that of Portland, can form any conception of the fearful dreariness and desolation it produces. It is a sad reflection that a simple spark of fire, dropped by the carelessness of a child, and caught up by the winds of heaven, should, in a single night, annihilate the labors of thousands of industrious and energetic men, working for twenty years in rearing pleasant homes and haunts of restless activity.

But fire does its work with terrible thoroughness, and what a few days ago was a beautiful, active, throbbing city, is now a desolate waste, a scarred, and scorched, and blackened monument of ruin.

The city was particularly cheerful, both by its location and by the character of its street architecture and ornaments. It occupies a peninsula which may be roughly described as a crescent-shaped valley lying between two hills. The rising ground to the south and west was the newest Portland, being mainly covered by handsome private houses, many of them of brown stone, almost all of them large, and either surrounded by pleasant gardens, or situated in streets beautifully overarched by avenues of the beautiful New England elm, that most graceful and noble of our American trees.

Below this western quarter stretches the valley above spoken of, which may be said to be divided longitudinally into two sections, the southern of which comprises the heavy wharfage and commercial business section of the city; while the northern, so far as occupied, is occupied by streets in which the lighter retail stores, the "shopping establishments" of the city, were established, together with the finest public buildings, such as the City Hall, the Custom House, the principal churches, the Natural History Society buildings, the Portland Athenæum, and the fashionable hotels. Here, too, were situated the lawyers' offices and the banks, and through this section, this northernmost and easternmost section of the middle or valley district, it was that the ocean of flame was swept before a violent gale, literally abolishing almost everything in its path.

The fire broke out in a boat-builder's shop, situated on the extreme western edge of the valley, or middle district. When it had been raging for less than an hour, and the citizens hoped to confine its fury to a limited space near the water-side, shingles and sparks from the burning buildings were carried by the violent southwest wind a mile across the whole intervening space, and falling upon some four or five frame houses which stood on the heights to the north of the city, set fire to and consumed them. Twelve hours afterward these ruins marked the extreme actual limit of a conflagration which had devoured all that stood between them and the spot from which the flames had first burst forth! It was as if the demon had hurled a fiery arrow over the devoted city to set himself a mark at which he should aim.

The fire originated in the carelessness of a little boy, who threw a lighted fire-cracker into a coopers' shop. From this shop the flames were communicated to a vast sugar-house adjoining, and carried by the wind from spot to spot, until the whole city seemed an ocean of surging billows of fire and smoke.

No. 1 in our double-page illustration, designates the point where the conflagration began, and shows a portion of the charred walls of the sugar house still standing.

All efforts to arrest the destruction proved unavailing. It swept across the doomed city with irresistible fury, devouring everything in its course, until for want of material its force was spent. There was but one trifling exception, the McAllister House, marked No. — in the illustration, was embowered in a dense and beautiful grove of trees, which did present a sufficient barrier to arrest the flames in that direction, while the barren hills opposite the house stood a wall of protection, because there was nothing on them to burn.

Great exigencies and dangers bring to view the best and worst phases of human nature. There are fiends and harpies who will take advantage even of the calamities of life, and while the great mass of the citizens were fighting the mad elements, and striving to secure life and property, these wretches prowled about, plundering wherever they had an opportunity. And since the fire, hordes of villains have flocked to the smitten city, in the hops of securing spoils amid the general confusion. In consequence of this invasion, it became necessary to station guards at various points, and a company of United States regulars and another of marines were, detailed for this purpose.

On our front page there is a picture showing the National Bank placed under the protection of these troops; also, a view of the encampment of the destitute citizens whose homes were destroyed. The tents were furnished by order of the Secretary of War. As an illustration of the spirit of enterprise actuating the people of Portland, and a proof that they do not yield to despair, number 3 shows an enterprising tradesman resuming business among the ruins of his former store. And a similar determination is expressed by all the sufferers; so that, though crippled for a time, they will soon begin the work of restoring what the fire has destroyed, and in a few years a new Portland will arise from the ashes and wreck of the former city, more beautiful and attractive than the one destroyed. A deep sympathy has been manifested throughout the country for the sufferers by this calamity, and from all our principal cities contributions have been forwarded for the relief of the destitute.

Our Artist has grouped together a series of views, showing some of the most prominent scenes connected with this calamitous visitation, which give a clearer idea of the state of things than any description. To these illustrations we refer our readers rather than to a detailed account.

A FACETIOUS ALDERMAN.

The estimation in which our "City Fathers" are generally held is not very complimentary to those functionaries. They are believed to have a decided liking for creature comforts; to shape their legislation by the amount of gratuities that, in some incomprehensive manner, find a way to their pockets; to be swayed by personal interests more than by a regard for the public welfare; in short, to be a body of respectable outlaws, who use their official position as a means of preying upon society generally. Such, however is not the character of the Board in Newark, N. J. That city is highly favored. Its aldermen are models. They are learned, they are elegant, they are witty. They relieve the tedious routine of formal business by brilliant disquisitions on art and kindred matters, while frequent sallies of humor prove that they have maintained a conscious void of offense, and are always disposed to look on the bright side of life.

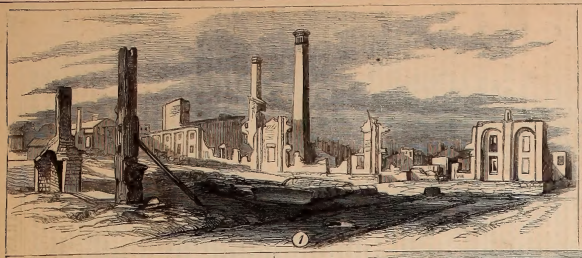
A few days ago a petition was presented to the Board, complaining of a steam whistle on a certain manufactory, and the whistles of the railroad engines, as nuisances. The petition was referred to a select committee, the chairman of which moved the following interesting and amusing report:

The Committee to whom was referred the petition of persons in Green street, respecting the steam whistle on Gould's manufacturing establishment on R. R. Avenue, together with the amendment, referring to the whistles on the engines belonging to the N. J. R. R. Co., and other unearthly noises in the neighborhood of the depot at Market street, would respectfully report:

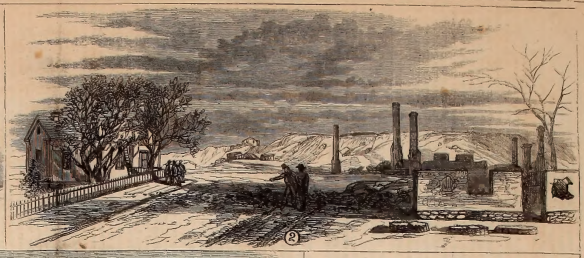
Firstly—Whistles are of ancient origin, and have existed from time immemorial; and even before the inventions of man, thousands of little songsters have wasted the sweetness of their whistles on the desert air, and fierce winds have whistled their wild music through the grand old forests. The shepherd's pipe, of which poets have so often sung, is nothing but a whistle, and the notes of the organ, from the shrill tenor to the deepest bass, are only sounds of whistles. The twanging of the harp, the jarring of cymbals, rumbling of big drums, sound harsh in comparison with the soft, captivating notes of the whistle.

Secondly—The uses of whistles and whistling have never been, and perhaps never will be told. What is more attractive to a boy than the noise of a penny whistle, and how many pleasures are experienced from whistling! The cow-boy on his way home whistles a simple air, and whistling after getting out of the woods is of use. By whistling, the lover invites his sweetheart to meet him by moonlight alone, the huntsman calls his dog, and the boatswain pipes all hands; in fact, there are times when nearly every one by turns seems to get in a pucker.

Thirdly—A whistle is not always of advantage. Look, for instance, how much it costs to wet our whistles, and then, what a task it is for a creditor to whistle for his pay. The wise Franklin also gives examples of many who pay too dear for their whistles.



Fourthly—Steam whistles, and especially the one on Gould's factory, are of modern invention. They are principally used to call the workmen to labor, to signify the close of labor, and to sound a note of alarm in case of fire. The one on Gould's factory is a rare specimen of art, and worthy of preservation. The precise nature of its sounds have not been as yet properly determined. It was made by one of our skillful mechanics, and this kind of whistle, with further improvements, is designed for a variety of uses. The inventor proposes to make a much larger one, and on a different key, to be placed in the bell-tower, not only to give the alarm in case of fire, but also to call those workmen who live in the extreme part of the city at the proper time to their labor. It will likewise be used instead of fog-bells on the coast, to warn vessels in thick weather, and one is to be placed at Sandy Hook to keep off the cholera. The engine whistles of the New Jersey Railroad are pleasant and entertaining, especially to highly cultivated musical minds. Those belonging to the engines that meet on the canal bridge at the foot of Market street excel in the lofty character of their tones. Your committee, not possessing musical ears, cannot appreciate the music as well as the engineers. Sometimes this music exerts a deleterious effect upon the nervous systems of elderly persons, and your committee have observed vibrating motions of the adjacent windows. The airs played upon these whistles are supposed to be foreign and require a considerable time to finish one tune, during which there is a general cessation of business, and your committee have learned that there is less feminine talk in that vicinity in this interval, and on this account they ought to be encouraged as a sanitary measure.



Fifthly—Your committee do not think it advisable for the city authorities to interfere with ordinary whistling, because this is the simplest mode of learning a tune, and it is also necessary in case a man should lose his dog. The big whistles, your committee think, should be changed to steam calliopes, to play the air of "Whistle and I'll come to you my Lad," or "Blow ye windy mornings, blow ye winds, heighho!

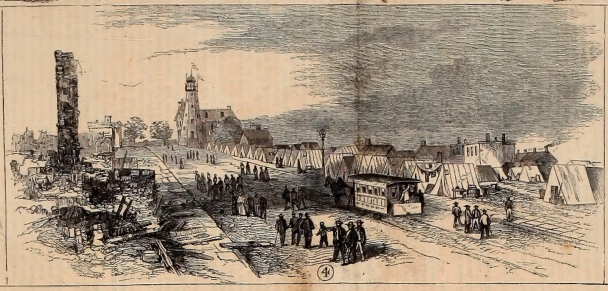
Blow ye windy mornings, blow, blow, blow!"



All of which is respectfully submitted.

We believe such men can be trusted, and we wish our own "Fathers" would give a little play to gentle feelings, and let contracts and schemes for depleting the treasury occupy less of their time. We commend the example of the Newark Board to their serious attention.

ISADORE.

Like a billow of sheen,
Of the aureal mouth
Of the river that floods the day—
Like a sheaf of the sheen
Of the sun of the south,
Bound in a single ray—
Shines the sheaf of thy yellow hair,
Bound in a fillet of gold—
Shines the sheaf of thy radiant hair,
Bound in an aureal fold.

When we whisper alone,
And the gates of the sun
The satin-slipper'd shadows shut and bar,
Then each tremulous soul
Seems to giddily roll
To the top of delight,
And to dizzily loll,
Half afraid of the height,
Like a pallid and pendulous star,
As it giddily rolls from its lair;
Like a timid and tremulous star,
As it dizzily lolls on the air.

When red is all the west,
And pallid stars arise,
And satin shadows half eclipse
Thy violet vernal eyes,
With youth's full-bodied zest,
And drunken with thy sighs,
On thine odorous, vermeil lips—
Ripe and red as granadilla—
All my longing lolls and rests,
And I drift—drift—on the Scylla
Of those marmorean breasts.

Like the lullaby light
Of the Cross of the South,
That purfles with pearl the purple of night,
Is the sibyllic spell
Of those violet eyes,
That hushes the passion that pants in me:
And the voice from the shell
Of thine odorous mouth
Comes like the sound of a star-soothed sea—
Like the sound of a pure and passionless sea.

The Spectre of Cliffe;

OR,

THE FAIR LADY OF THE SHROUD.

By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," &c. &c.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—THE SAUCY SALL.

With the first dawn of morning, Raymond swept the sea with a little spy-glass, which he had put into his pocket the previous day for the use of Mr. Stevens; there was one stately vessel visible that had just started upon the broad highway of the Atlantic for the Western World; but the instrument which told him that much, by showing him the streaming stars and stripes, could bring the ship no nearer, save to his vision! The wind had partially lulled which had hurried the clouds in flocks athwart the moon all night, and the huge three-master made but little way; it was agony to the captive to watch her lessening hull, her masts dwindling inch by inch to a mere stich of canvas, then sinking altogether out of sight; and yet he well knew that though he had caught sight of her from the first, she could not have come within distance, by a mile, for any signal of his to be discerned, far less attended to.

A few hours later, but still very early in the morning, the Preventive boat from Marmouth passed on its way to Lucky Bay; but it, too, gave the outlying rocks and reefs so wide a berth, that all his signs and cries were unavailing. He had made bold to strip one of the precious bales of its sailcloth covering, to flutter flag-wise at the mouth of the cave; but at the distance which the cutter kept, it could have shown no larger than an albatross's wing. Moreover, unlike one placed upon the Down, or even on the beach, he was in a position where no mortal would think of looking for a human creature, or of taking any sign as made by man. Foot by foot, the cutter slowly drew away, for the wind was not in her favor, and tacked and tacked, though never near the shore, till presently the headland cut her off.

Neither food nor drink had Raymond taken for twelve hours, yet the fever of his blood ran high; and like a wild beast in his lair, he paced his narrow prison, feeling desire for nothing save to be free. The day drew on, and with it drew the fatal time when Gideon was to put his murderous design into execution. The tide was almost at its lowest, which was the only period at which the Mermaid Cavern could be reached, and which Raymond himself had bidden his wife remember, appointing as it were with his own breath the hour of her doom.

He was about to lose the beloved partner of his life, the wife of his youth, still beautiful as a bride, the mother of his innocent child—nay, and that helpless child herself as well—at the hands of one already a murderer in intent, and whom neither beauty nor helplessness would move a hair's-breadth from his cruel purpose. Thoughts like these would have been enough to drive some men mad in a like position, or to tempt them to end such mental agony by one leap forth into the viewless air; but not so Raymond. If he could not save, he might still live to be avenged. Sooner or later, surely he would escape from his living grave; then, wifeless, childless, he would track the wretch who had made him desolate—ay, though the pursuit should lead him half round the world; and then, face to face, the victim risen from the tomb to confront his murderer—then, for a few brief minutes, he would taste of that nearest approach to joy which would then be left to him—revenge! Foot to foot, hand to hand—and, better, without a weapon, for so the thing would last the longer—how he would woo that ruffian to the combat, and bear him backward with tardy but relentless force, and squeeze the life out of his lying throat by slow degrees! He should come twice to life again, and die three times: once for himself, in payment for the time when Gideon mocked him in the very jaws of seeming death; and once—the husband's breath came quick and short the while he thought upon it—once for Mildred; and once again for the child; and then his dark soul should wing its way to hell. Raymond Clifford's veins swelled into knots, and his fingers dug into the flesh of his clinched hands the while he thought upon his great revenge. He had never been so near the fate of his race before, as when he brooded over that grim picture; the curse of the Cliffords almost came upon him. But as though he had felt that it was nigh, and knew that if it fell he would be powerless for the work of retribution, he beat it back as it were by force, and compelled his mind into other channels. He made it count the puffins as they stood in single file upon the ledges beneath, and mark how often the green-eyed haggard cormorant dived within the hour, and how long remained before he emerged from under water with draggled wing.

Toward noon, something occurred, however, which of itself demanded his attention. The little revenue-cutter once more rounded the point upon its return voyage to Marmouth. He forgot at the moment the arrangement which had been made by Lieutenant Carey for the transportation of Stevens to Mermaid Bay, and it was with a great cry of fury that through his glass he discerned the form, although not the features of his enemy. The boat this time seemed coming in quite close to shore, so near that his signals could not fail to be observed, and Raymond's heart had begun to beat with hope as well as passion, when suddenly her course was turned to seaward, and she made for the outlying pillar of chalk which was called the Dutchman. This change of tack at first originated in a natural disinclination on the part of Gideon Carr to approach the scene of his yesterday's crime, where the tide might by chance have left some ghastly evidence of it, or even the white cliff presented some damning stain; but as he continued to scan the spot through the boatswain's glass, he caught sight of Raymond's signal, which for the moment struck icy terror to his soul, and produced the change which we have already described to have occurred in him; and finding the boatswain importunate for the possession of the glass, he purposely dropped it into the sea, although, even through it, it is doubtful whether any other eye but his own could have perceived that which had so moved him. Nay, after a little thought, Gideon almost convinced himself that what he imagined he had beheld was merely the effect of morbid fancy; and as the cutter drew further and further from the land, so his wicked conscience grew less disturbed.

Then came the incident of Walter Dickson's craft being seen running close in-shore toward Sandby, and at once all his fears returned. If, by any miracle, Raymond Clifford was really yet alive, and what he had seen had indeed been a signal of his supposed victim, intended as a demand for help, those on board the smuggling vessel could not fail presently to see it; hence Mr. Stevens's passionate attempt to induce the crew of the revenue-cutter to arrest Dickson's course. We know that that appeal was futile, and how the cutter kept on her way, and carried Gideon Carr to his righteous doom in Mermaid Bay; but Raymond only knew that so far, at least, the murderer's plans had been successful, and that probably within that very hour both wife and child would perish through his cursed guile, choked by the pitiless tide. No mental torture could have been contrived by tyrant of old more poignant than that he was doomed to feel when he beheld in the far distance the cutter with its hateful burden at last standing in for the land. Scarcely, however, had he done so, when what should come swirling round the eastern promontory, through a passage, thought to be somewhat dangerous, between the mainland and a cluster of out-lying fragments of it called "the Stark," but the lugger of Mr. Walter Dickson, so close to the cliffs that one who stood upon the Beacon Down might have almost tossed a biscuit on to her slanting deck. On she came, noiseless and swift as a white phantom, steered by Mr. Dickson himself, who, with half-shut eyes, lay dreamily in the stern-sheets, as though his slender craft were in no more danger than if she were coasting upon Ullswater.

"They're allus out upon some fool's errand or other," observed young Richard Brock, who, with two others, made up the crew of the lugger, in continuation of some remarks called forth by their meeting with the revenue boat. "If they had been off Mermaid Bay three nights ago, instead of now, they might ha' done a good stroke o' business."

"They would not have got it cheap, whatever they got," answered his father, from the bow-thwarts, removing his pipe from his mouth, in order to give due emphasis to an imprecation. "Fifteen hundred pound worth of shawls and laces—— Where the devil are you steering us to, Walter? Port, man, port, or we shall be on Gull's Castle!" And, indeed, so near to the out-lying chalk-rock of that name did the lugger pass, that as the old seaman gave his warning, he also kicked off his shoes in readiness for a swim.

"Look, mate, look!" cried Walter Dickson, scarcely conscious of the danger they had so narrowly escaped; "there's somebody in the Martin's Nest."

The sensation which this exclamation produced upon the crew of the lugger was most extraordinary; they did not indeed start from their seats, as landsmen would have done, but each uttered a hasty ejaculation of wrath and wonder, as his looks followed the direction of the steersman's eyes to where Raymond could be plainly seen fluttering his signal, and gesticulating with the utmost vehemence. He was calling to them, too, at the top of his voice, and adjuring them to return at once to Mermaid Bay, and save his wife and child; but the distance was too great, and the wind too violent, to suffer them to catch a word he said, although they guessed by his motions that he was endeavoring to make himself heard.

"Who is it?" cried old Will Brock, savagely. "What cursed fool can have risked going there in daylight, and without leave or license, too, from those who have the best right to give it?"

"It ain't one of our folks at all," answered his son, shading his eyes with his hand, as he scanned the shining cliff; "it's Mr. Raymond Hepburn, of the Cottage."

"The worse for him," muttered the old man, furiously. "Is there not a gun in the boat? Pass it here, boy. I am going to shoot a razor-bill—that is all."

"No, no; none of that," interposed Dickson; "we should only make bad worse by anything of that sort.

"Fifteen hundred pound worth of shawls and laces," exclaimed the other, with passion; "the best run I ever made in my life; and all that you and I and the rest of us have in the world! Are you going to risk all that, Walter Dickson, for a friend of them blasted blue jackets? Give me the gun, I say."

"No, Will; you shall not do murder—nor even attempt it, for that fowling-piece would not carry half the distance. 'Tis clear that this man has not been seen by anybody as yet, or he would not be playing such frantic tricks yonder, in order to let us know he was there. How he ever got into the Martin's Nest, I know not; but he is evidently alone. We have only him to deal with in the matter, and if we can keep him quiet——"

"There is only one way that makes all safe," interrupted the old man, gloomily. "Why, he will get half that's there for merely saying it is there."

"Nay, nay; Mr. Hepburn is a gentleman, and his wife has been good to my old woman," answered Dickson, warmly; "and you have been my mate, Will, for these thirty years, and one of whom I should be sorry to have to say: 'That man was hanged for murder.' I have as large a stake in yonder goods as any man here, and should be equally loth to lose it; but there is blood enough on that Beacon Cliff already."

"Only a coast-guardsman," muttered one of the crew who had not yet spoken.

"Very true, Elliot," returned Dickson, quietly; "although, let me tell you, it does not become one of your stock to talk like that. In the heat of a fight, one may chance to get blood upon one's hands, and hardly know how it came there. But pushing folks over precipices—ay, you may frown and swear, too, for all I care—or shooting them in cold blood, while they're asking us for help, like this one—such things are not to my taste, nor do I believe that good can come of them."

"Then what do you propose to do, Master Clear-conscience?" inquired Brock, sullenly. "Is Lieutenant Carey and his friend, this Mr. Hepburn, to go shares together in our property?"

A hoarse murmur of rage and dissatisfaction came from the throats of the two sailors, who had themselves no little interest in the proceeds of the late "run," and whom this reference to the intimacy between the commander of the coast-guard and the present subject of conversation excited to fury.

"I will go bail that no one here suffers any loss," replied Walter Dickson, resolutely. "The Saucy Sall is worth something, and I have a little money at bank, which, in case of the worst, shall be at your service. There—does that suit you, mates?"

All reluctantly allowed that under these circumstances, so far as they were concerned, they had certainly no further right to complain, but, at the same time, they avowed their disinclination to accept so generous an offer.

"No, no," said Brock, with a gleam of kindly feeling in his hard gray eyes; "we ain't a-going to cut our cable from you, old fellow. We're in a heavy sea; but if we pull together with a will, we may perhaps keep our shirt-collars dry yet."

"That's well said, mate," answered Dickson, cheerily. "Now, my plan is this: to get one of our people to visit the Martin's Nest this very night. If I was as lissom as I used to be—"

"I will go," interrupted young Richard Brock, sententiously. "There will be moon enough for that."

"You're a good fellow," replied Dickson, with much heartiness; "and your father is proud of you, for all that he looks like a cormorant who has just dropped a fish. You shall visit the poor gentleman, my lad, and explain matters. It will be hard upon him as well as upon us, we may be sure; but you must make him see the necessity of being a prisoner for some time to come at least, and more than that, of his remaining quiet, so that nobody but ourselves may know where he is. If the Martin's Nest was discovered, even without its golden eggs, it would be a heavy blow to the Good Cause."

"Ay, that it would," murmured the crew as with one voice, but no longer with peevish sullenness; for their confidence in Walter Dickson was great; and now that a little time had been allowed for reflection, even old Will Brock confessed to himself that his friend's counsel had been wiser than his own, as well as more humane.

Throughout the period of this conversation, the lugger had been making short tacks in front of the Beacon Cliff, since it would have been dangerous to bring her up in such an anchorage; as for landing, it was not to be thought of at that place; nor if it could have been done, would it have availed for any intercourse between the crew and Raymond, so great was even yet the force of the wind and the distance between the beach and his place of captivity. He could indeed have communicated with them (through the medium, as already suggested, of something written and enclosed in the cover of his hunting-watch), but, of course, they had no cause to suspect the urgent necessity of the case, and were unwilling to risk the peril of a disembarkation, from which, as it seemed to them, no good could possibly come. In a few minutes more, the unhappy man, whose hopes for the rescue of his wife and child had been lately so flattered, had the misery to read their fate (as he had every reason to fear) in a few ill-spelled words, printed with chalk upon a board, and held over the side of the lugger:

"Be Pashent: Help will come to nite. But on your life do not show yourself again, or make any more signals."

Then, in spite of his reiterated attempts by voice and gesture to reverse this fatal sentence, the head of the Saucy Sall was turned toward Sandby; and in a few more minutes the sea was once more sailless, and Raymond watching the cruel foam come crawling in, and listening to the long-drawn hiss of the rising tide with a heart robbed of its last hope.

CHAPTER XXIV.—HOW THE MARTIN'S NEST WAS DISCOVERED.

Once more the pale Moon rose upon Raymond Clifford in his captivity, and this time it looked down upon him pitifully, with scarce an intervening cloud; tipped with her rays, each tiny wavelet (for the wind had dropped) broke into silver smiles; the sapphire sea, like one great jewel, sparkled icily from marge to marge. But the captive had no eye for its beauty; it would have been the same to him had inky darkness overspread the scene. Whatever canvas Nature might have displayed, he would only have seen upon it the picture of a little home, emptied of all its happiness by one remorseless hand. His mind was solely usurped by utter wretchedness: the sense of desolation reigned supreme; even Revenge stirred not now within him. His long fast had doubtless combined with his late anxieties thus to prostrate him; but one who had seen Raymond thirty-six hours before, as he stood upon Beacon Down, radiant with health and vigor, would scarcely have recognized him, as with woe-begone face and lack-lustre eye he sat within his solitary prison. It was nearly midnight, but he felt no desire for sleep; and yet so occupied were his thoughts, that he could hardly be said to be a waking, conscious man. As he saw nothing, so he heard nothing of what was passing around him. It was only when a huge object suddenly darkened the mouth of the cave, and then retired, leaving it light again, that he became conscious that he was not alone—that there was a human being swinging to and fro in front of the Martin's Nest, now touching the threshold with his feet, and now leaping out again into space, so as to gain a greater impetus, and thereby penetrate still further upon his return.

"Can you not shorten matters, sir," cried the human spider, "by catching hold of me presently?"

The voice of his fellow-creature acted upon Raymond like a restorative; he leaped up from his costly couch of shawls and laces in time to seize his visitor at the very next swing of the pendulum, and retain him in his grasp.

"Hold tight, sir," cried Richard Brock, for he it was who presented himself under these very peculiar circumstances. "You have no idea (however anxious you may be to leave the Martin's Nest) how a body wants to get out of it which has entered after this fashion. But what's the matter with you, sir, besides hunger and want of room?"

"Can you tell me any news of my wife?" gasped Raymond. "Tell me the worst at once, man; is she alive or dead?"

"Lor bless you, sir, alive and well—why not? I saw her this very evening."

"God be praised!" cried Raymond, fervently, wringing the man's hand who had brought him such blessed tidings. "And is my child safe, too?"

Richard hesitated a little.

"What! has that devil Stevens drowned my child?"

"No, no, sir. Don't call names. The man you speak of is drowned hisself, poor wretch—held by a stone-crab in the Mermaid Cavern until the tide came up and— Well, that's a strange thing to be thanking heaven for, unless, maybe, you are thinking that the chap was a coast-guardsman, which, it seems, he was not, after all."

"He was a murderer in thought if not in deed," returned Raymond, sternly, "as I will tell you."

"All in good time, sir," observed the young man, cheerily; "but first you take this bread and meat, and let the brandy in that flask fetch up a little color into your cheek. You must be main hungry, so use your teeth and rest your tongue, while I take the eggs here out of the Martin's Nest." With these words, the young man began fastening two of the bales to the rope of three-inch cow-hide which had brought him, a hundred feet of which at least, besides what he had himself required for his descent, were in the hands of his friends upon the Down above. "Now, do not fear but I shall return for the rest," cried he; "and when I have cleared all these goods, I will still come back and keep you company."

"But why not take me with you instead of the bales?" inquired Raymond, with whom good news and a few morsels of food had already worked wonders, and who felt quite equal to any peril or exertion, the object of which should be to set him on terra firma.

"I will tell you that presently, and everything else it concerns you to know, Mr. Hepburn; but duty first, say I (unless it's revenue duty), and pleasure afterward; so here goes."

With that the young man stepped into the air with his burden, as calmly as a tide-waiter would step from deck to quay, and keeping himself off the rock with his nimble feet, was rapidly hauled up to the summit of the Down above. Then again descending, and being caught by Raymond as before, he took away more bales, and so on till the cave was bare.

"You do not think I will desert you, Mr. Hepburn?" said the young man, frankly, as he started with his last freight, and Raymond was watching his movements with wistful eyes.

"No, Richard, I do not. I can easily understand why I am not to see how those bundles of—"

"Gulls' feathers," interrupted the young man, smiling: "we cliff-fowlers make our living by collecting them, you know."

True to his promise, Richard Brock once more descended, bringing with him this time some rugs and blankets, as well as a further supply of provisions. At sight of these, Raymond looked by no means grateful.

"What!" cried he, "am I to stay in this place another night?"

"Ay, sir, and another and another, I fear, although no longer than I can help, I promise you. If I had been the sole owner of what was here just now, you should be free at once, for I know that I could trust to your honor, and besides, I owe your good lady a kind turn for what she did to my Phœbe in her sickness. But there are others who are deeply concerned in the matter—it's the best run we have had this many a year, and everything must be got well away before we risk letting you out. Even then—I'm speaking what others say, sir, and not my own thoughts—even then, you would do us a mort of mischief by telling about the Martin's Nest. It is the best place for stowage along the coast; and all the better for the little mischance as happened to poor Price down yonder. The blue jackets think the place uncanny, and shirk their night-watches upon the beacon in consequence. There's Walter Dickson up there now, holding on to this rope as quietly as though he was not sitting on the beat of a coast-guardsman; though, indeed, if one should come, he has his answer ready: If one likes to go bird-fowling by night instead of by day, what's that to the custom-house? They will never trust themselves at a rope's end to see what I'm about—of that I'm certain. And, by-the-by, Mr. Hepburn, how in the name of the devil—for is he not called The Prince of the Powers of the Air in Holy Writ?—did you yourself chance to come here?"

"I climbed down by yonder ledge," quoth Raymond, coolly.

"What! without a rope?" exclaimed the other, with a perceptible shudder: "that is not humanly possible!"

"Yet by that means, and no other, did I come hither, Richard, although not of my own free will, as you shall hear." Then Raymond narrated all the circumstances (so far as consisted with his assumed name of Hepburn) which had brought him into his present inconvenient plight. To the details of the attempted murder, his companion listened with not a little excitement and indignation; but in the description of the means by which the Martin's Nest had at last been reachad, his interest was manifested even still more keenly.

"You are the king of us all, sir!" exclaimed the cliff-fowler, enthusiastically, when the tale was told. "There is not a man in Sandby who could have got here from the cliff-top as you did; no, nor ever was one, I believe, even when Walter Dickson was young. He it was, sir, who first discovered this place, and that in a very curious manner—one which I should have thought could scarcely have been equaled for strangeness, if I had not heard your story."

"And how was that?" inquired Raymond; not that he much cared to know, but because he began to feel a great repugnance in being left alone, and desired to retain his present companion with him as long as possible.

"Well, sir, it was when Dickson was quite a boy, about sixteen or so, and when Sandby was not so full of folk as it is now: there were scarcely any cliff-fowlers then, for there was a better trade than bird-nesting to take to, and all hands were wanted for it, so that the gulls had an easy life of it to what they have now, and were only plagued by the boys. Dickson and my father were playmates at that time, as they're workmates now, and have been so these thirty years and more; always together, shrimpin' and fishin', risking their necks about the cliffs with letting one another down by a bit of rope such as nobody but madcaps like them would have trusted themselves to. One day, while knocking about in a coble, which, I believe, had been pronounced unseaworthy by the rightful owner—in the Beacon Bay here—Dickson spies out this dark hole.

"'What a lot of gulls' nests there ought to be in there!' says he.

"'What a lot there are!' cries my father, whom I have heard tell this story about a hundred and forty times. 'What a lot there are, for I can see 'em!'

"'I wish we could get at 'em,' continues Dickson.

"'What's the good o' wishing?' answers my father. 'Don't you see how the cliff hangs over? You might as well wish to get at the moon.

"'No, mate," returns Dickson, gravely, 'because you ain't got nowhere above the moon where you can stick a stake in with a rope tied round it, and lower yourself down hand over hand; let alone any stand-point such as yonder Down, where a chap could depend upon—like you, Brock—might stand and hold the rope, and shift it properly.

"'You ain't a-goin' to try that, mate,' says my father, firmly, 'nor anything so foolhardy?'

"'No, I'm not a-goin' to try it; I'm a-goin' to do it,' returned Walter Dickson. 'Why, think what must be in that ere hole, mate, in which never a fowler has yet put his fingers, I'll be bound; what feathers and skins, and oil and eggs! Why, I doubt whether even that last run, which your father (that's my grandfather, Mr. Hepburn) is never tired of talking about, will ha' brought more grist to the mill. Only, not a word about it to any soul, mind. They'd make us promise not to try it; or, perhaps, it 'ud put it into somebody else's head to do the very same thing before us.'

"'You needn't be a bit afraid of that last, boy,' answers my father, grimly enough; 'and as for the first, I'm not one to blab and spoil sport; and if you're fixed upon it, why, I'm your man for anything. Only, you'll never use this rotten old cord for such a place as yon, where you'll have to swing right under——'

"'No,' replies Dickson, interrupting him sharp; 'I'm not a fool, although you chose, just now, to call me one.'

"'I said "fool-hardy,'" replied my father, positively, 'and I say it again.'

"'Well, we'll see what you say to-morrow, when you haul me up from yonder hole—under the eave of the Down though it be, and for all the world like a martin's nest—with my pockets full of fulmars. As for the rope, Lucy Prichard (and here my father says Dickson blushed, for Lucy was the young girl as he was courting then, and whom he afterward married) will lend me that fine one which was her mother's only marriage-portion, and has never been any good to her, because she has no son. Lucy has often begged me, if I must needs go fowling, to use that rope, and so I'll do it to-morrow, and to some purpose; and as for the stake, if you do not choose to hold me, lad, I will borrow an iron bar of the blacksmith; so you may please yourself.'

"But when the morrow came, and found Walter Dickson on the Beacon Down, William Brock was there likewise; and when the other, who was too proud to ask his help, since it was not offered, had thrust the bar into the earth, and fixed the rope, then, says my father:

"'And do you suppose as I'm goin' to let you risk your neck alone, mate? No, man, no. You and I are agoin' to see this ere Martin's Nest together; and if we miss it, why, even then we shall not be parted.'

"Then Walter and he shook hands, for they was very fond of one another as boys, as they are now, although they has their tiffs. 'Just as you like,' says he; 'the rope is strong enough for ten such as we, and the bar won't break.'

"Then, instead of tying the hide round their bodies—as I and all sensible cliff-fowlers do—these mad boys lowered themselves slowly down, merely holding it in their hands; and work enough they had, when they got opposite this place, to swing themselves into it, as you may guess, when there was nobody within it to help them in as you helped me. Moreover, my father says that the birds flew out upon them in hundreds—just as in the big print we've got stuck up at home of the opening of the doors of the Ark—and beat them with their wings, not that the poor timorous creatures showed any fight, but by reason of their excessive numbers. At last the two boys swung themselves sufficiently far within to obtain foothold, and my father instantly began to lay his hands on all with life that had not yet flown away.

"'Quick, quick!' exclaimed he; and Dickson, seeing how much he needed help, and what great spoil there was ran toward him eagerly.

"The next instant both cried out together.

"'The rope!' 'The rope!'

"But the recollection of it came too late! My father had forgotten it at first, and now in his excitement Walter also let it go. So there it swung, now near, now far, but already too far to be reached, and coming with every swing less and less near. At last it hung quite still, about five feet or so beyond the entrance; and it will give you some notion of the extraordinary feat that you, sir, have accomplished in arriving here, that neither of the boys, though cliff-fowlers born, dared venture out upon yonder sloping ledge, and so approach the rope by your own road. If they had done so, however, it would even then have been beyond their reach.

"They were as completely trapped as any guillemot they had ever caught in spring. It might be days, as they well knew, before anybody discovered the bar upon the Down above, and if that happened, he who found it would probably draw up the rope, and finding nothing, would conceive that he who had left it there must needs have fallen into the sea. It was quite impossible to make their voices heard upon the cliff-top, and the Martin's Nest was unknown to all except themselves. Their only hope, like yours, lay in attracting the notice of some one on shipboard; but they had no large sail-cloth, such as you found here—nothing except their own clothes, which could not be seen save at a very little distance.

"The two boys looked at one another ruefully enough, each thinking of his home and friends, but Walter of his Lucy also, and of how she would reproach herself for having been the innocent means of his destruction, through lending him that fatal rope.

"Dickson was the first to speak.

"'Robert,' said he, 'we are in a bad plight here, and if matters are to be mended, we must mend them ourselves. It is no use waiting here to be starved to death, or to be so weakened by hunger that we can do nothing that requires strength and courage. One of us must jump out at that rope, and take our chance of catching hold of it.'

"My father says he never felt his blood run so cold in all his life as when he heard these words. But nevertheless he clearly saw the necessity of what the other proposed.

"'I am ready, Walter,' says he, simply; 'and I think I am the lissomer of the two, and had better try first.'

"'Not so,' says Dickson,; 'I brought you into this peril, and I must get you out of it. If I miss it, then it will be time enough for you to take your chance; and God send you better fortune!'

"'Thank you, mate, replies my father, sturdily; 'but I'd rather die like a brave man, than survive you upon such terms as those. We'll jump together, if you please; but you won't jump before me, that's certain.'

"'As for jumping together,' says Walter Dickson, very vexed, 'that would only be another name for falling together; but since I know what a cruel obstinate chap you are, I'll consent to draw lots. Now, look you, here are two feathers, a black and a white; now I put my hands behind me, and if you guess which feather I hold in my right hand, then you shall jump first; if not——'

"'No, no," interrupted my father, sharply; 'I won't trust you, Walter; your heart is too kind to be honest in a matter like this. I myself will throw the feathers into the air, and whichever passes the ledge first shall decide the question; if the black one falls the quicker, I jump—if the white one, you.'

"'So be it, Will, if you will have it so,' returned Dickson.

"The air was very calm and still that day, and the feathers were a long time descending from the height to which my father threw them. The two boys watched them with straining eyes, now poise, now quiver, now slowly sink, now caught in little eddies, until at last they reached the ledge, the white one first.

"'I am glad of that,' said Dickson, quietly; 'for otherwise I should have jumped from where I stand, and it is better to have a run. Look here, Robert; I don't want to blubber about such things now, when all depends upon a clear sight, but if I—if I miss the rope, and you get home again all right, as I trust you will, you'll give my love to mother, and father, and Lucy, and tell them—— But there, that's enough. God bless you, mate, if we don't happen to meet again just yet. Stand clear there. One—two—three!'

"As he said these words, he leapt out at the rope with a great spring, and my father hid his face; nor did he look up again, nor know what was happening—being in a sort of swoon-like—until he felt Walter Dickson fastening the hide about his waist, and bidding him cheer up and fill his pockets. And that's the true story of how the Martin's Nest was first found out."

"And he that was the brave boy you speak of—Walter Dickson—is now awaiting you upon the Down, above us, is he?"

"The very man, sir, and as brave as ever, only a good deal stiffer in the joints. Nevertheless, he would have visited you here himself, if nobody else could have been got to do it; for Mrs. Hepburn has been very good to his old woman—she that was Lucy Prichard once, and who owns this rope, which is the same I have been talking of all this time—as she was to my poor Phœbe in the fever."

"Then, being both so brave and grateful," pleaded Raymond, "will you not trust to my honor not to betray the secret of the Martin's Nest?"

"Ay, that we would, sir, if the matter concerned us only. But we have passed our word to keep you prisoner here till the goods removed this night have been disposed of, and that will take some time."

"At least you will let my poor wife know that I am safe; or else, when I do not return to-morrow, she is sure to think I have come to grievous harm."

"Well, sir," answered the young man, frankly, "we will do our best, Dickson and I; but no woman has ever yet been let into this secret, any more than if it was the Freemason's. I dare not trust to Phœbe. However, you may depend upon us two, sir. Do not fret, and I shall be with you again to-morrow night at furthest."

"And you will have seen my wife and child?" said Raymond.

"I hope so," answered the young man, evasively; for he knew that Milly had been carried away, although he thought it better not to harrow the father's heart by such sad news, while thus compelled to inaction and captivity. But he kept his promise, and so worked upon his father, with the help of Dickson, that the old man at last gave permission that Mrs. Hepburn should be informed, under a strict oath of secrecy, that her husband was alive and in safe hands. It was this glad news which Walter Dickson came to impart that evening when he found Mrs. Carey at Pampas Cottage, and the revelation of which sent Mildred back, as we have seen, from the bedside of his 'old woman' with such a lightened heart. Upon the other hand, through their prisoner, the free-traders became cognizant of the villainy of the man called Stevens, and exhibited it, with reference to the burial of his body, in the manner described. Still, they were much averse to set Raymond free, fearing that the secret must needs ooze out if they did so, and jealous of his intimacy with the people at Lucky Bay. Mildred and her husband, however, were permitted to correspond by letter—subject to a Sir James Graham's inspection of the correspondence—and it was with Raymond's full consent that Mrs. Hepburn undertook the expedition to Cliffe Hall in search of her lost Milly. The smugglers, too, were not displeased at an opportunity of giving the captive his liberty, which also insured his absence from the neighborhood; so a few hours after Mildred's departure, his faithful friend and visitor, young Richard Brock, swung himself as usual into Raymond's (by this time tolerably furnished) lodgings, with the long-wished-for information that the rope was ready to carry double.

So Raymond had followed his wife post-haste, to Cliffe, and now met her, as they had agreed upon, in the heart of Ribble, for the first time since Gideon Carr had striven so hard to part them for ever.

CHAPTER XXXV.—MET TO PART.

"But what is it you propose to do at Cliffe, love?" asked Mildred of her husband, when he had finished narrating his strange experiences of the last few days, and had received her own in turn. "Why should we not at once depart, now that we have our Milly safe and well? I cannot bear a second separation from you, Ray—indeed, indeed, I cannot—and yet I feel that that is what you have in your mind."

"We will not be separated, dearest," answered Raymond, smoothing her dark tresses with his loving hand. "I will be near you to watch over you; you will meet me here every day. But I have a duty to perform in my father's house, which I have too long neglected; I must protect the helpless, and I must punish the guilty."

Very stern and grave was Raymond's voice as he spoke these words, and Mildred trembled to hear it, because she knew what iron resolve that tone expressed. Her husband, so simple, so generous, so open, was about to match himself against the wily Grace.

"Yes," continued he, "I have been selfishly content with my own lot too long. I have suffered my father's son, my only brother, to remain in wicked hands—flattered by false hopes, terrified by false fears—and have never lifted finger to set him free from a captivity worse than that from which I have myself but now escaped. True, I have not wronged him; but when I look upon you, my own, my love, I feel pity for him who coveted such a priceless treasure in vain."

"Raymond," answered Mildred, hastily, "you do not know how sadly Rupert is changed."

"Yes, dear, I know it. The Curse has fallen—alas! poor Rue, poor Rue!" Raymond turned away his face, and was silent for a little, ere he resumed. "I must act for him, therefore, and not with him, as I had hoped to do. For some base purpose of her own, this woman, who would imprison him at the Dene without a scruple, seeks to make him appear sane. In a few days I can collect evidence hereabouts to prove him otherwise. Then he will be removed from her and hers, and put in some fit place, and receive careful attendance, from which may come—who knows?—Improvement, cure."

Mildred shook her head.

"At all events," continued her husband, "he shall remain no more with one who only uses him for her own ends. With her, too—a murderess in intention—I have my own account to settle. This letter, in her own handwriting—'When you have made sure of R,' writes she—was found on the dead body of her brother. I will tell her this to her false face: 'That were it not she was once my father's wife——'"

"No, no," cried Mildred, passionately; "defy her not, dear husband; let her be. You will fall into her toils yourself."

"I must take my chance of that, wife," answered Raymond, cheerfully; "but since you fear this woman thus, Mildred, I will remove you at once from out of her reach. With the Careys, you and the child will be safe alike from force or fraud; and when my work here is finished——"

"No, Raymond," cried Mildred, firmly. "If we are to be parted from you, I should feel safer here, in the very hold of our enemy, than in any place where, as before, she might suddenly swoop down upon us. The expectation of the peril would be worse than the peril itself. With thee without, and our unknown friend, whoever that may be, within, I shall not feel unprotected; besides, for a week, at least, I am safe, for until then I shall not have served this woman's turn."

"Moreover," answered Raymond, "within a week I shall have obtained all that I need in the way of information, as well, I hope, as struck a blow at this evil woman, who is even now, as I have cause to suspect, bringing her base designs to some completion. Nay, do not tremble, my sweet love. How strange it is that you, who are so brave against all else, should be such a coward with respect to Grace Clifford!"

"I do not fear, dear Raymond—indeed, indeed I do not for myself, no, nor yet for Milly; while she is in my arms, at least, she seems to be safe, and knowing that I have her to guard, I meet my aunt as the sheep-dog meets the wolf—but it is for thee, Raymond, for thee I tremble."

"You doubt that I have wits to cope with cunning Grace," returned Raymond, smiling. "Well, that is true, enough. Still, there is something of advantage in an honest cause, and something, too, in this—that the woman deems me dead. She that plays tricks with shrouds, and acts the sacrilegious part of a lost spirit, may yet not be without her own superstitions, Mildred."

"Then why be seen?" urged Mildred. "If you trust for anything to Grace's ignorance—and, oh, beware how you build on that foundation—why show yourself, and run the risk of being recognized? Would Aunt Grace easily credit that it is your ghost which haunts the place, or would it not rather put her on her guard to sift the truth of the story of your death?"

"You are wise and prudent, dear Mildred; but you do not remember that I left Cliffe a smooth-faced boy, having scarcely used a razor till I married; while, since I have been imprisoned under Beacon Down, I have become bearded like the pard. Moreover, in the daytime, no one is stirring now about the park, whether from the Hall or the village; and when evening comes I retire to the Spotted Cow, beyond the turnpike, where, in return for looking over the contents of my portfolio, the guidman and his wife entertain me with the country gossip, and all the history of the poor mad squire. They would as soon think of finding a likeness for me to the cow upon their signboard as to Raymond Clifford."

"Why, the very dog, Rufus, knew you; and I knew you, Raymond"——

"Yes, the dog and you," interrupted her husband, smiling upon her, fondly, "for love and instinct are equally lynx-eyed; but, trust me, no one else shall recognize me. And now, dearest, for the present, we must part, lest this attendant of yours become impatient, or even grow suspicious. You see that it is I that am the prudent one. Every day at this same time I shall be within this chamber, having always Finis Hall to take to if any ferret shall invade the burrow. If you do not come, I shall conclude you cannot. In the meantime, do not fear. Within the week, or in less time, I hope to discover enough to put a spoke in Madame Clifford's wheel that shall mar the smoothness of its running."

With dire forebodings, which, however, she did not express, Mildred held up her child to meet its father's kiss; then turned toward him her own obedient cheek, unstained by tear, and made him a loving farewell. Darker and darker grew his form with every footstep that she took with torch in hand, and once she could not forbear from running back and kissing him once more; but at last she tore herself away, and hurried forth to Lucy.

"I am afraid I have been very selfish, and made you wait very long," said Mildred, sweetly.

"It did not seem so, madam, I assure you," replied her attendant. "It is my duty to await your pleasure; and, besides, my brother, here, has kept me company."

William Cator, who was standing a little behind his sister, leaning upon a gun, regarded his mistress's truant niece with no very friendly eyes.

"I am afraid I frightened you, miss—that is, madam," said he, gruffly.

"Yes," returned Mildred, with a steady voice, "I am always frightened at firearms. Please to carry it carefully as we go back."

"I ain't agoing back, ma'am," replied the other, with an unpleasant grin. "There's nothing to do at the Hall, and I can't sleep in the sunlight, like the other folks; so I'm out for a day's pleasure."

"What is your brother going to shoot?" asked Mildred, with a beating heart, of Lucy, as they recrossed the park.

"Oh, nothing as I knows of, madam: he is no sportsman. He was waiting for you to leave the cave, because he wants to go in there himself to fire the gun off, and try the effect of the echoes. I wonder whether we shall hear them?"

THE POWER OF MUSIC.

THERE are treasures richer than gold or pearls, and there are sentiments so pure and deep, that sometimes they control our whole nature and disclose its true dignity. The incident shown in our illustration of the power of music, which we take from an exchange, is one of those touching revelations of feeling, inspired by song, that prove what susceptibilities often lie hidden beneath an unpromising exterior, requiring only the fitting opportunity for their proper development.

Leaning idly over a fence a few days since, we noticed a little four-year-old "bird of creation" amusing himself in the grass by watching the frolicsome flight of birds which were around him. At length a beautiful bob-o-link perched himself upon a drooping bough of an apple tree which extended to within a few yards of the spot where the urchin sat, and maintained his position apparently unconsciousness of the close proximity to one whom birds usually consider a dangerous neighbor.

The boy seemed astonished at his impudence, and after steadily regarding him for a minute or two, obeying the instincts of his baser nature, he picked up a stone lying at his feet and was preparing himself for a good aim. The little arm was reached backward without alarming the bird, the Bob was within an ace of damage, when lo! his throat swelled, and forth came nature's joy. "A link—a link—a-i-n-k, bob-o-link, bob-o-link! a-n-o-wet! I know it—I know it! a-link! don't throw it! throw it, throw it," etc., etc.; and he didn't. Slowly the little arm subsided to its natural position and the despised stone dropped. The minstrel charmed the murderer! We heard the songster through and watched his unharmed flight, as did the boy with a sorrowful countenance. Anxious to hear an expression of the little fellow's feelings, we approached him and inquired—"Why didn't you stone him, my boy? you might have killed him and carried him home."

The poor little fellow looked up doubtingly, as though he suspected our meaning, and with an expression of half shame and half sorrow, he replied: "Couldn't, cause he sung so."

Who will say our nature is wholly depraved, after that; or even that music hath no charms to soothe the savage breast? Melody awakened humanity, and humanity—mercy! The bird was saved, and, God was glorified by the deed. Dear little boys, don't stone the birds.

THE POWER OF MUSIC.

BURNING OF A COOLIE SHI

WE cannot conceive of any sound more appalling than the cry of fire on a crowded ship in mid-ocean. The mad element, at any time so frightful, is now invested with ten-fold terror, from the utter hopelessness of rescue, and the certainty of death either from the flames or the water. It is hardly a matter of surprise that in such circumstances reason is paralyzed and passion becomes furious, that the worst, as well as the noblest traits of humanity, are brought into action, and utter despair induces utter madness.

The following account of the destruction of a coolie ship will convey some faint conception of the horrors of a fire at sea:

The Italian ship Napoleon Canevero, which sailed from Macao on March 8, had a crew of forty men, 663 Chinese coolie emigrants and 8,000 boxes of fire-crackers. Soon after sailing an attempt was made by some of the coolies to poison the ship's officers, and the ringleaders were punished by flogging. It appeared that 200 had joined in a conspiracy to destroy the officers and capture the ship, and efforts were made to keep them in subordination, but they failed. On the 9th of March a rush was made by the coolies to get possession of the vessel, but they were fired upon by the officers and crew, and about thirty of them shot, but yet they refused to surrender, declaring they would either capture the vessel or die. They made another rush to obtain possession of the deck, when the crew fired down the hatches upon them. The account of the proceedings immediately subsequent is thus given by Alexander Francis Faw, master of the ship:

"A cry of fire was raised and smoke seen to issue from several parts of the vessel aft. The fire-engine was at once got ready for work, but whilst some of the deck lights were being lifted for the purpose of putting down the hose in the between-decks, where the fire was, one of the coolies severed the wrist of the seaman engaged in handing them the hose, with a cutlass obtained from one of the guards, the consequence of which was that the man, in less than twenty minutes, died from loss of blood. To all appearance the object of the coolies in setting fire to the ship was for the purpose of getting the crew below, they thinking the fire a more serious affair than the revolt, and that the crew in all probability would at once go below and endeavor to prevent the fire making any further progress in the vessel; but in this they were disappointed. A second time they were asked to surrender, and they again replied they would not. The fire rapidly increasing, the captain ordered bread and water to be placed in the boats, and the latter got ready for immediate use.

"The cook, assisted by the steward, placed in the gig, which was hanging on the starboard side to the ship's davits, two barrels of bread and a small keg containing about six gallons. The cook got into the boat, and while the steward was lowering it down, the tackle rope parted, the boat was capsized and the cook drowned. The captain now ordered a long boat to be lowered, and while in the act of lowering it, the tackle rope of this also parted, and the boat was swamped. A third boat was lowered in safety, which was immediately filled with some of the crew, and put off from the ship's side. The ship now being fore and aft one mass of flames, the remainder of the crew left on board, which consisted of the captain, first mate, European doctor, interpreter, supercargo, storekeeper, chief steward and one sailor, were compelled to throw themselves overboard, and swim toward one of the swamped boats. The captain, mate, supercargo and sailor alone reached the boat, the others having perished in the attempt.

"After being in the water twenty minutes or more, still holding on to the swamped boat and calling to the crew in the other boat for assistance, they came at length to our rescue, and we got into the boat which now contained thirty-one men, the remainder of the crew, nine in number, having perished. The weather at this time being calm, an attempt was made to bail the water out of the long-boat, which was swamped, and having succeeded in doing so, fifteen men were placed in it. Having only six oars, two were given to the smallest boat, and the latter was towed by the large one—still keeping within a mile of the burning ship; at nine P. M. the mizzen-mast fell, and at ten P. M. the vessel blew up, the fire having reached that part of the hold in which the 8,000 boxes of Chinese fire-crackers were stowed."

Of course every soul on board perished. The crew on board the boats was rescued by the Hamburg bark Maders, bound to Saigon, China.

THE ADROIT THIEF.

THE skill and shrewdness exhibited by rogues in obtaining the property of others are sometimes almost marvelous, and it is always a matter of regret that their abilities are not devoted to more laudable ends. The following incident, related by a resident of India, illustrates the adroitness with which peculations are carried on in that country: "I once had a remarkably quiet and docile elephant, which one day came home loaded with branches of trees for provender, followed by a number of villagers, complaining that the driver had stolen a kid from them, and that it was then on the elephant under the branches of the trees. The driver took an opportunity of decamping into the village and hiding himself. I ordered the elephant to be unloaded, and was surprised to see that he would not allow any person to come near him, when at all other times he was perfectly tractable and obedient. Combining all the circumstances, I was convinced that the driver was guilty, and to get rid of the noise, I recompensed the people for the loss of the kid. As soon as they were gone, the elephant allowed himself to be unloaded, and the kid was found under the branches as described by the people. I learned from my interpreter that similar complaints had been made to him before, and that the rascal of a driver had made it a practice to drive the elephant into the midst of a herd of goats, and had taught the animal to pick up any of the kids he was directed; he had also accustomed him to steal pumpkins, and other vegetables that grew against the inside of the fences, like beans, which could be reached only by an elephant.

THE ASS AND THE CARROTS.

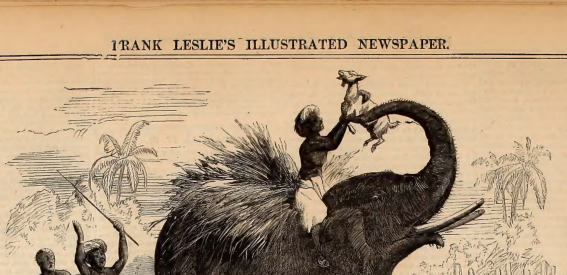
THE intelligence displayed by animals often approximates so nearly to reason, that it is not very difficult to believe they may have the power of forming logical conclusions. The advocates of the development theory can certainly adduce many facts that strongly favor their views. The donkey is not generally considered a very knowing brute, but the following incident exhibits a degree of shrewdness, and a skill in adapting means to ends, that ought to redeem this despised quadruped from the contempt with which he is usually regarded.

An ass was lodged at night in a small shed, which opened into a yard; adjoining this, but separated from it by a wall and a door, fastened by two bolts and an ordinary latch, was the kitchen garden. One morning the master was very much surprised to find the garden-door unbolted, and the lettuces, and all the rest of the garden-walks and beds plainly showed who had been the trespasser. Still the master could scarcely imagine that the ass had withdrawn the bolts, and let himself in; but one night he watched him from the window of a room overlooking the yard and garden, and there he distinctly saw Master Donkey, reared on his hind legs, unfastening the upper bolt with the nose or mouth. He then withdrew the lower one also, lifted the latch, and walked in. Presently he returned with a fine head of carrots, which he placed on his shed, and then went back to latch the door, after which he leisurely munched his aptly acquired booty. Before a stop was put to his proceedings his master gave several of his neighbors an opportunity of witnessing them. It was noticed that he never would begin operations till the light had been extinguished from the bedroom window.

MARRIAGES IN THE FLEET PRISON

THE condition of public morals in England is a subject of sad sorry, even with our own standard, was exceedingly gross and disgraceful. Abuses of every character were tolerated, and there was a complete absence of that delicacy and delicate regard for purity and refinement that is the distinguishing mark of modern society.

Among the singular customs of our forefathers, arising, in a great measure, from their indifference to decorum, one of the most remarkable was matrimony, although, we would rather say, to say, but the fitest word would be "performed" by the parsons in the Fleet Prison. These clerical functionaries were disreputable, dissolute men, mostly prisoners for debt, who, to the great injury of public morals, degraded the dignity of their holy profession by marrying in the precincts of the Fleet Prison, at a minute's notice, any persons who might present themselves for that purpose. No questions were asked, no stipulations made, except as to the amount of the fee for the service, or the quantity of wine to be drunk on the occasion. It not unfrequently happened, indeed, that the clergyman, the clerk, the bridegroom and the bride were drunk at the very time the ceremony was performed. These disgraceful members of the sacred calling had their "pipers," or "touters," who, if they caught sight of a man and woman walking together along the streets of the neighborhood, pestered them as the few clothesmen in the present day tease the passers-by with solicitations, not easily to be shaken off, as to whether they wanted a clergyman to marry them.



With such facilities for marriage, and such unprincipled ministers, it may easily be imagined that iniquitous schemes of all sorts were perpetrated under the name of "Fleet Weddings." The parsons were ready, for a bribe, to make false entries in their registers, to ante-date weddings, to give fictitious certificates, and to marry persons who would declare only the initials of their names. Thus, if a spinster or a widow, in debt, desired to cheat her creditors by pretending to have been married before the debt was contracted, she had only to present herself at one of the marriage-houses in the Fleet, and, upon payment of a small additional fee to the clergyman, a man could instantly be found on the spot to act as bridegroom for a few shillings, and the worthless chaplain could find a blank place in his register for any year desired, so that there was no difficulty in making the necessary record. They would also, for a consideration, obliterate any given entry. The sham bridegrooms, under different names, were married over and over again, with the full knowledge of the clerical practitioners. In fact, all manner of people presented themselves for marriage at the unholy dens in the Fleet taverns: runaway sons and daughters of peers, Irish adventurers and foolish rich widows, demons and decayed beauties, soldiers and servant-girls, boys in their teens and old women of seventy, men and women living already wives and husbands, young heiresses conveyed thither by force, and compelled, in terrorem, to be brides, and common laborers and female paupers, dragged by parish-officers to the profane altar, stained by relics of drunken orgies, and reeking with the fumes of liquor and tobacco!

Such was London in the early part of the last century. It is an evidence of progress and virtue that such a state of things would be impossible now, and that corruption cannot so openly fester and pollute. Our illustration shows one of these unhallowed performances in the old Fleet Prison, within the walls of which so much of agony and wretchedness has been experienced.

THE ADROIT THIEF.

THE STING OF A SCORPION.

Episode o an Adventure in Tartary.

ON my way between Balkh and Kerki, I spent several days in the house of a renowned Turkoman sheikh, who, besides his spiritual influence, exercised also a worldly superiority over the tribe amongst whom he resided. I should have plenty to do if I set myself to relate all the roguery and hypocritical bearings of this Mohammedan saint, especially in connecting bartering with blessing, and business with so-called religion. But at present I wish to speak only of a danger which befell me when in his company, and from which I escaped by a special mercy of the Almighty.

In one of those bright moonlight nights of August I sat up a little longer than usual in the society of some young Turkomans, who found extreme pleasure in my reading of some heroic ballads and their national songs. Toward midnight, however, everybody retired, or rather separated from the rest, which was merely lying down in the open air. I fell asleep near an old wall, entirely forgetting the warnings so often given to me by the nomads not to dwell in the neighborhood of old decaying edifices, or near a heap of rubbish. But, alas! I suppose men accustomed to civilized life feel always a secret inclination toward buildings. A wall, even if in ruin, reminded me of comfort and of settled life, and I may be excused if I listened rather to the voice of my heart than to the counsels of my companions.

Sleep, as usual with me, closed my eyes as soon as I laid me down. I dreamt of the wars and the warriors illustrated in the poetry I had been reading to the Turkomans. I would rather have had my senses beguiled by remembrance of "sweet home;" but we cannot command the nature of our dreams.

It was about midnight when I felt a terrible and acute pain in my right foot near the great toe—a pain as awful as if somebody had plunged a poisoned needle in that spot. I awoke with a cold piercing cry. I grasped my foot, and, although yet unconscious of what had befallen me, I imported, with heart-rending exclamations the help of my slumbering neighbors. They awoke, but before they could come to my assistance, the pain, increasing in violence, began to spread upward to the head like the flow of a fiery stream. While the right side from top to toe ached in an indescribably awful way, the left remained entirely untouched.

In this desperate state it was a gray-haired Turkoman who approached me first, and saying: "Ah, Hodjim" (my guest), "you are stung by a scorpion," he seized the leg, bound it round the ankle as tight as he could, then, pressing his lips on the spot where the pain originated, he sucked with such a force that I really felt the power of his breath along the whole aching side. In the meantime I was surrounded by the rest of the company, and the old Turkoman, who became probably tired by his exertions, was soon relieved by a second and a third. The sucking, although renewed with fresh vigor, did little or nothing to relieve my agony. Finally, an old Mollah came to apply his holy breath in the shape of blessings. Tapping for some minutes with his fingers on the badly wounded limb, he uttered curses and imprecations on the evil spirit who came in the shape of a scorpion to torture the true believer. He encouraged me with the promise that as soon as the Muezzin should call for the morning prayer, the evil spirit would disappear, being by nothing more frightened than by the words of that holy admonition.

I remained then in a state the picture of which I could scarcely give to the reader. The excitement pain bereft me of all reason. The cutting, stinging, and burning now pierced through the whole half of my body; but the head, and particularly the right eye, was the most affected. I screamed constantly as loud as I could, but my lamentations and my deep sighs did not prevent the company falling again to sleep. It was undoubtedly the most desperate moment, not only of my journey, but of my whole life. Whilst I thought the poison would kill me here in this strange and distant country, I glanced often to the heavens, not to look for the morning star as the signal of release from my tortures, according to the prediction of the pious Mollah, but to contemplate those shining bright orbs as if I would bid them farewell, and intrust to them my last address to my friends in the much-beloved West. In the paroxysm of my sufferings I renounced all hope, and flung my head violently to the ground, as if in order to deaden the intensity of my pangs. I am well ashamed now of my puerilanimous conduct, and I might justly be rebuked of it; but there is scarcely any pain or anguish which could approach that most terrible agony caused by the sting of scorpions—animals which were much dreaded even in the ancient times, and of whose deadly poison I had seen a miserable victim expire some days before. It was a poor Hadji, who, during his prayers, on touching the ground with his forehead, was stung on his eyelid: and there being no possibility of checking the spreading of the poison, he died in the most frightful way.

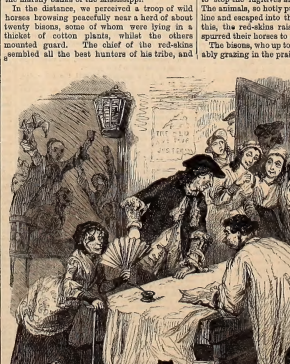
I lay there in an almost exhausted state. The dawn was yet half an hour distant, when I felt by degrees the fire changing into cold. I thought it was the morning breeze which made me shiver; but no, it was the crisis which had come. Every moment which brought me nearer to the blessed daylight diminished my aches, and —is it not wonderful to relate?—I felt them disappear exactly in the same way in which they came. First of all it was the head which began to clear; the mitigation augmented by short intervals in every limb downward to the foot; and when the first rays of the morning twilight struck my eyes I felt almost entirely recovered. I was in a state of half-intoxication, and my senses being weakened by the pain. In calling back to my memory the dreary midnight hour, I began to shudder, when the deep stentorian voice of the Muezzin saying, "There is no God besides Allah," sounded in the distance. The prophecy of the Mollah was fulfilled; but the reader will understand that it was not the holy admonition, but rather the sucking of the Turkomans, that saved me. The wild sons of the desert know the usual term of the sufferings caused by the bite of this venomous animal, and instead of using a commonplace expression of so many hours, the wise Mollah gave the time of the morning prayer as the time of my recovery.

Two hours after sunrise, although weak, I was able to walk about; and how great was my astonishment when, looking at the spot where I had been wounded, I saw but a small, scarcely noticeable point, like the puncture of a very fine needle.

THE WILD HORSE

IT was on the occasion of my second journey across the American desert that we found ourselves one morning, in the month of October, 1846, among a chain of steep and barren mountains, amid which flowed a stream like a chain of silver. It was full of fish, and the banks were of turf, enameled with flowers. In the distance, on the brow of the mountain which overlooked the valley, were trees whose foliage was fresh and bright, whose boles were covered with emerald moss, and on which the eye rested with pleasure, for they contrasted with the monotony of the vast solitudes which we had traversed, after quitting the marshy banks of the Mississippi.

In the distance, we perceived a troop of wild horses browsing peacefully near a herd of about twenty bisons, some of whom were lying in a thicket of cotton plants, whilst the others mounted guard. The chief of the red-skins assembled all the best hunters of his tribe, and held a council with them. He was determined to carry out that grand manœuvre which is known in the United States and among the emigrants of the Far West as the "Wild Horses' Ring." This style of sporting requires a large number of able horsemen, who, spreading themselves about, formed a circle of about a mile and a half in circumference.



Absolute silence is necessary, for wild horses are easily frightened, and their instinct is so acute that the slightest breeze will carry to their nostrils the scent of their enemies, the red-skins of the desert. As soon as the circle was formed, four hunters, mounted on splendid horses, started in the direction of the herd. Immediately, every animal started off in the opposite direction; but, as soon as they attempted to pass over the boundaries of the circle, the nearest hunter dashed onward to meet them, and frightened them back again.

Nothing is grander than to see these horses at full gallop, rushing in every direction, and whinnying with such clearness and suddenness that the echoes have scarcely time to take up the burden without hearing it repeated. The Pawnees, who entertained me, attached the baggage horses to stakes, so as to keep them from running away, and to prevent them from being misled by bad example. Fifty red-skins, with the chief of the tribe at the head, crept along the border of the wood which lined the hill to the left, leading their horses after them. A similar number of men went to the right, on the other side of the stream; whilst a third party, making an immense circuit, lay in ambush on a parallel line near the lower end of the valley, with a view to a junction of the two wings, so as to inclose the herd of wild horses in the centre. The different manœuvre was executed with extraordinary facility, and the third line was just about to unite itself with the two others, when the herd gave symptoms of alarm. The neighings of the horses became more frequent; they breathed heavily, and looked anxiously around. Presently they broke out into a trot, behind a clump of cotton bushes, which hid them from from our sight.

The chief of the Pawnees happened to retreat to the spot where the scene which I narrate took place, and he advanced slowly to the animals, in order to drive them back, when the three whites who accompanied me broke out of the cover and advanced toward the horses.

This clumsy movement upset all the plans of the red-skins. Immediately they perceived the men, the wild horses dashed off into the valley, pursued by the three whites, who were shouting like men possessed. It was in vain for the Pawnees, who formed the middle line, to attempt to stop the fugitives and make them turn back. The animals, so hotly pursued, broke through the line and escaped into the open plain. On seeing this, the red-skins raised their war-whoop, and spurred their horses to a gallop.

The bisons, who up to this time had been peacefully grazing in the prairie, seemed now to hold a consultation together, and looking with an air of astonishment at the human avalanche which came pouring toward them, they took flight at a rapid pace, galloping toward a marsh which was at the foot of the valley. As for the horses, they fled along the narrow defile through the mountains, and disappeared pell-mell in a cloud of dust. The three whites and about fifty Pawnees were on the heels of the wild horses, but none of them could use the lasso with any success. I must here confess my own incompetence as a horseman, and I admit that I was one of the laggards, although I was mounted on a capital mare, with an Indian saddle as comfortable and easy as an arm-chair. My feet were securely bound to the large Mexican stirrups, so that I was quite secure from falling.

Among the animals in the herd I had remarked a magnificent stallion, as black as a raven's wing, and I pursued him in company with two young Pawnees who acted as attendants upon the chief of the tribe. As we mounted the defile the stallion slipped and fell, and, in a moment, the two red-skins leapt from their horses and seized the creature by his mane and nostrils. The stallion struggled vigorously, beating the earth with his fore feet and plowing it up behind with his hoofs; but, in spite of all his efforts, my two companions succeeded in passing the lasso around his neck and in fixing him by the right fore foot to a leathern thong which was attached to the left hind foot.

Whilst the other Indian hunters and the three whites pursued the remainder of the herd, I returned to camp with the black stallion and his two conquerors, who had attached a second rope to the lasso, and so held the brute between them at a sufficient distance to prevent him from injuring them by his kicking. Directly he went toward one side, they tugged him toward the other, and by this means, when arrived at the camp, if not vanquished, he was fairly tired out.

The Pawnees brought back four colts and a mare. Two of the former were bays, and the two others white; the mare was as black as jet. Next morning, the six animals seemed to understand perfectly the necessity of submission, and had become as docile as others who had lived for years in the camp of the Pawnees.

The capture of a wild horse is a feat which is esteemed above all others among the red-skins of every tribe. The animals who live in freedom on those vast plains are of different shapes and colors, and it is not difficult to distinguish their origin. Some of them resemble the English breeds, and these are probably the descendants of horses which escaped from the English colonies before the Declaration of Independence. The smaller and more sinewy horses are doubtless descended from the Andalusian breed, which were brought thither by Cortez and the Spanish colonists after the Mississippi and the neighboring territories were taken possession of by Hernandes de Soto.

On the evening after this grand hunt we were sitting around our fires, with which we had cooked our supper. Two blankets were spread upon the ground, and an enormous bowl of maple-wood was before us filled with a stew composed of wild turkeys and slices of peccary hams. Several haunches of wild venison, roasted upon wooden spits, were browning before the fire, which sputtered and smoked with the grease which dropped into it. We had neither plates nor forks, and every one helped himself with the aid of his knife, cutting slices from the venison, which he seasoned from a little bowl filled with a mixture of salt and pepper.

Here I must offer a compliment to the Pawnee cook. The stew and roasts, seasoned by the air of the prairie, seemed to me superior to anything I had ever tasted at Delmonico's. Our only drink was coffee boiled in a caldron, sweetened with brown sugar, and served in tin cups. When night came on, the camp wore a picturesque appearance. Scattered fires sparkled in the forest, and around them you could see groups of Indians, some seated, others lying at full length and wrapped up in their blankets. For my part, I took a pleasure in listening to the tales of the Pawnees who surrounded me—tales which beguiled the monotony of the scene. The Indians have plenty of legends, and their superstitious veneration for the beauties of Nature surpasses all that the ingenuity of a European can invent. One of them assured us that the hunters sometimes found thunder-bolts in the prairies, and that they made the best points for arrows and lances. A warrior furnished with those is invincible, but he is all the more subject to the danger of electricity. If a storm comes on during a fight, he may be reduced to powder. This, however, is but a fable.

I heard a great many anecdotes about a certain black horse that frequented the prairies of Arkansas for a number of years, defying every attempt of the hunters to catch him. The fame of him was known afar. He was thought to be impossible of capture, and his feet were lighter than the gazelle, and the mane which fell upon his graceful crest, was as black as ebony. One of the Pawnees told us that one evening, before the moon was up, he approached very near to the enchanted horse, and threw his lasso. The noble brute seemed to resign himself at first, and galloped by the side of his captor; but suddenly perceiving the camp fires, he shied off vigorously, disentangled himself from the lasso, and rushed full into the obscurity of the night.

The horses captured by the Pawnees are the objects of especial attention. It may interest the reader to know something of the means employed by the red-skins to conquer these noble animals. In the first place, they set upon the horse's back a construction composed of two pieces of wood, lightly attached to each other, so as to give it its first idea of servitude. The haughty independence of the animal is then immediately manifested, but after an unequal struggle, in which the Indian aids, the poor horse, feeling resistance to be useless, lies down and confesses himself to be vanquished. An actor, hoping to represent the despair of a monarch, could not render the position more dramatically.

The second lesson consists in making the animal get up by the pressure of the bridle. At first the horse refuses to obey; then he lies down at full length; but presently, on the reiterated pressure of the bridle and the sting of the whip, he springs neighing to his feet and places his head between his two fore legs. Then he is entirely vanquished, and after making him submit for two or three days to these humiliations of slavery, he is set free among the horses who submit themselves to the rein or saddle. I could not help admiring the splendid animals thus trained by the Pawnees, and whose life is changed from freedom to a miserable slavery. Instead of ranging the boundless pastures at their will, wandering from prairie to prairie, and from mountain to plain, browsing upon every kind of flower and grass, and quenching their thirst at every brook, they are condemned to a perpetual servitude, to the humiliation of bridle and bit.

Is there not a strange similarity between this transition and the lot of some of the human race? One day a monarch, the next a prisoner. So one day the noble is monarch of the prairies, and the next, he is harnessed to a dung-cart.

THE ÆSTHETICS OF VIRTUE.

It is a trite saying, that virtue is its own reward, and doubtless under certain conditions this statement is true. There is unquestionably a satisfaction in the consciousness of well-doing, in the supremacy of good over evil, in the victory gained over wild passions and wayward propensities, that more than compensates for any self-denial imposed or any meretricious allurements neglected by one who has achieved such an end; but the melancholy fact still remains, that in the highest sense the great mass of men are not virtuous, and that many others, whose outward conduct is blameless, are secretly guilty of glaring departures from rectitude. Now this condition of things must arise either from some unconquerable propensity toward wrong-doing, from a want of power in virtue to control the mind and conduct, or from mistaken notions of its nature and requirements.

The last of these formulas we deem by far the more probable. It is our mistake as to the nature and province of virtue that disappoints us as to its influence and leads us to impugn human nature and mourn over its obliquity.

We strip virtue of all her adornments and pleasantries, hold her up to the world a stark, repulsive skeleton, and ask that she shall be revered as a goddess, and when the beholders do not fall down and worship the miserable phantom, we declaim against the corruption of the times and the rampant wickedness of man. Virtue is not a bare abstraction, something that only the judgment can comprehend and the reason approve, but a living, breathing reality, radiant with love and sympathy, entering right into the heart and feelings, and reigning a queen over the affections. Verily her ways are ways of pleasantness, but we force her into rigid, artificial grooves, when all her attractions disappear, and wonder that she has so little power.

We take a child full of animal spirit, frank, trusting and loving, and teach him that to be good and virtuous he must repress all those feelings that are the very crowning charm of his being. We may succeed in molding and developing him into our own distorted pattern, just as trees may be pruned into fantastic shapes, but the result of our unnatural efforts in each instance will prove about equally satisfactory; we shall have neither a noble, virtuous man, nor a vigorous, beautiful tree. And this is the radical defect with most schemes of social and moral reform. Men, full of zeal, but void of wisdom, set up a caricature, and because the world laughs and despises, they say, What a naughty world!

But we proposed to treat of the æsthetics of virtue. The fact is, virtue, as generally held up to men, has no æsthetics, and it is of this great lack we complain. Vice is clothed in purple and fine linen, vice appeals to every sense, vice builds gorgeous temples, vice provides for almost every craving of our nature; is it strange, then, that virtue, losing sight of all these things, and decrying every innocent source of enjoyment, should itself be discarded as too rigid in its nature and too exacting in its requirements? Contrast the appliances virtue affords for reforming men with those vice provides for enslaving them, and wonder no longer that virtue has so little power.

We passed by a seaman's Bethel the other day, moored to a filthy pier, devoid of taste and beauty, dilapidated, uninviting; it did not surprise us that the attendance there on Sundays was very meager; in fact, it is a marvel that any one should be willing to enter such a gloomy prison-like place at all. And so of our chapels and association rooms the same things may be said. They are magnificent failures, just because they are indescribably barren and unattractive. Reformers generally act on the assumption that our moral nature is all we possess, and they have addressed this nature as if it were fully trained and developed. You might as well expect to teach a savage how to read by giving him lessons in algebra; he would soon turn from you in disgust or despair. Men must come down from their stilts and put themselves in accord with the emotional nature of the world, if they would have the world improve, and just as they enter into the sympathies of those around them will they exert a salutary and lasting influence. Restore to virtue her insignia and her prerogatives, strip off the cerements with which she has been bound, let her stand forth in her native radiance and exercise her proper sway, and the world shall do her homage and bow in submission at her feet.

Of course there are some who are so constituted or circumstanced, as to appreciate the force and applicability of bare abstract truth, but men generally are reached through the medium of their senses and emotions, and from losing sight of this fact, many noble and praiseworthy efforts for the general good have proved wonderfully barren of palpable results. And especially is this true of what right-thinking men regard as of vital importance, pertaining to the future equally with the present. We are invariably asked to accept as true what we cannot understand, what has no practical bearing upon our daily life, what blunts and stifles all the voluntary exercises of our nature; and because we are faithless and skeptical, and turn away from dry dogmas to living facts, we are denounced and consigned to perdition. There is need and opportunity for reform in all these things. Beginning in the family and extending to the school, the rostrum and the church, we would have truth so presented, and virtue so inculcated, that they might appeal to our receptive powers, and stand before us in all their native excellence.

We shall train our children best by working on their feelings rather than on their intellect; we shall reform society, not by denouncing its follies and faults, but by bringing into exercise those common emotions that, properly directed, will have no relish for follies and faults. When the great Teacher instructed the multitudes, his doctrines were not abstract formulas, but living gems of thought and feeling, set in the beauties of the fields and flowers, and thus appealing to every one's experience and coming home to every one's heart. If our teachers and reformers would keep this fact in view, and act upon it—if they would take men as they are, and treat them as mortals and not as machines, disappointment and failure would less frequently attend their honest but ill-advised efforts. And when one does break away from the beaten track, how he is suspected and abused; but the world moves, and we have hope that the days of this ignorance will soon come to an end, and an era of better things be vouchsafed to us.

SPAIN AS IT IS.

The attempt of Spain, after a little trumpery success in Africa, to lift itself into the rank of a first-rate nation by raids and conquests in America, has abjectly failed. Utterly foiled in San Domingo, she has been beaten and humiliated in Chile and Peru. The last mail brings us news of both popular and military risings within her borders. She is bankrupt. For many years her securities have been running lower and lower. Nobody will buy them. Few care to inherit them. She is without voice in the affairs of Europe, and is now the only civilized nation of the world upholding slavery. She merits the opprobrium of mankind. She is not, however, utterly hopeless. In the first place, her legislation recognizes the liberty of religious opinions, but does not recognize the liberty of religious worship. The distinction is a pitiful one for these days, but still it represents the abolition of an enormous amount of tyranny and annoyance. Secondly, the territorial power of the priesthood, once so great, has ceased to exist; monasteries are a thing of the past, and in their place we find only a few scattered mission-houses, while the whole number of ecclesiastics has been diminished by many thousands. Thirdly, although it might be imagined that the sacrifice of so large a portion of its worldly advantages might have been repaid to the Spanish clergy by an increase of spiritual influence, this has certainly not been the case, and every traveler knows that neither they nor their office are respected by large sections of the community. In Malaga and Cadiz, in Seville and Cordova, through all south-eastern Spain we behold the old religion sinking into contempt. The priests candidly confess that they have lost their hold over the middle class; or, to use their own peculiar diction, they say: "If it were not for the poor, there would be no worship of God in the land." Sometimes when a sermon of an exceptionally startling kind wakes up the slumbering consciences of the masses, the ancient fanaticism flares up again in a ghastly way; but it is a mere momentary revival, and things soon return to their accustomed course.

Probably the form of Romanism which prevails in Spain is lower, and retains less of the real spirit of Christianity, than that which exists in any other Catholic country. Over the lower classes it still has very considerable hold, but rather as a superstition than as a religion. On the other hand, the creed of the bulk of the men among the educated classes is pure indifferentism, and probably in their hearts the majority of those who are opposed to religious toleration oppose it in order that they may not have the trouble of settling what attitude they are to take up toward the religion of the State. At present they are Catholics as a matter of course, just as they are Spaniards. If they could be anything else, they would be ashamed to profess belief in a system which they utterly despise. This state of things need surprise nobody; it is the natural result of the forcible suppression of free thought, and is seen in a less degree even in those countries—pagan and other—where public opinion, and not penal legislation, is the supporter of the existing creeds. We cannot expect this miserable hypocrisy, injurious alike to morality, to literature and to statesmanship, soon to pass away; but a beginning is made. Any one who knows Spain could mention the names of Spaniards who are as enlightened in these great matters and as earnest as the best; and just as surely as the opinions of Luther and Melancthon would, through the Enzinas family and many others, have taken root in Spain and converted a large minority of the nation, if the persecutions of Philip II. and his successors had not made it absolutely impossible, so one or other of the forms of Christianity which, under various names and with differences more or less marked, but not of vital importance, are becoming the creed of most thinking men in the countries of Europe generally recognized as progressive, will most certainly, before the end of this century, have great influence in rapidly reviving Spain.

SONG BIRDS OF JAMAICA.

In such a region of vegetable luxuriance we might expect animal life to display its wonders and varieties of being, and here the numerous tribes of gay-plumaged and vocal birds, the brilliant and sometimes huge reptiles, and the innumerable moths and flies, and leaping and bounding things, add the charm of animated and sensuous existence to wilds which, however beautiful, were otherwise but tame and unattractive. In the lonely dells of the forest, where the crystal brook brawls among the pebbles, the kildee plover wheels in swift flight around the traveler's head; in the rushy shallows the snowy gaulin is seen watching for its aquatic prey, and from the underwood hard by, the soft cooing of the peadoves comes mournfully, yet soothingly, to the ear, while now and then the plump bird alights on the sward to pick the fallen fruit of the pimento-trees, or to look upon the observer with its full, liquid, gentle eyes. In the same spots may be heard the note of the pretty Jamaica sparrow, repeating—"tichicro! chi-chi-tichicro," from his grassy cover; and where the orange groves and pimento trees fringe the way to the negro village the wild canary hops and twitters—an imported stranger, who has lost in song what he has gained in color.

Numerous pigeons and partridges are common in these woods, and the green tody or robin redbreast of the colonists is particularly abundant, and though with brighter coloring than our own robin, with much the same fearless habit—sitting on the road-side bush, and almost brushing the face of the traveler as he passes.

Among the mountains of the Bluefields ridge there are few birds, but such as are found are of a peculiar interest. The jabbering crow gives utterance to strange articulations, as, from the topmost branch of the highest tree, he calls to his fellows, or sails on laboring wing from one tree to another. This is the region, too, of the solitaire, a mysterious recluse, who just before day-break ravishes the ear of the wanderer with his flute-like tones, which fall like the measured notes of a psalm. One, and another, and another, take up the strain, till the mellow tones come from all parts of the surrounding woods, startling the ear when not accustomed to it and charming it when it is. The lovely humming-bird, too, is a frequenter of these regions, and flits and hovers about the flowering trees all day long, sipping with its long bill the honey from their blossoms, and peeping fearlessly under the broad hat of the wanderer, almost startling him with their matchless beauty of metallic plumage, changing into innumerable shades of lustre with the fitful motions of the bee-like bird. At night, every part of the island is vocal with the varied song of the mocking-bird, the nightingale of the tropics. Under the blue sky and the silver moonlight—which in Jamaica surpasses in their beauty the brightest imagining of northern poets—the soft cadences of the breeze sweeping over the grassy sward, or rustling through the embowered woods is delightfully varied with the notes of this prince of songsters, who, taking his seat on the highest twig of an orange tree, pours forth rich and solemn gushes of melody, as earnestly as if his soul were in his song. A rival from a neighboring tree commences a similar strain, and now the two birds exert all their powers in rivalry, until the blue midnight rings with bursts, and swells, and tender cadences, as if the stars themselves were singing.

AN INCIDENT OFF CAPE HORN.

At seven o'clock in the morning, it being our watch below, we were aroused from a sound sleep by the cry of "All hands ahoy! a man overboard!" This unwonted cry sent a thrill through the heart of every one, and hurrying on deck, we found the vessel hove flat aback, with all her studding-sails set—for the boy who was at the helm left it to throw something overboard, and the carpenter, who was an old sailor, knowing that the wind was light, put the helm down and hove her aback. The watch on deck were lowering away the quarter-boat, and I got on deck just in time to heave myself into her as she was leaving the side; but it was not until out upon the wide Pacific, in our little boat, that I knew whom we had lost. It was George Ballmer, a young sailor who was prized by the officers as an active and willing seaman, and by the crew as a lively, hearty fellow, and a good shipmate. He was going aloft to fit a strap round the main-topmast-head, for ringtail halyards, and had the strap and block, a coil of halyards and a marline-spike, about his neck. He fell from the starboard shrouds, and not knowing how to swim, and being very heavily dressed, with all those things round his neck, he probably sank immediately. We pulled astern, in the direction in which he fell, and though we knew there was no hope of saving him, yet no one wished to speak of returning, and we rowed about for nearly an hour, without the hope of doing anything, but unwilling to acknowledge to ourselves that we must give him up. At length we turned the boat's head, and made toward the vessel. Death is at all times solemn, but never so much so as at sea. A man dies on shore; his body remains with his friends, and "the mourners go about the streets;" but when a man falls overboard at sea and is lost, there is suddenness in the event, and a difficulty in realizing it, which give to it an air of awful mystery. A man dies on shore—you follow his body to the grave, and a stone marks the spot. You are often prepared for the event. There is always something which helps you to realize it when it happens, and to recall it when it has passed. A man is shot down by your side in battle, and the mangled body remains an object and a real evidence; but at sea, the man is near you—at your side—you hear his voice, and in an instant he is gone, and nothing but a vacancy shows his loss. Then, too, at sea—to use a homely but expressive phrase—you miss a man so much.

A dozen men are shut up together in a little bark, upon the wide, wide sea, and for months and months see no forms and hear no voices but their own, and one is taken suddenly from among them, and they miss him at every turn. It is like losing a limb. There are no new faces or new scenes to fill up the gap. There is always an empty berth in the forecastle, and one man wanting when the small night-watch is mustered. There is one less to take the wheel, and one less to lay out with you upon the yard. You miss his form, and the sound of his voice, for habit has made them almost necessary to you, and each of your senses feels the loss. All these things make such a death peculiarly solemn, and the effect of it remains upon the crew for some time.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A man, seeing an undertaker carrying a very small coffin, exclaimed, in the utmost surprise, "Is it possible that that coffin can be intended for any living creature?"

The easiest way to get a living (says a vagabond poet), is to sit on a gate and wait for good luck. In case good luck don't come along, you are no worse off than you were before.

A reporter, in describing a meeting of a total abstinence society, said that "they had a most harmonious and profitable session, and retired from the hall full of the best of spirits."

The following words, if spelt backward and forward, are the same, "name no one man."

The ladies of Cincinnati and the vicinage are very confiding. One of them, named "Diana," writes to the Commercial, urging the rebuilding of the Opera House, where "mothers, wives and sisters can at least fancy their absent ones are spending their evenings."

AN INCIDENT IN A RAILWAY CAR.

Monster—"I'm afraid I'm sitting on your crinoline, ma'am."

Affable Young Lady—"Oh, never mind sir, it's of no consequence: you can't hurt it."

Monster—"No, ma'am, it's not that; but the confounded thing hurts me!"

"File right!" said an officer to his company. "Bedad," said an Irishman, who stood near sharpening his saw, "it's me own property, and I'll be after doin' as I plaze wid it."

When lovely women, Lump of Folly,
 Would show the world her vainest trait;
Would treat herself as child her dolly,
 And warns each man of sense away,
The surest method she'll discover
 To prompt a wink from every eye,
Degrade a spouse, disgust a lover,
 And spoil a scalp-skin is—to dye.

We are told to hope and trust; but what is a poor fellow to do when he can no longer get any credit?

Why an Apothecary Sells Cod-Liver Oil.—To replenish his coughers (coffers).

Misery loves company, and so does a marriageable young lady.

What prevents the running river running away? Why, it's tide up.

You can tell how wide a man's reputation is, but you can't tell how long.

Our Bed-rooms.—Singular Statements in Relation to Cholera.—Dr. T. S. Bell, an old and eminent physician of Louisville, a man of vast acquirements and wide observation and experience, said the other day at a meeting of the Louisville College of Physicians and Surgeons: "The cause of cholera has never risen to any great height perpendicularly, except when it was forced up. Naturally it cannot seriously affect the second story of any good residence. Heights have always been, when properly guarded, secure refuge from cholera. Elevated buildings or high walls have been perfectly exempt, while conterminous places were ravaged. Moscow has been repeatedly invaded in the quarters along the low banks of the Moskwa, but there has never been a case of the disease in the elevated Kremlin. The monasteries with high walls in Italy, France and Spain have, with great uniformity, escaped the disease. The cause of cholera acts alone at night, and upon sleeping persons. No amount of exposure in the worst localities of the disease imperils the wakeful moving individual. I have seen hundreds of instances of this fact, without one aberration from the statement of the proposition. I have myself spent many a night in these localities during the ravages of the epidemic, and never felt that I was in any peril while I kept awake, and the best security for that is to keep in motion." So this distinguished practitioner intimates that attention to our sleeping apartments is quite as important as the other precautionary steps which are more frequently urged in the newspapers. Look where you sleep, for it seems that the epidemic is most dangerous when it steals on one "like a thief in the night."

THE FROZEN MAMMOTH.—At the last meeting of the Academy of Science, a letter was received from M. de Baer, of St. Petersburg, in reference to the mammoth, still covered with its skin and hair, which had been discovered in the frozen soil of Arctic Siberia. This discovery had been made in 1858 by a Samoyede, in the environs of Tas Bay, the eastern branch of the Gulf of Obi. The news only reached St. Petersburg toward the end of 1865; but as the bodies of large animals will keep a long while in those regions, if they are not completely uncovered, and as this mammoth was still inclosed in the frozen soil, the Academy of St. Petersburg has, with the aid of the Russian Government, sent M. Schmidt, an excellent paleontologist, to examine the animal and its position in the locality. It is hoped M. Schmidt will arrive before the decomposition is further advanced, and that a correct notion may be obtained of the outer appearance of the animal, and also, from the contents of the stomach, of its natural food. The pre-historical figure of the mammoth rests on a tradition of very, found in a cavern of Perigord by M. Lartet, and taken almost entirely from it.

Martin Luther once thought he saw the devil in his chamber, and threw an inkstand at his head. Had they had in those days AYER'S PILLS to exercise all the devils that come from indigestion of stomach, his laughable fright would not have become a matter of history.

Purify the Blood.—If the blood be pure, the body, which is formed from and by the blood, cannot be diseased. If there be in any part of the body any affection, such as a boil or ulcer, even a bruise, the blood cannot be brought to that part without carrying matters from the local affection, and carries it into the general system. This is the case often of sudden death to persons of habits afflicted with boils and ulcers, and who use no medicine; the matter gets into the circulating system and makes up the fine blood-vessels, which supply the brain with vitality, and life ceases as if bereft by lightning. Now this can be remedied. BRANDRETH'S PILLS take all impure matter from the circulation, and save the general health, soon curing local affections also. BRANDRETH'S PILLS protect from sickness, and restore the ailing. Sold by all Druggists.

Chastellar's White Liquid Enamel,

For Improving and Beautifying the Complexion. The most valuable and perfect preparation in use, for giving the skin a beautiful pearl-like tint, that is only found in youth. It removes Freckles, Tan, Pimples, Plugnia, Blotches, Moth Patches, Sallowness, Eruptions, and all impurities of the skin, totally banishing them, and leaving the skin white and clear as alabaster. Its use cannot be detected, after the closest scrutiny, and being a vegetable preparation, is perfectly harmless. It is the only article of the kind used by the French, and is considered by the Parisian as indispensable to a perfect toilet. Over 1,000 bottles were sold during the past year, a sufficient guarantee of its efficacy. Price only 75 cents. Sent by mail, on receipt of an order, by BERGER, SHUTTS & CO., Chemists, 241 River Street, Troy, N. Y. 556-6m

The European Complication.

EVENTS have already shown that nothing can be more uncertain and unsafe than speculations on the course of affairs in Europe. Already complications have occurred which the principal actors in the field could scarcely have anticipated. It could not have been supposed possible, by the most experienced and skilful in political divination, that within a month after the "mobilization" of the Prussian army the whole of Venetia, with its world-famed fortresses, would be, not in the hands of either of the combatants, enemies of Austria, but in possession of that unselfish apostle of peace, Louis Napoleon, and that a Bonaparte, and not the Hapsburg, would be warning off Italy from the territory she coveted, and for the purpose of obtaining which she drew the sword!

She may obtain it still; but it will be at the expense of the island of Sardinia, and at the cost of submission to French plans as regards the Pope and the Pontifical States. In other words, France is already aggrandized by the war in which she ostentatiously took no part, and Italy is defrauded of the acquisition which the battle of Sadowa assured to her, through her alliance with Prussia. By this action of France she is prevented from efficient co-operation with her ally. She had no way of striking Austria except through Venetia, where she is confronted by French instead of Austrian troops, while the latter are left free to reinforce the beaten army of Benedek in Bohemia, and enable the Hapsburgs to make another and final attempt, with superior numbers, to stop, if not turn back, the victorious Prussians.

Practically, therefore, France occupies the position of ally of Austria. Practically, she deprives Prussia of the aid of 300,000 Italian soldiers. In occupying this attitude, Louis Napoleon flatters himself that he is, as he may be indeed, "arbiter of the situation." He may think, by thus confining the war to Prussia and Austria, and enabling the latter to concentrate all her forces against a single foe, he may be able to force Prussia to yield a speedy assent to that new repartition of Europe shadowed forth in his recent letter, as the only business that could engage the attention of the lately proposed European Conference.

COUNT BISMARCK, PRIME MINISTER OF PRUSSIA.—SEE PAGE 307.

THE ARCHDUKE ALBERT, SUCCESSOR OF GEN. BENEDEK TO THE COMMAND OF THE AUSTRIAN ARMY.

Successful in this, he would gain Sardinia, obtain full scope for his policy as regards the Pope, and push his frontiers to the Rhine, without firing a gun, and through characteristic unscrupulousness, bad faith and chicane. It is true, he would thus create bitter enemies of Italy and Prussia, not less than of Austria, whose animosity would be none the less against him because his intervention saved her from the depths of humiliation, if not from extinction.

But the mind, equally crafty and unscrupulous with his own, that has brought about the present condition of affairs, without deference to the Tuileries, and perhaps in spite of it, is not to be so easily controlled as Louis Napoleon may imagine. The ultimate plans of Bismarck may not harmonize with the schemes of the adventurer of Boulogne, and the successes he has already obtained, which for scope and brilliancy stand without parallel in the history of European politics, may enable him, as they thus far entitle him, to set aside and disregard the wishes and purposes of France. His armies may, and flushed with victory, united and strong, it is not improbable they will, bear down the army of the Kaiser, although augmented by the forces which Louis Napoleon has set free in Italy. Or, Austria, always facile to yield when her dynasty is in danger, may be brought to purchase peace and safety from Bismarck, on the basis of an alliance, one condition of which shall be open, and if need be, forcible opposition to each and every scheme of French aggrandizement.

It is probable that Bismarck never contemplated the resolution of Austria to cede Venice, and thus checkmate his ally of Italy. Certain it is, Austria never contemplated defeat so crushing as she sustained in the north; and it seems impossible that she should have made the cession except as an extreme expedient to escape the consequences of that defeat. The humiliating deed may have all the results hoped for; and it may be that Bismarck will feel himself obliged to acknowledge his plans thwarted by this sudden move on the political board. In this case, unless he seeks to unite both Austria and Italy with him against France, affairs will probably go through the phases of armistice, negotiation, a general conference, a revision of the map of Europe, and the complete and formal abrogation of the treaties of 1815.

In any case, however, the squalid brood of principalities and nurseries for princelings and "Serene Highnesses," and other riff-raff, will disappear from Northern Germany, and Prussia appear in European politics as a great nation, with well-earned prestige and glory.

Radicalism.

The late war developed an entirely new condition of political organization and tactics. The questions that had arisen out of mere economical and sectional policies, were found at the outbreak of actual hostilities to be of insignificant consequence, compared with the momentous issues of national existence and governmental perpetuity. All shades of opinion and all differences of views soon settled down upon two points—viz., cordial sympathy and co-operation with the Government in its efforts to prevent disintegration, and disapproval of those efforts or undisguised opposition to them. And as the value of our institutions became more generally appreciated, and the consequences of anarchy more clearly seen, everything that had a favorable bearing upon the success of the authorities, even if somewhat irregular, and in a manner antagonistic to the letter of established law and recognized modes of procedure, was not only approved, but hailed with delight. Whoever bent his energies to the achievement of success was loyal, whoever raised any obstacle to that success was disloyal, and loyalty covered a multitude of political sins.

The nation was to be saved, and men were not disposed to be fastidious about the manner in which their salvation was effected. They were willing to be termed ultra, radical, anything, so that the good cause should not suffer, and the superiority of free institutions and a republican form of government should be manifest to the whole world. Now that the struggle is over, and the object for which we entered into it gained, we are menaced by a new danger. The patriotism that shone so brilliantly on the battle-field, and was so pure in the forum, is not equal to the tests and exigencies that have been presented by returning peace, and we are now in danger of losing all the practical results of the war through the impracticable measures a certain class of men are striving to force upon us. Not content with the wonderful change in our public policy, in all our modes of thought, in the condition of a large class of our population—brought about by the progress of events—these men, aptly known as Radicals, and ambitious to be immortalized as reformers, would imperil our best interests, and break up the very foundations of our political structure, for the sake of carrying out their own impracticable notions and perpetuating their own lease of power.

More than a year has elapsed since the close of the war, and nothing has been done toward a cordial, permanent union of the States, at one time in arms with each other. In fact, we hazard nothing in asserting that the feelings of the different portions of the country, are more embittered now, than they were while the conflict was raging, simply because radicalism has been mistaken for patriotism, and a zeal for partisan measures and personal preferences, confounded with devotion to the general good and the true interests of the country at large. And as the majority in Congress have raised up a barrier between themselves and the Administration, thus forcing the people at large to choose whether they will sustain a manly, prudent and dignified exercise of power and a frank, sincere announcement of policy, or follow the wild aberrations of those representatives who have not given any very gratifying evidence that they are either safe counselors or prudent leaders, they need not be surprised if the clear common-sense and practical thinking of the masses, will very soon decide that the straight forward, conciliatory course of the President is, after all, the safest one, and therefore endorse and sustain a policy that promises well, in preference to legislation that must result in increased alienation and distrust.

Nor is it alone in reference to any plan of reconstruction, or any question of what encouragement shall be given to loyal sentiment in the seceded States, that radicalism has become so odious, and proved itself unfriendly as an element of legislation. All the economical measures that have been brought before Congress, have been treated with the same illiberal spirit and the same want of comprehensive intelligence, that have characterized the enactments with reference to the state of the country, politically considered. Take, for example, the Tariff, a matter of vital importance to every interest and every individual; see what absurd and ruinous provisions radicalism strove to ingraft into the bill as it passed the House. Had each member been directly concerned in the operation of the proposed tariff, he could not have framed a law more generally repugnant to business-men, and reprobated by the advocates both of free trade and protection with more unanimity.

The complications of specific and ad valorem duties on the same article, and the imposition of a tax, upon many things, even greater than their original cost, with the attempt to enrich certain monopolists by granting additional protection, furnish abundant evidence that what we term radicalism would not only destroy all hopes of political unity, but involve us also in financial ruin. And this danger arises from the well-known tendency to go to extremes in every direction, when we allow ourselves to become ultra in any one thing.

Mr. Stevens, for instance, has a morbid hatred for what he deems disloyalty. With the best intentions, he would demand such guarantees for the future, and such a clear record of the past, from the members of the Southern States who have asked admission into Congress, as would assure him that not only would they never engage in secession again, but that they never had in any way countenanced that wicked movement. Now, as this is an obvious impossibility, Mr. Stevens's suspicions are all aroused, and he resolves, as the only safe course, to refuse seats indiscriminately to every Southern member, whether he is now loyal or not. And a similar course is pursued with reference to every question that comes up for consideration. It is not allowed to rest on its own merits; if it square with some preconceived notions, it is right; if it fail thus to coincide, it is wrong, and must be opposed and rejected.

The fruits of radicalism are neither pleasant nor desirable. We are fast losing confidence in the propriety of measures that thus far have been barren of good, and unless we can have some practical, tangible token that the present majority in our National Legislature really and earnestly seek the public welfare, we will take good care that they shall not again disappoint our expectations.

We want men in Congress who can rise above all personal and partisan considerations in treating great public measures; men whose patriotism will not yield to their feelings, and who will be just and true, heeding the interests of the country at large, and not those of any faction. And we care not by what party lines those men are distinguished; we care not whether there are parties at all or not, for true loyalty is now the only test of worth, and he only is loyal who can devote himself to the true interests of the country, irrespective of any other consideration. Radicalism has served its purpose, and by revealing its dangerous tendencies, will arouse more fully a healthful public sentiment, and lead us to regard measures, more than men.

Great is the consternation of the faithful of the Church of England in Great Britain. They have signally disobeyed, on many occasions, that apostolic injunction to settle all differences among themselves, and not go to law before unbelievers. They have, from time to time, brought all sorts of matters before the secular judges, from the concerns of Bishop Colenso with regard to matters of faith, down to the ritualistic observances of the last new "Anglican" church with regard to the fashion and color of vestments and altar-cloths. The latest form, in which non-observance of rubrical directions was supposed to be about to involve consequences which might necessitate the intervention of the law-making powers, was, however, one of immediate and very practical importance. Imagine the consternation that spread through the breasts of all the clergy who heard the visitation charge of the Archdeacon of Bristol, when they learned that many of the marriages which they, in the course of their ministrations, had solemnized, were legally void. The Archdeacon said that it was certainly illegal to publish the banns of marriage after the second lesson in the morning service; that every marriage following such banns was void; and, moreover, that every clergyman celebrating such a marriage thereby rendered himself liable to transportation for fourteen years! If this indeed were the case, what a shocking state of things would be prevalent in England at this moment—in what a perilous condition would be a very large number of clergymen, with a Damocles's sword of penal servitude hanging over them! What confusion might have been introduced into families by the uncertainty as to the nature of the marriage of the heads of the circle! What a wonderful assistance might have been afforded to the operations of the Divorce Court if it had been discovered that some of the ill-assorted couples had been joined by a ceremony performed after banns published at an illegal period of the service! The Archdeacon endeavored to soothe the apprehensions of his hearers, and all others "whom it might concern," by stating that he had no doubt an act would be passed to indemnify all clergymen who had erred in this respect, and to recognize the validity of marriage solemnized after banns published in this irregular manner. It is difficult to conceive of a whole people getting themselves in "a state of mind" over a matter like this. But it is one of precisely the necessary inconsequence to engage the average English mind. When a British Ministry resigns, and a "political crisis" is brought about on an issue as between tweedledum and tweedledee, we can imagine the consternation of half the matrons of the United Kingdom, in a state of ritualistic uncertainty as to whether they are real wives or only mistresses of their lords. Five minutes more or less in the time of publishing the banns (the banns being always published, however,) is gravely held to invalidate the act to which, after all, it is merely a conventional and technical, and by no means a rational preliminary. And this is claimed to be the nineteenth century!

Nebraska is no longer a Territory. At an election in June she adopted a State Constitution, and her Legislature has elected Major-Gen. John M. Thayer and F. W. Tipton to represent her in the United States Senate. Nebraska was organized as a Territory in 1854, by the celebrated Kansas-Nebraska Act. Kansas passed through a protracted and fierce war, and her struggles and destiny shook the very foundations of the Government. With her admission as a State she began to enjoy a reasonable degree of quiet, but during the rebellion the old spirit broke out, and her territory was the scene of constant outrages, culminating in the dreadful massacre of Lawrence by the demon Quantrell. Nebraska all this time was in perfect peace, slowly but surely acquiring population and wealth, and now she adds a star to our splendid galaxy.

Special Correspondents are a necessity of modern warfare; and General Benedek, who at first refused to have any such attendants, and then proposed an exception in favor of Mr. W. H. Russell, has had to withdraw his prohibition. Mr. Charles Boner accompanies the Austrian army as Correspondent of the London Daily News. Other names have already been given as representing the rest of the English and Continental Press.

In Paris the strictest surveillance is now exercised over the Press, and anything like the propagation of false or doubtful rumors on political subjects is immediately repressed and punished. The Moniteur alone, it would seem, can be entirely trusted on such matters. It has, in truth, enough on its hands, for, besides official news at home and abroad, we find a recent notice in its columns of the authorization given by the Prefect for the sale of horse-flesh as an article of food. The places where this new culinary article is to be sold will be given out in due time. Meanwhile, restaurants and other eating-houses are authorized to serve it, but never without indicating its origin and nature. The measure is too recent to enable one to judge how it will be received by the public.

Any American young lady about to marry a Frenchman should be careful to ascertain the legal formalities necessary to render such marriage valid in France. These are as follows: The consent of the father and mother of the bride and bridegroom until the age of twenty-five; after that age they must give three notices, at a month's interval between each, to their respective parents; these notices are called sommations respectueuses. Should either of the parents be dead, they must produce a certificate to that effect. Finally, certificates of their birth must also be shown. The marriage must either be registered in the office of the French Consul, or within six months in one of the mairies of France. Several American ladies have already been the victims of the French law in this respect, and have learnt to their cost that, although they were married women in the United States, they were not so in Fran

TOWN GOSSIP.

The absorbing topic of both thought and conversation for the last week, has been the heat. Sometimes there are croakers who incessantly complain of the weather, and take a delight in making themselves uncomfortable by grumbling; but for the past few days the temperature has been so intensely tropical, so overpowering, that any one would be fully excused for complaining to the full extent of his ability.

Our school-books used to describe matter as possessed of the properties of permeability, fluidity, etc., abstract propositions to which assent was given without question, but we have now had a palpable demonstration of their truth, and can understand, from unhappy experience, what they mean. What degree of temperature is necessary to convert those aggregations of flesh and blood we call men into vapor, is not recorded in the books, but we were fearfully near a settlement of the question by involuntary and unwilling experiment. Within us, around us, above us, everything was hot, everything seemed to be on fire. The sun was no longer the regal dispenser of light and comfort, but an immense furnace sending forth agony and destruction; the air was a sirocco, to breathe which was suffering; night brought no respite, for day and night alike were seasons of torture. It seemed as if nature were to be changed into its original portions and the elements to melt with fervent heat, as if a woe had fallen upon humanity, and the earth, hurled from its course, were describing a new orbit, involving a new constitution of things. But we never know how much we can endure until we are tried, and the tests of the last few days furnish conclusive evidence that our powers are of no mean order, and disprove the frequent assertion that physically we are a degenerated race. Of course there has been a universal hegira to the country, in the hope that a change of location would afford a more endurable temperature. It is doubtful if crowded rooms and dusty roads and sunny walks are greatly preferable to the comforts of home, but then, one loses caste who does not leave town in summer, so let it be taken for granted that every one who got away from the city escaped all the discomforts of our heated term.

Speaking of the country, suggests the fact that much of our comfort depends upon the route we take, and our mode of conveyance. Northern tourists will do well to remember that a trip up the river to Albany, by the steamers of the the People's Line, will meet all the conditions of ease, elegance, speed, and comfort which the traveler can desire. The boats are spacious and sumptuous in all their appointments, the officers polite and gentlemanly, the scenery of the river unsurpassed; but why reiterate what everybody knows, and what hundreds of people happily experience, every night of the season? And yet, one who has not taken a trip on the St John or the Richmond, and enjoyed the courtesies of their officers and the comforts which those floating palaces afford, knows very little of the real pleasures of steamboat traveling. You spend the day in your business, get on the boat, after your work is done, find a sumptuous supper awaiting you, and a handsomely furnished room inviting you to repose, and awaken in the morning one hundred and fifty miles from your starting point, astonished that you have thus been advanced on your way, not only without any annoyance and discomfort, but with positive satisfaction and delight.

The mortuary reports of large cities furnish some singular facts, to prove that their increase of population is wholly derived from outside sources. If New York could be surrounded by an impassable wall, it would not be a great many years before its inhabitants would become extinct. It is shown, by accurate statistics, that more than half the children born here die under five years of age, and of the remaining half, a large proportion never reach maturity. Without accessions from abroad, therefore, our population would be depleted in a few generations. Proper attention to the laws of health and the conditions of being would prevent this fearful destruction; but such attention cannot be enforced, for vice and crime, and consequent wretchedness and suffering, always centre in large towns, and flourish most in crowded places, that afford the best opportunities for their indulgence.

One of the daily papers has an interesting article on pickpockets, showing how they live, the mode of their operations, and the adroitness with which they pursue their nefarious calling. Though well-known by the police, they are seldom arrested, simply because it is impossible to prove their guilt; and yet they crowd our public conveyances, mingle in all our large assemblies, and support themselves from our hard earnings. Their business is thoroughly systematized, and their skill is so great that the most careful and watchful sometimes become their victims. Generally operating with confederates, the real aggressor is rarely detected, for he is shrewd enough to carry no proof of guilt with him. Purses and watches are the principal articles of plunder; the contents of the first can readily be used and rarely identified, and the second are disposed of to receivers who know how to derive a value from them. Our only security against these clever rogues is to carry nothing that will tempt their cupidity or furnish an opportunity for the exercise of their ingenuity.

All things have their compensations. The excessive heat has brought an immense amount of patronage to the soda-water fountains, and the dealers in that mixture have hardly been able to supply the demand for their cooling beverage. As a substitute for stimulating drinks, soda-water is a valuable reformer, and as Americans will not drink water, by all means let them have the soda.

The war in Europe occupies a considerable share of attention, and furnishes an opportunity to the "dailies" for the occasional issue of an extra; but aside from our interest in the progress of nations toward freedom, we really care very little for these contests of tottering dynasties and would-be sovereigns. The sooner the whole race of them becomes extinguished, the better it will be for the world, and if they choose to hasten their own destruction, few will mourn over their fate.

Notwithstanding the intense heat, the cholera makes little or no progress, and the few cases occurring are attended so promptly and carefully, that the disease is kept thoroughly in check. Medical skill can now control most diseases, and proper personal habits are a pretty effectual safeguard against those disorders that often prove so fatal.

A well-known London physician, Dr. Walter Tyrrell, now a resident here, and who possesses the historical interest of being a lineal descendant of the accidental regicide who killed William Rufus, has just published a pamphlet explaining his system of curing epilepsy, by the use of strychnine. Medical men speak very highly of the ability displayed in this little work, the importance of which commends itself to the suffering.

In the way of amusements, the week has revealed nothing new or striking. With the thermometer at 100°, people have enough to do in trying to exist, without aggravating their sorrows by rushing into a crowd. The theatres have presented pantomime, acrobatics and Irish character as their attractions, but neither the wonderful feats of the Buislays, nor the mirth of Bryant, have been sufficient to draw full houses.

Mr. Theodore Thomas's Orchestral Concerts at Terrace Garden have been especially well patronized. There one can gratify his æsthetic feelings and his natural appetites at the same time, and in pure air and under shady trees, can listen to the grand strains of stirring music, and partake of such refreshments as his tastes may crave.

NEW BOOKS.

THE SILVER SUNBEAM; a Theoretical and Practical Text-Book of Photography. By J. TOWLER, M.D.,

DRY PLATE PHOTOGRAPHY; OR, THE TANNIN PROCESS. By PROFESSOR J. TOWLER.

AMERICAN PHOTOGRAPHIC ALMANAC, 1866. Edited by PROFESSOR TOWLER.

HUMPHREY'S JOURNAL OF PHOTOGRAPHY. Edited by JOHN TOWLER, M. D., (Monthly).

These are the titles of a series of works on Photography, published by Joseph H. Ladd, 600 Broadway. They are all well-known to professional photographers, but happily the beautiful art to which they constitute the key, and in which they give the amplest theoretical and practical explanations and instructions, is not limited to the professional practitioner. The student, the traveler, the man of taste, and the man of leisure, find aid and pleasing occupation in this "gentle art." Such will be glad to know where to obtain the instruction and guidance which they require. They will find everything needful in the "Silver Sunbeam," which is a complete vade mecum of Photography.

Professor Towler's "Manual, on Dry Plate Photography," is exhaustive, and all that the learner can ask for in acquiring a knowledge of that useful process; while the "Photographic Almanac" and the "Monthly Journal" promptly embody every new and useful addition to the stock of Photographic knowledge.

TRODDEN DOWN. By MRS. NEWBY. F. A. Brady, New York.

Mrs. Newby is favorably known to the public by her previous novels of "Kate Kennedy," "Common Sense," "Wondrous Strange," etc., etc. These are all written in a pleasant style, and the plots are generally attractive. "Trodden Down," is an improvement on her previous writings. The character of Marion Lowleigh is well drawn and sustained.

THE ORGANISTS' PORTFOLIO.

This is a collection of voluntaries from the works of ancient and modern composers, designed for the organ, but likewise well adapted for performance upon any reed instrument. The selections are varied and judicious, and will supply a long existing want. Oliver Ditson & Co. are the publishers.

YOUNG AMERICA.

IN a country like ours, embracing so many diverse and heterogeneous elements, physical and social, it would be vain to look for a uniform and established order of either thought or action. We call ourselves a free people, without any very definite conception of what freedom is, except that every one may act as he pleases, and fret under necessary restraint; we have little reverence for antiquity, and little reverence for anything but our own will; we are radical in politics, heterodox in religion, loose and extravagant in economy, but active and aggressive in enterprise, marvelous in growth, and inexhaustible in resources. We possess a power of adapting ourselves to circumstances that is nowhere else excelled, and accomplish at a single stride what other nations have required centuries to effect. Of course we present many assailable points, many peculiarities, that sometimes expose us to ridicule; and since we reach our conclusions almost intuitively, disregarding ordinary processes, we are often misjudged, and always regarded with suspicion.

There is one phase of our society, marked by many good traits, and many salient points, that frequently brings us into discredit with those older forms of social life in which everything is done by rule and compass, and everything moves in grooves worn and deepened by long usage. This phase is expressed by the term Young America, the synonym, with many people, for all that is pert, obtrusive, and unreverential, and yet the exponent of enterprise, self-confidence, and success.

It is often charged that there are no youth among us that our children become men and women instantaneously, the schoolboy leaving his books to plunge at once into the whirl of business, and the little girl abandoning her dolls to act the part of the young lady, or assume the responsibilities of the matron. Doubtless this charge is too well founded, and the condition of things on which it is based involves very serious considerations. There is a precocious activity among our people that encourages, and in a large degree warrants, the early assumption of positions usually allotted to those of mature years, while we have no established precedents, and no pride of family and ancestral renown, to confine any one within bounds which he has either the ability or inclination to pass. Hence we often find children in years occupying posts that in other countries are filled only by men of large experience, and we encourage a spirit of independence that brooks no control, and refuses to acknowledge a superior.

It is this spirit of independence, pervading all classes and arraying itself against legitimate authority, that has connected with the term Young America something of opprobrium; and the fault lies not so much with those who are obnoxious to the reproach, as with those who have the care and training of our children.

The difficulty begins in the home circle, and radiates thence through all the various departments of our social system.

Parents do not spend the time and care upon their children necessary to inculcate right views of the proper relationship existing between them, and to impress a salutary respect in the feelings of their children for those of more advanced age.

Nor is obedience to parental authority required as strictly as it should be; in a majority of cases it is not required at all, and the consequence is, we rarely meet with a respectful, deferential, well-behaved child.

If children are allowed to act as they please at home, they invariably assume the same privilege at school and in society, and the neglect of parents in their especial sphere will prevent any substantial co-operation with teachers and guardians in enforcing discipline and forming character. We do not counsel severity and puritanical rigidity in training the young; but we respectfully submit that these defects in home education of which we speak are a prolific source of the lawlessness and social corruption that are so rampant throughout the land.

We do not want to train up a generation of moral acrobats, who shall astound us with their contempt of the ordinary rules of propriety and their fantastic pranks; we do not wish to dwarf and pervert the natural impulses and exuberant feelings of our children, but to give them such a direction and control as shall result in sound principles, proper views, and useful activities.

Irreverence at home is apt to degenerate into impudence abroad, and the failure to insist upon a due submission in the family, may result, and often does result, in a defiance of all authority, when the home circle is abandoned. Out of inattention to these facts have arisen those fast propensities that are leading so many to moral shipwreck and social ruin.

Young people, left to themselves, and made responsible to no one for their conduct, proud of acting on their own responsibility, and permitted to choose their companions and occupy their time as they please, very naturally imitate the worst rather than the best examples around them, and outvie their associates in extravagance and more objectionable ways. And this evil is constantly on the increase, each generation departing more widely from the simplicity of manners and purity of thought that are the crowning charm of the young. With the opportunities and facilities within the reach of every one in the land, with our schools, and literature, and press, our youth should be models of propriety, virtue, and intelligence, and doubtless as our national character becomes more crystalized, and the elements of our social system more homogeneous, they will be such.

Young America will then have a new signification; will be the representative of all that is manly, generous, noble, and improving; will struggle for the supremacy in good deeds, in enterprise, progress, and true elevation; will prove how great a boon freedom is, and show that a nation can govern itself, because each individual of that nation respects the supremacy of proper authority in all the relations of life.

VIENNA AND THE GERMAN QUESTION.

VIENNA, the capital of the Austrian Empire, has been the scene of some of the most important events in the history of modern Europe. It was occupied by Napoleon in 1805 and 1809; it was chosen as the seat of Congress in 1814 and 1815; and there a conference took place, in 1855, to consider the proposals of peace with Russia. In appearance, the city is in no way remarkable either for grandeur or beauty; its form is neither compact nor regular, while its straggling suburbs are surrounded by a wall twelve miles in circumference. The ramparts afford a fashionable lounge, commanding a good view of the city and adjacent country—a city more heterogeneous, perhaps, than any other metropolis in Europe—while the country is an extensive plain, well watered, and occasionally inundated, by the Wein and the Alster.

Vienna has already been made familiar with the exigencies of war. It was besieged by the Turks in 1689, and only saved by the bravery of Sobieski of Poland, the hero whose soldiers were accustomed to boast, that if the sky fell they would bear it up on the points of their lances. Sobieski, in relieving Vienna, saved the empire, and the Emperor, Leopold, received him with open arms. In 1741, Vienna, though pressed by the Bavarians on the west, and the French and Prussians on the north, was still preserved, and under Maria Theresa—the Austrian Semiramis—became the focus of literature and art, gallantry and fashion. During the Napoleon occupation, it sustained very little injury, the French invaders being far more considerate than were its own people in 1848. In that year of revolution Vienna suffered severely in a bombardment from the Imperial troops, and was at length compelled to surrender. From that period to the present, the attention of Europe has frequently been drawn toward Vienna, in consequence of the many political events of general importance with which Austria has been connected.

For months past Vienna has been a centre of interest, while the question had yet to be decided for peace or war. Fresh in the recollection of most persons is the attitude assumed by Austria in regard to Schleswig-Holstein. Since 1851 the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein had been placed in close connection with Denmark. They had been associated with Denmark for a long period, and by the treaty of Vienna the rights of the King of Denmark were fully recognized in the German Confederation. There was a declaration of independence in 1848, but order was restored, and affairs went on quietly, until Austria and Prussia became the self-elected champions of the duchies, and Prussia, after a short and sanguinary struggle, wrested this portion of territory from Denmark. Before the Danish war broke out, Austria and Prussia issued circular notes to the powers of Europe, averring that Denmark alone was bent on disturbing the general tranquility by restraining the duchies from joining the German Confederation; and that the interests of peace could only be preserved by taking possession of the disputed provinces. This was, however, plainly an act of war. As such it was regarded by the Danes, who fought bravely, but, of course, unsuccessfully, against the colossal power of Prussia.

The dismemberment of Denmark did not, however, result in the realization of the promised millennium. Austria and Prussia were immediately at issue as to what was to become of the provinces. The allies became bitter foes. Prussia, ever anxious to extend her boundaries, proposed to absorb Holstein; Austria, jealously watching the growth of her neighbor, refused to accede. It was openly stated that Count Bismarck would buy Holstein of Austria—a temptation, doubtless, to an impoverished exchequer, but the Imperial policy could listen to no such pecuniary arrangement. It was hoped that the men of the pen might settle the differences of these great German powers, without rendering altogether useless our maps of Europe; but the Congress project entirely failed.

Austria, great as her power is, is still opposed to a formidable foe, when she enters the lists with Prussia. Notwithstanding her internal embarrassments, Prussia is in a better position than she was fifteen years ago, while Austria is in a far worse. Austria, with her arrogant Magyars, her intractable Czecks, her schism of Sclave nationalities, and her sullenly rebellious Venetians, is in danger on every hand. The Italians, in alliance with the Prussians, are resolved on sweeping the white coats from the province of Venetia.

Both combatants are watched with no ordinary interest; the names of the statesmen and generals on both sides are as "household words;" the old theatre of European warfare seems to revive its stock pieces: places already memorable in history for many a long siege and bloody fight, become the centres of contemporary interest. So history repeats herself!

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—There are seventeen manufactories of paper collars in New England, and each girl employed makes about 1,000 of them daily.

—— The Agricultural Department has received information showing that the crops throughout the country are in a better condition than had been anticipated, as the weather during the spring was very unfavorable. The present appearance of the corn crop is promising, and the oat crop throughout the whole country is unsurpassed. All cereals promise a large yield, and it is expected that the crops will be unusually heavy.

—— The result of the City Surveyor's investigation shows that a district of 327 acres was burned over in the late conflagration at Portland.

—— A Richmond paper grows indignant at having seen on a Sunday a large number of colored ladies and gentlemen riding in all the style that the livery stables could furnish, and especially at having seen white drivers upon the box and the negroes upon the cushions behind—a strange reversal of former situations.

—— General Sterling Price lately excused himself from fighting with the Mexican patriots on the ground that if the Liberals caught him they would send him either to the infernal regions or the United States, and he would as soon go to one place as to the other. It is to be hoped that he will not be sent to the other.

—— It is stated on Chinese authority that the Chinese population in California numbers 58,300 persons, one-fourth of whom are employed upon the Pacific Railroad improvements.

—— The Auburn (Cal.) Stars and Stripes has a request from "Captain Tom," of the Placer tribe of Indians, to make the paper tell every man and every woman that his beloved wife Manda is "heap dead." "She was a little sick two week, heap sick one week, and made dead after dinner on Monday." The sorrowing widower says she was "heap good woman."

—— One of the American Government agents seriously informs the Commissioners of Customs that Canadian smugglers have laid pipes across the St. Lawrence River, and are engaged in pumping whisky into the United States.

—— A native of Western Africa, who visited this country, when asked what he would call ice, said: "Him be water fast asleep;" and when asked what he would call the railroad car in which he was riding, said: "Him be a thunder mill."

—— The reports that the conference with the Indians gathered at Fort Laramie had proved a failure, and that they had returned to their homes in a hostile attitude, proves untrue. The President has received a notification that satisfactory treaties have been concluded with the Upper Plattes, Sioux, and Cheyennes.

—— The Court of Common Pleas at Indianapolis, in a case made up by the National Bankers' Association of Indiana, has decided that the stock of National Banks of that State are not liable to tax for State or municipal purposes, under the present State law, not from any defect of power, but from defective State legislation.

—— Council Bluffs having been fixed upon as the terminus of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, is elated with its prospects. With one continuous line of railroad to Chicago on the east, a distance of over 500 miles; the Council Bluffs and St. Joseph Railroad on the south; the Union Pacific on the west, with a prospect of two more roads leading from the Mississippi, it anticipates being the great railroad centre of Iowa.

—— In San Francisco the police have discovered a gang of thieves, the oldest of whom is not over sixteen or seventeen years of age, with a regular organization, who have constructed caverns underneath side walks in unfrequented localities, in which they burrow, and from which they construct tunnels to adjacent stores, conveying their stolen goods thence to the upper air.

—— There are in the United States about 900 railroad corporations that operate steam power roads; the joint length of the steam power roads in the United States is about 32,000 miles, and their joint cost is about $1,280,000,000, equal to an average of $40,000 for each mile.

—— There are in the whole of Europe 1,480 theatres. Of these there are 337 in France; 168 in Spain; 159 in England; 152 in Austria; 115 in Germany; 76 in Prussia; 44 in Russia; 34 in Belgium; 23 in Holland; 20 in Switzerland; 10 in Sweden; 8 in Norway; 16 in Portugal; 10 in Denmark; 4 in Greece; 4 in Turkey; 3 in Roumania, and 1 in Servia. In Italy there is one theatre for every 75,000 of the inhabitants.

—— Since May 15th, emigrant trains have gone west from Kearney City at the rate of eighty wagons and one hundred and sixty people (men, women and children) per day. This computation is exclusive of freighters' trains, which exceed the emigrant trains in number of wagons, but not in people. It would be within bounds to say that one hundred and fifty wagons pass West daily during the season.

—— Steamers from Galveston bring accounts of a terrible three days' gale at Indianola, beginning on the 13th and ending in a terrible hurricane on the 15th instant. Four vessels were totally wrecked; of two of them there was not a vestige left. The steamer Potomac, which was on the bar at Galveston, had disappeared. It is supposed that she foundered at her anchorage, and that all who were on board in charge of her were lost. Her passengers had previously been landed. No such storm had occurred on that coast within the memory of the oldest inhabitant.

—— A correspondent of the Detroit Post writes of the battle-fields of Forts Henry and Donelson, to which he has just paid a visit. He says the few dead of Fort Henry are buried just without the fort. At Donelson the chief battle took place on the ridges of land three-quarters of a mile from the fort. The graves of our soldiers are scattered over these ridges of land for three or four miles about. When the National Cemetery is established at this point, it is estimated that it will contain about one thousand headstones.

—— The police in Charleston, S. C., have succeeded in ferreting out and arresting a number of colored men charged with being implicated in the murder of B. S. Rhett, Esq. The parties have been committed for trial, and one of them confessed that he committed the murder with the assistance of another, who instigated it.

—— George Peabody proposes to deposit with the Peabody Institute, at Danvers, Queen Victoria's portrait and autograph letter and Earl Russell's letter. He will also deposit a gold box, presented to him by one of the London associations. Mr. Peabody also intends to endow the branch library at Danvers with an additional forty thousand dollars.

Foreign.—The following has been published as the programme of the amusements that will take place at Orduna, in Spain, on the occasion of the festival of Our Lady of Antigua: "7th instant—Solemn afternoon service in the sanctuary. At night, dancing and illuminations in the square. 8th instant—Solemn Mass in the sanctuary, and a sermon will be preached by Mr. Gregory Montes, Presbytery of Madrid. In the afternoon four Navarre cows will be baited, three of them to death, by the company of M. Richina, the bull-fighter. There will be a young bull also for the amateurs to kill. In the evening, fire-works, illuminations and dancing in the square. 9th instant—The same festivities as the preceding day. This day the farmers of Arrastaria, near Orduna, will commend to the Virgin their coming crops. The Presbytery, Felix Herran, will preach. A bull-fight will follow. After the bull-fight there will be a romp under the trees by the banks of the Nervion. At night, crackers and skyrockets. 10th instant—Two Navarre cows will be baited and killed, and several young bulls will be run for the amusement of the amateurs. Fireworks at night."

—— A trial has just been made at Florence of a cuirass in aluminium, which is as light as an ordinary waistcoat, nearly as flexible, and capable of turning a musket-ball fired at the distance of thirty-eight paces, and of resisting a bayonet thrust from the heaviest hand. Each cuirass costs only twenty-five francs. Two regiments are, it is said, to be immediately provided with them.

—— The six countries with the greatest amount of live stock, are the following: Russia (returns of 1859–63), cattle, 25,444,000; sheep, 45,130,800; pigs, 10,097,000. United States (1860), cattle, 16,911,475; sheep, 23,317,756; pigs, 32,555,267. France (1862), cattle, 14,197,360; sheep, 30,381,592; pigs, 5,246,403. Austria (1863), cattle, 14,257,116; sheep, 16,961,236; pigs, 8,151,608. United Kingdom (1865–6), 8,316,960—viz: 3,286,308 cows and 5,030,652 other cattle; sheep, 25,795,708; pigs, 3,802,399. Prussia (1862), cattle, 5,634,500; sheep, 17,428,017; pigs, 2,709,709.

—— The Sandwich Island treasury has a large surplus, the chief cause being the high price realized for sugar, the leading staple.

—— The Jardin d'Acclimatation in Paris has recently been enriched by a species of guinea-hen from Australia, called the Weelat by the natives. It bears a strong resemblance to the vulture, and procures the hatching of its egg by what may be called artificial heat in a curious way. In the beginning of spring it collects all the vegetable refuse it can get into a heap, or the site of which it generally selects the shady side of a hill. Round this heap it lays its eggs, each five or six inches from its neighbor, with the big end turned upward; it then buries them under the refuse three feet deep, and lets the heat generated by the putrefaction of the vegetable matter hatch them. It has never been ascertained how the little ones get out of their strange prison, but when they do they are ready fledged and able to fly.

—— The Duke of Hamilton, according to English papers, is a reckless person. He lately bought a cow for which he paid $12,500, and at the last Derby he "laid" £180,000 ($900,000) to £5,000 against Hermit—but this latter was subsequently canceled. Still later he struck a man in a night-brawl, and was therefore "wanted" by the police, but went off to Paris to see the race for the grand prix, and so escaped arrest.

—— A curious press trial has just taken place at Berlin. On the occasion of the baptism of Prince Frederick Charles's son, then five weeks old, the Kreuz Zeitung published an article relating the part which each personage took in the solemnity. In reply, the Bourse Gazette spoke more especially of "the conduct of baby," demanding if it had been equal to the occasion so ably described by the other journal? The Gazette was in consequence seized; the tribunal admitted the plea of the Public Minister against the liberal newspaper for "an insult committed against a member of the royal family." The defendant demanded that doctors should be summoned to attend and decide if an infant of five weeks old, although a prince, could be considered as a personage, and as having pursued any "conduct." The tribunal finally pronounced an acquittal, though blaming the defendant for his disregard of propriety.

COUNT BISMARCK.

OUR first page contains the portraits of some of the men who at the present time hold the most prominent positions among the belligerent powers of Europe, and whose career will, consequently, be watched with especial interest. Names and reputations, however, cannot withstand the progress of events, and as in our own recent struggle many who at the outset promised much, soon sunk into insignificance because they were unequal to the occasion, so in these foreign complications success must be the test of merit, and he who fails must give place to others who can win. Count Bismarck, the Minister of Prussia, has had a large experience in diplomatic life, and possesses those talents and traits that enable a man to meet emergencies boldly, and push forward toward the accomplishment of his ends, irrespective of difficulty and antagonism. Determined and unscrupulous, he is well fitted to meet the various exigencies that will arise, and, thoroughly devoted to the interests of Prussia, while his enmity to Austria is undisguised, he will spare no efforts to make the issue of the war advantageous to his own country.

Prince Frederick Charles, the commander of the right wing of the Prussian army, is a young man whose success in the late battles have given him a prominence he did not before possess. He is a good soldier, self-possessed, courageous, and well deserves the post of honor and responsibility he has been called to occupy.

The Archduke Albert, upon whom the hopes of the Austrians now rest, has yet to make his mark and justify the expectations formed of him. As the commander of an immense and well-appointed army, he will have an opportunity of distinguishing himself, and establishing his reputation.

Marshal Benedek, late commander-in-chief of the Austrian army, is a proof that nothing succeeds like success. He has raised himself by force of character and talent from an humble and obscure origin to a post of honor and influence; but all this availed him not, and he has been compelled to give place to another, though so deserving himself.

Monarchies, as well as republics, can be ungrateful. With this brief notice of these high functionaries, we dismiss them for the present, feeling that the contest in which they are engaged is only the struggle of a wild ambition, that will retard the progress of liberty and burden the people, who should be the source of all power.

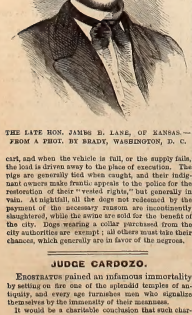
VIEWS IN CENTRAL PARK.

OUR population has not inaptly been divided into two classes, viz., those who leave town during the summer for recreation and pleasure, and those who remain at home to toil and worry with business and necessity. The latter class, however, are not wholly destitute of compensation for their enforced sojourn in the sweltering city, since, with a very trifling expenditure of time and money, they can transport themselves to quiet, shady retreats, and revel amid the gorgeous displays of Nature's beauty that tempt them on every side.

The Central Park is an especial point of attraction, and the daily resort of the multitudes who, leaving the dusty burning streets, find in its walks and shades an opportunity for relaxation and enjoyment. Every Saturday afternoon a fine band discourses sweet music, furnishing a treat to the assembled crowds of the richest character. Rich and poor alike have access to this entertainment; the devotee of fashion is no more welcome than the son of toil or the child of poverty; it is the people's heritage, and the people indiscriminately find something to improve their tastes and elevate their feelings.

The Grand Terrace is another feature of the Park worthy of attention. The view from its steps is especially beautiful, while its architectural merit is of no mean pretension, and indicates the liberal spirit that has provided such sources of gratification for our citizens. But no description can do justice to the Park; to be properly appreciated it must be seen, and as every year adds to its attractive features, New Yorkers are justly proud of this monument of their liberality and taste.

HUMAN SKIN TANNED.—In Herodotus allusion is made to the flaying of Sisamnes, father of Otanes, by order of Cambyses. The skin was stretched on the judgment-seat, and the son, who by special appointment succeeded the father, was ordered to remember on what he was sitting. In my younger days I recollect being told that a soldier named Steptoe was executed at Reading (between sixty or seventy years since) for murder. The body was dissected, the skin tanned, and gloves made of it as a relic; several persons having taken a deep interest in the fate of the malefactor, who was said to be a great penitent, as well as a great sinner, and who sang some hymn of his own composing, to the "Dead March in Saul," as he stood under the gallows-beam. The late Mr. Muskett, the bookseller of Norwich, had a portion of tanned skin of one Johnson, executed at that place for murder some fifty years ago, with which he had bound a copy of Johnson's "Dictionary," now in the possession of one of his brothers.



THERE is a glare about worldly success which is apt to dazzle men's eyes. When we see a man rising in the world, a foolishly high opinion is formed of his merits. It is said, "What a wonderful man this must be to rise so rapidly!" forgetting that dust and straw and feathers, things with neither weight nor value in them, rise the soonest and the easiest. It is not always the good and great man who rises rapidly into wealth and notice.

ENFORCING THE DOG LAWS IN RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

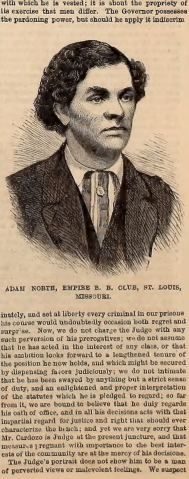
DOG-CATCHING IN RICHMOND.

NEW YORK is not the only city in which the liberty of dogs and other quadrupeds is restrained by public enactment. In fact, the canines are very generally distrusted and exposed to a summary and merciless conscription and an ignominious fate. In Richmond the business of catching the unlucky animals has some peculiarities, which are shown in the illustration on this page. Negroes, provided with strong ropenets, make the rounds of the streets, accompanied by a cart for the reception of the captives, catching every truant pig and cur they can find. Sometimes the chase is quite animated, affording great amusement to the passers-by, and presenting many ludicrous scenes. As soon as a capture is made, the victim is put in the cart, and when the vehicle is full, or the supply fails, the load is driven away to the place of execution. The pigs are generally tied when caught, and their indignant owners make frantic appeals to the police for the restoration of their "vested rights," but generally in vain. At nightfall, all the dogs not released by the payment of the necessary ransom are incontinently slaughtered, while the swine are sold for the benefit of the city. Dogs wearing a collar purchased from the city authorities are exempt; all others must take their chances, which generally are in favor of the negroes.

THE LATE HON. JAMES B. LANE, OF KANSAS.—FROM A PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON, D. C.

JUDGE CARDOZO.

EROSTRATUS gained an infamous immortality by setting on fire one of the splendid temples of antiquity, and every age furnishes men who signalize themselves by the immensity of their meanness.



It would be a charitable conclusion that such characters were subject to mental aberrations, and, therefore, were not responsible for their conduct, as it certainly would be creditable to humanity to establish such a conclusion. We would gladly predicate such a fact with reference to many of the officials of our city, whose career furnishes a striking parallel to that of Erostratus; but we fear facts would not warrant such a mode of accounting for their idiosyncrasies.

Of late, Judge Cardozo has become somewhat prominent for his hostility to the Excise law, and the immunity he has furnished to those who wished to violate its provisions. Having declared the law itself unconstitutional, he threw the shield of an injunction over every one who might, by any possibility, become amenable to its penalty. With the motives of Judge Cardozo we have nothing to do, nor will we question his sincerity and integrity, and though some of his opinions may appear extra judicial, we will assume that he is a paragon of personal and official excellence.

There are many, however, not yet convinced that it was the Judge's province to make a law wholly inoperative when his own decision in reference to it could be only temporary and partial, and might be reversed by a higher court. It is true he has not exceeded the power with which he is vested; it is about the propriety of its exercise that men differ. The Governor possesses the pardoning power, but should he apply it indiscrim inately, and set at liberty every criminal in our prisons his course would undoubtedly occasion both regret and surprise. Now, we do not charge the Judge with any such perversion of his prerogatives; we do not assume that he has acted in the interest of any class, or that his ambition looks forward to a lengthened tenure of the position he now holds, and which might be secured by dispensing favors judiciously; we do not intimate that he has been swayed by anything but a strict sense of duty, and an enlightened and proper interpretation of the statutes which he is pledged to regard; so far from it, we are bound to believe that he duly regards his oath of office, and in all his decisions acts with that impartial regard for justice and right that should ever characterize the bench; and yet we are very sorry that Mr. Cardozo is Judge at the present juncture, and that measures pregnant with importance to the best interests of the community are at the mercy of his decisions.

The Judge's portrait does not show him to be a man of perverted views or malevolent feelings. We suspect that he is much better than the system that made him a Judge, and that any errors he commits are chargeable to the system rather than to the man. That an elective judiciary is fatal to the purity and integrity of the bench, and leads to intolerable abuses, is evident from the nature of the case; but if Judge Cardozo has demonstrated the fact so fully and clearly that the most obtuse cannot fail to discover it, and by his attitude toward a particular enactment has shown the abuses to which the present system is liable, and thus contributed toward its entire abrogation, we shall thank him for his injunctions, and rejoice that it fell to his lot to contend with the Excise Board.

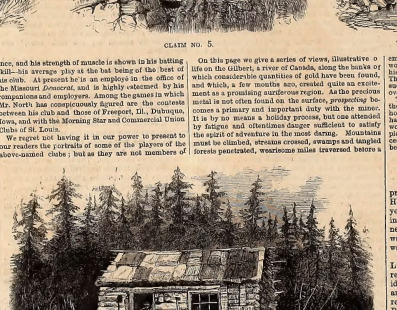
OUR BASE BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.

We present to our base ball readers in this week's issue, the third of our series of illustrations, and the second of the portraits of leading players of the country, the subject of our present sketch being Mr. Adam North, of the Empire Base Ball Club of St. Louis, Mo.

The furore for base ball which existed in the Middle States in 1860 to such an extent, reached as far West as St. Louis, and in that year it led to the organization of the Empire Club of that city—then, as now, the champion club of the Western States. The war, however, affected the Empire Club, as it did all base ball clubs, and for four years, play was, in a measure, suspended. In 1865, however, the activity and emulation which marked the action of the Empire Club in 1860 were resumed, and by several finely-contested games with leading organizations of sister States and cities, the Empires fully established their claim to the title of the Champion Club of the West, and it will, doubtless, be some time ere the laurels will be wrested from them; for this season they open play stronger and seem more enthusiastic than ever before.



In accordance with our request, we have to acknowledge a prompt reply to our circular from Mr. H. C. Sexton of the Empire Club, the first Vice-President of the National Association, who has sent us the name of Mr. Adam North, the first baseman of the Empire Club of St. Louis.

Mr. North is of the typographical frat-rnity, and as such, as a matter of course, is "a gentleman and a scholar," and, moreover, a first-class ball-player. His strong points of play are his accuracy in throwing and his certainty in holding a ball, these two physical attributes making his services exceedingly useful in other positions besides the one he has made his specialty—viz., the first base of the nine. To these desirable qualifications he adds calmness and steadiness of play, and presence of mind and evenness of temper in exciting and critical positions of the game.

Mr. North is about twenty-two years of age, possesses a manly physique, and considerable power of endurance, and his strength of muscle is shown in his batting skill—his average play at the bat being of the best of his club. At present he is an employe in the office of the Missouri Democrat, and is highly esteemed by his companions and employers. Among the games in which Mr. North has conspicuously figured are the contests between his club and those of Freeport, Ill., Dubuque, Iowa, and with the Morning Star and Commercial Union Clubs of St. Louis.

We regret not having it in our power to present to our readers the portraits of some of the players of the above-named clubs; but as they are not members of the Association, we are obliged to confine ourselves to such clubs as are.

In next week's issue we will give the portrait of Mr. Archibald McLure Bush, of the Knickerbocker B. B. Club, Albany, N. Y.

BAILEY'S STORE ON THE GILBERT.

On this page we give a series of views, illustrative o life on the Gilbert, a river of Canada, along the banks or which considerable quantities of gold have been found, and which, a few months ago, created quite an excitement as a promising auriferous region. As the precious metal is not often found on the surface, prospecting becomes a primary and important duty with the miner. It is by no means a holiday process, but one attended by fatigue and oftentimes danger sufficient to satisfy the spirit of adventure in the most daring. Mountains must be climbed, streams crossed, swamps and tangled forests penetrated, wearisome miles traversed before a suitable locality is found where operations can be carried on successfully. Then a claim is marked off, and the fortune-hunter begins the work of digging and washing, separating the small particles of pure metal from the sand and earth with which they are mixed. The process of washing has been described so frequently, that we refer our readers to the illustrations, without entering into details.

Men cannot live on gold, however much its possession may be desired; breakfast and dinner are necessities in the mines, as much as elsewhere, but the style differs somewhat from accepted forms. Dinner at the Gilbert diggings is evidently primitive, though doubtless substantial and satisfactory.

Hard work and out-door life give a relish to even the plainest fare which the epicure never enjoys, and the simple rations of the mine furnish a repast more grateful than the richest viands would be in the saloons of fashion. The skill of Soyer, or Blot, is not needed to tempt the appetite that has been sharpened by pure air and healthful exercis . Gold-diggers being human, do not cease to have human wants, hence the necessity of the store, where supplies of various kinds can be procured. Here, also, is one of the institutions of the mining districts, and an indispensable adjunct of mining life. Where lacks in its external attractions it supplements by the excellence and variety of its stock, which embraces almost everything that can be eaten, drunk worn and used. Sometimes the miner is rewarded for his toil by finding a nugget that at once enriches him. Gilb-rt has not been very liberal in furnishing such prominces. One was found, however, weighing over twelve ounces, and worth $100.

To many persons this wild life is especially attractive; they like the hardships and privations, or at least the hope of gaining fortune reconciles them to what perhaps they would not choose for its own sake. The world owes much to such adventurers; they are the pioneers in its progress, and whether they fall or succeed in their own purposes, society at large reaps the benefit of their exertions.

SCENES ON THE RIVER GILBERT, CANADA.

CALIFORNIA and Australia are the grand sources of supply for the precious metal, but there are other regions that furnish sufficient quantities to render labor profitable and keep up the excitement that always attends the search for gold. Ordinary mining is common-place and monotonous. A certain amount of labor produces certain and definite results; to wield the pick and the drill requires patient effort rather than skill, and the miner plods on from day to day, in the same unvarying routine.

Gold-digging is an entirely different matter, and involves difficulties and adventures that demand the highest degree of prudence, intelligence and endurance upon the part of the hardy adventurer who seeks his fortune among the hidden treasures of the earth.

DINNER AT THE GILBERT GOLD MINES.

JAMES H. LANE.

Few men have had a more c ckered life, or proved more erratic than the subjec of this sketch. He was a native of Indiana, but for a number of years had resided in Kansas. He commenced public life in 1845, as a member of the Legislature. The next year, upon the breaking out of the Mexican war, he entered the army, but his military career was by no means a brilliant one.

During the year 1849 Lane filled the office of Lieutenant-Governor of Indiana, and in 1852 represented a district of that State in Congress, identifying himself with the Democratic party, and taking an active part in the canvass which resulted in the election of Mr. Pierce to the Presidency. At the end of his term he removed to Kansas and became very active in the quarrels with which the early settlers of that territory were engaged. His political views at this time were completely changed; he acted with those who were known as Abolitionists, and used his utmost exertions for the organization of Kansas as a free State. After various vicissitudes he was elected to the United States Senate in 1861, by the Kansas Legislature, after the new State had been admitted into the Union.

At the commencement of the rebellion, Lane was at Washington, and was soon appointed a brigadier-general, but manifesting little aptitude for military affairs, he soon returned to his place in the Senate. His great forte was stump-speaking, and among the hardy pioneers of the West he possessed a large influence. He was earnest and energetic, but lacked stability of purpose. His death was a melancholy one, being caused by his own hands. For some time he had been considerably broken down, and on the 1st ult. shot himself through the head, either in a fit of mental derangement or of desperation at the loss of influence among those from whom he expected support. He was fifty-two years of age.

THE WORLD'S LOTTERY.

"TAKE hence the world," cried Jove, from upper Heaven;
"Take it, ye sons of earth, yours shall it be;
I give it you for tillage, toil and leaven,
Yet share it with each other brotherly."

Then hastened every strong two-handed being,
Both young and old, to take what pleased his mood;
The husbandman swift to the meadows fleeing,
While the gay youth went sporting through the wood.

Their portions chosen; when they had departed
Drew nigh the poet, lost in poe'e care,
And sought a home in tears, and broken-hearted,
For greedy men had seized everywhere.

"Woe me!" he cried; "shall I alone of others Forgotten be—I, thy most obedient son?"
Thus raised he loud his plaint against his brothers,
And abject knelt before the Thunderer's throne.

"If thou wilt linger by the wayside musing,"
Returned the god, "then lay it not to me.
Where were thou when each one his part was choosing?"
The poet said, "I was adoring thee.

"Mine eyes were fastened on thy glorious vision,
Mine ears to Heaven's harmonies were chained;
By thee enchanted from the world's division,
I lingered musing when the prize was gained."

"What shall I do?" cried Jove, his bosom swelling;
Nor land nor forest banding, naught is mine;
Will there in Heaven make with me thy dwelling?
If thou wilt only come, it shall be thine."

The Gambler's Last Stake:

A TALE OF NEW ORLEANS.

BY BIENVENU.

On the corner of Esplanade and Royal streets, in the city of New Orleans, is a large three-story marble building. To the stranger it would appear an elegant private residence. Its high stoop, elegantly carved iron pillars, magnificent damask curtains peeping out from behind glass windows, all would betoken to the uninitiated that the proprietor of the building was one of the many Creole millionaires of the city. Still, if the stranger will glance at the glass window over the door, he will perceive a small, odd inscription for a private residence. In colored letters, set surrounded by a wreath of flowers, are the words,

"LA BELLE ENFLAMME."

The above inscription was well-known to many, and none who knew the meaning had failed to visit the interior of the house. In fact, "No. 102 Esplanade street" was nothing less than a gambling-house. Not a common one either, where everybody could enter and stake money. It was, in fact, a private resort for the aristocratic and wealthy gamblers of the Crescent City. To obtain admission, it was necessary that the party desiring it should be introduced to the proprietor by one of the known habitues of the house, who would be able, not only to vouch for his position in society, but to be responsible for his gambling-debts. In consequence of the last desideratum, the frequenters were chary of introducing any but those whose standing and wealth were beyond suspicion, and, consequently, the circle of gamblers was always small and select—if there can be any selections about gamblers.

In my remarks I have referred to men; but it must not be understood that the male sex were the only frequenters of the house. I grieve to say many ladies were to be seen there nightly—ladies of wealth and refinement. But what their passion for play made them forgetful of their womanly origin long, they were not so fascinated as to be indifferent to what the world might say if it knew of their lamentable failing. They entered there by a private door by the aid of a talismanic words, and were invariably dressed in a suit of masqueade clothing. This disguise effectually revealed the gentlemen from recognizing them, and as their masks were never taken off, it is likely that many husbands set against their wives, without dreaming of their presence.

It was on a cold evening, in the month of January, 1851, that this story commenced. The Convention which passed the Ordinance of Secession having adjourned from Baton Rouge to New Orleans, the city was crowded with strangers. Dozens of wealthy planters had come to the city to witness the proceedings of the Convention, and of their number the majority was composed of Creoles, or natives of France and Spanish descent. As these were, with few exceptions, men accustomed to gambling, "No. 102 Esplanade" had received a large accession to its number of visitors. Introductions were frequent; large sums of money were lost in the house and the proprietor, a tall and fine-looking Frenchman, was highly delighted at the harvest he was reaping.

On the evening in question, two young men issued from the St. Louis Hotel, and calling a cab, ordered the driver to take them to No. 102. One of the youths was about twenty-six years of age, with dark, curly hair, black eyes, and thick, flowing mustache and imperial. His companion was about the same age, but with light hair, blue eyes, and a face as smooth and effeminate as a woman's. Nevertheless, they were both what is called handsome men, and their attire indicated that the wearers were of the highest class in wealth and position.

While driving to Esplanade street, they conversed for a while:

"Mon Dieu, Julius," said the dark-haired one, speaking in French, "who can that young lady be? For the past three weeks I have met her at Gautier's (the name of the proprietor of No. 102), and cannot yet discover who she is. We have spoken to each other; I have made love to her, and asked her to tell me her name, but it is no use. Sacre bleu! but it is hard. Of course she is a lady, and she assures me she is not married. If it was not unorganized, " he added, "I would tear off her mask to-night."

"Bah!" said Julius, quietly puffing his cigarette. "If you take my advice, Henri, you will leave her alone. She may be wealthy; but I do not believe she is much of a lady. It does very well for a married lady to visit a gambling-house in disguise, but when a young girl does so—bah! I do not trust her."

"You are jealous," returned D'Hurbal. "She does not go alone. There is an old woman who is always with her. She has certainly got a beautiful foot," he went on, enthusiastically, "and her hands are as little as a child's. If you had paid as much attention to her, mon ami, you would be in love with her, as I am."

"You had better think of recovering your losses," replied his companion, "instead of thinking about love. You have been losing heavily for several nights."

"Mon Dieu! but you are right," said D'Hurbal. "I have lost over fifteen thousand dollars this week. But I have five thousand more with me, and I intend to stake heavily to-night. There is no telling but the luck may change."

Just as his companion, whose name was Jules O'Somont, could reply, the cab stopped in front of the house, and on alighting, the cabman was discovered, after being paid.

Ascending the steps, Jules rung the bell three times, and the door opened. At that time the Code of Louisiana did not prohibit gambling-houses, the bill for that purpose not being passed for some months after. Such being the case, the utmost caution had to be observed, so as to prevent the police from obtaining admission.

"Alerte!" exclaimed the young men together, in a low tone of voice.

The usher, who was masked, bowed and stepped aside, at the same time throwing the door open. Scarcely giving him a glance, the young men entered, and walked up a long and narrow passage, dimly lighted by a single jet of gas. As they reached the end they opened a door to the left, after walking a few feet, stopped before a door, in front of which was another masked usher. A second countersign was given, and the door being opened, a narrow staircase was revealed, lighted by a small oil-lamp suspended in the passage. Up they walked, and as they reached the top a third masked usher confronted them. Again the countersign was given, the door opened, and the young men's carved sliding-door revealed. Jules gave this three peculiar taps, and, as if by mechanical means, the door noiselessly slid into the wall, and a brilliant flood of light poured through the opening. As the visitors entered, the door again slid to its wall and effectually shut out the world.

The apartment into which Jules O'Somont and Henri D'Hurbal had entered was a spacious hall of about thirty feet square. It was brilliantly supposed of eight large mirrors, from the centre of which were suspended two magnificent chandeliers of some thirty burners. The light of these being reflected in the glass, made the ceiling a magnificent representation of fairy scenes. Four long and elegant marble tables were standing on each side of the room, and in front of these was a crowd of gentlemen and ladies, all masked and extravagantly attired. Numerous chairs were scattered in various parts of the apartment, and several waiters were passing to and fro in adjoining rooms with liquors and refreshments for the guests. Everything appeared to be of the costliest order, and the rules of the house were evidently strictly observed.

"I'll be with you in a moment," whispered D'Hurbal to Jules, after they had strolled around the room for a few seconds.

"Ah, I see you have engaged a disguise of mademoiselle, I suppose?" said his friend.

His companion made no reply, but pushing his way through the crowd, moved over to one of the gaming-tables, over which was inscribed "No. 2." As he reached it, he slightly touched the shoulder of a female dressed in a pierrot's suit of white.

She turned round quickly, and a cry of pleasure broke from her lips as she saw who it was. Being unable to see features even slightly recognizable, but as she faced D'Hurbal, the light fell upon a head covered with rich brown hair, from the tresses of which hung a number of golden curls.

"Ah, monsieur!" she said, holding out a small and elegantly shaped hand, which was covered with jewels, "you are late—I thought you would not be here."

"I told you I remain away, mademoiselle!" he replied, pressing the dainty fingers. "Will mademoiselle take a walk into the sitting-room?" he continued.

"Certainly, monsieur," she replied.

Taking his arm, they elbowed their way through the crowd, and entered a small and furnished sitting-room, where a few ladies and gentlemen were engaged in conversation, flirtation or intrigue. To one corner of the room he led her, and they seated themselves upon an elegant tête-à-tête.

"So you could not remain away from here, monsieur?" she said, as he sat beside her.

"Ah, mademoiselle, how could I while you were here?"

"But you know nothing about me, monsieur," she returned. "You tell me every night that you love me, and yet you know not my name."

"What matters it, mademoiselle?" he replied. "How do you know if I am beautiful? How can you judge through my mask?"

"Your voice is enough for me to know that you must be charming," he answered. "But will not mademoiselle put an end to this incognito? Will she not, after my assurance of my love, deign to let me see her face and hear her name?"

"No, monsieur, I cannot do so now," she returned. "You must wait until the proper time shall come. If you love me, as you say, it will make no difference."

"Does mademoiselle think that I do not mean it, when I say I love her?" he asked, in a tone rendered tremulous from his passion.

"How can I tell, monsieur," she replied. "You have only known me for two weeks, and it seems about too soon for you to really love. How do I know this is not a mere fancy, which will wear off when you go back to Terrebonne?"

"You judge me wrongly," he answered, passionately. "I love you, mademoiselle. I love you now, and I always will love you. If you bade me risk a man, I would do so—so much is my love for you. And if I should be called a rival, I should not live in the same world with him. He would have to die, or I would have to die."

"Would monsieur go so far?" she asked; and then, after a moment's thought, she went on: "Well, monsieur, I will make a rival very hard to call for you; suppose he was a great duelist, would you venture to fight him?"

"Mademoiselle," he returned, proudly, "Henri d'Hurbal fears no man."

They remained silent for a few seconds, and then she continued her search.

"I must not detain you," she said; "Monsieur has been very right, and must desire to regain his losses. Let us go to the play-room."

"I will not play at all if you say so," he remarked, with the utmost gallantry.

"Oh, no," she answered, with a silvery laugh; "I will not say so. Come with me and I will tell you which table to play at. I will give you luck."

So saying, she extended her hand, which he took, and followed her into the gambling-room. She walked direct to table No. 2, and having taken a glance at the players, released her hand from that of her companion, and turned to him—

"Monsieur will play his luck here," she whispered.

Walking up to the table, the young man looked at the players. The game was confined to about three gentlemen, whose heavy betting had driven the smaller fry from that of them, a young, and dissipated-looking man, was the principal winner, and had before him a large pile of bank-notes and gold. Pulling out a large roll of notes from his pocket, D'Hurbal drew out five one-hundred dollar bills, and threw them on the table.

"On the red, croupier," he said.

The winning player bet on black, and the croupier drew the cards. The black won. D'Hurbal's five hundred dollars were raked down to the red, and again he lost. Stake after stake thus went, and, according to the rules of the game, he could not bet with the black while another did. As the five thousand dollars he had brought with him were now gone, and he spoke to Jules, who was now by his side.

"How much money have you?" he asked.

"About four thousand dollars," was the reply.

"Lend it to me until to-morrow."

The young man handed him the money, and D'Hurbal went to the croupier, and deposited a stake of five hundred dollars on the table. His opponents were now reduced to a single man, who had won nearly all the money, and was watching the game with the keen intent of gamblers. The dispated-looking young man was still the winner, and it was to his opponent's red he now addressed. As D'Hurbal laid down his stake, he deposited an equal amount. The croupier looked on with intense peace. The cards were dealt, and he coolly scuid accrue to the bank from the game. He turned over the cards, and again the black won. Another and another stake was lost by D'Hurbal in succession.

"Monsieur is in great luck to-night," he said, as he laid down another five hundred dollars upon the table.

The young man gave no reply, but ran his fingers through his hair in a singularly nervous manner.

The remaining five stakes were played, and each time it was lost. Although a very extravagant gambler, the loss of nine thousand dollars was a serious one for a single night. However, with the usual imperturbability of his class, the loser said nothing, but rising from the table, moved off. He was about to cross the room, the masked lady, whom we have seen him with, by his side.

"You have lost heavily again," she said. "But why do you see a playing? Go back; luck will change to your favor directly."

"I am sorry, mademoiselle, that I cannot take your advice," he answered. "I have staked the last dollar I brought with me and what I borrowed from my friend."

"Stake this," she said, handing him an elegant gold watch. "Take it—I suppose you may," she went on, in a slightly imperious tone; "monsieur will stake that ring against five thousand dollars, and not a coat."

"Will monsieur do as I ask him?" she said, stamping her little foot upon the floor. "I want you to stake that ring against the man who has won your money."

If mademoiselle orders, I obey," replied D'Hurbal.

He returned to the table just as the winner was about to rise.

"If monsieur will give me a chance, I will play against him for once more," said D'Hurbal. "I will stake this ring against five thousand dollars, and if monsieur wins, I will redeem it in the morning." And he threw the ring.

"That is an unusual stake, monsieur," commenced the young man. But, as his eye caught the ring, he ceased speaking, and gazed at it in astonishment.

"Will monsieur inform me how he obtained that ring?" he at length said.

"I do not see that you have the right to ask the question," returned D'Hurbal. "You will, therefore, excuse my not satisfying your request."

At this sudden controversy the bystanders had all turned their attention from the table to the speakers. While D'Hurbal was perfectly calm, the face of his companion was almost livid from excitement.

"I have the right to ask you the question," said the young man, whose name was Mausion. "And I repeat, monsieur, I would like you to inform me where you obtained that ring?"

"And I shall not do so," rejoined D'Hurbal, emphatically.

"I shall then be much obliged for monsieur's address," said Mausion.

"Which I shall not give, either," replied D'Hurbal, with the same firmness. "I do not see that monsieur has any cause to desire a duel."

"Will this be cause enough, monsieur?" asked Mausion, tearing off his glove and striking D'Hurbal with it in the face.

"No man ever did that to Henri D'Hurbal with impunity," he answered, as he dashed to the crimson hue at the outrage. "Monsieur will be pleased to give his address to my friend Jules D'Somont."

And leaving his friend to take Mausion's address, he left the table, and looked for the cause of the difficulty. But his search was unsuccessful; she had vanished.

On the way home, Jules told D'Hurbal that he had a most formidable antagonist to deal with. Marcel Mausion was the most noted duelist in New Orleans, and had never failed to defeat his adversary, in the many encounters that had taken place between him and others. He had killed eight in four years, and but few persons would now offend him.

"Mon Dieu! what can I do?" said D'Hurbal, in despair. "I have no chance unless I can make it be kills me? Is it not better that he should do so than that I should have quietly submitted to his insult?"

"Certainly," returned D'Somont. "As a gentleman of spirit and honor, you are bound to obtain satisfaction. And, if you can, kill him, for he deserves to die. But tell me how you came by that ring," he added. "I was much surprised when you staked it at cut, for I had never seen you with it before."

D'Hurbal, in a few words, told how he had obtained it.

"Did she tell you to stake it against Mausion's life?" asked Jules.

"Yes."

"Then, my dear friend, she wanted to get up a duel," rejoined his companion. "And I will bet she is some girl that he has jilted, and who is using you to avenge the affront. That is the meaning of the whole matter."

"I should be sorry to think so," said D'Hurbal.

"But," he continued, shrugging his shoulders, "it can make no difference now. He has insulted me, and I must fight. Sacre bleu! none of the D'Hurbals ever were cowards."

The conversation here ceased, and they walked the balance of the way in silence.

On the following morning, D'Somont proceeded to the residence of Mausion, where his card was received by his brother Gustave, who was to be his second. The words the young man requested him with the object of his visit. D'Hurbal deemed either a public apology that night, in the gambling-house, or requested that Mausion would name a day for a hostile meeting between them.

"My brother never apologizes," replied Gustave, gravely.

"Then monsieur will be kind enough to name the day for a meeting," said Jules.

"This evening, at four o'clock, at the Metraire Ridge, monsieur," he answered.

"And the weapons?" said Jules.

"The small-sword," he answered. "But," he added, "if monsieur prefers to fight with pistols, he can be accommodated."

"Any description of weapon suits Monsieur D'Hurbal," replied Jules, stiffly.

"Very well, then it will be the small-sword," said Gustave.

"We will be there at the appointed hour," said D'Somont, rising to leave. "I will bid you good-day, wishing Monsieur Gustave Mausion good-day."

"Good-day to you, monsieur," answered the other, bowing.

The "Metraire Ridge" is situated just on the outskirts of New Orleans, and is one of the most beautiful spots of ground in the vicinity of the city. Unfortunately, it bears a very bad reputation, being considered as the dueling-ground of the Crescent City. Perhaps more than one hundred duels have been fought there, and many noble men have there yielded up their lives for a point of honor.

To this beautiful spot repaired the principals and their seconds at the hour named in the evening. A surgeon, with a carriage, was in attendance, to aid them in the event of either being wounded, though, of course, it was almost certain to be when small-swords were used. The place of meeting was in a small grove, of just sufficient extent to enable the combatants to maneuver according. A thick shrubbery surrounded them on three sides, but on the fourth, nothing but the tiny branches remained, which, however, formed a thick and almost impenetrable screen between the grove and the open country of the ground.

The Creole of Louisiana is, in manners and habits, as much the Frenchman as the native of Paris. Therefore, the principals reached the ground, which was simultaneously, they bowed to each other politely, though distantly. The weather being fine, overcoats were thrown aside, and the adversaries waited the action of their seconds.

Going to the carriage, Gustave Mausion took out two swords, of the same length, which he handed to Jules D'Somont.

"Monsieur will make a selection," he said, with frigid politeness.

Either one was a satisfactory, was the reply of D'Somont, as he took one of the weapons.

Handing the swords to D'Hurbal and Mausion, the seconds moved to one side, and the duelists advanced toward each other.

Just as they were about to commence, Maussion dropped the point of his sword.

"Monsieur D'Hurbal must understand," said he, "that this is no child's duel. A slight scratch on the body, or the loss of a sword, must not be considered a sufficient satisfaction to either party —unless," he added, "it is preferable to him."

"I quite agree with you, monsieur," was the cool reply. And as he spoke, he threw himself on guard, and was followed by his antagonist.

For some minutes nothing but the quick clashing of the weapons was heard. D'Hurbal had been pressed by Clermont to retain his cockcane at all hazards, and, if possible, imitate Maussion, by keeping entirely on the defensive. He was an expert swordsman, it was true, but the devilish skill of his adversary was too formidable not to demand the utmost coolness and agility. He, therefore, confined his movements to parrying the thrusts of Maussion, refusing to avail himself of the apparent advantages which the duelist frequently gave him.

For about half an hour they continued fencing with extraordinary skill, when they dropped the points of their weapons, as if by accord.

"Monsieur displays considerable skill in the defense," said Maussion, satirically.

"I may be as formidable in the attack," was the answer.

"Ah! Monsieur Maussion," suddenly exclaimed a shrill, mocking voice from the rear of the leafless shrubbery, "I see you have met your match." And as the voice spoke, a figure, masked and dressed in the disguise of a page, pushed its way through the thicket, and appeared on the outside of the circle of spectators caused both to start. In the voice, D'Hurbal instantly recognized his unknown observer, and her presence appeared to have a remarkable effect upon the hitherto collected Maussion.

"This is not girl up, monsieur," he said, angrily; and D'Hurbal scarcely had time to address himself upon his guard before he was again vigorously attacked.

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed the disguised lady. "Monsieur Maussion has lost his temper," and the grave again rang with her sharp, mocking laugh.

If the lady had calculated upon exasperating Maussion, she must have been delighted with the result of her efforts. He lost the entire control of his temper, and continued pressing his adversary with the desperation of a madman. Presently he made a thrust, which the other skillfully parried, and before he could recover himself, the sword of D'Hurbal had passed through his body.

"Sure!" he muttered, as he fell to the ground. The surgeon came up and knelt by his side. After examining the wound, he shook his head significantly.

"I can do nothing for him," he said. "He is bleeding internally."

At these words the disguised lady walked to the side of the dying man.

"Marcel Maussion!" she exclaimed in the same bitter tone of mockery—"Marcel Maussion, look up at me. Do you not know me?"

As the dying man op ned his eyes and looked up, she threw the mask off, and revealed a singularly beautiful face, which was lit up by a pair of large black eyes, flashing with mingled hate and exultation.

"Louise!" muttered Maussion, feebly.

"Yes, Louise Ducatel," she answered; "the one whom you once gained, and then slighted. Did I not tell you that I should be revenged for the affront? I gave that ring to Monsieur D'Hurbal, and he urged him to stake it against you, for I knew that when you saw it there would be a duel. I took it to your lodging, your intended bride, for the purpose of being revenged."

"Take her away," muttered Maussion.

"Maitre-cocher had better retire," said D'Osmont, who had recognized in her the daughter of a very wealthy citizen.

"I shall," she answered, firmly. "And I do not suppose that monsieur will use violence to a woman. I came here to see him die; and if he had killed Monsieur D'Hurbal, I should have shot him myself;" and to prove that she was in earnest, she drew a small silver-mounted revolver from her pocket.

"Take her away!" repeated the dying man.

But any attempts would have been useless, for she was determined not to leave. Kneeling by his side, she placed a hand upon his wound, and again spoke:

"Mademoiselle Despard will have to find another lover, Marcel Maussion," she said, in the same tone of raillery. "But I very much fear will not see you the betrothed of another. Not You will be dead; but it was my fate to love you to madness, and to see you desert me for her. I told you three months ago that my love was turned to hate, and I swore that you should see my hand with your blood. See here! I promised see how I keep my word, and obtain my revenge!"

And with fearful calmness, she placed her tiny white hand upon the wound, and then raising it to his face, displayed a palm covered with gore!

"Ha, ha, ha!" she laughed, rising to her feet and shaking her hand, until the blood dropped on upon his face. "Marcel Maussion, die with my last words ringing in your ear. I hate you—I hate you, and I have lived to be avenged!"

"Louise! Wretch!" he exclaimed, raising himself up an effort; then falling backward, heavily, he muttered another invective, and expired.

"Mademoiselle, I hope you are satisfied," said Gustave, who had been quietly standing near by, and witnessing the scene.

"Yes," she replied, giving him a look of contempt, "Monsieur Gustave Maussion must know Louise Ducatel too well to doubt it."

As she spoke, she moved off, and was about to leave the spot, when D'Hurbal quickly followed her.

"I must request mademoiselle to receive her ring," he said, holding out the jewel. "She has forgotten that I still possess it."

"The ring is not mine," she answered; "but I insist upon monsieur's keeping it. I cannot suppose," she added, "that your sentiments are the same to-day as they were last night, after what has transpired."

"I am not right, mademoiselle," returned D'Hurbal, coldly. "I confess to have been much disappointed; I expected too much."

"You are right," she said; "but consider, monsieur, what I have endured. I loved him better than my life, and when he described me to Monsieur Maussion [pointing], I hated him. Since then I have had but one object in view, which has been attained this day. But I must not detain monsieur, she went on, "as I shall never meet again, for I will retire into a convent to-morrow. Retain, therefore, this ring, as a remembrance of me and of the result of your last stake."

As she spoke, she seized his hand with the one which was stained with blood, put her ring for an instant, and then vanished through the thicket.

It was Jules D'Osmont who told me the particulars of the foregoing tale, one night during the war. We were sitting in front of our tents, smoking—he, his interminable cigarette, and I, my darling pipe. When he had concluded, I asked him a couple of questions.

"Did you never hear of the particulars of the case between Louise and Marcel?" I asked.

"No," he answered; "she went into a convent next morning, and her relations were always silent on the subject. Poor girl, she was a fool. Maussion had seduced her, but nobody ever believed it."

"And what has become of D'Hurbal?" I again questioned.

"He is on General Monton's staff, on the west coast of Africa, I believe," he replied. "He soon got over his love for her. But, my dear friend, I can tell you one thing: if ever you meet with Mlle. D'Hurbal, look upon the left finger of her right hand; you will then see the ring that was given to him by Louise for a Last Stake.

The Scout's Adventure.

BY E. S. ELLIS.

SOMETHING over a century ago a settlement was formed on what was then termed the New Hampshire grants. The locality chancing to be equally distant from the settlements of Canada, it rapidly increased until it numbered over fifty souls.

All was going prosperously, and the settlers were happy, quiet and cheerful, when, one bitter cold night, in the dead of winter, a horde of Canadian Indians poured down like a whirlwind upon the little settlement, and, with a single exception, massacred every being of them. It was not long before word was brought to the effect that the demons marched away to their northern forests, leaving the burning settlement and mangled corpses behind them.

The man who had escaped their full fury was Gershow Bechtel, a strong, agile hunter, who, possessing more consciousness than the rest, had a brood of life in the bodies of his wife and five children. He himself was sadly wounded, but not dangerously, and although until next day many of his enemies were in sight, he staggered to his feet, and after almost perishing by the cold, succeeded in reaching the nearest neighboring settlement. Here he was put to bed, where he remained several weeks, and during that time the first intelligence came to the citizens of the massacre, and gathered and buried the bodies.

Gershow Bechtel lay in bed, and his thoughts reverted to his wife and little ones, all victims to the merciless tomahawk, that he took upon himself the solemn vow that he would devote the remainder of his life to revenge.

The first thing done, after fully regaining his strength, was to retire to a spot in the woods, about a dozen miles distant, where he erected a cabin, and proceeded to excavate a subterranean hall, now fitted up in a most singular and seemingly incredible history. It cannot be denied that Bechtel had a most powerful motive for revenge, and with fearful faithfulness did he carry out his vow.

Until the breaking out of the old French war he never desisted from his work. His intrepidity was wonderful, and his sagacity in the pursuit of the red-skinned object of his hate, almost fatal. It scarcely possible to imagine with what eager avidity he would hunt an Indian; for days he would hang to the trail and follow for the first favorable moment, and then inflict the fatal blow with silence and certainty. Like the wolf, who follows its prey for long days, he would appear when the red-skins, wept in slumber, and no thought of danger was in their minds, and vanish, and wherever Bechtel was, there it was sure they suffered.

Matters progressed in this manner for several years, during which time Bechtel had slaughtered enough Indians to revenge the entire settlement which had fallen; but his thirst never abated. Each victim seemed to confirm his terrible passion, and more relentlessly than ever did he wage his crusade against them.

Finally, the French war broke out, and Bechtel offered his services to Sir William Johnson, then Colonial Superintendent of Indian Affairs. They were gladly accepted, and he was employed upon the most delicate and dangerous missions. His success in all of these made him invaluable to Johnson, who frequently employed him upon errands that he would have entrusted to no other living man.

It is our purpose in this sketch to record merely one of the feats, which will illustrate his shrewdness and skill.

It became necessary to send a spy into the enemy's lines, and as usual, Sir William Johnson selected Bechtel and a particular friend of his own, whose brains were to be used only after entering the lines. Bechtel was to attend to the safety of the two; while the other, an ist ingest young officer, was to devote his full mind and energy to acquiring all the information possible when the opportunity presented itself.

So soon as the part of each had been explained and fully com rehended, Sir William produced two Indian scouts, who were donned at once by the spies. With his own hand the famous "superintendent" painted the faces of the two, until they were exactly face-mates of genuine Indians.

By this time night had set in, and Sir William, admonishing strict silence, led the way to one of the gates of Schenectady, which was opened by the sentinel, and they made all haste to the high bank which hung over the strait in front of the fort. A skiff was in waiting awaited them, into which the two spies immediately placed themselves.

"Good luck go with you," whispered Sir William; "and remember," he added, addressing himself particularly to Bechtel, "not to fire a gun."

"Not if we are in danger?" inquired the hunter, who, it was apparent, was eager for the chance of making additions to his list of victims.

"Not unless your own safety imperatively demands it. Do not forfeit you fame by using a gun under any other circumstances."

"Then I hope our safety will demand it," muttered Bechtel, as, taking the paddle in his hand, he sent the light boat silently and rapidly in the direction of the enemy.

The night was the perfection of inky darkness; earth, air, sky, everything was a mass of utter blackness, excepting the stars, which twinkled above the tops of the owl. Not a breath of wind pustled the foliage of the trees, nor did the long paddle in the hands of the spy make a noise that could have been heard a rod distant.

"Sh!" suddenly admonished Bechtel, so low that it just reached the ears of his companion, who became sensible at the same time, merely from the cessation of motion, that the rowing had ceased.

The boat coasted down in the bank, and then peered over the edge. Suddenly the sound of dipping paddles fell upon it, and a few moments later half a dozen lights twinkled through the obscurity, apparently a great distance. Bechtel raised his gun noiselessly to his shoulder, and held it pointed for a moment, when, recollecting the injunction of Sir William, he lowered it again, with a sigh of regret.

"What was that?" inquired the companion of Bechtel.

"Injius; and, if I ain't mightily mistook, they are going a spying, just the same as we are."

"With the boats?"

"Twas only the fire of the pipes, which looked like as many candles in the darkness. How I wish I could have shot 'em. I'll bet a dollar that the forbid of Sir William!"

"Why, they looked a mile away to me."

"Sartain, sartain, it looks. I could have broke all their pipes as easy as pull the trigger."

The paddles soon resumed with the same skill and silence as before. At the rapid rate which they were pursuing, this brought them to a point about opposite the distant fires. Bechtel saw, when, turning a sharp angle, Bechtel suddenly ceased rowing, and covered down in the bottom of the boat.

There was no need to inquire the cause for this action; for, in the distance, along shore, a great number of lights could be seen flashing and flickering in the obscurity, and making the wall of darkness still more profound. These lights proved to belong to a party of Indians on the shore of lake, which, here and there reflected its rays.

"We've found 'em at last," muttered Bechtel in a suppressed voice. "Ain't it a purty sight, mister?"

"Well, yes, I suppose so," replied his companion, who saw nothing specially to admire in the view.

"Shall we go among them, mister, I want to ask you one thing."

"Let's hear it."

"Will you obey my orders?"

"If I like them."

"Like them or not, I must be captain for the while."

"I have no objection, I am sure, to benefit by your superior knowledge and experience."

"Can you talk Injin?"

"No."

"Then, that's bad; your edjycation isn't finished, mister. Howsumever, you can keep silence, can't you?"

"I think so."

"Well, do that, then; for if you open that mouth of yours, one word will be enough to lose us our scalp-knot. Keep a-holding on all-fours without making a speck of noise?"

"Yes."

"Hangnation! I don't see what Sir William sent you with me for, I could have done better myself. But you having you here, why we might as well go to work at once. I can't stop to tell you anything more, for we haven't the time to spare. What you have to do is to keep close to me, and DO AS I DO. Can you keep your mustache?"

"A very interesting part to play."

"Play! You'll find there's mighty little play, I can tell you. Remember what I told you."

The injunctions were obeyed. Bechtel proceeded toward the lights, which seemed further away in the darkness than they really were, handling his paddle with such consummate skill that not the slightest sound was made. In this manner they rapidly approached the encampment, until they could hear the tones of voices talking, and a perfect Babel of discord.

Bechtel paused and listened.

"It's the tarnal Ottawas, for I know 'em, and have cause to. They are low, lyckon. They are a drunken frolic, as they always are just afore going into battle. Hear 'em sing their songs. I can do a little of that, I reckon, so let's be among them right away. Remember what I said, to make no noise and stick close to me."

Plying his paddle with the same matchless skill, he made the land at some little distance away, in order that he might avoid the sentinels, who could be heard hallooing and challenging each other constantly. The canoe was then drawn up into the bushes that skirted the water.

"Now, leave everything behind except yourself," whispered Bechtel, carefully taking up his rifle to protect it from the dews and damps of the night.

"Must we leave our guns behind?"

"That's the orders of Sir William, and mighty hard ones I reckon, too. You'll find 'em the best, for I wouldn't like to risk my getting a rifle charged with powder."

"But suppose we get into danger?"

"We're in danger now."

On their hands and knees the two proceeded some distance, when Bechtel whispered:

"Here they are?" he spoke in a barely audible whisper.

"Where?" asked the other.

"Look in front of you."

Following the directions, his friend saw a group of five or six Indians seated around a fire, their countenances rendered frightfully hideous by the debauch in which they were engaged. They sat in a circle around, swaying back and forth, passing the canteen from one to the other, and singing and howling—the monsters and maniacs in which they had been engaged, and threatenings of what they intended to do on the morrow.

"Wait a moment," whispered Bechtel to his companion, as he crept stealthily toward the group. Reaching the nearest one quite, and drawing his knife, he stabbed him to the heart.

Instantly he motioned one who seemed to be the chief.

Bechtel replied in a few Indian words which his friend did not comprehend; and, rising from the ground, confidently appeared in the midst of the group. A few words were hastily interchanged, when the scout introduced his companion as "Big Knives," when the captain's thus they sank almost exhausted.

"The brother does not speak," said Bechtel.

"Is he dumb?" inquired the chief.

"No; but he has sworn not to speak his mouth until he has slain a Long-Knife."

"Good!" ejaculated the chief. "He is welcome."

"I don't remember the young warrior," said the chief, after another pull at the canteen, his natural caution struggling to the surface, in spite of his present condition. "Is he a brave?"

"He is; he was stolen by the Iroquois many long years ago, but has lately escaped."

"How did he escape?"

"He killed three warriors when they were asleep by the fire, and ran away."

"Only three warriors! I heard the chief, growing in his drunken stupor.

After a few moments, he suddenly aroused himself from this, and, grasping his tomahawk and starting fiercely up, sprang toward him and held the weapon over his head, as if about to strike. Bechtel showed not the least fear, but placidly awaited the blow.

"Good!" said the Ottawa again; "we are satisfied [the chief] never saw a braver stuff than a Saub, but look him in the face. You are our brother; you shall go with us to battle with the Long-Knives to-morrow."

"We are, then, in time," said Bechtel. "Does the chief desire to spare us the red-coats on to-morrow?"

"He does."

"Has he men enough to fight them?"

"Good! Count the braves of the trees, and you may count our warriors," said the chief, waving his arm in the direction mentioned.

Gradually and skilfully Bechtel extracted all the information he could from the numbers of the French, Indians, and courier de bois, which composed the army, the time when they proposed to begin the battle, the manner they were to take, and their plan of attack.

So soon as the examination of the chief was concluded, all the Indians, excepting himself, were found to be asleep, or lying in a drunken stupor to the ground, in a state of drunken stupefaction. Our two friends, who had also feigned slumber, and kept did not open their eyes until certain of not being discovered. They were about rousing to their feet, when Bechtel suddenly dropped to the earth, and his comrade imitated him, without exchanging a word, to await the reason for it.

"Shortly after footsteps were heard, and, as they approached, two officers were discovered. They halted by the fire, and one spoke French, in which tongue:

"The braves are all asleep; our spies have returned, and it is time to wake them."

"Not yet," returned the other. "Another hour's sleep will do a great deal toward sobering them. Let them rest."

They passed on, and when their footsteps were no longer audible, Bechtel arose to his feet, motioning to his comrade to be still. Passing around the group in the most noiseless manner, he removed from each of their guns, and then emptied their powder-horns into the nearest one. Returning to the tomahawk of the chief, he stood over him up for the tomahawk, with an expression of hatred that him a moment, with an expression of hatred that words cannot express.

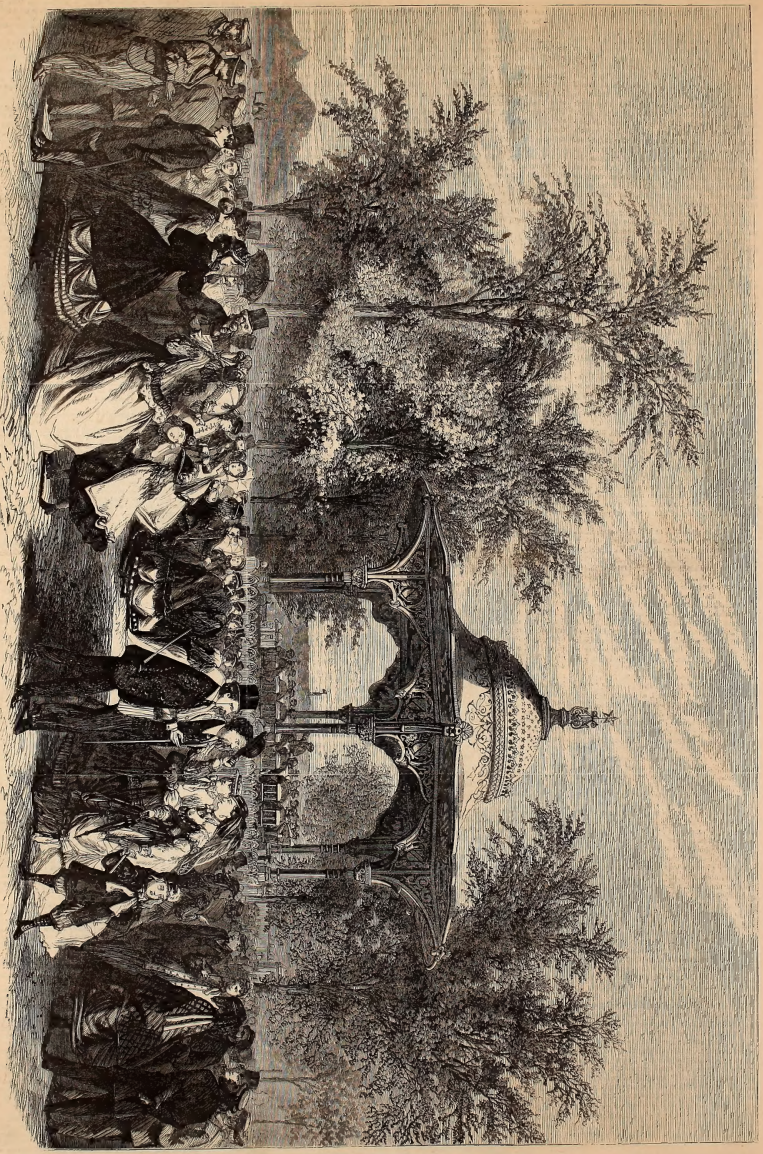
There was an intense debate between his strong desire for revenge and their safety, when they hesitated, and started down the river.

"The morning breeze is rising," said Bechtel; "we have no time to spare."

After passing some distance in silence, Bechtel turned to his companion:

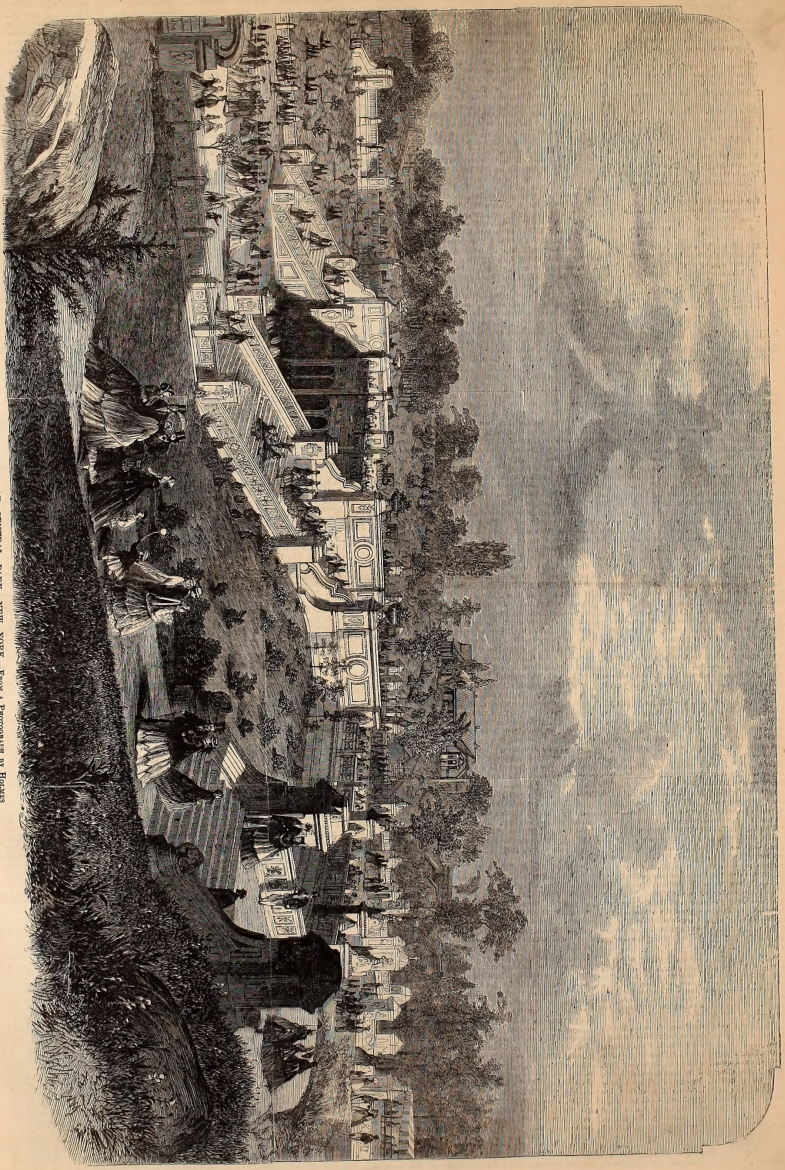
"It's confounded lucky for us that the boat we left behind the Injins last returned. It's getting light mighty fast. I'm only sorry for one thing."

"What is that?"



"That I let the drunken Ottawas alone. If I had only known it, my own boys would have rolled upon them one head; but Sir William is mighty particular."

"You will be in. You would have been overtaken and killed."



"Perhaps so. I must be a mighty poor critter if I can't dodge half-a-dozen red-skins."

Several hours of hasty rowing brought them at length within sight of Ticonderoga, just as it was beginning to grow light. As they struck the foot of the high bluff from which they started, the sun was just coming up in the east.

Without a moment's pause, they proceeded to the quarters of Sir William Johnson, who was awaiting their return with the greatest anxiety. It is scarcely necessary to say that he received with more information than he had a reason to expect.

TO A LADY.

BY ERNEST TREVOR.

DEATH's silent whispers touched the trees,
And over every leaf and bough
Steal those mysterious sympathies,
Like sadness o'er a youthful brow.

The winds sigh sadly, and the waves
Beat haggardly on rock and sand,
While sunshine falls upon the graves
Which sanctify this war-worn land.

But neither nation's gloom, nor yet
That mournful time—the year's decay—
Can on the gentle-hearted set
The seal of a departed day.

Within yourself, oh, lady dear,
Lives that pure light, which ever shines,
Like to those diamonds, pure and clear,
That nestle in Golconda's mines.

For virtue is a thing apart
From all the world; it lives within
The dim recesses of the heart,
And trembles at the touch of sin.

And yet, amid the battle's roar,
Through plague and tempest, fire and sword,
On every sea, on every shore,
It lives and walks—IT IS THE LORD!

THE FAIR LADY OF THE SHROUD.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—RUPERT'S MAGIC MIRROR.

THE week which Grace Clifford had meted to her niece as the interval of rest before her day of trial, and that which Raymond had also assigned as the period necessary for the completion of his own designs, had slowly worn away. Every day Mildred had been comforted by meeting with her husband, yet every day cast down by finding him so bent on punishing his wily step-mother. As though, in executing the sacred task of an avenger, he felt removed from human ills, he seemed to see no dangers in his path, no matter how obvious they might be; and when they were pointed out, made light of them. True, he said, Cator had suddenly come upon him in the cave. What then? The man had scarcely ever seen him in his life; was it likely he should identify a wandering artist, who had let his torch burn out in his enthusiastic admiration of the Cathedral Chamber, with dead Raymond Clifford?"

"But he must have known that you and I were here together," urged Mildred, anxiously.

"Yes; but I assured him that, worn out by a long ramble over Ribble, I had been asleep for hours on this yielding sand. The fellow was quite satisfied, I do assure you, love."

Mildred was far from being satisfied; but there was something of impatience in her husband's tone she had never observed before, which cautioned her not to dispute the matter. She had that faculty of knowing where contradiction is hopeless and argument worse than injudicious, which, in a woman, is so rare. This submission to her husband's opinion begat in time (as it will always do if, oh, wives of England, you would only try it) a certain confidence in it.

Matters went on upon the fifth night at Cliffe, and stagnated upon the fifth day, precisely the same as they had done at first; Lucy continued to be respectful and even kind, and Mrs. Clifford, according to promise, kept herself so completely out of her niece's sight, that Mildred lost that sense of insecurity which had taken such complete possession of her upon her arrival, and even began to think that nothing, after all, might happen worse than had already taken place, until the hour of her release came round. She had taken one of the old books from the library, and contrived by its help to pass a weary hour or two. It was a tale written in imitation of those of the "Round Table," about errant knights and captive ladies, and perhaps she found some application in it to her own case, which lent an interest it would not have otherwise possessed. At all events, it so far won her attention as to make her put a slip of paper in the volume over-night to mark her place, and on the morrow, after breakfast, she turned to it with some curiosity to see how Sir Eglamour or Sir Bedevire acquitted himself under certain circumstances. As she opened the book, she perceived that the paper which she had left therein was no longer blank, but scrawled over by the nameless friend, whose handwriting was now become so familiar to her:

"The hour which you dread draws nigh, but do not fear it. Rupert Clifford awaits you in the rose-garden, but I shall be there, too. It is better to go forth at once and meet him, than that your aunt should send you forth. You must get the paper signed according to her wish. Leave your child within doors, and do not refer to your marriage, if you love your life."

Like some condemned wretch who, having striven since his sentence to forget his inexorable doom, is suddenly reminded of it when there is not an hour left that he can call his own, so Mildred shivered and sank down in hopeless terror. Why had she lingered in that dreadful house, when escape had so often presented itself? Why cherished the foolish notion that what Grace Clifford had once designed would not be carried out? Why have promised, no matter in what straits, to play this evil and false part with Raymond's brother? Her husband, indeed, had not said "Nay," but only because he thought to have by this time rendered such an interview unnecessary. Nay, the week was not yet out; it was the morrow which her pitiless aunt had appointed for this dreadful interview. Why, therefore, should she meet Rupert now? Who knew what help or change the next day and night might bring forth? But yet her unknown "Well-wisher," whom she had no cause to doubt, advised her to see her brother-in-law at once. And was it not well thus to anticipate the commands of Mrs Clifford at a time when, for all Grace knew, Milly was still clasped in her mother's arms?

The windows of the library looked upon the terrace only; but opening one of them, and putting out her head, she could catch sight of the rose-garden—or rather, for it was a sunk square, of any person who chanced to be walking in it. Yes, Rupert Clifford was there, in the hunting-costume he had worn the previous night, walking rapidly to and fro, and cutting at the leafless plants with his whip-lash. He had evidently not been to bed at all. His face, even at that distance, showed as though he had not known rest for weeks; and always, as his hasty steps brought him to the end of his restricted walk, he looked up anxiously toward a window, which she felt was that which had wont to be her own. He was evidently keeping an appointment, as he thought, with some one who had not yet come. Then it came into her mind that he had made some such appointment with herself, in that very place, the day previous to her elopement with his brother. Mildred hurried back to her own chamber, and muttering something of having left her book behind her, put the child into Lucy's arms, and then returned alone. She well knew that without Milly she would never be suspected by her attendant of any attempt to leave the castle.

Rupert was still there, but walking faster and faster, like some poor pent-up animal in its narrow cage. Mildred dared not look again, lest her resolution should give way, but hurried to the western postern and let herself out. With a firm step, though with a beating heart, she walked along the terrace toward Rupert, but he did not hear her. She would not have used that way had she dwelt in her old room, and therefore he did not look for her in that direction. She had time to observe him thoroughly, as he crossed and recrossed the little square. The last time she had beheld him, he had but lately recovered from a long and dangerous illness, but he had then been healthful and well-looking by contrast with his present appearance. His cheeks had fallen in, and were ghastly pale; his thin, fair moustache, all unkempt and straggling, hung like hoar-frost upon his lip; his hair was white as snow. There was nothing about him of youth or beauty left. But his eyes burned like living coals—so fiercely, that Mildred involuntarily stopped as she caught sight of their strange fire. At that moment he turned and saw her. With a joyful cry, he took the few stone steps that led up from the rose-garden at a single bound, and stood beside her on the terrace.

"At last, at last!" he cried triumphantly. "Ah, heaven, how I have wearied for you!" He seized her hand; then, as if controlling himself by a strong effort, raised it respectfully to his lips. "You are not yet mine," said he; "I kissed you the other day, and you were angry. That makes me sad, as it pains you, my dearest, to see me wrathful. I was wroth just now because you did not come. I thought they kept you from me—She, or They; and that turns my blood to flame. Your own aunt, too, your own mother's sister, else—— But there, I am not angry now. I am so happy, Mildred, that all seems like spring."

"It is spring, Rupert."

"Ay, true, spring with us, dearest, and with all fond lovers, although to the world, who are neither wooed nor wooers, it is still winter. Is it to-day or to-morrow that we two marry? See, I have gathered you a posy. Sweets to the sweet, they say. Now, give me one rose back again, that I may put it in my button-hole; or, since it has no blossom, into my bosom. That is where the true roses bud and bloom. But I do not like those black clothes, my darling. Why do you wear them?" Such a chill crept over Mildred at these words as numbed her brain; until that moment the thought of her being in widow's weeds had never struck her. Fortunately, Rupert answered for her. "It is not fit," he said, "to mourn the dead so long. My father was an old man, too, and old men must expect death; it is the young who shrink from the grim mower. Your aunt Grace, poor thing, is likely to die early."

"Indeed, Rupert. Why so?"

"Well, that is between you and me and the terrace wall here. Or stay; come here into the yew-tree arbor. I will then tell you some news; I will forecast the future. We shall be one to-day or to-morrow; and man and wife should have no secrets. And by-the-by, talking of that, I dreamed last night—of all the dreadful dreams—that you were married, and to whom, think you? To whom?"

They had crossed the rose-garden, and stood in the huge arbor, enclosed in thick and close walls of yew. The madman held her at arm's-length, and griped her hard, but not in anger; he gazed upon her shrinking face with a good-natured smile, as one who asks a riddle.

"I knew you would never guess," cried he at last; "for who would ever think of Raymond? And yet I dreamed that you were Raymond's wife, not mine; and when I woke—now, listen, for this is what I have brought you here for—I saw my own brother's face—— What's that?"

In an instant, the grave and solemn look with which he had spoken the last few words was replaced by one of keen suspicion; then, again, by one of mocking mirth.

"Ha, ha, my friend; what! you are listening, are you?" Like a boy that plays at hide-and-seek, he ran out of the arbor, and searched it round and round. "Did you not hear a twig snap, Mildred?" inquired he.

"No, Rupert."

But in the brief space that he had been absent she had heard something else—a whisper from she knew not whom, and coming from she knew not whence, which said:

"Fear not; you are not alone. Hide your wedding-ring."

"You heard nothing, Mildred? Good. Your ears are trustworthy, whereas I hear so many things—voices in the night-air, and at all times our wedding-bells. They give me the headache, dearest; yet, if I heard them not, I should have heartache. 'Married to-morrow, married to-morrow, married to-morrow,' is what they are always saying. But why not 'To-day?'—why not to-day, I say?"

He snatched her little wrist, and squeezed it in his trembling fingers, as in a vice. But for the unseen presence of her unknown friend, her power of speech would have frozen as before. As it was, she whispered, huskily:

"Because we agreed upon to-morrow."

"That's well; for you never deceived me, Mildred, as one did. That is why your Aunt Grace will never be long-lived."

"Why so, Rupert, since she is a young woman still?"

"Well, to most persons—to all, in fact, but you—I should say, that's my secret. There was once a secret kept from me by all the world, and now I have one of my own. You have heard of second-sight. That is nothing to the faculty which I possess. I can count one, two, three," (he checked the numbers slowly off upon his fingers, but never taking his eyes off hers), "four for certain, and perhaps five living folks; and I foretell that those persons will all die early, and two of them young. I have seen these faces, still, and pale, and cold. Now, where do you think I have seen their faces? Come now, guess. It's a brave riddle. Not in the fire, though there are men's faces there, but those are dead already; not in the air, though there are faces there, too, but those are devils. Let me whisper in your ear, for I hear creakings—on my razor-blade. I thought it would astonish you. That has been my magic crystal, my patent foreshadowing looking-glass, for many a day; I bought it with my first money long ago, before I wanted it for shaving. You see I don't shave now, because they have taken away my razors, as they think, and with them the most gladsome sight that memory or sunbeam have got to show me—the faces of the men I want to kill. They are not all men. Look you—for I always carry it about with me—here is a woman's face. Do you know it?"

"Yes, I know it, Rupert; but you would not hurt me?"

She gazed upon the blade, whereon was mirrored a beautiful face, indeed—her own—but white with terror, and the lips parted with the beginning of a prayer.

"Hurt you, my Mildred? Nay, I love you so, that while you speak and breathe upon the steel, her hateful features fade away. But now—see!—they come again; the hard blue eyes—the silken mesh of hair in which she trapped my father—the lips that whisper lies—the lily neck that I will squeeze some day. She is blotted out by quite a mist of blood, and then comes Clement—the fat-faced shrinking fool. How that man fears me, Mildred! I will kill him, too, yet not too quickly, but as the cat plays with the mouse. Here's that devil Cator; now, I fear him. He has chains about him, whips and locks; he shut up Uncle Cyril, the only sane man in our family, and then murdered him. Now, for murderers, the law says 'Death.'"

"The law, Rupert; but you are not the law," pleaded Mildred, earnestly. "Yours are wicked thoughts. If you, indeed, feel tempted to do these people hurt, give me the razor."

"To-morrow, not to-day. Before I marry, I must wipe out old scores. My fear is that, having once begun, there will be no end; for No. 4 (I always call him that, but he may be No. 5) is certain as the rest. You see him, don't you?"

"No, Rupert; I do not wish to look upon that thing again."

"Ha, ha!" laughed the madman, softly. "Look at me, then. Here is No. 4. I am short-lived, like the rest. That is why you are wearing widow's weeds already. I thought it was for Raymond. There, I've pained you now. I thought so only in my dream. I dreamed that Raymond married you, and so it happened that this very morning whose face should come out on my magic crystal but poor Raymond's! But it was dimmer than the rest, and therefore I have my doubts."

"Would you kill your own brother, Rupert, and ruin your immortal soul?" asked Mildred, laying her hand upon his arm, and looking at him with such solemn, earnest eyes, that Rupert's drooped their lids.

"Well, as to that," returned he, stripping the rose-branch, still in Mildred's hand, of its few leafless twigs; "Grace Clifford—who is the devil, you know—has promised me that, if I sign a certain parchment, all will be well with me, and safer than any priest could make it."

"Sign it, Rupert."

"You say so?" exclaimed the madman, eagerly. "Then, that is enough, otherwise, because she has plagued me with her 'Sign, sign,' ever since—well, since yesterday; but there's something wrong there—I would never have done it. I will settle that at once; and would it not be rare to sign it with—— But that's secret. Have you any other commands, my love, my bride?"

"Yes, Rupert. For my sake, I pray you to do no harm to Mrs. Clifford, nor to any other of those you spoke of. Now, promise me, as you are a gentleman."

"Ay, there's the rub; some people can make promises and break them, which I never can. Well—I will promise you to sign with ink, not blood, and to let Mrs. Clifford and the fat-faced fool and Cator live—until to-morrow. Give me your arm. No, not a day longer. Hush! the peacock listens yonder; he has a thousand eyes to see with, and what he hears he tells."

CHAPTER XXXVII.—MILDRED'S FLIGHT.

AFTER parting, she scarce knew how, with Rupert at the western postern, Mildred flew to her own chamber, with a mind divided between thankfulness and terror. She was deeply grateful that the dread interview—so infinitely worse than anything she had been prepared for—had come to any end not immediately tragical; while she trembled for the consequences which it foreshadowed. It was clearly her duty to warn her enemy, Grace, of the imminent peril that threatened her, as well as Clement Carr and Cator, at the hands of this unhappy madman. But her own Raymond, although his danger did not seem to be so instant, was to be warned also. What, if after setting her aunt upon her guard, Mrs. Clifford—having obtained in the meantime what she wanted from her unhappy step-son—should put at once into effect whatever design she might entertain against herself and child; or even but make them, for the future, her close prisoners, so that she could not communicate with her husband at all! To be cut off from that comfort now seemed, indeed, a thing unbearable. To run the risk, however small, of such another meeting with Rupert, was something too terrible to be thought of. She wondered at herself for having sustained, even with the help of her unknown and unseen ally, so frightful a trial, with sufficient external composure to deceive the cunning madman—if, indeed, she had deceived him. Might he not even now be committing those very crimes he had spoken of as though they were decrees of fate which he had been appointed to execute! Upon consideration, however, she felt as much conviction as the nature of the case permitted of, that Rupert would keep his promise, and for that day at least restrain his murderous instincts. Once persuaded of this, her resolve was fixed to escape from the walls of Cliffe—from the mad love of Rupert, and the cruel hate of her aunt Grace—at once and for ever.

Her husband himself had appointed the morrow for the maturing of his plans and her own departure; and now, after what had happened, he would certainly not permit her to remain another night under that hateful roof. She would meet him as usual in Ribble Cave that day, but not to part. They would take Lucy with them—such a confidence had grown up between her and her attendant, almost, as it seemed, in spite of the latter's self—if she feared the wrath of the mistress of Cliffe, and was willing to change service; but whether Lucy proved to be a consenting party or not, Mildred was resolutely determined to flee. Let her attendant be ever so kind to Milly, and friendly to the interests of herself and child, and let her unknown friend be ever so watchful over their safety, Cliffe was no longer a place for them. With the necessity for flight, there came into her mind, as the morning drew slowly on, all sorts of possible impediments and obstructions to it. Contrary to custom, Rupert was up and about that day, might not—nay, if he pressed the immediate signature of this parchment, was not Grace herself quite certain to be stirring likewise? As for the ruffian Cator, he seemed to need rest neither by night nor day, for his grim face was always to be seen where least expected; a cunning look, too, sat on his harsh features, which she did not like. Had Raymond really hoodwinked him so easily as he imagined? If not, then indeed did her husband stand in deadly peril.

Again and again, as the sun lingered on the dial in the courtyard, did she accuse herself (though never her husband, who was the one in fault) of insensate folly in remaining at Cliffe, when so many chances of escape had offered themselves. In vain she strove to reassure herself by recalling the arguments Raymond was wont to use at Sandby long ago with the same object: the power of the law, the certainty of detection, which must needs deter so acute a woman as her aunt from the commission of actual crime; the ridiculous notion of kidnappings, murders, private imprisonments, and all the stage situations of romance taking place at all in this nineteenth century. This last consideration, so generally popular with persons in commonplace and easy circumstances (who, by-the-by, read in the Times at breakfast every morning of their lives, some case or other much more tremendous and astounding than any so-called "sensational" novelist would venture to put into fiction), was not so comforting to Mildred as it doubtless would have been, had not her personal experience so flatly contradicted it. We have it upon good authority that the human hand is not the better fitted for a brasier, notwithstanding that the mind may be engaged in contemplating the lofty Caucasus; and if all these weighty reasons for entertaining a sense of confidence and security had failed her at Sandby—before the attempted designs of Gideon Carr and the abduction of Milly—it was not likely that they should give her comfort now.

When a message suddenly came for Lucy that her mistress wished to see her immediately, and Mildred was left alone, she caught up her child in her arms, and prepared for instant flight. This surely was the time, before some order should arrive from her aunt for her more strict keeping, to cross the solitary park; but even as she hurried on little Milly's outdoor garments, she heard Cator enter his own room, the window of which she knew commanded the very door at which she must make her exit. Moreover, even if she reached the cave, Raymond would not be there for yet some hours, and her pursuers would be sure to seek for her there before he came; or, if not so, to come upon himself, when recognition would be all but inevitable. She had hardly time to undo her hasty work, and conceal the evidences of her intention, when Lucy returned with a countenance even graver than usual.

"What are my aunt's commands? Tell me the worst! Am I to be a prisoner even more than I am?" cried Mildred, forgetting all her caution in her anxiety.

"No, madam. It is for myself I grieve, and not for you. My mistress is dissatisfied, it seems, with my attendance on you. I am to serve you no more—or, at all events, not as before."

"Is some one else, then—some jailer—to take your place?" asked Mildred, hanging with eagerness upon the other's answer.

"Not that I know of, madam. But I am no longer to accompany you in your walks, Since Rufus knows you now, Mrs. Clifford says it is no longer necessary; but I am afraid she has some other reason."

Mildred's heart bounded within her, and then as suddenly it seemed to stop and die.

"But the child? When I go out, may I take my Milly with me?"

"Yes, madam; I was particularly to say that you were not to be parted from the child."

Mildred took Lucy by the hand.

"Do not grieve," she said; "though I leave you for a little, I shall not forget you. God bless you, Lucy; you have been very kind to the friendless and the fatherless. I am sure she wishes us well; is it not so, Milly?"

As the child, for answer, put up its little mouth for its whilom nurse to kiss, the tears rolled down the woman's cheeks; then, as if not daring to trust herself to speak, she withdrew into a distant corner of the room, and took up some needle-work.

"I will not press you with questions that may embarrass you, Lucy, or to which it is inconsistent with your duty to reply; but tell me: Where is Mr. Rupert?"

"He is with Mrs. Clifford, madam."

"Alone?" asked Mildred, with apprehension.

"No, madam. Mr. Carr is with them."

"And your brother—I heard him in his room a while ago—where is he now?"

"I left word with him to join my mistress."

"Do you know what their meeting is about, and may you tell me if it concerns myself and Milly?"

"I think"—the woman stopped and hesitated—"I believe not, madam. There was something to be signed by the Master. But I was to tell you, madam—at least I was to let you know—that Mr. Rupert would not be about again to-day; and that Mr. Clement and my brother were both bound for Lancaster."

"Why, that almost looks, Lucy, as though my aunt would say: 'The coast is clear, niece; you may now depart from Cliffe, if you have a mind.'"

"Yes, madam."

"You answer as though you still thought some evil was intended; but I have reason to think that Mrs. Clifford has obtained all she wants, and would willingly be rid of me. I have had a meeting with Mr. Rupert this morning."

"With Mr. Rupert?" exclaimed the woman, leaping to her feet. "Great Heaven! you have never done that? It would have been safer for you to have met Rufus, ere you and he were friends."

"I know it, Lucy. He is mad—and more—he is bent on murder. Let your mistress and her friends beware of him, for he loves them not."

"They will look to that," returned Lucy, more quietly, "they are all used to mad folks."

Something in the woman's tone, as well as words, jarred on Mildred's ear, as had often been the case during the first few days of their acquaintance, but not of late. Its effect now, as always, was to reduce Mildred to silence. Presently Lucy left the room, and when she returned, they scarcely interchanged a remark until their mid-day meal; after which Mildred quietly began to prepare for going out. When she and the child were ready, and about to leave, Mildred said: "Good-by, Lucy," with a smile, which the other easily comprehended.

"You forgive your jailer, then?" returned the woman, gravely. "For a captive on the day she leaves her prison, that is much to say."

Mildred changed color.

"Nay, madam, do not deny, for I know better than you that you will not return. May I kiss the child, please?"

Once more the woman's tears stood out upon her harsh and furrowed cheek like drops of turpentine upon the fir-bark. Then, with a parting hand-shake, Mildred departed; along the echoing corridor, down the muffled stair, and so through the great hall into the empty courtyard. There, looking up at the window of the room she had just quitted, she saw Lucy watching them with her still weeping face pressed to the pane. Mildred paused upon the bridge that spanned the sleeping waters of the moat to wave her handkerchief in farewell; then she turned, and took her way across the solitary park.

Surely she was free now; yet, what a weight seemed to oppress her heart and brain! Did her Aunt Grace indeed intend that she should make her escape? or was this fancied freedom but like that of some poor prisoned bird, forgetful of the string that tethers it, who flies a little way from its tormentor, only to be checked at his cruel pleasure, and be put back in the cage? If Lucy knew her simple plan, how much more would Grace Clifford be cognizant of it. Still, here she was on her way to utmost Ribble, and not a creature in sight to stay her! In a few minutes she would find herself in the presence of her natural protector, friend and lover; clasped to her husband's heart, she would fear nothing. With hands too eager for their task, she lit a torch, and took the oft-trodden way, unmindful of its unsullied glories—though virgin white as ever glistened the pendent crystals; and the fantastic forms that rose to meet them, rough with ten thousand ripples, showed like new drifted snow. Now on the pebble rang her hurrying feet—now the bare rock gave sullen token of their passage—now the silver sand received their noiseless impress; then, with bent head, whose wealth of hair covered her precious charge as with a silken mantle from the tricklings of the roof, she threaded the narrow tunnel, at the end of which Raymond had always met her with a cry of welcome, coming from out the darkness of that vast cathedral-chamber like r This time he met her not. Her torch flashed full upon two human countenances, than either of which she would rather in that solitary place have faced a wolf's. The one displayed the cruel features of her uncle, Clement Carr, and the other the grim and repulsive lineaments of William Cator.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—AN UNHOLY ALLIANCE AND ITS PLANS.

As soon as Rupert Clifford had parted from Mildred, he sent word to his step-mother that he wished to see her upon a matter of the last importance, in what he was pleased to term his business-room. Like many another dignified by the same name, or even that more ambitious one, "the study," this chamber gave no evidence of its title in its contents. Formerly, a few of the more faded family pictures, for which even the great gallery had no room, had adorned the walls; but the present inmate had caused them to be exchanged for the portraits of such of his ancestors upon whom, in later life, the supposed ancestral curse had fallen, or who, in other words, had distinguished themselves in eccentricity. Of Guy Clifford, a full length had been taken, when advanced in life, attired in his favorite hunting-dress of gray; and but that Rupert's coat was a red one, the picture in its frame might have almost passed for a reflection of the living man; so like, as Lucy had said, had the young master of Cliffe in these late years grown to his strange forefather; unshorn was his long white hair, unkempt his straggling mustache, and upon his worn cadaverous face dissipation had set the same sad marks which physical and mental illness had imprinted upon the face of his descendant. Rupert's great-uncle, Roderic, too, was there, who had lived and died his own master as well as Master of Cliffe, but who had yet been mad enough to think he would come to life again to inherit house and land; the features, not unlike those of Ralph Clifford's, but less firm, and not without a touch of cunning. Uncle Cyril's well remembered face was the last of that long line, with lips that beamed forth kindness and good-will, as they had ever done on him whom they now looked upon (for he had loved his brother's boys), but with a certain glitter of the eye which boded evil to the man that crossed him. But there was one picture to which Rupert's glance had been directed from the moment he entered the room, and which he was contemplating now, with head aside, while he awaited Mrs. Clifford's coming—the handsomest face of all, so beautiful and waxen delicate that it might have belonged to some fair girl, save for the silken fringe upon the lip.

"How could she have played him false?" murmured Rupert, his chin sunk on his hand. "With one such as he to love her—and very kind he was, they say, when he was pleased—why did she not then please him? Why ruffle that broad brow? Why mar that loving smile? And he too—why for that fair Jezebel so strangely like" —— He heard the rustle of a dress at the open door, but he did not stir a hairbreadth—"so very, very like her portrait."

"You sent for me, Rupert, did you not?" said Mrs. Clifford, laying her finger-tips upon his arm.

"Yes, mother—I call you mother because Hamlet did—but why I sent for you, that has escaped me altogether. Perhaps it was to ask your opinion about Bertram here? Now, what do you think of him?"

"Well, he was a foolish, headstrong boy, enamored of a woman false as she was fair."

"How very, very like my father?" observed Rupert.

"Yes, a little like," returned Mrs. Clifford, carelessly: "they were both dark and very handsome in their youth."

"But this one was never old."

"No; he died young."

"Ay, and shut up, poor fellow," remarked Rupert, pitifully.

"The better for him, step-son, otherwise he would have been hung. Do you not know that for jealousy of that same wanton he slew his brother Gervaise?"

"Ay." Rupert faced suddenly round, and asked with fierce impatience: "But why did he not kill her instead? Those cruel eyes of blue, why did he not shut them close? Those lying lips, why did he not make them dumb? Those serpent locks, why did he not take them, as I might yours this instant, and wind them about her snowy neck until she choked.

Grace Clifford's face was ashen pale; but her eyes did not quail, nor her voice tremble, as she answered, sternly:

"Ask her yourself, Rupert; you have seen her once, and will perhaps see her again."

"True, true," stammered the other; "let us not talk of that; I could not bear to see her; it would drive me—— I am sure I could not bear it. The last time—I marked it in the almanac here—was the very day of my poor father's death. I wonder whether she appears before all deaths. One, two, three, four—— What are you staring at, mother? Do you not know that I am here to sign the almanac—the thing that you have plagued me to do a thousand times. How does one sign an almanac? Let me write down Cancer for my name, because he was the brave crab that nipped your brother Gideon, and kept him tight till the tide came up, for which I hold him in everlasting honor."

"Do you mean that you are ready to sign the parchment, which you have hitherto refused to do until you are married to Mildred?"

"Just so; it is only to-day instead of to-morrow; why not?"

Grace Clifford strove in vain to quench the gleam of triumph that stole over her white face, and made her cold eyes glitter with eager greed; but she made answer, carelessly:

"As you please, Rue; but we must have witnesses, or the deed would only be waste paper. Shall we send for my brother Clement and William Cator?"

"Ay, do," said Rupert, slowly. "Give me the deed—you keep it somewhere here, I know—and I will read it while you fetch these men. One should read what one signs."

From a locked drawer, in a cedar cabinet, Mrs. Clifford drew forth a parchment, neatly folded, and placed it in his hands. It was Rupert's own will, whereby, in case his brother died before him without issue, all the lands of Cliffe were devised to his step-mother solely.

She pointed to the place where, presently, he was to sign, and where the names of her brother and Cator were to be attached.

"But where do you sign?" asked he.

"I do not sign at all," said she.

"But that will not do," cried Rupert; "your name must be set down."

"It is set down," replied she, impatiently. "There, there, and there again—have you no eyes? I will go ring for Lucy, and she will bring the other two."

"One—two—three—four," observed the madman, slowly; "Grace, Clement, Cator, and I. This is to do all our wills in one, then. No. 5 is in it also; but then he never stole my love away as Gervaise served poor Bertram; that was only an evil dream. Time has not fled, as the whispering fiends would persuade me. All between is but one long—long night. This, surely, is my own sweet marriage-eve."

He took the parchment to the almanac, and compared it with a date marked with a white cross.

"Yes, 'tis the self-same day. To-morrow I wed my Mildred. To-morrow, one goes to the bridal, and three to the bier. Ay, here they come. Now, see me sign, my honest witnesses. Clement the fool, put thy name below here; Cator, the knave, write thine beneath it; and as for Grace, the foul fiend with the fair face, as Raymond used to call her—Grace is everywhere, like sin. You do not smile, mother. That is hard, since I have done all this to please you. Now, I go to my bed—— By the by," he added, stopping at the door, and looking at her very fixedly, "to-morrow, being Mildred's husband, I shall be your nephew; will that make any difference in one's calculations? One—two—three—four. No; it all comes out as it should do. But I'll ask my father, nevertheless."

"What does he mean by that?" asked Clement, uneasily, and not before the echoes of Rupert's heavy footfall, so unlike a young man's tread, had died away down the oaken stair.

"There is no meaning left in him," replied Mrs. Clifford, contemptuously. "I suppose he refers to some ramble on the roof-top which he intends to take to-night, in hopes to meet with poor Ralph's spirit, which forsook him there. I often hear him on the leads above my chamber."

"Hear him! Hear who?" asked Clement, with apprehension.

"Why, Rupert, of course. Do you think that dead men walk?"

"I have heard," returned Clement, seriously, "that spirits will sometimes re-enact the self-same scene which was fatal to them or to those dear to them in this life, and in the self-same place."

"Then you have heard lies, brother, which it is not worth while to repeat. Leave such idle tales to folk like yonder madman. We that have wits must use them to better purpose. Now, look you, Clement and Cator, this Rupert Clifford is growing something worse than intractable; he is getting to be dangerous."

"He has been fit for the Dene this long time," grunted Cator.

"I know that," returned Mrs. Clifford, sharply; "and what is worse, everybody about him knows the same. This deed he has just signed would be quite worthless, but for the date, which sets it two years back."

"But is not that for—for—forgery?" stammered Clement.

"No, fool; or if it is, what then? Which of us three would witness against the other? Not I, nor Cator—of that, at least, I am sure; I wish I could say the same of my own kin."

She spoke with such contempt and bitterness, that Clement seemed to shrink within himself, and cower like a shelterless beast in a storm.

"Forgery!" repeated she. "Why, if I could not have got this man to sign, do you think that I would not have written 'Rupert Clifford' here with my own hand, as like to his as I could make it? Have I gone so far upon my road—and yours—to halt for this or that? Have I done my part, taken my share of risk—ay, and more than my share—that you should stare because I say I would have done this thing? Do you deem that if this madman's wild caprice had not chanced to be thus favorable, or if this Mildred should have failed to make him so to-morrow, that I would have sat down submissive, like a perplexed maiden before her embroidery frame, whereon the pattern has been woven amiss? Do you think that Cliffe and all you see, brother, from yonder window, and thrice as much again, and gold in bank, and coal in Durham mines—read, read! 'tis here!—is all this to be got by me, and shared by you, without suspicion, peril—ay, perchance, and even risk of your own worthless neck? What! think you to make me your cat's-paw—me!—and never let your fingers feel the fire, but only itch for what I keep myself, after all's done?"

"I am sure, sister," said Clement, doggedly, "I have always wished you well."

"Wished!" hissed Grace. "I wonder that you do not tell me I have ever had your prayers! What have you done?—but that you will have some difficulty in answering—come, what are you prepared to do?"

Mr. Clement Carr looked ruefully at his own signature, scarce dry upon the lying deed, as though he would have said: "That's not a little risk to run, according to my prudent notions;" but his lips murmured something about his being ready to do anything that was required of him for the common good.

"That's well answered, brother. There is but one thing and an easy thing—which you can do; and it must be done at once."

"What is it?" asked Clement, huskily. "I won't have anything to do with Rupert?"

"Of course not, because, as I have said, he has grown dangerous," returned Mrs. Clifford, scornfully. "No, let Rupert be my charge. You will find him quiet and subdued enough to-morrow, thanks to a certain treatment invented by myself, and quite unknown to you wise folks, who make lunatics their study. But with respect to your task, brother—you have read this deed?"

"I have, Grace. Rupert leaves all to you without reserve, in case of Raymond's death, and Raymond is dead already."

"Yes; but not without issue."

A cold dew suffused the fat face of Clement at these words.

"True," continued his sister, "the land is entailed to male heirs only, and perchance the will might hold; of this I am not sure. But if this child lives—she being Rupert's near and only relative—we should have "Fraud," or, at the best, "Injustice," heaped upon us in her name by all. Suspicion would be aroused, Investigation instituted, and all that may follow is written in your tell-tale face, brother."

For the third time in that short space Clement Carr passed his handkerchief over his clammy forehead.

"Let Cator do it," he stammered.

"Do what?" asked Mrs. Clifford. "You have not heard what there is to do. And besides, Cator has done enough to show himself faithful, risked enough, done all but gained enough. Now, it is your turn."

"I will not commit a——"

"Hush, fool!" cried Grace, holding up a warning finger; "that is not required of you; but you will be what you have been already to-day—a witness. We must make these things sure. I will take no man's word. Gideon's word I did take, but I will take no other's; no, Cator, not even yours."

"Then this is my job, is it, mistress, and Mr. Clement is to look on?" observed the serving-man, sullenly.

For once, Grace Clifford winced. Her heart was hard as the nether millstone, and she had never felt the sentiment of shame. She could have borne with equanimity the loathing of the entire human family, if only they were made to fear her; but something even in her nature shrank from this brutal candor. She could contemplate the frightful crime she had in view with resolution; she was actually about to speak of the details of its execution; and yet, when her tool and minister, who, compared to her, was innocence itself, growled forth: "This is my job, is it?" her very blood seemed to curdle. To order lamb (for the sake of the mint-sauce) is one thing, but to hear the butcher begin to talk about his part of the business is another matter, and intolerable to a delicate stomach.

"Pray, be silent, Cator—it is your business to listen and to act—if action seems to be absolutely necessary. Perhaps your own acute intelligence, assisted by that of your master here, may devise some less unpleasant means of making this document something better than waste-paper; but a method more safe, more absolutely without peril to ourselves, I do not think that you will hit upon. For listen. Ever since this disobedient girl has been held prisoner here, she has taken it into her head to visit Ribble Cave. Lucy tells me that she does so through some foolish sentiment connected with that—connected with her late husband. It was in that place, it seems, that the minx first drew him on to declare his passion, and laid the foundation of that plot whereby, for a time indeed, she thwarted us, but for which she has suffered since, and is now about to pay the penalty to the uttermost. And does not this jade deserve it? Did I not send for her hither, the orphan of one who did me deadly wrong, and place her higher than she could have ever looked for in her most ambitious dreams? and would I not have given her a position which any lady in the land might have been proud to hold—let alone a girl like her, with nothing but her gipsy face for fortune—and for return, did she not betray me, cross me, and almost—but not quite, not quite, my soft-toned niece—defeat me!"

She spoke with vehemence, and yet as though she held converse with herself alone, making apology for what she was about to do by calling to mind her wrongs: then suddenly flashing her falcon eyes upon her hearers, she added, with cruel distinctness:

"Therefore it seems to me it is most fit that Ribble Cave should be the place of her just punishment, as it was the first scene of her wicked disobedience. However, she daily goes to this cave—she and her child—attended up to this time by Lucy; but to-day, Lucy will not go with them. Now, what so likely, what so a most certain, as that this foolish girl, half maddened by her recent loss, and feeding on this foolish fantasy day after day, should end her woes by plunging with her babe in Ribble stream?"

She paused, while Clement turned his white weak face toward Cator, which, as if reflecting something of the serving-man's grim strength of purpose, gradually grew firm. He smiled a sickly smile, and murmured:

"Good! The thing looks likely, William; does it not?"

"I always said Miss Grace, as was, was a clever woman," growled Cator, admiringly.

"I do not speak thus of my own thought alone," continued Mrs. Clifford. "The extreme likelihood of the girl's committing suicide struck Lucy herself; but for her telling me that she did not think the cave was safe for my niece to visit, perhaps I should never have hit upon this plan. And look you, Clement, she may do it yet. For my part, like all others who hear the news, I shall conclude she did it; and if you and Cator should have reason to think otherwise, I pray you keep it to yourselves." Seeing the serving-man was about to speak, she held up her hand for silence. "I want to hear nothing—nothing. I have no time for talking. Do not suppose that it is you alone who have to act. This parchment being signed—and made by you effectual—I have to do what has been postponed too long already. There has been already much unpleasant rumor concerning Rupert; moreover, I am told that during these last few days there have been inquiries made, and even some attempt at collecting evidence respecting the young master's state of mind. This is dangerous, and the more so since I cannot guess the quarter from which the danger comes. But now they shall have evidence enough. They shall no more complain that Rupert Clifford is suffered to take his own mad way. The country bumpkins shall no longer stare at his wild doings. That shall be set right this very night."

"What! would you harm him, too, mistress?" inquired Cator, apprehensively. "Don't you think that three such—ahem—sudden removals within the twelve hours would be a little suspicious?"

"Harm him?" rejoined Mrs. Clifford, contemptuously. "Why should I harm the man? But since he has become impracticable, and can be of no more use to us, it is high time he should be sent to the Dene. We know he will be taken care of by the good folks who have bought the place off our hands. Only he must be made a little riper for it. But that's my business; do you see about your own. What you have to do must be done to-day. It is time that you should both set forth for Ribble, but not together—nor must either of you be seen going in that direction. You will have to make a long round before you meet. And be sure you light no torch, but wait in the Cathedral Chamber for—for what fate may send you. Remember, Clement, this is the last blow we have to strike, and there is none to ward it; and without it, all we have done and periled has been but labor and risk in vain."

VIEW OF BOWLING ALLEY BUILT ON THE TRUNK OF ONE OF THE MAMMOTH TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

BOWLING ALLEY ON THE TRUNK OF A TREE.

AMONG the many wonders of California, the mammoth trees occupy a prominent place. Nowhere else in the world are such gigantic specimens of vegetable life to be found, and nowhere else, we would hope, could the vandal hand of man raise itself for their destruction. Towering to the height of from two hundred to over three hundred feet, with a diameter of from twelve to thirty feet, they should be allowed to remain in their solemn grandeur, and only time should pronounce their doom. They are a cone-bearing evergreen, and are found in different parts of the State. In Calaveras County, about ninety miles from Stockton, there is a grove of these trees, a hundred in number, within an area of fifty acres, twenty of which exceed twenty-five feet in diameter at the base. A few years ago one of the largest of these trees was ruthlessly cut down, and on its prostrate trunk a bowling alley has been built, which is shown in our illustration, together with a specimen of the cone and foliage of these giants of the forest. This tree employed five men for twenty-two days in felling it, not by chopping it down, but by boring it off with pump augers.

After the stem was fairly severed from the trunk, the uprightness of the tree and the breadth of its base sustained it in its position, and to throw it over, wedges were inserted and driven in, until the noble monarch was forced to tremble and then to fall, after bearing the "battles and breezes" of many centuries. It was a sacrilegious act, for which there is neither palliation nor excuse.

THE FATHER OF THE FOREST.

MR. JAMES M. HUTCHINGS, whose name will be familiar to our California readers, if not to a great many here, has just published, in London, a neat interesting book, entitled, "Scenes and Wonders in California," from which we extract this account of a gigantic tree, which has received the name of "The Father of the Forest."

After describing one called "The Mother of the Forest," which is 84 feet in circumference at the base, and at 70 feet from the base 49 feet 6 inches, he goes on:

"A short distance from the above lies the prostrate and majestic body of the 'Father of the Forest,' the largest tree of the entire group, half buried in the soil. Its true measurem in circumference, at the roots, 110 feet. It is 200 feet to the first branch; the whole of which is hollow, and through which a person can walk erect. By the trees that were broken off when this tree bowed its proud head, in its fall, it is estimated that, when standing, it could not be less than 435 feet in height; 300 feet from the roots, and where it was broken off by striking against another large tree, it is 18 feet in diameter. Around this tree stand the graceful, yet giant trunks of numerous other trees, which form a family circle, and make this the most imposing scene in the whole grove. From its immense size, and the number of trees near, doubtless originated the name. Near its base is a never-failing spring of cold and delicious water.

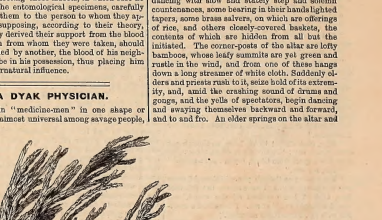
"Let us not linger here too long, but pass on to the 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' and 'Husband' pair of trees that are leaning, with apparent affection, against each other. Both of these are of the same size, and measure in circumference, at the base, about 60 feet, and in height are about 53 feet.

"A short distance further is 'The Burnt Tree,' which is prostrate, and hollow from numerous burnings—in which a person can ride on horseback for 60 feet. The estimated height of this tree, when standing, was 330 feet, and its circumference 97 feet. It now measures across the roots 39 feet 6 inches."

After these Mr. Hutchings goes on to describe a score or two more of this family, but none equaling this "Father." In fact, it is timber enough to build a navy, or wood enough to supply the Metropolitan Hotel with fire for a century.

A CAFFRE HUT.

THERE are some delectable regions where the absence of dingy tenements and extortionate rents renders the solution of the problem "How shall we live?" quite easy and simple, where the tax-gatherer is a myth, and the imperious demands of modern society unknown. There may, however, be conditions connected with these exemptions none of our readers would care to obey, so we present to them a phase of life more curious than attractive.



In Caffre-land the huts, which have the form of a hemisphere, are from eighteen to twenty feet in diameter, and from six to seven feet high; they are generally built by the women, poles being first stuck into the earth, from which flexible boughs are arched over the top. This bower-shaped wattle-work is thatched with straw, and plastered over with clay or cow-dung. A small aperture is left for the door, which is formed of basket-work, and usually screened by a rustic sort of portal. The fireplace is formed in the centre, and the only outlet for the smoke is the doorway; to this may be attributed in a great measure the circumstance of the inmates of these rude dwellings being so frequently afflicted with weak or sore eyes. The floor is usually composed of the earth of ant-hills, which, by long exposure to the heat of the sun, has become dry and hardened, being thus well adapted for the purpose, and producing a smooth and even surface.

A few mats to sit and sleep on, a small one to hold the food when dressed, a few coarse earthen pots of native manufacture for cooking, a basket of peculiar workmanship, so closely woven as to be capable of containing liquor, and a bundle of assagais or spears, constitute the furniture of a Caffre hut. In that of a wealthy Caffre, there is usually a milk sack made of bullock's hide, so closely sewn together as to prevent leakage, and capable of containing several gallons; but the poorer classes are content to keep their milk in calabashes. The food of these people varies with the seasons; their principal support is milk and a coarse description of unleavened bread made from a kind of millet called Caffre corn, roughly ground between two stones. Meat is only eaten on great occasions, such as marriages and other festivals, or when they are obliged to kill an ox for the support of their wives while engaged in the duties of cultivating the land and suckling an infant; or at the time when karrosses are required for the use of the family, which seldom happens more than once a year, and among the poor class not so frequently. They never eat salt, to which they have a decided aversion. The milk is poured into a thirteen sack, as before described, which being placed in the sun, soon curdles; a mess of this, with a little Caffre corn, either boiled or roasted, is in their estimation a most delicious banquet. They preserve their corn in holes dug for the purpose, in the centre of their cattle kraal, covering it with manure, which, being trodden down and well hardened, generally protects it from the wet, and where they consider it as being more safe from the attacks of marauders. Should it prove occasionally rather musty, it is considered by no means unpalatable, but on the contrary possesses a flavor agreeable to their taste.

Except an occasional plunge in the river, they never wash themselves; so the ordinary condition of their bodies may be very well imagined. On a fine day their karrosses are opened out in the sun, and such specimens of insect life as show themselves meet speedy destruction. It often happens that one Caffre performs for another the kind office of collecting these insects, in which case he preserves the entomological specimens, carefully delivering them to the person to whom they appertained, supposing, according to their theory, that as they derived their support from the blood of the man from whom they were taken, should they be killed by another, the blood of his neighbor would be in his possession, thus placing him under supernatural influence.

A DYAK PHYSICIAN.

BELIEF in "medicine-men" in one shape or another is almost universal among savage people, appearance like a miniature human being. This is supposed to be thrust into a hole in the top of the patient's head, invisible to all but the learned men. He has thus recovered the man's soul, or, as it may be called, the principle of life that was departing from him.

THE CONE AND FOLIAGE OF THE MAMMOTH TREES, CALIFORNIA.

At the third and last harvest the "soul of the rice" is secured. The way of obtaining it varies in different tribes. Sometimes it is performed by day, sometimes by night, and the process is this: The priest, fixing his eyes on some object visible only to him, takes in one hand a bundle of charms, and in the other a second bundle, composed of pigs' and bears' and dogs' tusks and teeth, and large opaque-colored beads; a little gold dust is also necessary in this ceremony, during which he calls aloud for a white cloth, into it is brought and spread before him, he waves his charms toward the invisible object in the air, and then shakes it over the white cloth, into which there fall a few grains of rice, which Tapa, in reward to their offerings and invocations, sends down to them. This is the soul, and it is immediately wrapped up with great care and laid among the offerings around the altar.

In some tribes it is a far more exciting spectacle, especially when done at night. A large shed is erected outside the village, and lighted by huge fires inside and out, which cast a ruddy glow over the dense mass of palms surrounding the houses, while gongs and drums are crashing around a high and spacious altar near the shed, where a number of gayly-dressed men and women are dancing with slow and stately step and solemn countenances, some bearing in their hands lighted tapers, some brass salvers, on which are offerings of rice, and others bamboo vessels filled with rice, the contents of which are hidden from all but the initiated. The corner-posts of the altar are lofty bamboos, whose leafy summits are yet green and rustle in the wind, and from one of these hangs down a long streamer of white cloth. Suddenly elders and priests rush to it, seize hold of its extremity, and, amid the crashing sound of drums and gongs, and the yells of spectators, begin dancing and swaying themselves backward and forward, and to and fro. An elder springs on the altar and whose superstitions lead them to trust more in rites and incantations than in skill and drugs. From the following account, it will be seen that a practitioner in Borneo must possess a considerable range of qualification, and that he is not indifferent to his fees:

The Dyaks know of but one cause of sickness—Satan. If it be headache, an imp of darkness has taken up his abode there; a pain in the stomach, and the unlucky sufferer has swallowed a goblin. The patient's soul is frightened from its tenement, not quite away, but hovering about in a shy, uncertain way, and it is the business of the magicians who are called in to entice the soul to enter the man's body again.

At this ceremony four or five priestesses attend, the interdict lasts four days, and one pig and one fowl are killed. Outside the door of the family apartment in which the incantation is held are gathered together, in a winnowing basket, an offering of fowls, yams and pork; fowl and pig's blood in a cup, boiled rice, and sirih-leaf and areca nuts; these are for the various spirits. On the first day of the incantation, two priestesses pretend to fight with each other with drawn swords, which they wave and slash about in so furious a manner as at once to put to flight the trembling ghost. After this display of valor, chanting begins, accompanied by the music of a small gong and drum, the latter beaten by the priest; this ceremony lasts through a day and a night.

Toward midnight the "doctor" proceeds to get the soul of the patient. Carefully wrapping up a small cup in a white cloth, he places it amidst the offerings before mentioned; then, with a torch in one hand and a circlet of beads and tinkling hawk-bells in the other, he stalks about, shaking his charms. After a little while he orders one of the admiring spectators to look in the cup previously wrapped up in the white cloth, and sure enough there the soul always is, in the form of a bunch of hair to vulgar eyes, but to the initiated in shape and begins violently to shake the tall bamboos, utterring as he does so shouts of triumph, which are responded to by the swaying bodies of those below, and amid all this excitement small stones, bunches of hair, and grains of rice fall at the feet of the dancers, and are carefully picked up by watchful attendants. The rice is the soul enough for, and the ceremony ends by several of the oldest priestesses falling, or pretending to fall, to the earth senseless, when, till they recover, their heads are supported and their faces fanned by their younger sisters.

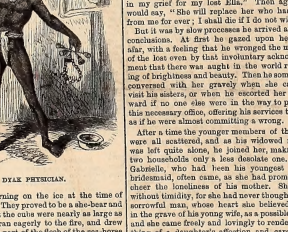
THE FIREMAN'S DOG.

THE humble faculties of animals are often so well exercised as to put to shame the negligence of those who are gifted with immortal powers, and the many instances of sagacity they have displayed suggest important lessons. A fire company in one of our large cities once possessed a dog called "Bob," that in many respects was remarkable. When the fire-bell rang the alarm, Bob started up promptly and ran before the engine, barking, to clear the way, and was most useful in preventing obstructions and stimulating the men by his energy. For years he attended every fire, and so efficient was the aid he afforded, that the firemen had a collar made for him with an inscription expressive of his faithfulness. On one occasion a fire broke out in a chemical laboratory filled with explosive materials. Undeterred by the noise and smoke, Bob rushed in, and finding that every person had escaped, came away, bringing a poor cat in his mouth, and saving it from a cruel death.



THE AFFECTION OF THE POLAR BEAR FOR ITS YOUNG.

than desert each other in distress. While an English frigate, which went out some years ago to make discoveries toward the North Pole, was locked in the ice, early one morning the man at the mast-head gave notice that three bears were making their way very fast over the frozen ocean, and were directing their course toward the ship. They had, no doubt, been invited by the scent of some blubber of a sea-horse that the crew had killed a few days before, which had been set on fire, and was burning on the ice at the time of their approach. They proved to be a she-bear and her two cubs, but the cubs were nearly as large as the dam. They ran eagerly to the fire, and drew out of the flames part of the flesh of the sea-horse that remained unconsumed, and ate it voraciously. The crew from the ship threw great lumps of the flesh of the sea-horse, which they had still remaining, upon the ice. These the old bear fetched away singly, laid every lump before her cubs as she brought it, and, dividing it, gave to each a share, reserving but a small portion to herself. As she was fetching away the last piece, the sailors leveled their muskets at the cubs, and shot them both dead; and, in her retreat, they wounded the dam, but not mortally. The affectionate concern expressed by the poor beast in the last moments of her expiring young was most touching. Though she was herself dreadfully wounded, and could but just crawl to the place where they lay, she carried the lump of flesh she had fetched away, as she had done others before, tore it in pieces, and laid it before them; but, when she saw that they refused to eat, she laid her paws first upon one, then upon the other, and endeavored to raise them up; all this while it was pitiful to hear her moan. When she found that she could not stir them, she went off, and, when she had got to some distance, looked back, and moaned; and, that not awaiting to entice them away, she returned, and, smelling round them, began to lick their wounds. She went off a second time, as before, and, having crawled a few paces, looked behind her, and for some time stood moaning. But still her cubs not rising to follow her, she returned to them again, and, with signs of inexpressible fondness, went round them, pawing them, and moaning. Finding, at last, that they were cold and lifeless, she raised her head toward the ship, and uttered a growl of despair, which was answered by a volley of musket-balls, and she fell between her cubs, and died licking their wounds.

WAITING.

Gabrielle Lee was a young and beautiful girl when the shadow of her long waiting fell upon her. Had she been older, plainer, less prepossessing, she doubtless might have escaped the dreary fate into which she was then led.

Edward Gray had married in his early youth one as beautiful, gay and bright as Gabrielle, and he had known a terrible sorrow. Scarcely a year was he the happy husband of this lovely young creature, and then she faded from his sight. For a time the young widower was inconsolable. "Never was sorrow like my sorrow," was on his lips by night and by day.

Full of this morbid wretchedness, he obstinately refused for a long time to admit of consolation. But that which the sympathy of his friends failed to accomplish was effected by one fleeting expression of pensive thought shading a bright young face.

He had seen Gabrielle Lee many times. He had known her from the time she was a merry little child, sporting the hours away with his younger brothers and sisters. He had assented to common opinion, and the repeated remark of his wife, who loved all beauty passionately, that "she had become a most lovely girl." But this was merely the external recognition of an indifferent fact, not the powerful attraction of an appreciative heart such as now led him to re-echo feelingly the oft-repeated sentiment.

By-and-by he said to himself, "She is as good as she is beautiful; she will sympathize with me in my grief for my lost Ella." Then again he would say, "She will replace her who has gone from me for ever; I shall die if I do not win her."

But it was by slow processes he arrived at these conclusions. At first he gazed upon her from afar, with a feeling that he wronged the memory of the lost even by that involuntary acknowledgment that there was aught in the world remaining of brightness and beauty. Then he sometimes conversed with her gravely when she came to visit his sisters, or when he escorted her homeward if no one else were in the way to perform this necessary office, offering his services timidly, as if he were almost committing a wrong.

After a time the younger members of the flock were all scattered, and as his widowed mother was left quite alone, he joined her, making the two households only a less desolate one. Then Gabrielle, who had been his youngest sister's bridesmaid, often came, as she had promised, to cheer the loneliness of his mother. She came without timidity, for she had never thought of the sorrowful man, whose heart she believed buried in the grave of his young wife, as a possible suitor, and she came freely and lovingly to render something of a daughter's affection and care to the lonely mother whose brood had all flown away and left the home-nest desolate. She did not think of it, but never had she appeared more interesting—

A creature not too good
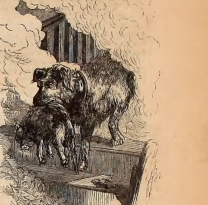
For human nature's daily food, in the perfection of her womanly lovableness, winning and attractive beyond expression to this lonely heart-weary man.

By degrees, meeting her thus in an unobstructed intercourse, and constantly made aware of her best qualities of mind and heart, and her genuine sympathy and tender pity for his sorrows, he came to love her, and desire her for his own, even as he once had Ella, and perhaps even more fervently.

So one day he astonished, almost grieved her, by an avowal of his love. For so reverent was this young girl of the sacredness of sorrow she had never known, that at first she appeared unaffected by human passions and emotions. Custom, however, changed her whole feeling. Joy succeeded pain, as gratitude did surprise. Admiration and pity readily gave way to tenderer emotions, and but little time elapsed before Edward Gray knew that his love was fully returned, accompanied by the delicate flattery of the acknowledgment of his superiority in every unconscious word and act. From that time forth the shadows of her fate lay thick around her.

With acknowledged love came the question of marriage. Gabrielle's timidity pleaded for delay, but Edward's impatience would not grant the boon. Preparations were therefore made, and it was intended that the marriage should take place in the course of a few months. There was no voice against it, but joyful approval by every one, for not one of Edward's friends but had regretted the morbid grief which he had indulged, and which seemed to shut him out almost altogether from the enjoyments, the duties, and the ambitions of life. But the moribundness which had grown upon him was not quite overcome even by the cheering influence of his new love.

It was at this period that his mother, in her age and feebleness, experienced a sudden decay of her mental faculties. The first evidence of this was the inexplicable change in her feelings toward Gabrielle, whom she had hitherto loved and welcomed as a daughter.



More than once she had assured Edward that his marriage with Gabrielle had her entire approval, and that she was prepared to welcome her as a beloved daughter. To the trembling girl she had given the same assurance, and the kiss wherewith she sealed it was as a mother's.

But suddenly she took a dislike to Gabrielle that soon amounted to positive hatred. Entreaties or reasoning could not shake it; it was violent and uncontrolled; so much so, that if even safe from personal injury, Gabrielle was by no means safe from the sharp abuse of words. Vain were all their endeavors to palliate this harsh fact. Edward was bound by every tie of honor as well as of filial love to remain with his mother till her death should free him from the charge voluntarily undertaken. She was not so changed in other points as to be deemed by any one insane. There was a general fearlessness of all her mental manifestations and emotions, with which this one rabid hate stood out in strong and terrible contrast.

There seemed no alternative but to wait until the perturbed spirit gained its release before the marriage took place. For evidently Gabrielle could not, however willing, share the charge of his parent with her betrothed husband, while at the same time neither her high principles, nor his sense of right and duty, would allow him to delegate it to other hands. And so commenced the long and dreary years of waiting.

Year after year the same routine went on. Edward's days were given to business and to his cheerless home, his evenings to Gabrielle. At home she waited for him at nightfall, and through rain, or under the shine of stars, or the radiance of the moon, he took his way thitherward, with a punctuality that only love could have made an unvarying habit. And the years, with their quiet routine that marked no startling event, were yet not without the wondrous miracle of change which goes on forever.

To Edward they brought mature manhood, then gray hairs, fullness of form, and the rubicund face, which often signify that the fullness of one's years has been reached, and that their decline has hardly commenced. A more settled gravity, an added stateliness, pervaded his demeanor. The impatience of youth was no longer his, but disappointment had severed the sweetness of his temper, and embittered his judgment of his kind. He had suffered much, and even his best joy had been tinged with the dark shade of sorrow. He bore this trial less patiently than any other. He was happy in Gabrielle's love; but, manlike, he wanted her in his home, to be the daily, hourly compensation for his former griefs, the sharer of his present, and the soother of his past cares, which memory so often brought before him.

He did not see how the years, with their silent fingers, had changed Gabrielle—how they had robbed her of her bloom, and the light and joyous brightness which had been one great element of her beauty. To him she was perennially lovely, this angel of his life. For him she could never grow old, nor fade. The image of the lovely young girl who had first pitied, then loved him, was never to be erased from his heart. Well for Gabrielle that to him she was still charming, for in other eyes all in her exterior that made her attractive had long passed away.

The peachen bloom of her cheek, and the rosy sweetness of her mouth, the tender brightness of her eye, the soft whiteness of her brow, her abundant glossy locks, and the exquisite contour of her figure—where were they?

Edward did not miss them; but others did. They saw that the cheek was ashen and hollow; that lines of pain were drawn around her mouth; that her eyes were dim as if with unshed tears; her brow sallow and wrinkled; her hair thin, with many a bright line threading its darkness; and her form stooping as beneath the burden of her sorrows, and its roundness displaced by an angular attenuation.

While this dreary waiting went on, her young companions, one by one, deserted her. The young girls she had played with were now bustling matrons, mothers of boisterous boys, and girls fast growing up to fill the places they once occupied. Her ancient beaux were now grave and anxious men of business, plodding on in humdrum fashion, or weighed down with care, or the demands of an exorbitant ambition.

She stood alone—neither matron nor girl. The elders had their own cares and hopes for thought and interest; the young almost despised the old woman, whom they sneeringly named "old maid," as if it were an epithet of opprobrium that trenched not on actual wrong-doing.

Hers was, indeed, an anomalous position. Her father's home still sheltered her, but the bustling wife of a brother was now its actual mistress; she and her little brood filling the wide chambers, and often impatient of her as an inmate who had overstaid her welcome.

But that she could never be unwelcome to her parents, who had been the joy and comfort of their declining years, she had indeed, been most unhappy under the new reign which had superseded that of her girlhood; and sometimes her longing for the safe shelter of a husband's heart and home became almost greater than she could bear. But through all these years there was no waning of her steadfast love.

Edward saw little of this. To him she uttered neither complaint nor longing. Only once, during an illness of her mother, and when grief had made her father's feebleness more apparent, she had said, with the weary sigh that had become habitual to her when alone, but was always repressed in Edward's presence:

"When my parents die I shall be homeless."

Edward was struck with the depression and weariness of her tone, and for the first time in all these years the thought rushed across his mind that he had done her an injustice as well as himself, and that she, too, had suffered, but more patiently than he had done.

He clasped her to his heart, and soothed her with tenderest words and caresses, till she grew calm and happy; and not till he was alone beneath the stars, walking homeward, did he let his own sorrows rise uppermost.

"She has a home, at any rate, while her parents live," he said to himself, "and that is more than I have had all these years. My mother grows feeble; perhaps, as she notices so little, I might bring Gabrielle home now, and make the old place cheerful."

And then he went on thinking of the lonely hearth beside which he would sit to-night, and wondering when it would brighten for him. And meanwhile Gabrielle had retired to her watch beside her mother's sick bed, with a warmth at her heart not often felt there. For the tender words, and the loving caresses of that night had been unfrequent of late, as Edward, like an old-time husband, forgot that even the truest love needs constantly-renewed assurances.

This long and patient love had its reward at last, after many weary years; but its freshness and its beauty had long departed. It bloomed upon the long desolate hearth, but—like an autumn blossom—if gorgeous in tint, destitute of the fragrance of the flowers of spring.

A GOOD THING.

A popular clergyman of this city (says a Rochester paper) has lately ceased to be a housekeeper, rented his residence, and gone elsewhere. The party who succeeded to the occupancy has been greatly annoyed by the daily calls of those who came for assistance in a variety of forms. He has at length resorted to a novel expedient which has served, perhaps, a double purpose; viz.: first, to relieve him from bores; second, to let the beggars see themselves as others see them. And we may add that he has given the public an insight into what a popular clergyman has to endure. He posted upon his front door a card, upon which the following was written in a hand as plain as the talk itself. The copy which we produce was obtained without the knowledge of the writer thereof:

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN!

Dr. —— does not live here. He has moved away from where he lives now, and will not occupy this house again till May 15th, 1867.

In consequence of this, the present incumbent has decided to suspend the free list. No books, maps, pictures, stationery, or receipts of any kind wanted. No history of the rebellion, whether written by Greeley or Jeff Davis. Have no desire to put my name in any subscription book, in order that it may be used for influence. Have no old clothes, except those I am now wearing, and the customs of modern society are unfortunately such that I cannot dispense with them. Have no cold pieces, for we cannot possibly get money enough to purchase at one time more than we can eat at one meal; consequently, proprietors of boarding-houses will have to look elsewhere for supplies. This house will not be kept as a hotel, and warm meals at all hours will not be furnished. Have not a spear of hay in the barn, or a single oat, and have not taken care of horses since I drove on the canal, which means that we have no room for horses, or donkeys either.

Have no vacant rooms or beds to spare for agents, colporteurs, traveling ministers, missionaries, teachers, elders, beggars, sponges, leeches, professional bores, seedy students, soldiers, sailors, negroes, freedmen's aid society agents, rebels or abolitionists, even though ministers in neighboring towns and cities have told them to be sure and call here.

No money to spare for any of the above individuals, or enterprises which they represent, even though it be for the laudable object of furnishing unborn African children with red flannel night-caps and fine-tooth combs.

In short, the minister does not live here now; and "old things have passed away, and all are become new."

Disintegrating Vegetable and Animal Substances.—The high price of rags, and even their sea city, is a great inconvenience and drawback to the manufacture of paper. The price of cotton having also so greatly increased, renders it important to have means for treating certain plants which, like the green weed or genista (genet), produce good filaments for manufacturing paper. Almost all textile plants employed alone only produce transparent paper, which is not suitable for ordinary use. The green weed, on the contrary, is not only suitable for making very good paper and perfect card, but also some sorts of fabrics. With this view, M. François Cabasson, of Paris, has invented an apparatus for disintegrating, as perfectly as may be, and in a very short space of time, the different materials capable of producing paper, and especially the green weed, a portion of the filaments of which are capable of producing fabrics, and the remainder paper.

COURAGE OF A GAME HEN.

The self-reliance of game fowl, and the dauntless valor exhibited by a game hen in defense of her brood, are so vividly described by the well-known poultry judge, Mr. Edward Hewitt, in the last number of the "Poultry Book," that we feel sure our subscribers will have as much pleasure in reading as we have in reproducing the description:

"Not a doubt presents itself to my own mind that, viewed exclusively for their actual merits, unencumbered by the caprice of poultry fashion or individual prejudice, game fowls are undoubtedly the most strikingly beautiful of any among the very numerous varieties of domestic poultry. Among any of the truly bred fowls of this variety, the superiority of gait and general contour strikes the eye of parties even the most indifferent and uninterested; and from this cause I have almost universally noticed that the avenues appropriated to the game at our poultry shows are those most commonly thronged by visitors. This fully proves how much a good display in these classes tends to the pecuniary success of such meetings. In situations where a free, unlimited range can be tolerated, there is not a doubt that game fowls will take care of themselves and their progeny more successfully than any other kind of poultry. Accidents of any kind where these advantages exist very rarely occur; as of all poultry, none are more vigilant in avoiding dangers, nor, again, so capable of repelling aggression; and many are the instances that recall themselves to my memory of cases in which powerful adversaries have found a retreat suddenly forced upon them; or, if persisting in their attacks, have at length been laid prostrate and powerless in the field despite of the superior strength that was relied on for insuring a very different issue. I will simply refer to such an incident where prowess alone carried the day, and also where the odds were vastly in favor of the assailant.

"It was not a casual occurrence, but premeditated by a couple of friends of mine, not only as a test of the dauntless valor of a game hen, but to teach a useful and admonitory lesson to an intruder, whose fondness for chickens had added a somewhat extravagant item to the losses of a notorious poultry amateur, and that, too, among chickens of high merit and considerable pecuniary value.

"It seems a large cat had for many weeks been making daily incursions, and had succeeded in not only taking a chicken at every visit, but had likewise very seriously maltreated the old hens on three different occasions. They were Cochins, and had become so alarmed at the frequent repetitions of these inroads as to scarcely make any attempt at protection for their chickens; and consequently the cat had increased in audacity daily. It was under these depressing circumstances that a brother amateur volunteered 'a certain cure,' if he were allowed unrestrained liberty as to the means adopted; a proviso most cheerfully permitted. Having cooped up all the chickens, and parent birds also, of the fowls that usually had sole possession of the yard, he produced a most beautiful game hen and chickens, the latter not more than three or four days old; the hen being armed with a pair of steel spurs, somewhat shorter than those used in the cock-pit, but well suited for the purpose intended; and being naturally a spurred hen, they were easily and firmly attached. The lot being placed at freedom in the yard, the hen, from all around being strange, was necessarily restless, and the chickens equally noisy.

"Grimalkin, with stealthy pace, was soon seen crouching along a wall about nine feet high; the hen unfortunately at this moment had flown into the body of a covered cart, that prevented any possibility of her seeing the threatened danger. A spring from the top of the wall—or rather gliding down it some few feet, and then darting, as it were, from it midway—placed puss in possession of the nearest chicken, and all the spectators thought certainly that one youngster was irretrievably forfeited to the experiment; but the idea was erroneous; with a shriek the hen flew headlong at the enemy of her brood. Puss seemed but little concerned at her fury, as the impunity with which she had faced other hens seemed rather to inspire her with confidence, almost amounting to imperturbability.

"Perceiving the coming attack, the cat loosed the chicken from her mouth, but instantaneously placed one foot upon it, and with hair erect looked defiantly; while a few deeply-drawn breathings at the window told how anxiously the lookers-on speculated as to the event. The Cochins—poor, heavy, domesticated dames—had always proved slow in their motions, and their efforts were easily avoided. Not so now; a blow the eye could scarcely follow, and a scream most dissimilar to the noise from anything feline, gave evidence the contest was not so very unequal as it appeared to be. Two or three other blows, in the most rapid succession possible, made retreat evidently the only way that remained to the cat of making the best of an unlucky speculation; still, with an obduracy most remarkable, she once more seized the chicken with her mouth and sprang with it upon the wall. Nevertheless, bravery carried the day—the hen proved close to her heels, and another double rap brought both antagonists headlong back again to the ground. The cat then loosed the chicken, bolted to another less exposed outlet, and the hen quickly commenced her muster-roll, which embraced the whole of her progeny, and none were injured, the hen herself escaping literally without a scratch; although her artificial heps were besmeared with gore—as was the scene of this extraordinary encounter. Some half year afterward I heard on inquiry that a longing, lingering look was frequently still indulged in by the aggressor, but always from afar—and the promise of the owner of the game hen has been fulfilled: the cure was a certain one.

CHINESE JUGGLING.

While walking on the banks of the river this afternoon, near the junction with the Grand Canal, I saw some clever juggling. A boy, about fourteen years of age, performed the needle trick in an exceedingly expert manner. He commenced by sticking a dozen of common sewing needles upon the end of a piece of wood, and showed them to the lookers-on. I examined one of them, and found it to be an ordinary sharp-pointed needle. Having done this, he placed them, one after another, between his lips, and sucked them slowly into his mouth, and, to all appearance, swallowed them. He then walked round the circle with his mouth open, and allowed the people to look into it; but nothing was to be seen of the needles. He then took a crystal ball, about the size of a walnut, and, placing it between his teeth, drew it into his mouth, and, to all appearance, swallowed it, as he opened his mouth and it was not visible. He then made an effort, as if bringing it up from his stomach, and ejected it from his mouth, repeating this performance several times. He next took a long piece of thread, passed it up one nostril, and brought the end out by his mouth, moving it backward and forward by the two ends, the one hanging out of his nostril, the other out of his mouth; he then pulled the string out altogether, introduced it again into his nostril by snuffing it in, and seemed to swallow the whole piece of string. He again swallowed the glass ball, ejected it, and immediately afterward drew the thread out of his mouth with all the needles strung upon it. This is really a very clever trick, showing wonderful powers of stowing things away in the mouth—the more so, as he was talking the whole time. A great amount of skill is exhibited, and no small degree of risk must be run in performing this trick, as Mr. Lockhart mentions a case that occurred at Shanghai, where the needles that had been introduced into the mouth, ready threaded, slipped down, and became impacted in the back part of the throat, and caused death the fifth day afterward.

THE SCENERY OF ICELAND.

The fiords, which, bursting through the rocky barrier that guards the coast, run far up into the interior, constitute a most characteristic feature of Icelandic scenery. They have all a great similarity of form, so that the description of the general features of one may serve equally for that of all the others. Having, probably, been at first rents or chasms produced by the general upheaving of the island, their length is very often disproportioned to their breadth; some of them being scarcely two miles wide, yet extending twenty-five or even thirty, into the country, and continued still further by narrow vales, down which the mountain rivers find their way to the sea. Lofty ridges, running out into the ocean, and ending in precipitous headlands, separate them from each other. In the neighborhood of the Rode and Beru Fiords these assume their most magnificent appearance, attaining an elevation of nearly 4,000 feet, though their average height on other parts of the coast is only about the half of that now specified. So sudden is the rise of these mountains, that it is no uncommon thing to find precipices 1,000 feet high, from the top of which a stone may be cast into the sea. The fiords are thus shut in on both sides by perpendicular walls of rock towering up to a tremendous height, whose summits are clothed with eternal snows, or vailed in dark clouds.

All around seems dead, no trace of life is visible. Man and all that he produces vanish amidst the mightier works of nature. Woods and the higher classes of the vegetable creation are entirely wanting, and the naked rocks are too steep for even the hardy birch or stunted willow to fix their roots. No sound is heard save the billows dashing on the craggy shore, no motion seen but the cataract rushing down the rugged cliffs. Such is the general appearance of these fiords, and the repulsive aspect they present; yet there does the Icelander choose his dwelling, unappalled by the rocks which threaten every moment to crush him by their fall. The island is nowhere thickly peopled, but these firths and their connected valleys are more so than any other portion. Here grassy meadows are found in the immediate vicinity of the sea; and here, therefore, the natives can employ in conjunction both those sources of gain which alone the severe climate leaves open to them. On their shores are the finest pastures for the cattle, whilst their waters are a favorite retreat of the cod, the most esteemed of the fish caught on the coast.

LIONS AND THEIR VOICE.

Lions appear to attack game by seizing the flank near the hind leg, or the throat below the jaw—points which instinct seems quickly to teach dogs of all kinds to assail, when in pursuit of the larger animals.

Dr. Livingstone, while bearing witness to the enormous strength of the lion, truly wonderful when compared with his size, remarked, however, that all the feats of strength, such as carrying off cattle, that have come under his observation, had been performed by dragging or trailing the carcass along the ground.

The tales of lions never devouring game save when killed by themselves are unfounded. We have seen a family of lions (they often hunt in families) in the Transvaal territory, quarreling like a pack of hungry hounds over the putrid carcass of a horse, which had died of paardsikté (pleuroneumonia) a few days previously, while the plains around were teeming with those countless herds of migrating game (antelopes and quaggas), of the numbers of which it is so difficult to convey an idea to the fireside traveler.

A point where imagination has wrought wonders is in the matter of the lion's voice. This fancy has been also demolished by Dr. Livingstone. "To talk of the majestic voice of the lion," he writes, "is merely so much majestic twaddle. I have never found any one who could fairly distinguish between the roar of the lion and that of the ostrich, although the former appears to proceed more from the chest. To this day," he adds, "I am unable to distinguish one from the other, except by knowing that the former roars by night, and the latter by day only."

Jules Gerard is, however, more enthusiastic in his appreciation of the vocal powers of his favorites. He remarks that the sound of a lion's voice, a league off, appears to an inexperienced observer as if close at hand; and that he has frequently tracked lions at a distance of three leagues (nine miles), by the sound of their voices; he also testifies to a certain musical grandeur in the sound.

A NOVEL ART UNION.

The great Chicago scheme for the disposal of the Crosby Opera House, has at last fairly been brought before the public. Its mammoth proportions, we may presume, rendered its earlier movements difficult, but now that it is fairly in motion, its pace to a completion of the gigantic speculation embodied in it will be more than rapid. For it is a gigantic speculation, even in these days of speculative enterprise, to raise a sum of money of more than one million of dollars in about three months. The inducements offered are, however, enormous. The shares are simply $5 each, yet each share entitles the holder at the very instant he purchases it to an engraving of its full value, or that of the several shares he may purchase. The choice of the engravings which have been purchased by the Crosby Opera House Art Association is very large, the "Mercy's Dream," by Huntington, and a splendid chromograph from Cropsey's great Autumnal picture being among the engravings on the books of the society. Next come the premiums, which are secured by the reputation of the prominent citizens of Chicago, who have consented to form the nucleus of the Managing Committee. These consist of three hundred paintings, including, amongst others, Bierstadt's great painting, entitled "The Yo Semite Valley," valued at $20,000; Cropsey's great work, entitled "An American Autumn," valued at $6,000; Schussele's great national painting of the American Authors, entitled "Washington Irving and His Friends," valued at $5,000; Hart's charming and celebrated painting of American scenery, entitled "Woods in Autumn," valued at $5,000; Constant Meyer's celebrated painting, entitled "Recognition," valued at $5,000; Beard's great Western landscape, entitled "Deer on the Prairie," valued at $4,000, and Gignoux's magnificent landscape, entitled "Alpine Scenery," valued at $3,000, to be followed by Crosby's Opera House in the city of Chicago, reared at a cost of $600,000, and producing from its stores, offices and studios, (not including the Opera House with its complete properties), a rental of $30,000. If this be not a mammoth speculation, we confess we know not what is, and guaranteed as it is by the names of the most prominently important and respectable of Mr. Crosby's fellow-citizens, we feel no hesitation in predicting for it a thorough and most speedy success.

Relics of a Pigmy Race in Tennessee.—Gen. Milroy (says the Nashville Press), who has been spending much time in Smith County, in attending to some mining and oil operations, says that while at Watertown a few days since, he saw some remarkable graves, which had been disclosed by the washing of a small creek in its passage through a low bottom. The graves were about eighteen inches in length, and were formed by an excavation about fifteen inches beneath the surface, in which were placed four undressed slabs of rock, one in the bottom of the pit, one on each side and one on top. Human skeletons, some with nearly an entire skull, and many with well-defined bones, were found in them. The teeth were very diminutive, but evidently those of an adult. Earthen crocks were found also with skeletons. Gen. Milroy could find nothing respecting these liliputian graves in conversation with the oldest inhabitant of the vicinity except that there were a large number of similar graves, perhaps thousands, near Statesville, in the same county, and also a like burial-ground at the mouth of Stone's River, near this city. They were examined about thirty-two years ago, and excited a good deal of comment. These diminutive human skeletons seem to have belonged to an extinct pigmy race. Gen. Milroy has deposited some of the bones in the State Library.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

Somebody, describing the absurd appearance of a man dancing the polka, says: "He looks as though he had a hole in his pocket, and was trying to shake a shilling down the leg of his trowsers."

People perform the greater part of the voyage of life before taking in their ballast; hence so many shipwrecks.

"No man can do anything against his will," said a metaphysician.

"Faith," said Pat, "I had a brother went to prison against his will; faith, he did."

A partisan paper says: "It is a mistake that the (opposite) party plays upon a harp of a thousand strings. The organ of that party is a lyre."

A man being asked the cause of his father's death, answered that, "While he was addressing a large outdoor assemblage of people, who were listening to his remarks with the deepest interest, a portion of the platform on which he was standing gave way beneath him, whereby he was precipitated several feet with such violence as to break his neck."

Love is as necessary to a woman's heart as a fashionable bonnet to her head. Indeed, we think, rather more so; for nothing less than a large measure of love will content her; whereas the recent fashion has shown that she can be satisfied with a very little bonnet.

What kind of money is everywhere legally tender?—Matri-mony.

Why are the arrows of Cupid like a man in an ague-fit?—Because they are all in a quiver.

"I can't find bread for my family," said a lazy fellow, in company.

"Nor I," replied an industrious miller; "I am obliged to work for it."

The last case of indolence is related in one of our exchanges. It is that of a man named John Hole, who was so lazy that in writing his name, he simply used the letter J, and then punched a hole through the paper.

A man had a sign up—"Cheap ladies' shoes for sale here?" He found that not a woman entered his shop. No wonder; the ladies don't like to be called cheap—they want to be called dear.

Dr. Clarke was a man of genuine piety, but much opposed to the noisy zeal that seeketh "to be known of men." A young divine, who was much given to enthusiastic cant, one day said to him:

"Do you suppose you have any real religion?"

"None to speak of," was the excellent reply.

A Physician, in speaking of the frail constitions of women of the present day, remarked that we ought to take great care of our grandmothers, for we should never get any more.

"Ma," said young Hopeful at the breakfast table, "if a man is Mister, is not a woman Mystery?"

"Can you do all sorts of casting here?" said a solemn-looking chap at the iron works the other day.

"Yes," said Frank, preparing to take his order; "all sorts."

"Well, then," returned the solemn inquirer, "I would like to have you cast a shadow."

He was cast out.

Sleepy or not Sleepy. — "I declare, mother," said a pretty little girl, in a pettish little way, "'tis too bad, mother! You always send me to bed when I am not sleepy, and you always make me get up when I am sleepy."

The Uncertain Quantity. — "I always think," said a reverend guest, "that a certain quantity of wine does a man no harm after a good dinner."

"Oh, no, sir," replied his host, "it is the uncertain quantity that does the mischief."

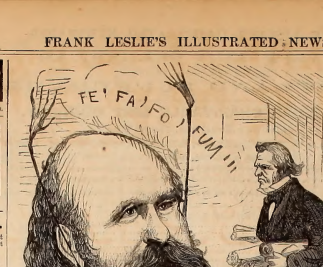
For $15, Three Shares or Certificates, with the fine allegorical Engraving on Steel, "MERCY'S DREAM," by D. HUNTINGTON. For $20, Four Shares or Certificates, with the splendid Chromo-Engraving (issued exclusively by the Crosby Art Association), "AN AMERICAN AUTUMN," by J. F. CROPSEY. While for $30, Ten Shares or Certificates are issued, with a CHOICE LARGE PROOF of either "Irving and His Friends," "Mercy's Dream," or the "American Autumn."

N.B.—Each of these Artist's Proofs having been retouched and signed by the artist, as well as being limited in number, are both rare and desirable.

From this it may be seen that purchasers of Certificates receive at once the value of their money in the Engravings, while they also secure a share in the award of premiums.



The Subscription Books will close on SATURDAY, the 22d of September, 1866, and on the 1st of October following the award of premiums will be publicly made at the Opera House, under the sole direction of a Committee representing the shareholders of all sections of the country, and in a manner to insure entire satisfaction to all interested.

The premiums will be ready for delivery immediately, and the person to whom the FIRST PREMIUM is awarded will receive a CONVEYANCE IN FEE OF AN UNINCUMBERED TITLE OF THE CROSBY OPERA HOUSE. All messages relative to the title will be furnished on application to the real estate office of Messrs. REED & ALLEN.

NOTICE.—In creating Certificates, please name Engraving desired. Send Drafts, Post Office Money Orders, or Greenbacks, with address of Town, County and State carefully written, as every Certificate is fully registered.

All orders for Certificates and communications should be addressed to O. H. CROSBY, Actuary, A. A., and directed to either 625 Broadway, New York, or to Crosby's Opera House, Chicago, Ill.

Modification of our Neutrality Laws.

Report of Gen. Banks.

GEN. BANKS, from the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, has presented an elaborate report on our neutrality laws, ending with a recommendation for their revision. The report goes into a history of their enactment, showing that they were, to a great extent, imposed on us by other nations, at a time when our weakness did not permit us to disregard outside pressure, and when our fathers were cautious almost to cowardice, and prudent almost to pusillanimity. Our first neutrality act of 1794 was forced on us by England, and made more restrictive in 1797 by the same influence, against the popular sentiment, which would have found expression in an overthrow of the Administration under whose auspices it was passed, had not the intemperance of Genet provoked a reaction against France, and induced the people to acquiesce in the policy of the Government.

In the contest between Spain and her colonies, it was found that the neutrality enactments, which had proved satisfactory to England, were not sufficiently stringent to meet the demands of Spain; and on her requisitions, persistently, and, in some cases, offensively urged, the Government consented to further modifications of the laws of neutrality. Congress, however, refused to go to the extent required by the Administration, as we had occasion to show in our issue of July 28th, but, nevertheless, revised the then existing laws and enacted those now in force, and which it is proposed to modify, to meet our altered circumstances, and more particularly to conform with those of other nations.

As the laws stand, they are exceptionally severe. No other nation has neutrality laws nearly as stringent; and as all laws of this character ought to be reciprocal, ours should be changed to meet the mean of general foreign legislation on the subject. We are not called on to bind ourselves with fetters, when the hands of others are loosely held with wisps of straw. If we had any lofty, chivalric notions of setting an example of abnegation and magnanimity in this matter, the experience of foreign, and especially British, neutrality during the late war, ought to have cured us of them. To set metes and bounds around ourselves, which other nations refuse to accept as rules of conduct, is to invite insult and injury. International law is the growth of reciprocal action, and as all obligations of neutrality are in their nature international, the municipal laws regarding them should not go beyond the general consent and practice of nations. The sublime injunction, "Do unto others as thou wouldst have others do unto thee," implies that the consciences of others are open to the appeals of kindness, and to an appreciation of good actions, impelling to reciprocity. But nations, like Great Britain, have no consciences, and little, if any, moral sense. To present to them a high and worthy example would be an idle exertion.

"Return good for evil" is an excellent injunction, in the loftiest spirit of Christianity, and there are people possibly that might be induced to "turn the other cheek," until by unhappy experience they found it smitten. Then, we suspect, any further experiments of the kind would be deferred until humanity had undergone a process of sublimation of which we see no evidence in practice.

We have done unto others, in our advanced neutrality laws, what no others have done unto us. We have returned good for evil, in that we have saved Canada to the British Crown, while our decimated commerce and unsettled demands for reparations of the damages inflicted by the Alabama attest our patience under wrong, and pusillanimity under insult. We have even gone so far as to stretch our exceptionally stringent neutrality laws beyond all just interpretation and precedent in favor of Spain, as in the case of the Meteor.

But, in common phrase, "does it pay?" Is the consciousness of being better than our neighbors in our international conduct an adequate compensation for prohibiting a traffic like that in ships, for instance, which can only be technically wrong—not morally so, but simply because it may be in opposition to laws which nobody else observes, and which we enacted under pressure, when we were young and weak?

The report of Gen. Banks answers in the negative. It recommends that we should fully reciprocate the policy and conduct of other nations, and make our laws conform with the average mass of legislation on the subject of neutrality. But all neutrality laws are, in their nature, concessions in favor of belligerents, whose rights, powers and pretensions, it is for the interests of peace and humanity to have limited, rather than extended. Upon this point the report is dignified and impressive:

"The American statute is not demanded by international or natural law. According to these systems neutrality is impartiality. A State, in virtue of its sovereignty has an inherent and inalienable right to engage in war with whomsoever it wishes, and the neutrality implies, on one part, impartiality on the other, inviolability. The State cannot inflict, and is not bound to suffer, injury. It is a temporary condition, incident to the situation, and not necessarily permanent. An attempt to impose upon a people permanent neutrality, especially if that word is interpreted to mean, as in our legislation, it does, an estrangement, alienation, and isolation of the State from other nations, is opposed to the true principles of public neutrality and law. To make such a system permanent is impracticable. It can be justified only by a regard to the temporary condition of States by which it is enacted. The highest interests of civilization demand that the liberties and rights of neutrals should be extended, and the privileges and powers of States at war diminished. Upon the recognition of this principle depends the progress of nations, the independence of States, the liberties of the people. To restrict the rights of neutrals and enlarge the power of belligerents is to reject the teachings of Christianity and the improvements of civilization, and to return to the doctrine of barbaric nations and practices of barbaric people.

"In reviewing the statutes of 1818, we cannot escape the conclusion that it is founded upon an opposite and unsound philosophy; that it disregards the inalienable rights of the people of all nations; that it was imposed upon the country by considerations affecting exclusively the political interests of other nations; that it criminally restrains the rights of nations at peace for the benefit of those at war; that it was intended to perpetuate the supremacy of the few on the seas, in which supremacy belongs to another age, and is not or use nor to us.

"It was in deference to the conditions then imposed that American Legislators thought it expedient to divest the country of rights enjoyed by others inalienable to the development of the strength of republican institutions and the American States, and to inflict upon the people the irreparable injury of depriving them of privileges necessary to their private prosperity and the preservation of the liberties of their race. It is inscribed that Ireland have been decapitated and torn permanently to suppress as crimes, on the part of our Citizens, intercourse with nations not punished as crimes elsewhere, for the benefit of nations inimical, if not hostile, to us, and opposed States struggling for independence and liberty, in emulation of our own example.

"No, these concessions to the peace of the world were made for the time for which they were enacted. It was an opportune and patriotic policy. The preservation of that republic was the first duty of our fathers, as it is now ours. It is destined, if sustained, to be the model of ruling nations, the light divine of liberty, the friendship of ruling nations, the last hope of the independence of struggling people of the earth.

"To the wise counsels of the people of our fathers we address. But if the time has come for which they waited and work, or whenever it shall come, in which the right of the country can be asserted, the interests protected without departure from the established policy of our Government, which we endorse without hesitation, nor to which any others without reserve, but in the conviction that the opportunity should not be lost. And we therefore recommend, as incident to the duty and the day, a thorough revision of the statutes affecting the rights of neutrals and citizens under Government, and the enactment of such laws as will limit its prohibitions and restrictions to those imposed by the laws of nations, the stipulations of treaties, the reciprocal legislation of other Governments, the freedom of commerce, the rights of peace or States, the interests of civilization, which have grown to be regarded at war, and strengthen and extend the rights of those at peace."

As regards the pretense that the repeal be modification would be a neutrality law might be interpreted as an abandonment of our reclamations on Great Britain, the report says:

"It may be said that this modification of our statutes of hostility will invite Great Britain to claim damages under upon her for the destruction of our merchant vessels during the late civil war. There is no ground for this apprehension. The modification proposed affects only our future action, and can have no effect upon claims with existing rights. The discharge of our duty as a neutral Great Britain from responsibility to the Government, cannot, under any pretense existing, constitute a claim in favor of American ships destroyed by British vessels, in violation of our laws as well as our treaties with the Foreign Settlement Act of 1819, enacted, we believe, upon the suggestion of Mr. Rush. Our only point is touched upon the fact that, hence on drop of blood was shed in the unnecessary upon land, or the engagement except the affair of Fort Sumter, when not an effective force was landed or landed upon the sea, and recognized the rebels as belligerents upon the sea, and which, according to the rights from their ports, and depots upon and destroy our consuerors, and appropriated to herself for the purpose of the vast spoliations.

"We complain that, while our Government conferred the status of 1793 and 1797 upon the insurgents of Great Britain, our enemy, against the French, our friends, and in 1818 recognized the new laws at the solicitation of Spain, backed against the South American Republics, their application of the Foreign Enlistment law of 1819, which was enforced in our favor, but, in spite of its provisions, British ships, in defiance of such arrangements and British decrees, were allowed to depart from and refit at British ports in every part of the world, and, the American merchant flag disappeared from the seas. It cannot be expected that we shall again maintain a policy that will destroys cherished American interests, operates only in favor of enemies and against friends. Great Britain cannot absolve herself from her obligations upon the present false and unfounded pretenses such unequal and unprofitable relations with her Government.

"The modification we specially have is recommended in the spirit of peace, and with no desire to disturb existing friendly relations with other nations. We prefer to approach the subject without delay. To the narrowest clear ground on which the conflict may be avoided. We have no interest in the aspect of the question. They look now, as heretofore, to universal industry for prosperity and power. We have no advantages, territorial or otherwise, incident to the possession of mere position and force, that will compel us to look for the real basis of industrial spirit which is the stimulant of national activity and the source of every thing material to the happiness and the welfare of the human subsistence. There is no outward advantage that will not add to us in the time. Our commerce may be impaired, but the nation never. Violence, imperial, monarchical, may destroy the foundations of present and prospective advantage. We need desire to avoid the perils that have been lead to the present discontent and modern—the policy which substitutes might for right, and wrests to power men who are intelligent, if not hostile, to the interests of masses of men.

"But, while we prefer peace to war, and find our advantage in maintaining peace as against war, it is no longer from necessity. If we are compelled to choose between the sacrifice of our rights and an appeal to the arbitrament of war, there can be no doubt about the decision. We can no longer stand bail for the peace of the world. We have made proof for other nations long enough. When the maintenance of national honor is identified in the affections of people essential to the independence of states and the progress of civilization, we cannot fail to be more marked out for us by duty and destiny."

Altogether the report of Gen. Banks is able and exhaustive, broad in principle, and practical in recommendation. It may be read with equal profit and satisfaction by every American.

Prussia.

In the interests of humanity and of civilization, it is a gratification to know that North Germany is become—has become—a great and united Power. It is immaterial whether it be called Prussia, or by any other name. We know that the instincts of Prussia have always been in the right direction, however thwarted by bad rulers. We know it is a country where education is better diffused than in any country our own. Its people, as a whole, are better fed and better clothed than those of any other European country. Science, art, and literature have been grandly developed within its borders. Its men of learning—a Humboldt, a Ritter, a Lepsius, and a thousand others, before whose unassuming learning and research the pretensions of French and Austrian students have paled into insignificance. Weak rulers and wicked ones it has had, and may have again; but, in spite of them, Prussia has always been great, and sometimes grand. She will now be greater and grander, and all right-thinking men will be rejoiced in her development.

Her augmented prominence in Europe will be the best guarantee for peace, if only as a check to intermeddling, conceited Powers.

As regards France: Concede that Bismarck is all his enemies assert; that he is selfish, unscrupulous, and with malignant, ulterior designs. It is enough for us to know that he has created a great nation. Napoleon, however, will throw its weight into the scale of human improvement. It is immaterial whether the party Napoleon, who has just overthrown, become dancing-masters or die. One thing is certain—the "King" of Hanover will point a cannon on his stilettos no more, or the "King" of Saxony will not dance a jig to the tune of Cassel take their wives, or the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg order them the stick, or Nassau, Darmstadt, or Baden, or Hesse-Cassel, or Oldenburg threaten them with Russia, or Wallack seize them for an army without a name, a use, or a career. Prussia has swept them away, and with them a race more worthless than a halter that they may have free breath—doubtless to exalt Hohenzollerns, but still that halter is swept away. Prussia has, in her parliament, eight millions of thoughtful and energetic men, so lacrated that their knowledge is a proverb, yet so martial that they at this moment are in the field. It is not impossible that English bourgeoisie pronounce them vulgar, yet so reverential that English writers incline to call them slavish, commence a free national life. We say free, for it will be found. If it was difficult to keep down the love for constitutionalism among Prussians, when their King was struggling to overthrow it, how much more shall a Russian wife, what will it be when all that is liberal in Hanover, and Saxony, and the Hesse-Cassel, and the Duchies, and Nassau, and the Free Cities, and Thuringia, be added to the opposition, while all that is conservative is disaffected, when liberals are as anxious as the King that the laws shall be kept, and the time when the "influences" round that King are liberal instead of Russian? The Germans have won their unity in spite of thirty Kings: they will win their freedom in spite of one King's Minister, though he has eaten the thirty Kings up.

The New Neutrality Law.

We have elsewhere given a summary of the able Report of Gen. Banks, as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, on the matter of the repeal or modification of the Neutrality Laws. This report was accompanied by a bill repealing the existing laws, and enacting others, in conformity with the conclusions of the report, which, after a little discussion, passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote!

There was no direct opposition to the bill, but Mr. Raymond, of New-York, characterized himself by endeavoring to postpone action and refer the matter to a joint committee to report at the present session—in short, by the usual devices which men resort to when they kill off a measure which it is not prudent openly to oppose. In his remarks, Mr. Raymond made a betrayal which, in announcing assertion that he "knew of no exigency that required any change in the neutrality laws," and that in the face of the decision of an authorized tribunal (as the city which goes far beyond the letter and scope of even the existing offensive laws, in the case of the Alabama. There is a vessel in construction, not carrying a single pound of contraband of war (which she had a right to carry), and cleared regularly for a neutral port. On complaint of the British Minister to the Secretary of State, she is seized, brought into court, and under pretense that she is or may be designed for Chilian service, is held in heavy bonds, and her case kept pending for six months, while a somnolent judge cogitates, and is then condemned by a decree which gives no reasons for its sentence, but which reasons are presumed us at some time when the infirmities of age shall permit the dispenser of the laws to illuminate the world with a flicker of his expiring legal taper!

Here is a flagrant case of wrong to an enterprising American firm, and a case of wrong also (although not to the same extent as that for Chile), to a friendly power, which justly commands our sympathies, and which is struggling to maintain interests and principles which are equally ours. A decision is reached, rightly or wrongly, under the laws sought to be repealed, which amounts to precisely this: "that our ship-builders cannot sell an unarmed vessel to any friendly power, or to anybody who may have the intent to sell her to such power, even when she is in the jurisdiction of the United States!" This monstrous doctrine, enunciated under color of existing laws, would inflict a severe blow on a large and useful branch of American enterprise and industry, in the interest of our enemies and the enemies of human progress.

Mr. Raymond, it would seem, never heard of this decision, albeit reported in the columns of his own paper, or he would not tell the world that, failing to defeat or postpone the bill, Mr. Raymond "dodged the vote." Such a betrayal of trust by a public Congressional carpet between the worthy representative's seat and the door!

The remarks of Gen. Banks to another member who advocated postponement, and a "reference to the best legal talent of the country," was apt and to the point:

"Sir, we have recourse to the best legal talent for the surrendering of our rights. What we want now is the best talent for maintaining them. I would rather go to the hearts of the people than to the lawyers of professional, political, or commercial corporations."

The bill reported by Gen. Banks, and adopted unanimously by the House, re-enacts the former provisions against organizing armed expeditions, fitting men, and fitting out, arming and manning ships to operate against friendly nations; but Sec. 10 is as follows:

"SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit citizens of the United States from selling vessels, ships, or steamers built within the jurisdiction of the United States, or munitions of war, the growth or product of the same, to inhabitants of other countries, the Governments and war with the United States, provided that the operation of the section of this act shall not extend to any citizen of the United States with respect to any citizen of countries thereof, or to any vessel which she is engaged in war, or otherwise the maintenance of friendly relations with any foreign nation may, in his judgment require it."

Sanguinary Battles.

"The great battle of Custozza," between the Austrians and Italians, in which the appearances were two hundred thousand men were engaged, was a very insignificant affair, judging from the losses of the victorious party, of which we have now the official statement. The total Italian loss was 651 killed, 2,909 wounded, and 2,054 prisoners—5,614 in all. This does not indicate any severe fighting. The "terrible fighting" at Sadowa will probably be found to have been much less severe than has been indicated from the thoroughly descriptive letters of the newspaper correspondence. Neither battle shows anything like the vigor, determination, and deadly fierceness which characterized most of the conflicts of our great civil war. The affair like that of Custozza, during the later years of the war would have been regarded as a mere skirmish.

Since the above was put in type, we have received the "estimated losses" of the Austrians and Prussians in the "terrible battle" of Sadowa. These losses, "it will be remembered, are always in excess of official returns, and these put the Austrian loss in killed and wounded at 30,000, and the killed alone of the Prussians at 5,000. There were not less than four hundred thousand men engaged. In some of our great battles the average losses on both sides ranged from four to five, while in the "sanguinary struggle of Sadowa, which is second only to Waterloo," we find the losses only about one in thirty.

The figures given by the combatants are any indication of courage, tenacity, or skill in fighting, Europe has still another lesson to learn from America.

THE true scope and power and real utility of wood engraving have rarely been understood by the professors of the art, who have too often chosen rather to imitate or reproduce the effects of other kinds of engraving than to bring out the special and admirable capacities of engraving on wood. This principle is vigorously reproduced by the London Athenæum, in a criticism on a book, "Descriptive Catalogue of the Works of Thomas and John Bewick." Speaking of the reprints of some of the cuts;

"Nothing could have been more delightful than, for example, the mountain view taken from the poems of Goldsmith, or the delicate touches of the drawing, so very different in feeling and style from the laborious but unsuccessful attempts of which our recent engravers of light and draughtsmen have aimed, not to cultivate the peculiar beauties of their own art and its natural effects, but to imitate—when success is as little to be desired as it is possible—the qualities of engraving on steel and other copper-plate engraving. In all the works of Bewick and his pupils, and in the best cuts of Linton for Jones's Owen, the amount of thought and knowledge that could be expressed was only limited by the skill in the production of "line-lining" and stripping, such as are employed by John Bewick. Nothing, too, enormous sums are wasted on such blocks as the 'Illustrated New Testament' of two years since, where the critical appeared capable enough to spite bares on the box, but had neglected to provide the gifts of drawing, with even knowledge accuracy, much less to obtain sufficient power of effect with the stylus of wood to compensate for engraving form. The boldness of the Bewick manner, on the other hand, is the result of great vessels of audacity, and less of contempt for nature, but of a conscious power of expressing much with little labor, and of leaving to the skill of those—the result or knight her deeper than the eye can see. The cuts of Bewick are all of low real form, yet who may find cause to dissatisfy in the difference between the two styles that referred to, for example, the little cut of 'Brain,' done for a private book-plate, and reprinted here; which in two inches and three-quarters wide by two inches in extreme height. It represents a piece of wrecked Gothic architecture, with college gown-ing about it. Not only have we here the most happy effect of chiaroscuro, in which was no small part of the interest of Bewick's work, but with which no doubt to be only as a Venetian painter would have done, but the most extraordinary management of the engraving line; however, are produced with such solid and firm lines, that thousands of good impressions might be taken from the block without any appeal for its wear to the extreme tenuity of its workmanship. So wonderful an amount of modulate and character has this little design, which, however, is only one among many thousands, that like foliage of the rare, distinguish ideas that of the ground-cast—the chestnuts which pour through the vista of the central rock—the feathery palms and the wide-trodden herbage in the front—leaf and stalk, bud and flower, are all seen. The sun, also, is the perfect picture of the landscape, in some places greatly weathered—see the broken tower where the wind has been driving in others less so—near the bases of the pillars of the crossing the broken arches of the wall which are built with pebbles—are on the left by the side of the pointed arch—the ivy and the grass, and the mossy and ragis which have not been harshly and swiftly distinguished. Yet, we say, the whole is but a line in the whole which a wood engraver of the modern craft could not split in three."

THE Queen of England has lately committed some slim of omission and commission in British eyes. Among the latter is the marrying off of the Princess Helena to "Prince Christian de Augustenburg"—an adventurer of purest ray, besides being a near relative of Darmouth, Gotha, German principlings (now, happily, about being "wiped out") have polygamous tendencies, as everybody knows. Such a marriage is unlikely to turn the ordinary and regular way, and filling up the world with a worthless, but, nevertheless, legitimate spawn, they must needs go into such a "mésalliance" marriages (i. e. marriages "over the left") and start a new suffering world a bastard brood besides. Among these principalities of fecund tendencies is the husband of the Princess Helena. He is not only married, but married already and has a family (including a girl without a leg, and also as his wife), but is a bastard himself, his mother having fixed on him a hundred wife-insistence of his father. This is the first time bigamy has been winked at by the present Royal Family of England, and public opinion is greatly outraged at it. The Queen is pronounced mad, and the hope of an abdication audibly expressed.

A FAR more startling proposition than that of laying a telegraphic wire from Europe to America is the proposal to run a submarine tube tunnel from England to France. This has been talked of for years, but has hardly been regarded seriously until the present period. Plans are being made near Dover, Calais, and Boulogne; in which the peculiar geological nature of the strata which would have to be pierced, will render not only to tunnel from both ends, but to sink shafts in the intermediate chalk, in order to get up the excavated materials. Should the tunnel ever be completed, it will furnish an unbroken line of rail from London to Paris. The actual work seems less difficult as it might appear at first sight. The chalk and soft limestone rocks which constitute the strata of the Straits, dip far down on either face of the waters, and extend into the interior of France. The character of these rocks will form the unexpended material for the entire formation of the tunnel, whilst it is imagined that they will be impervious to water and resisting to oppose an effectual barrier to the encroachments of the sea.

THE London Saturday Review, speaking of the result of the recent battles in Bohemia, observes:

"The Austrians have been beaten in the Bohemian mountains, but they were not as brave as the Prussians or as well disciplined. Their artillery was inferior, and their guns which enabled the Prussians to fire six or seven times in a minute. Their cavalry was not well mounted, just as the bravest savages with bows and arrows are overmatched by the weakest soldiers who have the use of gunpowder. In 1859 they could make no head against the French, who had not the needle cannon invented since then. Be grass without their old-fashioned guns before able to fire a second time. Their men are followed in front of an enemy that loads his musket in a new fashion at the breech. That the Prussians have overcome them through the superiority of their weapon, and from seeing the fact that the Austrians, who are by no means capricious their infantry, when charged by Austrian cavalry, are able to form in square, and to receive the calmly shot down the helpless riders as they came on, and when they were broken, to rally the stickers before the intended onset could be made."

A "SOUTHERN NOVEL" has been published in London—"The Heroine of the Confederacy," the heroine being Miss Jeff Davis, of Orleans, and the following passage will show the lofty style in which the heroines of the Confederacy conversed during the progress of the war. Jeff ruled in Richmond, The heroine, in response to some political news, inquires:

"Why think you so? Is there ought in the elements which betrodes a storm? Is the political heaven in a murky state? Is the political horizon of our country forge the thunderbolts of battle?"

She is also strong in ethnology. As to "nigger":

"By ancient as well as modern writers we are told of their jet skin, morely and physically. They worship naught save negroids, and, if we ask how deities were made by men of science, they are, in themselves, only a higher order of negroes."

THE commotions in Europe have extended, as a serious manner, to Spain. On the 28th of June a regiment of artillery, aided by some cavalry, in all 2,000 men, left the barrack of St. Gil, killed their colonels, a major, and some of the staff, and marched, amid the sympathy of the people, on the Plaza Mayor. Marshal Serrano, however, met them at the head of a strong force, killed 200, shot 170 for mutiny, cleared the streets at a loss of about 1,000 lives, and threw the remaining soldiers into prison. "Order reigns in Madrid," but it appears certain that the movement was planned by a Progressist party, and it had ramifications in the provinces—one regiment breaking out at Ocaña, and then retreating into France—and that the dissatisfaction in the army spreads very far. For the present, however, the Marshal is master of the situation, and is asking the Cortes for nearly dictatorial power, which he will probably obtain.

LORD STANLEY, who takes the post of Foreign Secretary in the new English Cabinet, is a young man of forty-seven years. He has been regarded as a Liberal-Conservative, and it was, at one time, thought he would thoroughly identify himself with the Liberal party. He is not a man of strong opinions or prejudices, and it is believed his administration of the foreign affairs of the country will be even and judicious, and free from that meddlesome, hectoring spirit which characterized it under the inspirations of Lord Palmerston. A London newspaper says of him and his probable temper toward the United States:

"No other member of the new Cabinet would have been equally acceptable, as Foreign Minister, to the Government of Washington. Notwithstanding his birth and his political associations, no Englishman or American would suspect Lord Stanley of a theoretical objection to republics. If he distrusts democracy, his objections are, probably, founded on a doubt whether universal suffrage conduces to frugal expenditure or to habitual preference of peace. During the civil war he carefully abstained from any expression of preference, although he judiciously anticipated the success of the stronger combatant. There is, perhaps, something American in his habit of thought and in the structure of his mind, although the likeness must be traced in the republic of Franklin rather than in the democratic empire of more recent times. Without attempting to vie with Mr. Seward in the voluminous display of controversial rhetoric, Lord Stanley will, probably, have little temptation to offend against American sensitiveness. Politicians in the States are not ignorant that, until a late period, Lord Stanley was a favorite of Mr. Bright's, who justly appreciated his perfect exemption from ordinary aristocratic prejudices. The cultivation of a good understanding with the United States is so important an object, that the relations of the Foreign Secretary with the Government of Washington are, in some degree, a test of his fitness for his office."

TOWN GOSSIP.

The sirocco that swept over our city for nearly a week, stifling the very fountains of life, and, like some dread avenger, striking down its victims on every side, has been followed by gentle breezes and such a desirable fall of the mercury as has restored our equanimity, and relieved us of the fear of being broiled alive and served up as dainty fare to some invisible cannibals who seemed to be controlling the powers of the air and sporting with us unhappy mortals in anticipation of their dainty meal. Of course the city is deserted; for who would remain in such a fiery caldron when it was possible to get away?—i. e. the fashionable, the people of leisure and wealth have made their annual hegira. The streets present a less gorgeous array of beauty and style, and on every side there are the tokens of a cessation in many of the activities of the metropolis. But let no one suppose that we are about to follow the example of the traditional hero of colonial times, and indulge a long period of quiet unconsciousness. We can't afford such a luxury in these stirring days, and few of us can obtain any respite in our toil, any relief in the unceasing struggle of life; and, while some favored ones may pursue their pleasures at the noted summer resorts, the great mass of our population are compelled to remain at home, and meet discomfort, heat, disease and pestilence, as they can. Perhaps there is no more suggestive or interesting study than the proceedings of our Common Council, who, certainly, are not afflicted with that frequent legislative malady—how not to do it. They are, emphatically, men of action, and many tax-payers are inconsiderate enough to hint that they are entirely too industrious, and even to complain, that so much is undertaken and accomplished. Then, too, our Councilmen are liberal; money is of no account in their estimation, except to be spent, so they are resolved to do all in their power toward accomplishing this very obvious and laudable purpose. The fact that the funds they disburse so freely are not their own, rather increases their satisfaction in the process, just as condiments add to the enjoyment of a good dinner. Nor are they unwilling that their liberality should have frequent and abundant illustration. Some one, the other day, was the owner of rooms that could be occupied conveniently for the sessions of one of our courts. The annual rental of these rooms should not have been more than three or four thousand dollars, but the Council, in the exercise of that comprehensive generosity for which they are notorious, secured the lease of these rooms, for ten years, at the annual outlay of twenty-one thousand dollars. Assuredly, Councilmen are not ungrateful to their favorites, however constituent tax-payers may view their conduct. Another person manufactures a patent gas-burner which costs about a dime. To encourage home-productions and industry, the Council made a contract with this party to supply 25,000 of the street lamps with his burners, at the trifling sum of a dollar each. So the money goes; but money is made to be spent, and why should the authorities of a great city like New York be niggardly and mean in their disbursements? Why, when they have the opportunity, should they not prove themselves examples of that public spirited enterprise that does not count cost too closely, or stand abashed at mere trifles?

Let it not be hinted that these officials derive any personal advantage from such operations, and though many of them grow rich with unaccountable rapidity, it would be a grave reflection on their integrity to suppose that they have their price, and shape their legislation in accordance with the amount of gratuities offered them. How far their conduct may confirm the serious doubts many over-cautious people entertain of the capacity of the city to govern itself, and how rapidly it may precipitate the interference of the State Legislature with all our municipal affairs, time must determine. As already intimated, the subject presents an interesting study, and is richly suggestive.

The bibulous propensity and capacity of our citizens are astonishing; and it would seem as if the chief end of man here is to drink. To say nothing of the thousands of bar-rooms and gardens that are continually thronged, one watching the soda-fountains, found at almost every corner, and the eager crowds that surround them, would inevitably conclude that the present is a thirsty generation.

The chief political topic at the present time is the approaching Philadelphia Convention, about which the daily papers are in a great muddle. If the proceedings of that assembly are not more lucid and direct than the vaticinations of the aforesaid papers, the country will be the gainer should it be postponed indefinitely.

Notwithstanding heated terms and burning suns, out-door sports are prosecuted with unflagging avidity, and continually growing in favor. Base-ball matches occur daily, affording interest and recreation to thousands who can spare a few hours for such diversion, and cultivating a love for healthful, manly exercise, that will be productive of the best results.

Yachting, rowing, etc., receive a proper share of attention.

Some of the theatres are closed, making preparations for the fall and winter; those that are open confine themselves to such light presentations as are suited to the season.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

In a large city there are always many influences unfavorable to the general health, and productive of a high rate of mortality. The miscellaneous character of the population; the crowding of large numbers into confined tenement houses and ill-ventilated apartments; the ignorance and disregard of the most obvious laws of health; the vicious habits and gross untidiness of many classes of people—all combine to invite and foster disease and shorten the ordinary period of life. That sanitary science can do much to mitigate and avoid the evils arising from such causes is clearly established by indubitable facts, and it has been fully demonstrated that a city may be made comparatively as healthy as the rural districts. If it is not so, the reason must be found in some extraneous and controllable cause, rather than an inevitable necessity; and the question very naturally arises, how far may the authorities properly interfere with the social habits and daily pursuits of the people, to conserve the public health, without an unjust and officious invasion upon individual rights and private convenience? It is obviously the duty of society to protect itself and the interests of all its members in the aggregate, and the admission of this plain principle would seemingly justify the adoption of any measures by which that end could be gained, and allow a very wide latitude in the answer to the inquiry proposed.

Recognizing these facts, and fearing the approach of cholera, which had fearfully ravaged several European towns, the last Legislature organized a Board of Health for this city, composed of gentlemen of the highest standing and competency, to whom the whole sanitary control of the city should be intrusted. Acting in conjunction and harmony with the police, and clothed with a most arbitrary power, this Board commenced operations vigorously, and gave promise of great efficiency.

Many unsuspected seeds of disease were discovered and destroyed, many odious nuisances were abated, and the conviction became very general that, should the pestilence come, it would find but little pabulum, and be shorn of its terrors and power. One would suppose that common philanthropy would bid God-speed to such an organization, and in every possible way facilitate its operations; and yet we blush to state, that, so far from this being the case, the Board has been arrested in its good work and seriously restricted in the exercise of its prerogatives. It became necessary to jostle certain private interests that were prejudicial to the general good; these interests clamored for non-interference, and facile judges were readily found to throw around them the shield of an injunction, and restrain the Board in their laudable and successful efforts. Doubtless much has been done, and much is still done, to carry out the objects for which the Commission was established, but there remains this serious consideration: that when great exigencies arise, there is neither power nor opportunity to meet them. The reports of last week show a mortality in this city alone of nearly fourteen hundred, and in Brooklyn, of about five hundred, a death-rate of about one in seventy of our population. And this in the absence of any epidemic. Such a mortality continued for a few weeks would decimate us. Suppose a ship should arrive in our harbor with cholera raging among its passengers, what can the Board do? Simply nothing, but let the disease spend its force among the doomed company, who would not be allowed to land, and who could not escape the dreaded pestilence. We venture to say that such inhumanity would not disgrace the barbarians of Dahomey, and yet through looseness of our present system of judicial appointments, just such inhumanity has been practiced by the authorities of our enlightened metropolis, who found themselves impotent to avert the burning disgrace. The inference from this state of things is very direct and very damaging.

The Board of Health has not proved unfaithful—has not been a failure—but it has found opposition where it had a right to expect co-operation, and has revealed the thorough rottenness of our elective judiciary system, and the potency of partisan and political considerations over all regard for our character as citizens and our reputation as an enlightened Christian people. So long as we permit our elections to be controlled as they are at present, so long will suffering, disease, and death riot and revel among us, and every public interest be made subservient to individual ambition and private gain; and so long as judges loan themselves as the tools of faction, our present evils will continue and become more odious.

A radical change in the whole administration of our municipal affairs is indispensable, and if we are found incompetent to govern ourselves, we cannot complain if the right of self-government should be taken from us. Our social, moral, economical, and sanitary interests are of far more importance than the elevation of individuals or parties to place and power, and these interests we must not sacrifice. Our city should be the healthiest in the land; it is now the most unhealthy; and though, in spite of this drawback, we increase in numbers and prosperity, yet the public health is a matter of the first importance to every right-minded citizen. We have attempted to show how it is imperiled, and how it may be conserved, and to point out the necessity of such legislation as will not leave us at the mercy of the selfish and the designing.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The first annual fair of the Association of the Tobacco Trade of Cincinnati was held last week. Large quantities of tobacco from Kentucky, Ohio, and Virginia were entered. Thirty prizes of silver-ware, worth from $25 to $200 each were awarded. The first-class premium tobacco, a lot of 570 pounds, sold at $9 05 per pound.

—— A Western reporter wails bitterly over a superabundence of picnics, and, having a headache on the morning of July 5, says: "They are variegated fooleries; they are sultry stupidities; they are elaborate funeral processions, marching, with melancholy step, between rows of pies, and cakes, and ice-cream!"

—— Galveston and Houston, Texas, have increased in population very rapidly since the war. The former city had, before the war, a population of about 5,000; now, according to a recent enumeration, it is nearly 20,000. Houston, a small city of between 5,000 and 6,000 inhabitants, now numbers upward of 16,000.

—— The bronze statue of Washington, removed from the Institute at Lexington, Va., during the war, has been returned, and will be reinaugurated on the 10th of September. Ex-Governor Letcher will deliver an address.

—— The Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago are to open a boarding-house for young girls who have no homes of their own, and have appealed to the Chicago ladies for assistance in furnishing the establishment.

—— The first man in the first class at the Annapolis Naval School is S. N. Kane, of Rhode Island; the first in the second class is B. F. Tilley; and the second in the third class is R. C. Derby, both from little Rhody.

—— A California paper mentions a drove of over 200 turkeys en route for San Francisco which had been over a hundred miles, and averaged ten pounds each, and was contracted for "on foot" at twenty-three cents a pound.

—— A soldier, who lost both hands in the war, was furnished with a hand-organ, and, with his son, a young lad, has traveled a year or two in the vicinity of Boston, with remarkable success, having already accumulated $15,000, the generous contributions of the charitable.

—— The largest mass of copper that ever left the mines of Lake Superior has just reached Cleveland, Ohio. It is from the Cliff mines, and weighs 16,130lbs. It is estimated that it contains at least ninety per cent. of pure copper.

—— The chains and ironwork of the Charlotte and Columbia Railroad bridge, over the Catawba river, South Carolina, are made from the muskets, bayonets, shell, etc., picked up on Virginia battle-fields, and which were stored in the rebel armory in Charlotte when the building was burnt, at the time of the evacuation. The iron was bought by Messrs. Joseph R. Anderson & Co., of the Tredegar Iron Works, as scrap iron, and by them worked up into cables, etc., to fill an order for this bridge.

—— The Florida Times says a general order, issued by Gen. Seymour, commanding at Pensacola, virtually establishes martial law over five counties of the State, in consequence of the civil authorities having failed to prevent crimes from being committed upon the persons of loyal citizens and soldiers.

—— The Boston Public Library contains 123,000 volumes. Its largest contributors are Joshua Bates, of London, who gave $100,000 worth of books, and Theodore Parker, who left 11,000 books, and 3,000 pamphlets. In 1865, nearly 195,000 books were lent, or an average of 703 per day. The greatest number given out in a single day was 1,464. The superintendent reports a constantly improving character in the circulation, and that it is tending strongly to the more substantial and useful class of books.

—— The silver vase which was presented to Daniel Webster by the citizens of Boston in 1835, as "The Defender of the Constitution," has been purchased from his heirs by a band of thirty-nine subscribers, and deposited in the Boston Public Library.

—— A man living at a village near Mobile, a few nights ago attempted to frighten some girls by wrapping a white cloth around his body and personating a ghost. All ran but one, who pulled out a revolver and deliberately fired six barrels into the head and body. At the first shot the ghost fell, but she continued firing. She then went home and related the circumstances, and parties returning to the spot found life extinct, two balls having penetrated the forehead, and the other four the region of the heart. The sympathy of the people favored the girl, and she has not been arrested.

—— The Lafayette (Ia.) Courier says an estimable lady, a witness in court the other day, testified that she was sixteen years of age, had been twice married, and was the mother of two children.

Foreign.—The population of the eight principal cities in the kingdom of Italy, at the beginning of this year is thus stated in a recent official document: Naples, 447,065; Turin, 204,715; Milan, 196,109; Palermo, 194,463; Genoa, 137,986; Florence, 114,363; Bologna, 109,395; Messina, 103,324.

—— The number of matriculations in the academical year at Cambridge University, England, has been 510. This is the largest number on record. In 1864-5 and 1863-4, the numbers were 530 and 519 respectively. A sudden increase took place in 1863; the number in 1862-3 having been 448, which was about the average for the last twenty years. The largest number of admissions, until the last two years, was 487 in 1845 (the time of the Tractarian controversies at Oxford); and the lowest was 382, in 1858.

—— The French savant, M. Dufour, has been making a very curious calculation, with the view of showing that the bulk of our globe undergoes annual increase from the deposit of meteoric dust, amounting, as he states, to two cubic metres a year. According to this hypothesis, the earth increases annually the 114 400,400th part of its weight.

—— The Journal du Havre contains the following extract from the report of Captain Tessa, commander of the French ship Le Coq, just arrived from the coast of Africa: "A large sea serpent pursued me for two days. This creature must have been sixty metres in length. Thanks to a storm, it disappeared, and was not seen again." The report itself is published in full in the same paper, and there can be no doubt as to its genuineness.

—— A dispatch from Rome states that the Pope, after having delivered the hats of the new cardinals in a public consistory, held on the 25th ultimo a secret one, in which was read the report of the eighteen martyrs of Gorcum and of the blessed Frances of the Five Wounds. The document received the approbation of all the cardinals, and the Pope announced that the canonization of the said personages would take place in 1867.

—— The cobblers of Nantes recently struck because the name of their patron saint, Crispin, was not inscribed on the Almanack Nantais. The almanac has been corrected to their satisfaction, and the cobblers are delighted at having stuck to their saint like wax.

—— Professor G. Stevens, of Copenhagen, is engaged on a detailed account of the "Old Northern Runic Inscriptions belonging to the Iron Age of Denmark." His book will be illustrated by fac-similes and alphabets. The number of stone implements alone, preserved in public and private collections in Denmark, has been estimated at 40,000.

—— The Italian Government has given orders for the manufacture of cuirasses of aluminium for their cavalry regiments. A series of experiments, made under various conditions, demonstrate that a cuirass of this metal, while possessing the great advantage of being as light as a coat, cannot be pierced by a musket-ball at the distance of forty paces, nor by the thrust of a bayonet. It has also been ascertained that cuirasses of this description can be manufactured for as low a sum as 25 francs.

—— The London News thus characterizes Lord Carnarvon, just named Colonial Secretary in the new British Cabinet: "His Lordship is one of those meek young noblemen who indulge in a mild flirtation with statistics, and who play at politics as their sisters play at croquet. He has some pretty little "views"—weak and washy water-color sketches of prison discipline, education and other "social subjects." He is fond of giving lectures, which are very much applauded at the time of their delivery, but he is indiscreet enough to publish them afterward, and they are of a kind which is wearisome to the soul of man. Thin tapioca thickened with treacle is probably innocuous, but it is scarcely nourishing. Lord Carnarvon is a sort of patrician pump running with milk and water. He has that kind of amiable insipid garrulity which is sometimes not disagreeable in a pretty girl, but which needs particularly rosy lips and exceedingly bright eyes to give it any charm. He would be invaluable as a male secretary to a Dorcas society; he shines with a soft and moony luster at quarter sessions and at kettle-drums; but in the heat, and crowd, and stress of practical politics, where bearded men are struggling for mastery, we should imagine that his neck-tie is likely to get out of order, and that some heavy, plebeian heels will tread rather roughly on his delicately-varnished boots."

THE MODES OF OBTAINING WATER IN THE FORMER TIMES.

A plentiful supply of good, pure water, is indispensable to health and comfort, and one of the necessary conditions of life. All living creatures need it, and nature, in her bounty, has provided liberally for their wants. Her springs, and fountains, and streams, gush forth on every side; her dews and gentle showers diffuse health and joy, strengthening what is weak and reviving what languishes. And, with a few exceptions, this bounty is wide-spread and universal, making the whole world a pleasant dwelling-place, and inviting man to every region and every clime.

Our artificial modes of life, and our aggregation into towns and cities, sometimes interfere with the generous provisions of nature, and throw us upon our own resources to obtain what the hills and valleys so generously furnish. Such is the case in New York and all our large towns at the present time, which depend for their daily consumption of water almost wholly upon artificial supplies. Such, however, was not the case when the good Knickerbockers of the olden time smoked their pipes, enjoyed their festive gatherings, and indulged their fond visions of successful trade and increasing wealth. Then, Manhattan Island abounded in fine springs and ponds, some of which, from the excellency and purity of their waters, became places of fashionable resort, and had connected with them many tender romances of Colonial life.

In the early days of our history, when the city, compared with its present proportions, was a mere hamlet, there was no difficulty in meeting the wants of the population.

In the times of good Wouter Van Twiller and the worthy Dutch Governors, rural simplicity marked the habits of the people. Young men and maidens mingled together without that regard to conventionalities which now renders intercourse so formal, and many a tender secret was softly whispered in willing ears while the old oaken bucket was performing its faithful service. The old patriarchs first met their wives at the well, drawing water; why should it be deemed strange, if, in later days, around the cooling spring and in the quiet evening shade, Cupid should throw his dart and wound some gentle bosom, all unconscious of the pain? There was a charm in the simple habits of those early days our modern conveniences have completely broken. Many a life intimacy commenced at the well, and the little attentions shown to the gentler sex often resulted in more tender and enduring bonds.

Our double-page illustration shows the ordinary means of supplying this city with water before the construction of the Croton aqueduct. At first the springs and ponds to which allusion has been made, furnished a sufficiency of the cooling fluid for all the wants of the people. Fig. 3 in the picture represents a portion of the city containing the famous Collect Pond, which, during the last century, was noted for the sweetness and purity of its waters. Its location was in what is now Centre and adjacent streets, east of Broadway. It was surrounded with hills, supplied by springs, filled with fish, and for many years constituted the pride and boast of the ancient burghers. As population increased encroachments were made upon it, and becoming the receptacle of filth and offal, it was filled up about the beginning of the present century. Fig. 2 represents a beautiful spring, afterward known as the "Tea Water Pump," situated near the present junction of Chatham and Roosevelt streets, which a hundred years ago was one of the celebrities of New York.

Shortly before the Revolution, this spring and its vicinity was made into a fashionable place of resort, at which to procure beverages adulterated with pure water. A pump was erected over the famous spring, grounds were laid out around it, and the "Tea Water Pump Garden" held forth its attractions under the most seductive influences. But its ancient glories have long since departed, and it is now almost a thing of tradition. Running from this spring was a brook, over which the road crossed, by a bridge of historical interest. At that time the summer amusements consisted in holding turtle feasts at several points along the East River. Several gentlemen and ladies would meet and dine together, drink tea in the afternoon, fish and amuse themselves till evening, and then return home in chaises, a gentleman and lady in each chaise. When crossing this little bridge it was customary for the gentleman to salute his companion, from which circumstance it was called "Kissing Bridge."

Figs. 5, 6, and 7 give a view of the wells and pumps found in various parts of the city, upon which the people depended for their drinking-water, and around which they enjoyed many a good gossip. At first the sweep and windlass were used for drawing the water, affording the young gallants of the time fine opportunities for extending courtesy and assistance to the fair maidens who came for their daily supply of water. And tradition declares that the young people were not slow to avail themselves of such advantages, and that an inordinate quantity of water was found necessary for household purposes. Perhaps the pleasant way of obtaining it had something to do with the consumption.

Fig. 8 gives a view of Knapp's Tea Well, situated at the present intersection of Greenwich and 6th Avenues. This region was open country, but the water of this well was so pure and sweet as to be in great demand for the tea-parties of the time; and as the well-to-do citizens took their daily ride, it was their custom to stop at this well and procure a glass of the refreshing liquid. With the growth of the city the various springs became filled up or worthless; and the wells, especially in the lower part of the town, were by no means palatable. Hence the practice arose of carting spring-water about the streets and selling it at a certain price per pail. For several years this was a thriving business, but "Othello's occupation's gone," and the many gay scenes connected with the former times are now only reminiscences.

As early as 1770 public attention was directed to some feasible method of obtaining an ample supply of good water from a distance. One plan was to erect reservoirs and fill them from the Collect Pond. Another, to lay pipes to some river in Westchester county and obtain a supply there. The occurrence of the Revolution suspended all these plans, and nothing practical was attempted until 1799, when the Manhattan Bank obtained a charter from the Legislature for furnishing the city with good water. They sunk wells and erected reservoirs over them, which were filled by pumping. One of these reservoirs stood in Chambers street, near the present City Hall, and was surmounted by a figure of Neptune and a weather-vane. Another was at the corner of Centre and Reade streets, a representation of which is shown in Fig. 1, together with the Washington Institute, which stood near it. From these reservoirs mains were laid through all the principal streets, to which the houses were connected by pipes, as at present. But neither the quantity nor quality of the water furnished in this manner was suitable to the wants of the city. The infiltrations from the streets rendered the wells exceedingly impure, and the only good water was that supplied by the carts. As the charter obtained by the Manhattan Company was perpetual, its provisions required them to furnish water whenever it should be demanded.

Accordingly, the reservoir in Centre street is still in existence and full of water. The building in which it stands is shown in Fig. 11, surmounted by the old statue of Neptune and the weather-vane, which stood on the Chambers street reservoir. Fig. 12 shows the arched foundation of the reservoir, built of strong mason-work. In Fig. 15 are seen the lower sections, also composed of masonry, together with portions of the machinery used in pumping. The upper portions, Figs. 13 and 14, are made of iron. The structure is some forty feet in diameter, very massive, and well fitted for the use to which it was appropriated. Probably few of our citizens are aware of the existence of this relic and the conditions connected with it, which conditions are not enforced, though the supply of water is continued.

Thus New York was supplied with water until within a little more than twenty years, and, as we recur to those early days and the various scenes connected with them, the simplicity of former habits and the many joyous occasions to which they gave rise, we almost regret that tea-wells, and pumps, and water-carriers, and festive maidens, archly carrying their buckets, are matters of history, and no longer a part of our realization.

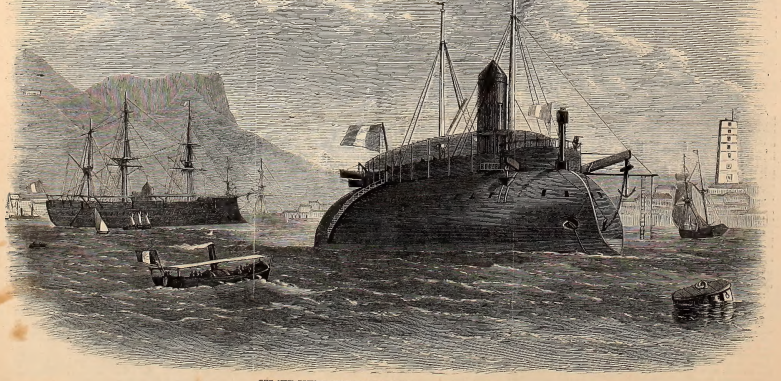
Professor Agassiz has received a large and important collection of the fishes inhabiting the Paraguay region, made by the Emperor of Brazil while carrying on war against that country. In an autograph note to the professor, accompanying the present, the Emperor says: "I have given instructions that the fishes I collected shall be sent to you, for it was with this thought that I collected them. It is a slight homage that I pay to science, and I shall be most happy if, by placing the fishes in your hands, you will make better known the rich nature of my country."

THE 47TH BATTALION OF THE 49TH REGIMENT OF THE LINE, UNDER PRINCE HUMBERT, FORMED IN SQUARE, RESISTING A CHARGE OF AUSTRIAN CAVALRY.

RESISTING A CHARGE OF THE AUSTRIAN CAVALRY.

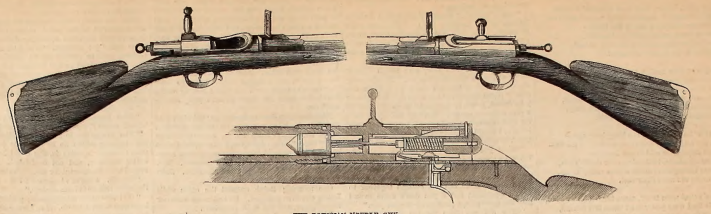
THE scene depicted in our illustration of a cavalry charge, represents one of those acts of bravery which are the result of a kind of inspiration, rather than of scientific training. In the recent battles in Italy, in which the Austrians were victorious, their success was owing to the force of numbers, more than any other cause. The Italians fought like good soldiers, but they were not prepared to maintain their ground against the heavy battalions of their foes, though they distinguished themselves by many acts of daring, of which this resistance to a cavalry charge was a signal one, entitling those who made it to the highest distinction as brave and fearless soldiers. A cause sustained by such men, sooner or later, must prevail; and the days of foreign rule in Italy are already numbered.

THE FRENCH IRON-CLAD RAM TAUREAU.



THE superiority of iron-plated vessels for war purposes over the best wooden ones was fully established in our recent struggle, and their introduction as a means both of offense and defense has become general. Their efficiency depends mainly upon two things, viz., impregnability and power of throwing heavy metal. The monitor principle, adopted in the construction of many of our national ships, so obviously commends itself as efficient and desirable, that it is applied, with some modifications, to the best vessels of other nations.

The engraving on this page gives a view of the Taureau, a new French iron-clad ram, recently completed, and now lying at anchor in the harbor of Toulon.



The Taureau is an odd-looking ship, resembling a whale in the shape of the upper part of its hull, with a swelling convexity above the water. The prow is made of bronze, weighs eleven tuns, and projects forty feet beneath the water. The ship carries but one gun, mounted in the turret at the bow. This turret descends to the keel, and is designed to furnish a stronghold for the crew during an engagement. The sides of the hull are iron-clad only for three feet above the water-line, amidships and abaft, but the bow and turret are protected by armor five inches thick. The vessel has two engines, each of two hundred and fifty horse power, and is one hundred and ninety-seven feet long by about forty-eight feet wide. The Taureau has been constructed in the best manner, and is expected to prove a formidable antagonist; and, acting both as a battery and a ram, possesses a double advantage.

THE EFFECTS OF THE HEAT.

THE ordeal through which we passed a few days ago was a fearful one to those exposed to the direct rays of the sun, and a trying one to every person. People engaged at work and walking the streets were stricken down without a moment's warning, as if by an invisible foe, and carried to their homes or the hospital in a state of insensibility from which many never recovered. The mortality was alarming; and had cholera or any pestilence proved as fatal, we would have felt that we were all standing in the vestibule of death. All, too, were alike exposed, and no place was wholly safe. It might be in the street, it might be in our homes and places of business, that the dread influence overpowered one. Those who survived will never forget the heated term, the burning, stifling, deadly days, through which existence was almost a miracle.

THE PRUSSIAN NEEDLE GUN.

THE PRUSSIAN NEEDLE GUN.

THE Prussian "needle gun," which was used with such disastrous effect in the battle of Sadowa, was originally invented in 1836, although many improvements have since been made in it. The credit of the invention belongs to Mr. Dreyse, the manufacturer of arms at Sömmerda; but in some respects the weapon is similar to and an improvement upon the breach-loading musket of Norway. It is simply a breech-loading rifle, and has a calibre of six-tenths of an inch, with four grooves having a twist of five-sevenths in the length of the barrel. The breadth of these is about a quarter of an inch, and the depth three hundredths of an inch. There is an unrifled chamber for a bed or the cartridge, of a diameter slightly larger than the calibre of the barrel, and enlarging a very little at the rear to admit the cartridge after repeated discharges. Where the chamber unites with the grooves there is a gradual slope, to facilitate the passage of the ball and prevent too sudden a compression. The barrel is screwed into a cylinder, which holds together the mechanism of the piece.

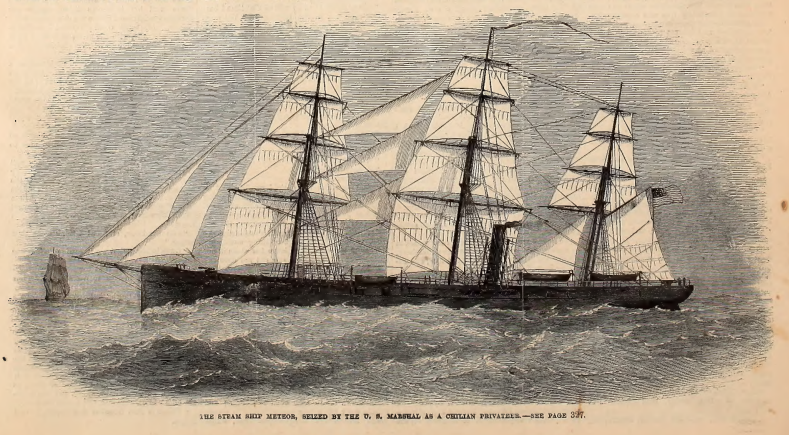
ARCHIBALD M'CLURE BUSH, KNICKERBOCKER B. B. CLUB, ALBANY, N. Y.—SEE PAGE 327.

The cartridge is made of stiff card-board, the ball-powder and explosive composition being contained in the same cylinder. Its great peculiarity is that the detonating powder is placed immediately in rear of base of the ball, and between it and the powder. The advantage of this is, that, when the powder is ignited, that portion next the ball, in which combustion is first perfected, exerts its full force upon the projectile, the powder in rear also exerting its influence, as it becomes almost instantaneously ignited. Under the present system, in which that part of the powder next to the breach of the gun is first ignited, a portion of the powder is frequently expelled from the gun with the ball in a condition of only partial combustion, the explosive force of the powder first consumed being adequate to expel the ball and the powder in its front before the whole charge has time to become entirely ignited.

Thus in the "needle gun" all the powder is consumed and applied to the best effect, and so as to obtain its fullest force at the same instant and in the same direction. The "needle gun" is a breech-loader; and when the trigger is pulled a stout "needle" or wire is thrust through the base of the cartridge, parallel with its axis, into the detonating charge, causing its explosion and the ignition of the cartridge. In accuracy the "needle gun" cannot be surpassed, and its effective range is said to be about 1,500 yards.

The advantages of the arm, besides the great one of celerity of fire, are, the simplicity of the mechanism, which can be taken apart without a screw-driver or other implement; the safety and ease with which it may be cleaned; the convenience of loading in a limited space or on horseback; the certain and uniform filling of the grooves; the reduced charge consequent upon the entire consumption of the powder; and the chance of the ramrod. The chief objection brought against it has been, that, firing so rapidly, the soldier would be apt to forget to aim, and so waste more ammunition than in the old weapons.

BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, CINCINNATI.



THERE seems to be a fatality attending the opera-houses in this country, as, sooner or later, they fall a prey to the devouring element.

On the 12th ult., a fire broke out in the Academy of Music, Cincinnati, and, in a short time, the building was totally destroyed. It was occupied at the time by a band of minstrels, and the audience had just left, when the fire was discovered, thus preventing a fearful loss of life. Whether or not the destruction of so many public buildings is the result of incendiarism, we are not prepared to state; but there are grave suspicions that there is a method in these repeated conflagrations, and that they are not the result of accident.

BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, CINCINNATI, JULY 12.—FROM A PHOT. BY J. W. WINDER.

DANIEL WEBSTER'S CHOWDER.—Four tablespoonfuls of onions, fried with pork; one quart of boiled potatoes, well mashed; one and a half pounds of sea-biscuit; one teaspoon ful of thyme, mixed with one of summer savory; half bottle of mushroom catsup; one bottle of port or claret; half nutmeg, grated; a few cloves, mace and allspice; six pounds of fish, sea bass or cod, cut in slices; twenty-five oysters; a little black pepper, and a few slices of lemon. The whole put in a pot and covered with an inch of water, boiled for an hour and gently stirred.

FADED FLOWERS.

BEAUTIFUL hopes, that have withered to dust,
Bright beams of sunshine that turned into rust,
Dreams that died out in the light—
Silvery tones, sweeping over the past,
Thrilled for the moment to being at last,
Come to me fondly to-night!

Lights of dear smiles, turned to ashes so cold,
Frozen on lips long since crumbled to mold,
Words once forgotten, arise!
Dim with the dust of the years rolled away,
Ringlets of hair, that will never turn gray,
Voices of bright sparkling eyes.

Hearts that I loved in the long, long ago—
Ere the cold world had thus mocked at me so—
Are they ever cold in my breast—
Phantom bands, beckoning over death's sea,
Gleam through the mists of the valley to me,
Luring me unto their rest.

Hearts that were truer, more tender, more kind,
Souls that were purer than these left behind,
Spirits more spotlessly white;
Only a step for the clearing of hands,
Only a few of these fast flowing sands
Are there between us to-night!

Only a step for the lost to appear,
Nearer to us than they ever were here;
Waiting, I stand by the gate—
Only a few of these poor earthly days,
While life's wreck runs in a thin golden haze,
Only a few—I can wait!

Dr. Ralph's Awakening.

DR. RALPH GIBSON sat in his office up town, examining, with the most careful attention, a new pictorial publication just imported from Paris. Two years of his life had he passed there in most profound and laborious study. The student forbidden of the keen monde seldom enticed him from his books or lectures; and hospital life, with its varied forms of disease, from infancy to old age; the post-mortem room, with its delicate Parisian apparatus for the nice examination of proper defunct anatomy; an occasional visit to Mabille; these were his only haunts and dances the way the hours with flying feet, engrossed all his time. Everything was reviewed from a professional standpoint, and the result was a much more intimate and scientific medical knowledge than young M.D.'s are apt to possess. So it was with a guess that he devoured this new work, and not with a very good grace that he said "Come in!" to a gentle knock on his office door.

"Mrs. Gibson sent me to tell you, sir, that the dinner-bell has already rung twice; and as they have company, she would be very thankful if you would come immediately."

"Who are our guests, Miss Randall?"

"I really don't know, sir; I have seen only one, and that is your sister Julia's friend, Mrs. Goodhue."

"Tell mother I'll be there in a minute," and he tossed his book on to the table petulantly, and followed his governess to the dining-room.

She had just reached the door, and was on the point of entering, when, seeing the doctor so near, she turned away, and slowly ascended the stairs.

"Don't you dine with us to-day, Miss Randall?"

"I take dinner with the children, sir."

Dr. Gibson hadn't much time to reflect just then, but the thought passed through his mind that there was tones in the young lady's voice and a quivering of the lip, notwithstanding the quiet, reserved manner with which she replied to his questions.

"My son, the doctor—Mrs. Cantrell, Mr. Cantrell, Miss Morrie, Mrs. Goodhue, whom you have met before," introducing him with evident pride.

He acknowledged their salutations gracefully, for, abstracted and devoted to his profession as he was, there was nothing of the boor about him, though his lady mother considered him shockingly indifferent in social conversation.

"We have been waiting for you some little time, Ralph. Didn't you hear the bell?"

"Upon my honor, mother, I never heard a sound. And now let's proceed to business."

He performed his part of the carving operation with a skill and dexterity which caused the funny little Mr. Can'rell to exclaim:

"Dead to that sort of business, sir? No one but a professional could take apart an animal so scientifically as that!"

"Oh, hear you, uncle?" exclaimed Miss Morrie, in disgust.

Dr. Ralph laughed good-naturedly, and replied:

"Yes, sir; it doesn't take a physician long to find the joints."

"Oh, Ralph, why will you"—exclaimed Julia—"forever put in a mind of something so horrible; you have taken my appetite quite away."

"A little fast will probably be beneficial, Jul."

Ralph bestowed the young, fascinating widow, Mrs. Goodhue, was assigned his sister Julia's place by his side, and wondered at the arrangement, and a little glimpse of the truth caused a quaint, comical smile to play round the corners of his mouth. He treated his right-hand neighbor very politely, but with no show of deference, and withdrew himself to his office, under pleas of a professional engagement, immediately after dinner. He lighted his cigar, and the fumes of the fragrant havana seemed about chasing away in a cloud of smoke any little shade of annoyance or irritation, when, lo! another knock at the door, and this time not a little, timid rap, as if fearful of intruding, but a bold, imperious rap —rap—rap, which waited for no summons to enter.

"Now, Ralph Gibson, I think you are the most impolite, unfeeling brother, that anybody was ever——"

"Cursed with," said her brother, interrupting her. "Speak your mind, sis; don't be fearful of wounding my feelings."

"No! I, indeed!" replied Julia, with a disdainful toss of her haughty head. "You have none to wound. But, now, Lizzie Goodhue has come, after repeated invitations, to spend a month with me, and I should not suppose you would commence the very first day by insulting her."

"What rather fast talk, sis; Ralph Gibson never insulted a woman in his life." He withdrew his cigar, and began to stare at her in his own eye. "If you desire me to be even civil with you or your friend, it will be necessary for you to pursue a very different course. You are well aware that my time is precious, and when I have a moment's leisure, I would infinitely prefer reading, or a good cigar, to any woman's society, Julia, dear."

"Don't you think you are something to our visitors in the character of host? Can you not exert yourself a little for their entertainment. This evening we are to have some music and a dance, and you can get enough together to form a quadrille; and if you have come in and play the agreeable, I shall never forgive you."

"Why did not Miss Randall dine with us, Julia?"

"What! when we have company, Ralph Gibson? Are you crazy? I will do such a thing when we are alone; but the idea o' placing one's governess on an equality with one's friends! What is the reason that you never can understand the most trifling conventionalities, which are so important, if we would keep our position in the first society."

"The most solid in existence, I trust. I was about to use a stronger phrase, and one which might have shocked your aristocratic sensibilities. But all the trouble about rank and position makes me feel like swearing."

"Well, you said that. Will you come into the parlor this evening, Ralph?"

"If I am not called away to a patient, and have no desire to do so, I may give you a call. So, good-by, Jul; I'm off."

Ralph Gibson was the only son, the first-born, and decidedly the favorite of his family. He was about thirty, uncommonly good-looking, but possessing no penchant for anything in the world but his profession, gymnastic exercises of the class, and caring for nothing but actual merit. Julia was twenty-two or three, and exactly his opposite in everything but beauty. She had the same sparkling black eyes and raven hair, Ralph's mingle in rings all about his temples; the same full lips and dazzling teeth, but her complexion was certainly unlike. Julia had a curl to her lip and a haughty toss of the head which denoted an arrogant and undisciplined spirit.

Ralph's frank, noble face, and unconstrained, cordial manner, gained him many friends, even among all classes. There were two other children, Annie, twelve, and Bertha, fourteen, of whom Miss Randall had the charge. Their governess had been dead some years. Julia was the exact counterpart of her mother in disposition, and they controlled together every member of the household.

Ten hour passed, and no Ralph; Mr. and Mrs. Cantrell and niece were to leave in the evening, and although Mrs. Gibson was elaborately earning for her son's absence on account of professional engagements, she secretly lamented him in his office, for the door was locked, and a strong smell of cigar-smoke pervaded the little entrance.

About ten o'clock Dr. Ralph made his appearance, but did not attempt to offer any excuse or apology. Mrs. Goodhue had just finished an exquisitely elaborate piece of music, which she had considered very fine, and, at Ralph's request, sang it again. He applauded it warmly, and in five minutes after commenced an animated political conversation with Mr. Cantrell, and never bestowed another glance on the bewitching widow. Really Ralph Gibson was a most strange creature. Mrs. Goodhue, with her artless, winning manner, and elegant toilet—the little classic head, with its wealth of auburn curls—the graceful form, and delicate complexion, and rosebud mouth, were all that man could ask. Julia recalled him to his senses.

"Ralph, I have been telling Lizzie how fond you are of the reform."

Of course there was nothing for him to do but invite the widow to waltz.

"But who will play for us, Julia? You can't be a prize in time to waltz to-night."

"I don't play any redowas. If I did, I think I could keep time. I will call Miss Randall."

In a moment more the governess appeared in mourning, came quietly in, and seated herself at the piano, and commenced playing a brilliant redowa, while Dr. Ralph's arms encircled the widow's waist, and her golden head almost reclined on his breast. He was the first to stop, under pretence of being dizzy. Julia arose hastily from the piano and prepared to leave the room.

"That is a very pretty air, Miss Randall," said Dr. Ralph. "Won't you favor us with something else?"

She bowed around as if to read the expression on each face, to see if approval were written there, but she evidently saw anything but that, and exclaimed to herself, left the room.

"Very elegant young lady, that," said Mr. Cantrell, appreciatingly.

"She is our governess, sir," replied Mrs. Gibson, with an emphasis which was unmistakable.

"Can't help that, Mrs. Gibson; she is extremely good-looking. Don't you think so, doctor?"

"She has magnificent eyes and teeth. I never noticed her so particularly before," replied Ralph.

I wonder why it is that men generally ignore all social distinctions. I don't believe a man would ever have an idea that wealth or birth was at all essential to admission into the first society. They may make a distinction as to merit, education, personal attractions, etc., etc., but dollars and cents never; and my word for it, when you hear a gentleman bringing forward any objection to a person's acquaintance or intimacy on the grounds of pecuniary incompatibility, you may make up your mind that his mother was deficient in good sense and discrimination, or else he possesses a vain, shallow-brained wife, who, wishing to forget her own plebeian origin, makes her husband's money a stepping-stone to all preferment. Dr. Ralph had no prejudices of this sort. His mother and sister had tried in vain to instil into his head and heart some of their aristocratic ideas, but it was a moral impossibility to drag Ralph down to their level. It would not be done. God had created him above all such petty considerations.

Miss Randall's duties were legion; yet she never complained. Each morning one of the servants swept Dr. Ralph's office, but he was so particular about "her" dusting it, and "her" keys, that some one else was obliged to do the dusting and regulating. This work fell to Miss Randall. Mrs. Gibson had not the patience or inclination. Julia was too indolent.

One morning Ralph entered the office while Miss Randall was engaged. He did not never see him there before, and was quite surprised.

"Miss Randall," said he, "I am astonished to see you here, doing menial work. By whose orders do you do this?"

"I heard your mother say, sir," said Lottie, ceasing her work and looking him calmly in the face, "that you were very particular in regard to your property and books, and that you found a great deal of fault with the servants' carelessness, so I offered my service, thinking I might be able to discriminate between articles of rubbish and articles of virtu; but I assure you I find myself sadly puzzled occasionally."

Ralph laughed heartily, lighted his cigar, laid himself back in his comfortable office chair, lifted his feet to the table, and very leisurely surveyed the graceful, queenly figure putting things to rights in such a demure, poetical manner. Miss Randall dusted each book and pamphlet, and then said:

"Will you be kind enough to remove your feet, Dr. Gibson, as you please?"

"Certainly, certainly," and he pushed himself away from the table.

Then Lottie scrubbed her little feather-duster around the pictures and furniture—stopping in front of his chair.

"It is a very unfortunate, doctor, that you came in before I had finished my task; but as I dislike extremely to have my work uncompleted, you will oblige me by taking it from me, and another time I remove the dust from this."

Dr. Ralph laughed again as he was bid.

I wonder, Miss Randall, if there is a place where we are delivered from the annoyances of dust and dirt?"

"Probably, sir; but are dust and dirt your greatest earthly troubles?"

"Not by a decided sight, Miss Randall." Dr. Ralph didn't always think twice before he spoke once, not even in ladies' society. "But why do you ask such a question, may I inquire?"

"Because I thought they appeared so very infinitesimal to me in comparison, that if you had the greater grievances to bear, that you must be an unusually happy man, and I think it is always best to pray to be delivered from the greater evil first."

"That's the way you reason, is it?" Well, then, Miss Randall, I will be very confident, and you shall join with me in supplicating Dr. Ralph's speedy release from the thraldom of frivolous, de grading occupations." He looked at him a moment, as if undecided what to do—for she could hardly believe that he intended anything personal by the remark, when he relieved her by inquiring very abruptly:

"How long have you been with us, Miss Randall?"

"Three months, doctor."

"Three months! and yet in all that time I have never seen you but drawing-room but once. Why do you remain here, when there are other families with whom you could be infinitely happier—boasting no control?"

"I am well aware of that, doctor, but my reasons for remaining are two these: Your mother pays me an excellent salary, considerably larger than I could hope to obtain elsewhere; and as I have two little sisters to support, the pecuniary benefit is worth a great deal more to me than any amount of appreciation or society."

"What is the matter with your mother?" asked Dr. Ralph, abruptly.

"Consumption, sir, I am afraid."

"Has she a cough?"

"No, sir."

"Where does she live?"

"Twenty-fifth street."

"What number?"

Lottie gave him the desired number, and he drew out his memorandum-book and made a very professional entry, without any remark whatever.

He had taken a peculiar desire to procure a first-class physician for her mother, but she had never been able to do so, and it was the greatest grief of her life that her failing weeks after week, and she obliged to leave her alone in her feebleness; so, although she did not dare ask Dr. Ralph any question, yet she felt that he would benefit her, if anybody could. Julia and Mrs. Goodhue were planning for a large party. Ralph had promised to escort the widow! It was a bore; but common courtesy demanded a little attention to Mrs. Goodhue's friend, so he had resolved to be very gracious, and at dinner bantered them in regard to their toilets, and assured them that unless they were "got up" (that was one of Ralph's pet phrases) in the most recherche style, nothing would ever induce him to take them out again. They did not engage their hair-dresser in time, and the consequence was that Lottie's good taste and nimble fingers were called into requisition. Never before had the widow's golden locks shown off to such good advantage; and when a gentleman bringing two white camellia buds around her finely-shaped head, which made her style of beauty more regal than ever, Ralph was sent for to criticise.

Mrs. Goodhue, with her eyes turned modestly away, arrayed in her pearl-colored silk with its frills of real lace, and sparkling diamonds with their heavy jet settings, was indeed a beautiful picture, and to most men an irresistible one. Miss Randall stood in the background, surveying her handiwork with evident appreciation.

Ralph looked them over, flattered Mrs. Goodhue until the little lady was entirely overcome, and then asked:

"But, Jul, who fixed your top-knots?"

"Miss Randall, Ralph, and hasn't she done herself credit?" exclaimed Julia, enthusiastically.

"She has given to you both, ladies, a finish and elegance, which no hair-dresser could have done; but my opinion is, she could have found better business, and not half tried. Have you copied that manuscript for me, Miss Randall?"

"No, sir. I haven't had time; but I will go to the office and do it immediately."

"Oh! it is of no consequence; perhaps I shall have time when I return. If any one comes for me in a hurry, please tell them where I can be found," and so they rolled off to the fashionable party.

Lottie proceeded to the office to do the copying. She had an errand to accomplish within a little for the doctor, when he had been very busy, and this article was to be published as soon as possible, so she had to hurry home and send to the task; but it was quite voluminous, and a great many of the medical phrases were not written legibly, and she was obliged to consult a dictionary frequently, and twelve o'clock came before she was aware. I think Lottie must have been very tired that night, for she had spent an unusually tiresome day; but it was a great pleasure to her copying for Doctor Ralph, and so she forgot her fatigue and hurried on. He had been called for two or three times, but she did not hear him, and would come home when the party was over, and she was not a little surprised to hear him coming in about half-past twelve.

"Miss Randall, I shall never forgive myself for having asked you to do this tedious copying for me. I felt all the evening that you were tiring yourself to death over it. Now go to bed immediately," said he, in a tone of authority.

"Certainly, sir, with pleasure," replied Lottie, meekly; "I am just finished. It is pretty late and tired, I think," noticing his pale face.

"I have just come from the death-bed of a patient, one of the terrible grief of the family has entirely unmanned me. What is your first name, Miss Randall?"

"Lottie, sir."

"Well, then, for kindness sake, let me call you Lottie when we are alone. Lottie—I'll be repeated over again and again; "it's a very pretty name."

"I am going, sir. Good-night," said Lottie, feeling sure that, now her work was done, she ought to retire.

"Oh, not just a few moments. I can't see why we may not be friends, Lottie. I like you ever so much—and that's more than I can say of anybody else in the house. I had tried decently hard to love my mother and sisters as the Bible directs of course, I have some obedience for them; but sometimes it really seems to me that I can not be my mother's son. There is not a particle of similarity in our tastes or habits."

Lottie did not know what reply to make to this tirade, so she merely stood looking sympathy, with her head bent to hear what he said.

"Lottie, I saw your mother to-day."

"Oh! did you, Doctor Ralph?" and the rich blood mounted to her temples, as she arose to the lounge where the doctor had thrown himself.

"What do you think of her, doctor?"

"She has a little bronchial difficulty, but her lungs are as sound as a dollar. Your father's death and her loneliness have affected her nervous system, but I assure you she has no dread disease. She must go out every day, have cheerful society, and, with the medicine I shall leave her, will not recognize your own mother in a month or two."

"Oh, doctor Ralph! you have no idea what a weight you have taken from my heart. I shall go about my duties with a renewed zeal," and she thanked him from the depths of her grateful soul.

"But, doctor, you are going back to the party for the young ladies—won't you?" as she saw him drawing on his coat for Doctor Ralph would remove his coat and substitute a dressing-gown, or change his boots for slippers, did he feel so inclined. It was a matter of course ladies were to wait on him.

"Yes, Lottie, I shall go for them, if they wait long enough—but not to-night. They already have two escorts, and I excused myself for the night, not knowing how long my services might need me. Why, Lottie, Mrs. Goodhue had a train of admirers as long as from here to Central Park. How long is she going to stay, do you know?"

"I do not know, sir; but I think some time longer."

"I was in hopes that my term of probation was short."

"I don't strike me that you have made yourself much of a martyr to her society, Doctor Ralph?"

"Well, no, not much; but it really would be a relief if she would go home."

"Oh, sir, I heard a good-night once more;" and Dr. Ralph was alone.

Lottie kept awake till most daylight. The sorrowful intelligence of her mother's condition, and the little words of appreciation and kindness, had given a warmer coloring to her life, and the mournful expression fled from the eyes, and she was almost gay. Julia was angry with her brother for allowing even sickness or death to keep him away from the widow, and her good-morning was quite formal, and almost insolent.

"Where is Mrs. Goodhue this morning?" said Ralph.

"I wonder that you condescend to notice her absence. She is quite sick; and I have no doubt very much hurt at your assertion last evening."

"Now, Julia, that is too ridiculous. Why, a poor fellow could hardly get within gunshot—her admirers were so numerous; and the idea of her caring three cuts of the amateur should well-drawn."

"Oh! that's very fine talk, but you know as well as I do that Lizzie Guthrie does not regard you as she does the gentlemen who surrounded her last evening. Of course she is aware that all they care about is her money, and you we all know are above the influence of such petty considerations."

"Has it got as far as that, Julia, and that on any one else dare take it for granted that I intend any more than common civility to that silly, mawkish pamby doll? Why, if her diamonds could be numbered with the hairs of her red head, and she was as beautiful as an houri, I should still detest her. She is a fool, Jul, and that's whatis the matter."

Mrs. Gibson entered the room in time to hear Ralph's last remark.

"Why, Ralph, you are entirely mistaken in her character. She is very amiable, and would make any man a splendid wife; then just think of her prospects. Two magnificent houses on Fifth avenue—and it is valued at——"

"I don't care a—fig," interrupted Ralph, petulantly, "if she owns real estate in Heaven. She will make me detest every woman that was ever created. They are all a deceitful, treacherous set, and how—present company excepted, of course," added he, with an ironical laugh, as he saw his mother and sister apply to use their handkerchiefs. "You don't suppose I would suspect either of you of double dealing, do you? of course I know you too well—and as for Julia, let me enjoy my bachelor life, and I'll be the best son and brother the world ever produced."

Dr. Ralph preceded to the office. There were several patients already waiting for him; and just as he had dismissed the last one, and was about stepping into his gig, he was sent for in a great hurry by his mother, to come immediately to Mrs. Goodhue, who was just recovering from a swoon.

He hurried to the invalid's room, drew a chair to the side of the bed, where the pretty widow reclined, looking as bewitching as embroidery, and frills of immaculate purity, and golden hair floating around her shoulders, could make her. She was indeed very pale, and Ralph instantly saw that it was no stratagem, but a bona fide swoon. He took the little delicate hand in his own—examined the pulse.

"Are you in the habit of fainting, Mrs. Goodhue?"

"No, sir," very faintly.

"How long was she unconscious, Julia?"

"Oh, fifteen minutes, I should think."

Now, Dr. Ralph was too much the physician to hesitate about asking all necessary questions, and an intimate acquaintance with the disease will rarely overcome all false modesty (if he ever had any), which was much good for, as he very professionally inquired into the minutiæ.

Mrs. Goodhue closed her eyes, and seemed about to faint again.

"Oh, dear!" said she, "I have such a pain here," pressing her hand on her left side over the heart.

Ralph saw the color going from her lips, and placed his hand under the dimity, and immediately discovered the cause.

"Hand me a pair of scissors, Julia."

In a second more the corset-lacing was cut, and the widow revived.

She had come from the party, and feeling very tired, had not unlaced her corsets, and this was the result.

Dr. Ralph drew on his gloves.

"I think you will have no more trouble, Mrs. Goodhue. Good morning."

The little widow burst into tears of rage and mortification.

"Don't care anything about it," said Julia, soothingly. "It is Ralph's way. He is a regular bear."

Mrs. Goodhue did not make her appearance in the dining-room for a day or two.

Ralph visited her after her occasionally, but was not again sent for.

"How's your patient, sis? By-love, that corset lace made a case like a champion cork, when it cut it. I hope, Jul, you are not foolen enouch to compress your waist like that. It may be a slow kind of suicide, but it is, nevertheless, suicide."

"You shocked Lizzie terribly, Ralph; she says she shall never be able to look you in the face again as long as she lives."

"So much the better, Jul; that arrangement will suit me as well as any."

"It is no use, mother; we might as well relinquish all hope of civilizing Ralph. If he wasn't so handsome, I shouldn't feel so badly about it; but he will never marry. He is too devoted to his old skeletons for that."

Lottie spent a good deal of her time with the two young ladies, who rapidly improved under her excellent instruction. She occasionally did some visiting for Dr. Ralph, but for some reason seemed to avoid all conversation with him. With all his indifference to ladies' society, Lottie's manner seemed to pique him; and one morning, just as she had burst through her tasks, and was about to leave the office, he entered, and placing himself against the door, acted abruptly:

"What is the reason, Miss Lottie, that you manage so cleverly to keep away from me? Don't you remember I told you the other night that I very much desired to be a friend to you?"

"Well, are you not, Dr. Ralph? I think you have shown yourself very friendly," replied Lottie, in her cool, self-possessed way.

"Well, then, why not give a poor fellow a chance to speak a word to you, now and then?"

"For this simple reason: that, however agreeable it might be to me to have a pleasant conversation with a friend occasionally—and Lottie accented the word friend quite forcibly—my position here does not warrant it. Y ours are well aware as myself of your mother's prejudices, and I could never be induced to take advantage of your kindness, to make trouble for you in your own family."

"Very fine sentiments, no doubt; but you can't scare up any difficulty for me that I haven't already had, so that can be no excuse."

"Perhaps, Dr. Ralph, it might compromise my own position, and bring down upon me again your mother for my attention (as I have before informed you), it may be as well for myself to conform, as far as practicable, to her ideas and wishes."

"Well, I swear! Miss Lottie, excuse me if you and I—the only ones in the house who could bitch teams and enjoy ourselves once in a while—have got to be kept apart by some ridiculous pretense ideas of my aristocratic mother and sister, I think it is about time we left this world and went to Jerusalem."

Lottie laughed heartily; she couldn't help it; and, taking advantage of the temporary fit of abstraction, quietly left the office.

Dr. Ralph sat for some time smoking and thinking. Memory was busy. He reviewed his past life, its future prospects, and for the first time looked his future in the face.

"Upon my word, it does look dubious," said he to himself. "It is unpleasant to think there is scarcely no prospect of its mending. Why can't I have a home of my own? Why, I never even thought of that before. I'm blessed if the idea don't pose me. But if a fellow has an establishment of his own, he's got to have a wife, a housekeeper, or there will be the same impropriety in making friends with the governess. What a fool I am! Why don't I marry and win a governess? so Lottie will be left behind, after all, and I shall be as well off to remain where I am; and then, as for an establishment, the lady by stirrup him, he jumped to his feet and exclaimed:

"I'll ask her to be my wife! and then we can at least understand each other. Why the deuce haven't I thought of that before?"

He kept his own counsel, was very attentive to Julia and the widow, and began to look forward again that the result might be as they desired. He called on Lottie's mother the next day after his self-communings, and opened the ball by informing her that he was about to offer his undivided hand and heart.

"But have you spoken to Lottie?" she asked, in surprise.

"No, and it, no; is that the way you do it? It's new business to me, Mrs. Randall."

She expressed her approval, and referred him to her daughter.

"What has got into Ralph—he has changed so much for the last few days? He seems solemnly vain to death, and I can't understand it. I don't believe, mother, he is at last actually smitten with Lizzie."

A day or two after, while at dinner, Mrs. Gibson asked Lottie if she were engaged for the afternoon, as Ralph left word that he would like her to do some writing for him.

"Is the doctor in the office, Mrs. Gibson?"

"No, but he said you would find the manuscript in the library drawer."

Lottie tripped along to the office with a light heart. She dearly loved to be of service to Dr. Ralph; why she couldn't explain to herself, unless it was that he had been so kind to her mother. She looked in the drawer, as directed, and found nothing there; so she took a seat in the standing in a state of indecision, when Dr. Ralph entered.

"What are you looking for, Lottie? Sit down here a moment. I have something to say to you."

"Yes, and I have something to say to you, Dr. Ralph Gibson! and for every one in this style again, I will never visit your office under any pretext whatever." Lottie spoke decided, but there was a tremor agitated light in her large dark eyes, although she tried to veil it under a sternness she was very far from feeling.

"I asked mother to send you, because, if you were found here, there could be nothing said to cause you trouble."

"And you really have no manuscript to copy ?"

"No, not a line."

"Well, then, good afternoon. I have duties of my own to perform."

"Come here, Lottie. I have heard of a situation where, I think, you will be very much happier than here."

Lottie walked toward him, and looked at him seriously.

"You will be treated with the consideration your goodness and intelligence demand, you will be perfectly independent and unrestricted, and you can have everything exactly your own way."

"But where is it, Dr. Ralph?" and the tears flowed in Lottie's eyes. "Will my pupils be young ladies?"

"No, dear; you will have only one for the present, and she is a very good, overgrown boy."

"But, Dr. Ralph, I am confident I shall not like it half so well as here. Now I am sure of one friend."

"And who is that, Lottie?"

"Why, who but yourself, doctor? You know I have no other."

"Ah, that's the stick; is it, Lottie? Delightful to hear you say so! Well, then, my boy" (the old familiarity of being taken under your supervision for life is—Ralph Gibson! a sorry scoundrel, is it true, and his establishment is one that he desires you to select and furnish according to your own taste, with the proviso that your mother has the best room in the house.

Lottie had not taken her eye off his face while he was speaking, but moved toward the door. He quickly drew her back.

"Will you accept the situation, Lottie?"

"Your mother, Dr. Ralph ?"

"Suppose I hadn't any mother, would you take me then?"

"I think I would," said Lottie, softly.

"All right, then," said the practical doctor. "Won't we have some high old talks when we have a house of our own, boy, Lottie?"

A week or two after, Lottie gave up her situation, very much to Mrs. Gibson's regret, and Ralph Ertel with the wilder wonderment.

One morning, as Mrs. Gibson, Julia and Mrs. Goodhue (who had already prolonged her stay some two months), were sitting, were seated in the parlor, Ralph entered, and, after exchanging a few commonplace remarks, said:

"Jul, there is one particular friend of mine to be married this afternoon, at three o'clock, at Trinity, and if you would all like to see a pretty girl affair, you had better ride down."

And they went.

What do you think were their sensations when they beheld Dr. Ralph and his radiant bride walk up the aisle, and take their places at the altar? Disappointment is no name for it.

They reached their carriage before the ceremony commenced, and have never forgiven them.

Mrs. Goodhue is still husband-hunting.

OUR BASE BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.

We have received several communications lately in reply to our circular, among which are two from Baltimore. As it is a matter of interest to our respondent, who presents a candidate for our list of players in the person of Mr. George Stanton, a worthy gentleman of Baltimore, and a most liberal patron of the game, and an old ball-player. But there are two considerations which will prevent his name in our list; one being that he is not an active player now, and the other, that he is not a member of a club in the National Association. Baltimore will have to go unrepresented at the National convention, as there is not a Base Ball more club in the Monumental.

The other communication presents the name of a player who is a member of a club of undoubted merit, whose occupation, character, and social standing are such as a decided credit to the game. Our only objection to notice all first-class ball players, but, at the same time, they must be those of good character and of high social standing, that is, gentlemen in all that constitutes the true definition of the term. They may be engaged in any honorable occupation, and yet be men of worth and estimable character. But we do not listen to the sketches of those whose only recommendation is their ability to play, to enter in the game. In future, too, we shall require the signature of the president and secretary of the club whose player is sent in for our portrait gallery.

The subject of our illustration this week is Mr. Arthur Allison, a member of the Veteran Knickerbocker Club of Albany—a club, by the way, distinguished for being among the first to practically exemplify the beauties and merits of the fly game, they playing no other when our "big bats" in town here practiced the puerile bound game.

"Archie Bush," as he is familiarly called by his club companions, is a favorite as he is a skilful, for the youngest player of the Knickerbocker Nine, he has been a player of the game since its revival, and which he still follows, he, of course, meets with sympathy and applause from the spectators, some his favorites do receive. Though young, not being of age yet, he has seen service as a soldier boy, and remained in the field during the whole three years' war. He, too, until the lamented death of that noble officer. Though a general favorite, he is rather to the back or in the field, his position is that of catcher, a feature of his play being a quick judgment in taking foul balls, he being a second Bechtoreg in this respect. He is general withal, an accurate thrower, and allows but few found nothing here, so he took a seat. His base hit skill at the bat has been proved by many a prize won by the club he plays for. In fact, whether as regards his skill as a player—achieved by practice since he could first handle a ball—or his social worth, "Archie Bush" is a favorite, and a credit to the locality of which he is the general favorite, and we present his countenance to our readers as a worthy representative of the esteemed member of the Albany section of the fraternity.

The next match in our series will be that of Mr. G. A. Flagg, Catcher, of the Cambridge B. B. Club, Cambridge, Mass.

THE CLIPPER STEAMER METEOR,

Seized by the United States Government.

As this splendid clipper, one of the highest achievements of modern skill, since her seizure on suspicion of being designed for the service of Chile, and as her consummation by the Government of that country was prevented by the timely arrival of a revenue cutter, has led to the repeal of those laws by a unanimous vote of the House of Representatives, we present a complete picture of her model in full sail. She is on the port tack, and looks the saucy craft she is, and has been pronounced by those who know how beauties among the world over for their beauty and speed.

The Meteor was built by a combination of wealthy and patriotic men, of Philadelphia and Boston, for the purpose of running between the Alabama and other Anglo-rebel pirates; but the close of the war prevented her departure on that service, and she was finished, fitted, and sold to other builders, who employ her for a time in the merchant service, for which she is admirably suited by her war.

She was tried by the Government, and confessedly made the best time, under steam alone, ever attained by a propeller, between the ports of Sandy Hook.

Eventually she was fitted for a voyage to Panama, and, being considered a fast vessel, was detained at the instance of the Spanish Government, on suspicion of having been purchased by that Government.

She was built at Portsmouth, N. H., of selected seasoned white oak, is diagonally cross-braced with iron, and fastened in the first style of workmanship. Her length over all is 284 feet; breadth of beam, 34 feet 6 inches; depth, 24 feet; and register, 1,461 tons, old measurement. It is estimated that she can sow 1,600 tons measurement goods, in addition to ten days' coal for constant steaming.

Her engines were built on the Clyde, and are considered a most handy pattern of machinery. They are of great power, with cylinders of 69½ inches diameter and 3 feet stroke of pistons, supplied with four tubular boilers, having between 7 and 8,000 feet of fire surface. Her propeller is 12 feet in diameter, with 22 feet pitch, and her screw-gear, section, when in good trim, is under 600 feet.

What disposition the owners of the Meteor intend to make of her when released, as she ultimately must be, we are not informed; but common sense would dictate that our own Government, to end the controversy, ought to buy her, and make her a model vessel to build others by.

COMMODORE TRUXTON.

THOMAS TRUXTON, one of the early glories of the American navy, was born on Long Island, February 15, 1755. During the Revolution he made his appearance as lieutenant, and subsequently as captain of a privateer, in which he made many captures of the British.

In 1794 he entered the United States Navy as captain, and was appointed to the frigate Constellation, thirty-nine guns.

When war was declared against France he sailed to the West Indies, and off Nevis, on the 9th of February, 1800, engaged the French L'Insurgente, forty guns and four hundred and nine men, commanded by Captain Barreaut, after a fight of one hour and a quarter. The French frigate was nearly cut up, having twenty-nine killed and forty wounded.

On the 1st of February in the following year, while off Guadaloupe, he fell in with the Vengeance, another French frigate, supposed to be mounting forty-four guns and carrying a crew of three hundred men. She, however, attacked her with spirit, and after killing fifty and wounding one hundred and twenty of her people, struck the flag of the French, when his adjutant went by the board, and his prize escaped. Truxton was presented with a gold medal for his achievement with a gold medal.

In 1801 he was appointed to the President, forty-four, and was employed on the Guadaloupe station, having a considerable squadron under his orders.

In 1802, however, he resigned, having during his seven years' service in the navy won a name never to be forgotten.

He continued to his skilled several important civil offices.

He died in Philadelphia, May 8th, 1822. His tomb is shown in our illustration, and will continue to be an object of interest to all who remember the deeds of the brave men who contributed so largely toward our national greatness.

PEARL FISHERIES IN THE PERSIAN GULF.

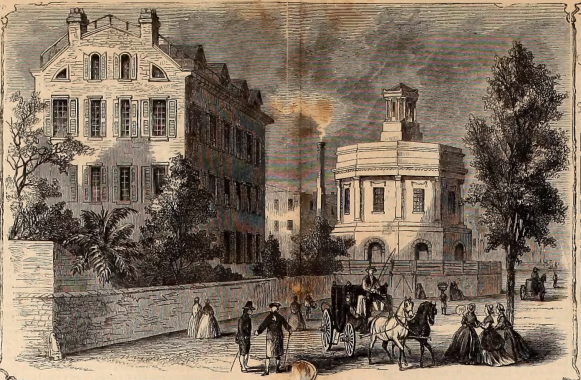
THE richest banks are those of the Islands of Bahrein. Pearls are found at all depths from a little below high water-mark down to three, seven, twelve, seventeen and eighteen fathoms. It is probable that there are beds at a much greater depth; for instance, at the Island of Kharg, on the north side and inside the inlets of the Muzeddeem promontory, these beds must have a depth of twenty-two or twenty-five fathoms.

It is said on the authority of the traders of the gulf pounds on the depth of the water—the greater the depth the finer the pearl. The oyster-beds are said to be known by covering the more or less perfect superiority of the pearl. The best oyster-beds are said to be those which have a muddy bottom, and covering the coral in clear water. A few stars of mud or earthy substance with the pearl are considered to be no detriment to its value, but if the beds having this defect are liable to exhaustion. It is said that there are beds in the Persian Gulf which the exhaustion of the pearl-beds on the coast of Scinde and Cutch, which were at one time very productive, have gradually fished from the earliest haste to perfect, coldness, and become so exhausted that for the last several years have given a more than usually abundant supply.

The notion that the Arabs feed their oysters with pearls is ridiculous. They have no means to do so even. No one whatever is taken of the oysters, which are left entirely to nature. Small, or slightly attach themselves by the hinge to the bottom of the sea, and are so like the rocks among the trees from their beds in groups below high water. The pearl-fishing is regulated with a view to keeping in April, to the end of the last summer months of September, when the fishing fleet is ordered from five thousand fishing-boats along the entire coast, each manned by about twenty persons, to the number of above number of boats, some fifteen hundred may belong to Bahrein. A few of these hundred may belong entirely the fruits of their own labors, but the great majority are in the hands of big men of pearl merchants, whether Hindoo or other, who reside in the towns of Bahrein, and who supply the wants in advance of the divers during the non-diving season, and when the season comes on, the boats are supplied with so many days' rates, rice and other provisions, and start away for the pearl-grounds, and return all or earliest complete. Hundreds of boats may be seen anchored at a time on the banks.

As a rule, the diving may be in water of from four to seven fathoms in depth. Fifteen fathoms of water is considered extremely prejudicial to longevity, and occasionally divers are lost in deeper water. Each boat has two divers and rope-holders, and the former diving, while the latter pull up the boat and by turns the boat dives up. Each diver has a coverage for the purpose, and a bag-net, which he fills with the oysters he pluckers, has a rope attached to his girdle, and a stone or other weight to sink him. He then descends to the bottom, remains, and on reaching the bottom, he collects his oysters and puts them in the bag-net, which he attaches to the rope, and he gives the stone weight, and he is hauled up by the rope-holders. The stone weight is attached to a second rope, by which it is sent down after the diver. The diver then ascends, and the boat is ready for another descent.

The great bulk of the best pearls is sent to the Bombay market, and the finest of the finished pearls of the prices were given for good pearls. A large number of pearls are consumed in Persia, Egypt, and Turkey, but they market prefers the pearl or yellowish tint and pearls of Bombay, and the finest of the finished pearls of the white pearl. The small seed pearls go principally to Bagdad also.



MAGNIFYING GLASSES.—The first convex magnifying glass known to have been made was ground by an oculist's stage in the ruins of Herculaneum. The first application of the same principle in modern times was been in the thirteenth century for spectacles. Early in the sixteenth century a lens appears to have been used that distant objects seen through the spectacles in the hands of Galileo, when inventing the telescope, and Newton brought nearer. He did not apply practically to the microscope, however, which was left for Leeuwenhoek. In a record of the state-General of the Netherlands, dated 1673, Leeuwenhoek is described as a "skilful maker of lenses one inch broth, reflections for government and for the use of physicians, and especially for anatomical lenses, and the authorities ordered the date of 1674, but on the conditions that they should be seen." Lenses with three glasses were advanced by Huyghens, in 1656, and by Hooke, in 1665, and compound lenses by Divini, at the time of our own Bonaventure, in 1700 and following years.

TALKING WITH THE SOUTH-WIND.

BY EDEN E. REXFORD.

Oh! spirit of the South-wind,
Whence comest thou to-night?
From groves where herons sleepeth,
Beneath the moon's pale light?
Go, whisper by the hearth-stone,
When good-night words are said,
Some failing one the loved ones,
Who sleep among the dead.

Go, tell the wife who sitteth
Beside the cottage door,
The husband whom she misseth,
Will kiss her cheek no more.
Just when the conflict ended,
He fell across the slain,
And though she lost a loved one,
Her loss was Freedom's gain.

Go, tell the mother, weeping
Beside a lonely hearth,
And lingering o'er the footsteps
Of one no more of earth—
Go tell her that no braver
Or truer hero died,
When raged the battle's tempest,
Than he, her poor heart's pride.

Go, tell the father, thinking
In lonesomeness and tears,
Of one, his best beloved,
The darling of his years;
Go tell him he buried
No more the battle's din,
But that the gates of Heaven
Have let his darling in.

Go, tell the maiden, waiting
Beside the trysting-place,
And longing for the brightness
Of a returned face,
That God's white smile is lying
Above his fallen head,
That where his young life ended
He sleeps among the dead.

Go, tell the merry children,
Unused to care or pain,
The one they knew as father
Will never come again.
Go, tell them that he perished
In some lone prison cell,
Because his heart was loyal,
And loved his country well.

Go to each shadowed hearth-stone,
Where stands a vacant chair,
And count the tears that falleth
Of those that gather there,
And tell them that their loved ones,
Who, 'neath a southern sky,
Are resting from the conflict,
Were not afraid to die.

The freedom, grand and lasting,
To which their deeds gave birth,
Has made our land the noblest
And proudest one of earth.
The love they gave their country
Were given up to God:
The graves where heroes sleepeth,
Are tracks where Freedom trod.

OR,

THE FAIR LADY OF THE SHROUD.

CHAPTER XXXII.—FRIEND AND FOE.

WHEN those two evil countenances met Mildred's terrified gaze at the entrance of the Cathedral Chamber, she mechanically started back.

"No, no, mice," cried Clement, mockingly, and interposing his fat carcass so as to shut out the "you have had many pleasant hours in this place by yourself—why should you be so anxious to leave it, now that your own good company is

"By yourself?" he said, thought Mildred; then this man did not know of her husband's having met her there almost certainly, if he did not know that, of his being in existence. Was it possible that Raymond had died at their approach, as he had once before, into Pixie Hall? If so not, he must be late, and would presently follow her into the cave. In either case, there was hope of help, which held her sinking heart.

"What would you with me, Uncle Clement?"

"Ay, it's Uncle Clement, now, is it?" returned he, with a sneer. "The last and only time we met, it was Mr. Carr, forsooth, and your lullaby did your best to put me to sleep. But one can forget these things, Mrs. Raymond Clifford."

"If I was distant to you, sir, it was not my own will, but my aunt's—your sister's orders. You know that those must be obeyed."

"I do, niece Mildred. We are here to-day to obey them; are we not, Cator?"

Even now, with only a poor shrinking woman and her child to deal with, this man liked to assert himself. He had a right; even now, on the very threshold of his hideous crime, he drew some shabby comfort from laying it at another's door. His tone and manner froze Mildred's blood within her. Rather than appeal to this base wretch, silent her own kith and kin, she turned to his grim briefing.

"You, at least," she cried, in piteous accents, "I have never, even involuntarily, wronged. I did not come into this world your enemy, born of a hated stock, and yet your own. Although you may be rough and rude, you are still a man and—— I know not what harm may be intended me, and this poor innocent child; but you will not, surely you will not lend your strength to this unnatural wretch against such foes as we are. Spit us—pity this little one, if only you have at home—and if not, then pity me, for the sake of your own mother."

Not a word came from the stern lips of the serving-man, but he withdrew himself within the gloom a little, as though ashamed to meet her pleading eyes.

"You dare not look upon my wretched face," she cried, "so much of divine pity dwells in you. Oh, let your better nature move you a little further, and——"

"Silence!" cried Clement, fiercely. "This is no time for pity and whining. You should have thought of some such bar as this, when in this very place you laid your hands for Raymond Clifford, and thwarted me and Grace. You have well said that what she orders must be done. She orders that I shall never more look upon the that cursed child—but for whom no such fate need have awaited you, and here you see how your punishment again and again rises from your perversity; I say we are here to see you never more return from Pibble Cave."

"God of heaven! would you murder us, then?" exclaimed Mildred, hugging her babe to her fastbeating heart.

"No, niece; not so. We only wish to assure ourselves that yonder stream has taken you both from a world of trouble. As I have said, I am sorry for this necessity, which, however, you have brought upon yourself; but, after all, drowning is an easy death, and matters might have been worse—might they not, Cator?"

"Matters might have been worse," returned his grim associate, haughtily.

What little chance was left for Mildred now lay, she was well aware, alone in gaining time. Her ears, while they drank in these words of cruelty, were straining for the echo of a footfall in the tunnel, for a splash in the sullen stream below her; but the heard nothing save the monotonous "drip, drip" from the limestone roof, and the stealthy flow of the dark tide.

"Why do you speak equal to your servant, sir," cried she, "for sympathy in your premeditated crime, and yet forbid me to strive to move your heart a little—a very little—from its cruel purpose? My child and I—if you only spare our lives—will never more plague you, while our Aunt Grace: we will leave this place, and take another name, and be as dead. I promise—I swear it."

"So you promised, so you swore, mice, to marry Rupert Clifford," interposed Clement, gravely, "to please your beauty, and you will attempt to melt with it you crystal statue, as to move Cator, honest fellow from his duty."

Mildred looked her very last upon the stalagmite thus indicated, and shuddered to see how like it looked to the thing which it had been. Her mother and child already perished in that very spot; was it possible that she and Milly would be also there alone? Among the dead who were hidden from the light of heaven, was it also hidden from its Lord? She prayed with dumb wiles long and earnestly, but without any sense that right speedily. It was now long past the usual time of tryst with Raymond, and of human aid Mildred had ceased to depend.

"Come," resumed Clement, impatiently, "let us have done with this. If, as you endeavor to persuade me, you would lay no claim on your child's account to Cliffe, or aught belonging to it, were you suffered to live on, would not things would turn be to such a life? Why wish for mere existence, without a single possession that makes it dear? You are widowed, and your child fatherless, I know years of wretchedness, and, like enough, of shame, would there be in store for your little one, when best-wife Grace, and all the rest of her less rebil reasons; and you—I tell you, you must die, whether or no; so, why not save us the

"What!" interrupted Mildred, passionately, "would you slay my soul as well as my body? Would you drive me to unnatural crime, in order to flatter yourself that you did not do it with your hands? No—villain, butcher! if you will murder me, you shall do it in cold blood. help. If I die, it shall be murder, and no suicide; and my child—ay, spare the child, for your mother's sake broke forth. "Drown me, if it must be so. I would rather that thou didst it, than to feel the fingers of that fell monster put her child in cause, prese down my head beneath you dark cold stream. But save my child; if thou art born of woman, have pity on my child!"

"Take hold of her, Cator. Damn her, how she screams—these echoes make as though it were fifty women! Take hold of her, and put her down, since she wishes it, and leave the child to me."

"To save?" cried Mildred, clinging to this straw. "Will you, indeed, save my child? Oh, do not mock me on the verge of death, but promise me this! Swear to me, by the God in heaven, shall live unharmed. God will protect her, though, alas, alas, he seems to have forsaken me! No one will harm my innocent child for it. Good Clement, do you promise?"

"Ay, ay," returned Clement, gruffly—"give me the girl."

"Give her not to him!" cried out a terrible voice, as the gloomy figure leaped down and seemed to tremble. "Let not his murderous fingers touch her innocent head! Oh, liar, damned for ever! Oh, false to the last hour—and mine—has come at last."

Not a footstep had fallen upon the cavern floor; not an arm had parted the watery path from Pixie Hall; and it seemed to Mildred as though Heaven's own thunder had spoken. Indeed, such power and fury were in the sound, that it did not appear like human speech, and not until William Cator gave one stride from out of the gloom, and seized her uncle by the throat, did she recognize her ally in the servant-man. As for Clement Carr, his surprise was greater than her own—so stupendous that it even overwhelmed for a moment his naturally acute perception of personal danger.

"What are you about, man? What do you mean? Are you mad or——Oh!" Here the vestpipe of Mr. Carr became too rigidly compressed to admit of further gurgling.

"Cease to bring the name of Mrs. Raymond Clifford," said Cator, hoarsely, "that this fellow and I may look at one another."

Mildred stood, breathless, silently, and threw the full glare of the pine-branch upon the two struggling figures, if struggling they could be called where there was no resistance from standing, and, at the same time, prevented from falling, by the strong, firm grasp of the other. Clement's face, compressed, livid, with the eyes dilated, from which, as it seemed, the wicked cunning had scarce had time to escape and give place to abject fear, was a ghastly sight enough, but that of Cator was far worse. Always grim and forbidding, the countenance of the self-appointed man as disturbed by mental passion as was that of his master by physical violence; an unextinguishable hate flamed up from every feature.

"He is not dead, mistress," said he, in answer to Mildred's terrified glance, and relaxing his grasp a little, "it is hard to let go of such a throat as his, but I should have been loth to kill him that way; he has got to bear something first, before, amd I——" He seized the torch and dashed it into Clement's face, so that it singed his hair and eyebrows. "There, that revives him wonderfully!" said, indeed, under that novel application of the burned feathers' system, Mr. Carr began to show signs of animation. After a prolonged fit of sneezing, he proceeded once more to articulate his opinion that his serving-man was either mad or a knave.

"You see he can't believe it, mistress," cried Cator, triumphantly. "He can't believe that, after so long a servitude to him and his, one could remain an honest man." Then, pointing to his late master with a finger that quivered with passion, he continued: "Even such are Rupert's brother—the twin-Cain—how do I hate thee! Dost thou think, because I delay to smite thee, or because I loose the hold just for a moment, to hope for thy base life? There is no hope, no loophole for escape the size of a needle's eye! Clement Carr, thou art come here to die."

"You would not murder me, honest Cator—me, who have been your master for ten years—and for no more?"

"Hark to him, mistress!" laughed the other, scornfully. "Listen to his whining prayer! He is a knave of murder—he that came hither to do a double murder—as though it were a crime! 'My master for ten years, and for no reason,' say you? Why, is not that a reason good enough, if there were no other? To live for ten long years the minister of your wickedness—the instrument of villainies unspeakable done upon friendless creatures, chained and starved——"

"That was Lady Doug," broke in the abject wretch; "you know I always said that he was too hard."

"Yes, and strove to make him harder. I say nothing for him. Sooner or later he would have met his doom at these same hands (as thou art going to do), for his cruelty to his child, impatient of his crimes, cut short his course; but he, at least, was open in his wickedness, and spoke his death. I, do. But thou—thou fox, without the fox's courage, thou hypocrite, who with canting words and Why dost thou shudder so, thou that hast just been saying what an easy death it is to drown? Why dost thou not, like a cowardly dealer, calling on the God in whom thou hast no faith, and thinking to move me with thy lying words—me, a sinner, who has had what, as easy to move from his fixed purpose as yonder crystal statue is to be melted by the breath?"

"Why should you kill me? Why should you do me hurt?" cried Clement, fawningly, and almost grovelling at his foeman's feet.

"Because——" and the two other, sternly, and gazing upright before him with grave eyes, like one who recalls up the past.

"Because, sir, I—He has got a knife," cried Mildred, suddenly, and not too soon.

Clement had drawn a long weapon from some hidden pocket, and struck with it at his enemy with all his force. But, warned by Mildred's voice, the latter had partially turned, and the keen instrument Clement's wrist was hanging loose and useless, and the shining blade whirled through the air with a harmless flash, and fell into the dark pellucid Clement Carr uttered one yell of pain and baffled fury, then sank forth shriek on shriek of despair, terror, and agony, which, lifting up the neck to the brink of the dark river. Detestable, curses and the vilest oaths that the world could flow from his breathless, and almost a corpse, to the very brink, whence they could see the tide glided by as black as night, and as noiseless as the waves in a vaulted sepulchre. Why coward, my friend of the knife? My plotter against mother and child of your own kin—my coward, all the same?

"Because my wrist is broken, and you have got two hands to my one," cried Clement, vindictively.

Cator looked down upon his fallen lord, then sternly answered: "Cunning to the end; false to thy latest breath. Why should I scruple that ever offered itself to me? My treacherous life seemed to thee too base and mean, if it did but gain thine end? Nevertheless, I will be fair even to thee. See, I will use my left hand—only my left—to match with thine. Thou will be a little longer drowning, that is all. You don't-work made me lusty, else I did not mean to slay thee quite so soon."

"Do not slay him," broke in Mildred, earnestly, and not for the first time by many; but her appeals had been disregarded hitherto by her strange ally, and, perhaps, unheard in his heat and passion.

"Then, since you wish it, mistress, he shall live almost a quarter of an hour—and listen to the tale I mean to tell him, from the first, before I send him hence to join his brother Gideon in the pit of Tophet."

CHAPTER XL.—CATOR'S RECOMPENSE.

"My story is not short," began the servingman; "and lest this posture, with my fingers twisted in your mouth should weary you, my master, you shall lie down on the sand. Now, with your nose your coast, so as to feel you safe, and ready to squeeze your life out, like a worm's, should you show sign of movement, you shall hear me out. Two score of years ago, and more than that, my mother—Heaven rest her soul!—was coming across this hill with her sheep with a great burden. We had been wealthy once, or what seemed so to yeomen folks like us, but we had gradually grown poor. The house had let the natural head; and though our mother did all she could, and more than her strength warranted, to keep want from us, it was coming with near food. She was returning from market, and having sold what she took, was bringing back some household matters of which we stood in need. A good mother and a brave one; and if there be anything of goodness or courage left in me, this villain's overvant for these ten years past, I owe it to her."

As the man said these words, he doffed his cap, and over his rugged face a look of loving reverence crept, like sunshine on a weather-beaten wall.

It was spring-time then, as now—not such a spring as comes to Sandby, mistress, but what we northern folks are used to, rain, and sleet, and cold, and in the mountains, and on the moors dark as night, and more misleading. Our mother lost her way, and, wandering from what little track there was, plunged into a bog, and was all instantly, or morass, not dangerous to strong and active persons in the daytime, but to her, fatigued and overcome, and knowing where she was, most perilous. There, almost exhausted with vain efforts to escape, Ralph Clifford, now among the saints in Heaven, found her. He was a cripple in his youth, was ever roaming over the Fells alone, although no sportsman, and he knew them so well as any shepherd. Not only did he rescue my poor mother, but, finding her half-dead, bore her in his own strong arms to our very cottage door. When we had gathered from her own lips what the Master of Cliffe had done for her and us—and never shall I forget the loving care with which he brought her in and bade us tend her well, for that he knew himself what it was to lose a mother—she called Ralph her son and Love by her blessed and bade us swear, so long as her memory should be fresh and dear to us (as it is this day, God knows), to serve her darling, should ever he or she, or issues of our power. We did not need the oath to make us theirs; but they were rich, and in no want, at that time, of such help as we could render them. Years rolled on, and I dare say the squire forgot his good deed as well as those whom it had so bountiful; but I did not forget, although my lot had laid our mother in the grave. But a time came, when out of the cruse of the Cliffes' wealth an evil upon them even more than it—the Curse.

"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Raymond, and not for this alone. I know that I have seemed discourteous and unmannerly to you, mistress—of late, as you shall hear; I have been so for your own sake and the sake of that dear little one, whose grandsire saved my mother's life; but when I saw you first, the niece of that fiendish wretch who tempted me to sin, and of that reptile whom I have here beneath my foot, I gave you neither reverence nor respect: an evil seed, I thought, could not bring forth any but evil. You do not know, nor will I vex you by a recital of them, how hateful were the deeds of your kith and kin. I had loved my master, though dimly, though what I heard fell far short of the hideous truth; and when Squire Cyril was taken to the Jews, I volunteered to accompany him as his body-servant. There I did what I could for him, poor fellow, and for the rest of the wretched household in that loathsome place; but to all seeming I was as bad, or worse, as its master, Gideon, or as Lady Doug. But I only begin to wriggle, my friend, do you? I thought this would be bitter news.

"Yes, I played the fiend to please the devil; and I did please him; won the confidence of both and I did please him; won the confidence of both and Lady Doug, and Gideon, and even of their wily sister Grace. Yes, Mr. Clement, Miss Grace, as was, is double-dyed in her own woman, but my time came some her cunning. I need not tell you how you starved and tortured Cyril, and how at last Gideon got to (as we now know, or can guess) how he was by his brutal treatment. Before that time, I had been an unwilling witness to the ruin of Grace, and saw her sink lower in her toils the good, loud Master in his old age and gloom. This I could not prevent, nor even warn her of, for without risk of a discovery which would destroy my usefulness; and I perceived that I should be wasted yet to a greater purpose. Gideon, whom never shall the Dene receive within its cursed walls, although your sister counts upon it with such sureness. I could tell you how once that I was also fated to be—thank Heaven!—the guardian of Raymond's wife and of his child—the last of all the Cliffords, and the heiress of their accumulated wealth; but that thwarted it she was resolved to marry Gideon, I need not say what an unexpected obstacle occurred in your own marriage with Mr. Raymond. Her fury, when she found her niece had fled with him she hated most of all the Cliffords, was something worth beholding; and when I saw it, then, for the first time, I began to like you, mistress, as I never thought to like a Carr. Then I resolved to shield you also—being Raymond's wife and child—from your vengeful wrath, should a need arise. When, after finding out where you had hid your selves, your husband's death was plotted by his stepmother and her two brothers—of whom this wretch alone survives to pay the forfeit—I was privy to their plans. It was I who accompanied Gideon Carr, under his assumed name of Stevens, to Westportown as his servant, and strove to put you on your guard—in vain. I was and am that Well-wisher, from or on you heard so often, without ever guessing, up to this last hour, who that friend might be. I was out, indeed, in time to save your husband's life—the bridegroom of two years—the father of you helpless child—your only friend on earth'—

Here Clement made some motion with the sand.

"What, villain, doth that please thee? Dared then ten times that, that art so near to the open gates of hell? Before thou goest there, I have a message for thee for thy brother's ear—Raymond Clifford is not dead!

An inarticulate cry, like that of a wild beast in pain, broke from the lips of the prostrate man.

"It is true!" cried he. "He fell fifty fathoms sheer upon the sea-beach, and tosses now beneath the depths of ocean."

"Thou liest! Silence, devil! He did not fall. He is alive, and at Cliffe. This very hour he stands face to face with thy vile sister, and she, too, a murder fiend. But we all thought him dead, as then dost; and I took the child away and brought her hither, to keep under my eye and Lowry, lest he should slay her, too. But that God's vengeance overtook him in the very act, he would have drowned her and his mother likewise, even as he will now drown thee. Answer me not, or I will beat thy teeth in with my heel. The pent-up rage of half a quarter of years longs to be loose. There, let that quiet thee!"

"Spare him! for God's sake, spare him!" cried Mildred, passionately, as Cator's iron-bound boot crashed in the wretch's mouth and ground him in the sand.

"Yes, mistress, I will spare him—but only for the devil's sake, who is going to have his company —for five minutes longer. Where were we, Mr. Clement, when you were so indiscreet as to interrupt? Ah, I remember; I brought the child to Cliffe, as Isaac Rudge, since I was there known, and when Grace sent for you, I likewise wrote to bid you come, for I knew that I could manage her and Clement was laid-aside. Night and day I have watched over you and your little one ever since you set foot in Cliffe. When you came thither, I thought that I alone was left to guard you; but on the second day I recognized your husband in his artist's dress. Yes, Clement; the man Grace had of so carelessly as he knew not back in her deadly foe, and by this time she feels it. I was close by when Rufus knew his master, and thereby knew who he was. My eye was in my hand that morning, mistress, you remember, that was to be the boat if it had not chanced to mislike you. When you had left this cave I entered it, and made myself known to your husband, telling him how my service was altered, and Grace have suspected something amiss. The cloak of guild I have worn these many years has become so natural, that you could never guess me aught but the knave I looked; but Lucy—it was hard for her, whose heart is kind and true, to pretend hardness when it yearned toward the babe and you. In case you did not get poor Mr. Rupert to sign the paper, Grace might have struck some sudden blow in wrath, such as I could not ward; therefore, I brought about your interview with him at day-break, in the time appointed. The signing of that deed with its forged date has brought this woman within our power, to punish or to insult as we choose to—eye—"

"I will witness against her," interrupted Clement, eagerly, though with speech half-choked with sand and sea-brine, still. "She was always a self-seeker—Grace. I will do my duty, I will indeed, good Cator, though she is my sister."

The servant's withdrew his foot in hesitancy, as though the very contact of his heel with such a loathsome wretch had been pollution; and Mr. Cary, feeling his courage more in play, continued to improve the occasion.

"My testimony will be really most important, if you will not give in. I have been bitter against Grace so long. She has never behaved to me as a sister should be in sure; nor would she ever listen to my advice. These plots of yours," I have said again and again—you will do me justice, Lucy—are wicked and very discreditable."

"No, master—are fraught with too much danger. That was the line you always took. Do you think to deceive me, of all men? No. Those who know you not may, indeed, perhaps credit your damned hypocrisy; but they shall never have the power. Out of the talons of the bird you, reptile-like, might haply manage to wriggle, but out of my clutch thou shalt never creep. If there be enough in thine evil heart of that which to frame one prayer, though, methinks, I might wrest rope out of this sand as easily, make it frame it. I would I could say: 'God forgive thee!' but I cannot."

"Will God forgive thee, Cator, who thus takest the law into thy vicious hands?" said Mildred, solemnly.

"I will take my risk of that, mistress. I have seen too much of wrong and woe worked in this world, to trust to law for righting it. Leave me to deal with this fellow; it is not a case for woman's eyes. Art thou ready, wretch? It is thy time for drowning, Carr."

With a great effort, Clement Carr managed to seize Mildred's garment by the hem, and to that clung, in spite of Cator's efforts to unloose his hold.

"Then must I use my other hand!" quoth the service-man, grimly. "Tar down then shalt."

"Oh! Mildred, good niece Mildred, my own sister's child, will you see me slain before your eyes?"

"Cator," cried Mildred, passionately, "forbear, forbear! For my sake, for whom you have been so much, I pray you spare him."

"I can not, mistress. I dare not let slip this precious tyne, for which I have been longing through years of basest servitude, as Jacob longed for Rachel. This is my sole reward."

"He has been paid, niece Mildred," gasped the wretched Clement—"paid well and punctually—while during these late months——"

"Yes, I have been paid," broke in the other, fiercely, "but every farthing and shilling of it lies unspent, untouched, as though it were the price of blood. You dreamed it was, when you came with their gold to aid the murderer Gideon against my own husband, mistress. Will you say prayers him now?"

"Yes, yes," cried Mildred, earnestly, "and, for my husband's sake—for his child's sake, whose innocent hands will else be stained red for ever by this direful deed! The records of her house are stained enough already with blood and violence. Oh, forgive you, for her sake, the last of that illstarred race to which you owe much loving fealty, to spare this wretched man."

"Mistress," rejoined Cator, sternly, and still keeping his grips of Clement's throat, "are I entered this place to-day, with two base villains bound upon sweeping purposes, one from his foul path, as he had already swept your husband's, I would withdraw myself never again? should his vile body comes between the sunlight and the earth, nor wind of heaven be polluted by breathing it. So fling overboard I, yea in sorely and than that black stream, fleeting, no man knows whither, into the darksome hollows of the sands."

"Save me, niece Mildred—save me!" broke in the shrinking wretch. "I am your own mother's brother!"

"Moreover," continued Cator, "I made oath this morning, while this oily slave was composing your deeds, that never more should Gideon Clifford's eye rest on the would-be murderer of his child and wife, save in Heaven's heaven, if——"

"They never shall rest on me," pleaded Clement, passionately; "I will leave Cliffe, England, Europe forever. They never shall rest on me, upon my sacred soul!"

"Upon your what?"

"Then, look you, Cator," continued the abject wretch, "if you don't believe my solemn—nay, pray have patience with me. If Raymond Clifford took upon me, I give you leave to slay me on the spot, shoot me, cut me off by swiftest poison."

"Then give me leave—and poison! I tell thee, Clement Carr, if I do not drown thee now, and ever again I even so much as hear of thee, that straightway will I seek out thy foul haunt, and the hound shall tear and eat thy living limbs. And it come upon thee suddenly, alone or in the tumult of the streets, I care not, so that it come, that instant will I clutch thee by the throat, and in sight of God, I will look into thine eyes light on thee again, if mine ear hear thee, it were better for thee to have been drowned in child."

Upon his knees, half dead with pain and fear, Clement Carr dragged himself away, like a wounded animal, out of the range of the daylight.

"Mistress," continued Cator, in changed and quiet tones, "you have robbed me of half the recompense for which I have toiled these ten years. Let us now to Cliffe, where I trust the other half at least awaits me."

CHAPTER XLI.—THE LAST OBSTACLE REMOVED.

CHILL night had fallen upon Cliffe Hall, and while a few servants still remained about the house, the untimely sport, and hound and hunter stood with pricking ears, and listened for the horn in vain, in fear and wonder. Ever since noon, Grace had caused it to be said, and come over his wild and wayward brain; and evidently a change for the better. Still there was danger in it. The lull might grow to long and settled calm, or it might end in storm. Let all about him be kept still. Thus it happened that Mrs. Gibbs, as though the hours of darkness were its accustomed season, kept watch and ward, while Clifford herself set the example by retiring early, and in her own bedchamber the lamp was quenched. She had suffered much during the day, and was in no quire how their mission had ended, and had studiously avoided that portion of the house which Mildred and Cator had made their purpose—as to felt no sting of conscience for the deed which she had ordered to be done that afternoon, but it banished for the moment all other purposes save its firm as ever, but not her mind. She had been wont to look as calmly on her past with all its sins as on the future before the commission of them; and the means which it was necessary to employ for the accomplishment, apologetics in spite of herself to overcome them. But now she shrank from retrospection, and, indeed, from thought of all kind whatever. Her mind, which before had been so wicked, who have wickedness upon hand, are so far fortunate; it is when they have gained all their ends finally and that their work is complishment begins. Grace Clifford, nothwithstanding that she had stepped her soul in guilt, had as yet reaped nothing. Wealth, indeed, she had in large, she had labored in vain. Her heart was weary of deeds and crime. She longed, almost as the penitent, for peace, for the hour when there should be no further need for lies, dissimulating such continuous cure in act and speech, and for violent deeds, from which anxious risk was so inseparable.

"But one more crime," thought she—as though one launched upon a glissade in the Alps, and bound for a crevasse, should say: But one more slide—" and then my path is plain and level to the end. While this hair-brained fellow dwells here I can never feel the mistress of Cliffe Hall. Why should I wait until his madness is full-blown? What sanity he has but shows itself in sly suspicion, which itself is dangerous to me, or else in open hate." It was strange that she should accuse herself for what she was about to do, since she had done such far worse deeds than that which she now contemplated upon the road to her yet unreached goal; but such was the case. Perhaps it was that Rupert had been his father's favorite at first; and even the less decisive approach to remorse which she had ever experienced had touched her with respect to her treatment of Ralph Clifford, the man who had wronged her, if after a somewhat dating fashion. In her scheme against Raymond, she had strengthened herself by means about her heart by nature to mind his disobedience to the old man's wishes, as she chose to consider him, and to withhold from and extorted from him about Rupert's marriage. Raymond had robbed his brother of the bride which his father, as well as she herself, had destined for him; Raymond, too, had so little reverence for the things the old man had held sacred, that it would not have been seen him ruin at Cliffe. But Rupert, by no jesuitry of even her subtle brain could she justify her present purpose against him. He was in no way something positively abhorrent in it, inasmuch as it had for its object the very catastrophe the fear of which had embittered Ralph's whole life. In order to overthrow his son's already shaken intellect, she was about to employ the most terrible cruel weapon by which she done to death, although inadvertently, his father.

She knew that none but Raymond, and probably Mildred, had been aware of her having played the part of the Fair Lady of Cliffe. Rupert himself must have had no suspicion of it; and although he had of late become such a dare-devil in some respects, he still, she knew, retained the superstitious awe with which connected him, when he did not hunt, to pass many hours of the night upon the roof of Cliffe Hall, in order, as he had told her, to get a good breath, to consult his father's spirit, which roamed about the spot where he had died. Of this she was convinced. That very day he had announced his intention of so doing, and ever since nightfall Grace had been waiting for him, attired in her old disguise. Crouching in an angle of the central tower, in her dark and shapeless dress, with her long hair about her face, her shoulders and her head a shroud, or what appeared to be so, she looked indeed, in the sickly light of that crescent moon, a specter. Such was the reason of her bravest and most sane. Tarrying so long alone, in the very spot where Ralph had perished at her hands, at early dawn, she had driven a dagger through his heart, had tried even her nerves, and her fears had been worn and haggard with that fearful watch. The night-wind, too, from off the wastes of Bibble Fell, blew full upon her, and chilled her blood, and made it seem as cold, but with many a strange and stealthy sound; putting shrill voices into the gargoyles' mouths, that seemed to mock her with human dumb; using the water-pipes as speaking-trumpets through which to tell the household where the mistress was; and carrying the leaves of withered leaves of autumn along the leaden roof, like some great company of ghosts without a burial-place in consecrated earth, who had come to Cliffe Hall in his every ferry, only to be denied the wished-for passage.

At last she heard a door open and then shut, and in the haste and violence of the action, recognized Rupert's step. It was not, however, quick or slowly or with care. To think, to speak, except by impatient, unconnected snatches, has long been difficult to him, as the last few months have become hurried. For a moment he stands irresolute, and throws a hasty glance in the direction of the tower in which his grandmother stands hid; then falls to pacing rapidly to and fro along the eastward leads. These are fringed by a low parapet and broken by stone piers, and anon, he pauses, and looks down upon the rose-garden, which lies, although at a great depth, just below the terrace on either side of it spreads the stately terrace, and below, the sloping lawn, ringed by the moat, here shining like shoy with the moonbeams, there lustreless as a pall beneath the overshadowing bank. Beyond, the wooded park, the village and church, Cliffe itself southward with the rich and teeming lowlands, and on the north, creeps half-way up the base of the Pennine Fell. Over against Clifford's eye, though bright and even piercing, nature has neither charm nor awe; and yet there is special attention in them too. It is never for child-gazing on his fingers One, Two, Three and Four, and at the fourth he seems to measure the distance from where he stands to the rose-garden below. "There I fell before her," he says; "down you stone stairs, which ever since have seemed like cataracts. Grace let her be laid where she was, as the brier hung forth the rose. There was our trysting-place, and there—yes, there—I was murdered, and by her, when all is over. After life's sinful fever, men sleep well, 'tis said. I hope so, for I have need of a long rest, and shall rest well as in that spot hallowed by the most sacred recollections. What is the chapel to me, or I to the chapel? Let Guy and Bertram, Lucy Gibbs and Cyril, guard the edge of sanctity. They like it—it smells in my nose like dead man's bones. Give me the odor of roses-roses——"

"Rupert Clifford!"

The youth man turned, and beheld the boding phantom of his house standing close beside him. With a cry of terror, he threw up his arms, stepped swiftly backward, and in an instant had toppled over the low parapet; but, even as he fell, that instinct which, unlike our fair-weather friend, Reason, remains with us till death, made him catch at the stone coping, where, with both hands, he hung. Grace slowly thrust her cold white face above the balustrade, and then withdrewit hastily, terrified to see him so near, striving with feet and fingers, whom she had thought by that time to be three days below and many still strife; yet not hastily, but that his upturned gaze met hers and recognized her wicked eyes.

"One, one," cried he, and, with a frantic effort such as a sane man could scarcely have put forth, drew himself upward to the parapet itself, and clutched it with nerveless grip. Upon his holding fast the arms of another life than his depended. If once he reached the top, not all the subtlety of woman could save her from prompt death in five minutes. She knew it well; she read it in the hungry looks which, even at that moment peril, craved for vengeance, rather than for safety; she heard it in the deadly menace of his "One, one, two," reiterated with frightful hate and vengeance, and yet as though it were her knell of doom. Grace had never meant to take his life, but only to rob him of that little store of reason left remained to him. His failing backward was an unforeseen mischance; but now that it was a question of life or death for her, she was by no means irresolute. She threw herself at once upon his clutching fingers, and, with the force and fury of a wild-cat, strove to unloose their hold.

"Friend, liar, whom now I know, but you shall pay for this!" shrieked Rupert, breathless with fury, as he beat as much as with his entire strugglies. "I will spoil one face of this Fair Lady as you are known to have spoiled his."

"Not so," hissed Grace, as, one by one, she tore his bleeding fingers from their hold.

"Then I will, strong woman that I, laughed Rupert, harshly; "then I go to the rose-bud a day sooner, that is all." Yet, with a madman's cunning, even as he spoke, he contrived with his clutch of the stone for her own flesh. "You see I have your hand now, Mrs. Grace. Since we are about to part, you must let me kiss it."

But, with a cry of terror lest he should bite it through, Grace snatched it from his now feeble grasp, and let it fall, and sank over upon the parapet-walk which he had so often paced that very day, and lay there senseless.

"He sought his doom," murmured Grace, huskily, as she once more peered over the balustrade. "He has met his death more himself and, perhaps, it is better so. How strange that he should have met the self-same fate as——"

Here she suddenly paused, and turned inclined, with her hand upon her heart, to still its rapid throbbings. Up the private stairs close by, which led from the lady's grandmother's room to the roof, there was a hurrying step, whose every footfall struck her with unimaginable terror. Grace knew the step of a foe to whose another woman proved fatal of her lover. It was a swift and vigorous stride, such as she well knew had belonged but to one man in Cliffe Hall—and he was Dead!

THE DIET OF WORMS.—Many persons are not aware of the fact that the earthworm really does live upon earth. It is a common and very popular works on zoology that the worm picks out portions of earth to eat, and devours them, just as we do a piece of cake; the earthworm lives upon earth. It must not be supposed that it assimilates the mineral constituents of the earth in the same way as ordinary animals digest the decomposing animal and vegetable matter which they consume. The amount of earth in the stone time the swallowing of earth is an assistance to the worm as it improves in the process of digestion large quantities of material are thereby removed from the mouth and carried into the hinder portions of the intestine little masses of digested earth on the surface is thus caused, by the action of which the worm effects such wonderful changes on the surface of the ground, and which are known as worm-casts. The worm, with its fresh and fertile soil where formerly was a barren waste. The organs in which the earthworm resolves the earth is somewhat curious; its pharynx is extremely muscular, and is capable of being turned inside out; tunic, which acts within like the piston of an air-pump, and thus it draws into the mouth as much as is sucked in and passed on by the action of the muscular coat of the gullet and stomach behind. It is no doubt that worms do an immense deal of good by turning up the soil, and so to their habits of life of plants and shrubs, as is sometimes said of them, why, it is a mistake. They could not do it, if they would, as they have no teeth; they are quite satisfied with the earth as it is, and thoroughly nauseed, but with all the better. It is this last fact which brings them round the mouth, and the fact of their swallowing earth that they come to bite them; whereas they really come after the decomposing animal matter.

A TURKISH STORY.—A young man going a journey, left a number of bonbons in his drawer. When he came back, the old man desired having had some of the bonbons with him, and he was put before the Khadee.

"Did you, young man, when you delivered this money?"

"I have seen it."

"Take my seal and somewhat that tree," said the Khadee, "and bring me a fig from it." It was out time, and the tree will obey when you show it my seal."

The young man went in search. After he had been gone some time the Khadee said to the old man:

"He is long. Do you think he has got I core yet?"

"No," said the old man; "it is a distant distance. He has not got there yet."

"Then, by the great Khadee, old man," cried the Khadee, "where that tree is?"

The young man returned, and said the tree would not come.

"He has been here, young man, and given his evidence. The money is thine."

THE OLDEN TIME.—Professor Silliman, in his diary, speaks of a visit he made to Stratford in 1775. It was rather an contrast with the Saratoga of our times. He says: "We mount on our incessant day and rode seven or eight miles through the pine forest, with its delightful fragrance, and arrived at a place where they said there were some natural springs. There was not even a village, but only two or three log-houses standing among the pine trees. The people were civil, and provided hay for our horses, and for ourselves some bread and milk. Here we began to see a serious wine. Nature was unsubdued, and stepping cautiously from log to log, we soon arrived at a spring which they called the 'Congress Spring,' which tasted as it does now."

THE WITCHES' CALDRON.

THERE is scarcely a production of any country that cannot likewise be found in California, which teems with everything pertaining to earth, air, and water, and many of whose exhaustless treasures have not yet been unveiled. The largest trees, the most stupendous waterfalls, the highest mountains, the richest mines, the most beautiful valleys—all these do not complete the catalogue of wonders in this wonderful State. In the Petoluma region there is a cañon containing a number of geysers and remarkable springs. One of these, the Witches' Caldron, is shown in our illustration. The caldron is a hole sunk in the precipitous side of the mountain, and is of unknown depth. It is filled to the brim with something like burnt cork and water, the principal ingredient being black sulphur. This liquid blackness is in constant motion, bubbling and surging from side to side, and throwing up its boiling spray to the height of three or four feet.

ALABASTER LIME-KILN.

SOME thirty miles from Sacramento, there is a beautiful cave, called the Alabaster Cave, which is a point of great interest to visitors. Near its entrance there stands a lime-kiln, where a large portion of the lime used in San Francisco is manufactured. A night view of this kiln, in full blast, is an imposing sight. The red-hot doors at the base, with the light flashing on the faces of the men, as they stir the fire, with the flames escaping from the top, added to the deep ravine, darkened by tall overhanging trees, while high above, the moon throws her silvery light on every surrounding object—these make up a picture it is impossible to describe.

NIGHT SCENE ON THE SAN JOAQUIN RIVER.

THE San Joaquin river is divided into three branches, known respectively, as the West, Middle, and East Channels; the latter being not only the main stream, but the one used by steamboats in going to and from Stockton.

ALABASTER LIME-KILN BY MOONLIGHT, NEAR SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA.

An apparently interminable sea of grass and reeds extends nearly one hundred and fifty miles south, up the valley of the San Joaquin, and when this is on fire, as not unfrequently the case during the fall and early winter months, the broad sheet of licking and leaping flame, and the vast volumes of smoke that rise, and eddy, and surge hither and thither, present a scene of fearful grandeur at night that is suggestive of some earthly pandemonium.

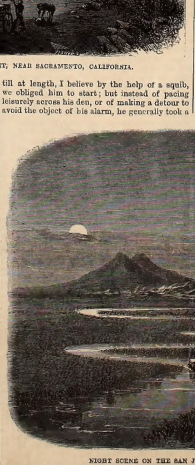
The illustration on this page gives a view of such a scene resembling very closely the fires on the great Western prairies.

THE FRIGHTENED TIGER.

THE brute creation manifests as many striking peculiarities of character, departing from all fixed rules and setting aside all established principles, as we find among men. The boldest sometimes give way to causeless fears, and the most timid display unflinching courage.

In following anecdote of a tiger, an animal not noted for delicacy of feeling, is illustrative of this fact:

"But what annoyed him far more than our poking him up with a stick, or tantalizing him with shins of beef or legs or mutton, was introducing a mouse into his cage. No fine lady ever exhibited more terror at the sight of a spider than this magnificent royal tiger betrayed on seeing a mouse. Our mischievous plan was to tie the little animal by a string to the end of a long pole, and thrust it close to the tiger's nose. The moment he saw it, he leaped to the opposite side; and when the mouse was made to run near him, he jammed himself into a corner, and stood trembling and roaring in such an ecstasy of fear, that we were always obliged to desist in pity to the poor brute. Sometimes we taunted on his passing over the spot where the unconscious little mouse ran backward and forward. For a long time, however, we could not get him to move; till at length, I believe by the help of a squib, we obliged him to start; but instead of pacing leisurely across his den, or of making a detour to avoid the object of his alarm, he generally took a kind of flying leap, so high as nearly to bring his back in contact with the roof of his cage."



THE WITCHES' CALDRON, CALIFORNIA.

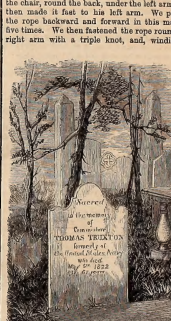
A WELL-TRAINED DOG.

A CORRESPONDENT at Lasalle, Ill., sends us the following description of a sagacious dog owned in that place: "The dog is a thoroughbred setter, of a beautiful brown color, and a first-class hunter. She will bring meat, milk, or any article you desire, if furnished with a proper vessel for carrying it. She goes to the post-office and gets the letters and papers. Should her master, either by accident or design, drop anything, and inform the dog of the fact, by a word or two, she will immediately return and obtain it. While out hunting, her owner frequently sends her home for a supply of powder, caps, and shot, which she will bring to him, even if he is five or six miles from home. In fact, she manifests almost a human intelligence, and has been trained to perform a great variety of feats. On one occasion, her master made a wager that she would obtain a sum of money from the bank without the knowledge of the officers, and in a short time the knowing brute succeeded in carrying off five hundred dollars. But she is useful as well as amusing. While duck-shooting one day, her owner accidentally fell into deep water, and being unable to swim, would soon have drowned; but the faithful animal plunged in after him, and by her timely assistance saved his life."

SCENE NEAR THE CATARACTS OF THE ROVUMA.

THE Rovuma is a river in Eastern Africa, unknown to geography until explored and described by recent travelers. The illustration presents a very common scene in that country, where women are made the slaves of men, and perform all the drudgery. Fish, constituting an important article of their food, these natives become very expert in catching them, and with their rude nets are able to procure a supply sufficient for their wants. A great quantity of excellent honey is also collected along the river, by bark hives being placed for the bees on the high trees on both banks. Large pots of it, very good and clear, are offered in exchange for a very little cloth, an article greatly prized by the natives.

NIGHT SCENE ON THE SAN JOAQUIN RIVER, CALIFORNIA.



JUGGLERY IN INDIA.

THE Indian juggler, as is well known, is very expert in his art. He can climb up a pole, keep up a number of balls at a time, draw ribbon from his mouth, eat fire, or swallow a sword, with an adroitness quite equal to that of his brother artist of the West.

Some of the performances are still more wonderful to the European eye. A half-naked juggler, with his arms and shoulders bare, takes in his hand the fresh twig of a tree, and, running his fingers along it, strips off the leaves. To the astonishment of the spectator, a number of live scorpions fall with the leaves to the ground! There is no doubt about it. There they are, struggling on the floor. How did they come there? Who can tell? The juggler waves his arms in the air, gathers the scorpions up in his hand, and they disappear in the same mysterious way they came.

The Indian juggler attempts still greater feats than these. He actually contrives to sit on the air, at a distance of three or four feet from the ground, without any visible support whatever. There is a mystery about it which our European inquisitiveness has scarcely yet been able to fathom.

The rope-tying trick, so well exposed in this country, is also known in India. The following account of it, as performed by an Indian juggler, lately appeared in a Madras journal: "A native sat in a strong blackwood arm-chair. We fastened a rope to his right arm, passed it under the arm of the chair, round the back, under the left arm, and then made it fast to his left arm. We passed the rope backward and forward in this manner five times. We then fastened the rope round the right arm with a triple knot, and, winding it round the ropes passing behind the chair about twenty times, made a triple knot at the left arm. We then carried on the rope to the wrists, and made them fast by crossing, recrossing and knotting it. The thumbs were then tied together, and the rope carried back to the wrist and knotted. Afterward we tied his legs together, above the ankles, crossing and recrossing the rope in a complicated manner. We next bound his big toes together, and carried back the rope to the tie on his legs. We had used nineteen yards of rope—quite enough, we thought, to make him secure. The man could not move his hands either to his arms or his legs, so as to touch an end of the rope, and, if he could have done so, they were tied so tightly, as, in our judgment, to prevent him from using them. When he thought the tie was weak, he asked that it might be strengthened; gave us perfect liberty to tie him as we liked, and, at his request, we continued binding him after he appeared to us to be quite secure. More than twenty minutes elapsed before we had finished binding him. I afterward put a paper round the rope where it crossed between his legs, and where the last knot was tied, and sealed it with sealing-wax and a stamp.

"We left him at the west side of my study, seated in the blackwood arm-chair before mentioned, he promising that when we returned he would be sitting in a teak arm-chair on the east side, with the ropes arranged exactly as we had left them. In five minutes he summoned us, and we found the paper and seal undamaged, and every knot and portion of the rope as we had arranged them—only he was seated in the teak arm-chair. I wished to see if he could unfasten himself, and left him to do so. In four and a half minutes he recalled us. We found the rope stretched out over the floor, and the man unbound and erect before us. We could have remained in the room by allowing him to cover himself with a sheet during the performance of the trick."

Another character which the Indian juggler assumes is that of the snake charmer. He goes about with a covered basket on his head, containing one of three cobras. This snake has the reputation of being very venomous. It certainly looks mischievous, but beautiful, too, with its arched neck and hooded crest.

When about to exhibit his art, the snake charmer sets his basket on the ground, and begins to play softly on the flute. After playing for some time, he kneels down, lifts the lid, and blows upon the snakes. He then stops back a few paces and begins to play gain. After a little, the snakes, one after another, raise their heads and look about them, with their arched necks and forked tongues looking very dangerous. The snake charmer continues to play on the flute, with which the snakes appear charmed and delighted. They stand erect, waving their heads backward and forward, keeping time to the music, and darting forward their forked tongues to strike if any one goes near them. Sometimes you may see half a dozen of them all standing at once, with their heads and necks raised a foot or so from the ground, and waving backward and forward to the sound of the music. When the music ceases, they lie down as if exhausted by the effort.

The snake charmer seems to have the snakes completely under his control. When they dart forward, as if to strike, he whisks the end of his scarf at them and quiets them instantly. If he wishes to catch one of them, he seizes it by the tail with one hand, and moves the other quickly along the body to its neck, where he holds it fast. The creature is completely in his power, and though it opens its jaws and thrusts out its tongue, it can do no harm.

The snake charmer sometimes plies his vocation in another fashion. He goes from door to door, seeking employment, and offering his services to catch any snakes that may be lurking in holes in the house or garden. The means he employs for this purpose are very simple. He merely plays on a flute. After playing for some time, the snakes come from their holes, attracted by the music.

Certain it is that snakes frequently appear on these occasions, which the snake charmer allures from their retreat. But whether they were there before, or were put there by the snake charmer himself, is a question involved in some obscurity. The general opinion seems to be that they are put there for a purpose, after undergoing a certain training, and having their poison extracted.

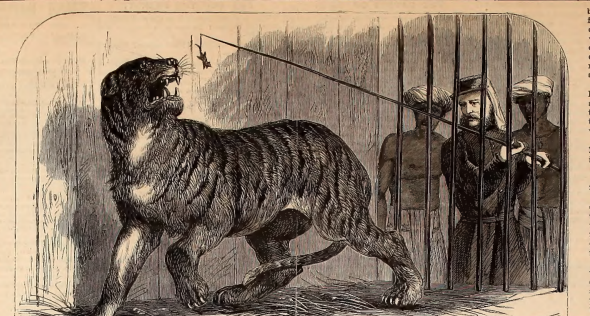
Elephant Shooting.

I had been three months in Ceylon, lodged in the Mansion House. I was reclining one morning in my bed, contemplating that splendid sea into which the Ganges pours its waters, when a friend of mine—a nephew or pupil, I am not quite sure which, of Sir Robert Peel—came into my room.

"What good wind brings you here this morning, Sir William?" I asked.

"You are a sportsman! Will you join us tomorrow in an elephant hunt?"

"An elephant hunt! How long would it last?"



"Seven or eight days. Have you any arms?"

"Oh, yes; I have my rifle."

"That won't do. You must have three double-barreled rifles, or I won't answer for your life."

"But, my dear friend, what shall I do with such an arsenal?"

"Oh, don't trouble yourself about that; the attendants will see to your arms. I will provide what is necessary for you."

A TIGER FRIGHTENED AT A MOUSE.

The sun, I must tell you, is awfully punctual in Ceylon. It always gets up at six, and goes to bed at six, the whole year round. It comes and goes out like a flash of lightning. I was ready and mounted whilst it was still dark. At Sir William's I found four or five of the party already assembled; others were to join us on the way. Our route lay along the banks of a splendid river, wide as the Seine at Rouen. The road was shaded with the most varied and magnificent vegetation. Crossing a bridge, we were joined by four more sportsmen. We were thus eleven in all, and as each had three or four attendants, the whole party amounted to some fifty persons.

One attendant walked at the head of each horse, another in the rear. The first was to hold the horse, the latter to keep off the flies. They did not use the fan for themselves—the natives are never hot.

Our first station was a temple of Buddha—a very holy spot, as it contained one of the tusks of the sacred elephant. This relic is so much more precious, as the Ceylonese elephants have no tusks. The tooth of the same animal was buried ten leagues deep in the ground beneath a neighboring cupola, which exactly resembled half an egg.

The farther off we left the town, the less populated was the country; at the same time, living things became more numerous. Every now and then gigantic lizards were seen by the roadside, lifting up their flat heads or fore-feet, and pushing forth a tongue six inches in length. Snakes were also seen gliding in the grass.

On the same afternoon we arrived at Potsaye, where we dined and slept, starting early next morning on the road to Newra-Ellia. The road had now become so narrow through plantations, that only one horseman could proceed at a time, and beyond the plantations we came to a jungle interspersed with rocks. There we first met with monkeys. I shot one, and never did I regret a thing more. I have killed two or three adversaries in duels, but I never felt what I did in contemplating the agony of that caricature of a man called the monkey.

Shortly afterward we arrived at a coffee plantation, in the centre of which was a habitation. Sir William clapped his hands, and an attendant made his appearance.

"Whose house is this?" inquired Sir William.

"Sir Andrew's," was the reply.

"Is he at home?"

In answer to the announcement that the host was absent, Sir William contented himself with ordering a repast for fifty, and we took up our quarters there till the Wednesday. In this we hospitality is practiced in Ceylon.

The next day we breakfasted at Newra-Ellia, and ascending another high jungle, reached Elephant's Plain the same evening. Unluckily a storm came on, and we had to take refuge in a wayside hut, with nothing but a few biscuits for supper.

This time Count Horace regretted he had not kept the monkey. It was young, and might have been tender. Jupiter Tonans kept walking about all night at about twenty feet distance over their heads, and no one got even a wink of sleep.

Next morning it was resolved to commence sport in earnest. It was no longer a matter of amusement: it was a question of absolute necessity. The dogs were let loose, the attendants dispersed over the jungle, and the gunners followed close upon their tracks.

Scarcely five minutes had elapsed ere the dogs gave tongue, but without stirring from the spot. Whatever it was it did not leave its lair.

I hastened to the spot where the dogs were congregated, making fearful noise.

"Take care," shouted Sir William. "It is a tiger!"

I must acknowledge that the information nailed me to the spot. I had often heard tigers talked about, and always in the most unfavorable manner. But I heard at the same time my companions advancing on all sides, and cutting their way through the jungle with their hunting-knives. I knew that I was nearest to the animal, and did not like being superseded. A heavy perspiration bedewed my forehead, so I repeated the words of Henry IV.:

"Ah, carcass, you tremble! Well, I will give you something to tremble for."

So saying, I rushed forward, and in a step or two stood face to face with the wild beast. The tiger made a movement, as if to receive me after his own fashion. Luckily two great dogs held it back, one by the throat, the other by the ear; three or four more dogs had hold of it behind. Others kept barking at the distance of a few paces.

The head of the animal, drawn on one side by the dogs [all sought to turn toward me, as if instinct told its owner that the greatest danger lay in that quarter. The tiger's yellow eyes shone with the lustre of carbuncles, and a furious foam bathed its open mouth, exposing in the rear two rows of formidable-looking white and sharp teeth. I began by fixing the animal. I knew that so long as a man has the courage to meet the eyes, be is of a lion, tiger, or panther, he influences it. But let the look waver, and he is lost.

The voices of my companions were getting nearer and nearer. There was no time for hesitation, unless I chose to be lost. So taking my hunting-knife in hand, I went straight up to the tiger, without ever quitting his eye, and then with the tranquility which characterizes me when I have once made up my mind, I plunged my knife up to the hilt immediately behind the shoulder-blade.

The animal made such a violent plunge that it drew the weapon out of my hand.

I leaped aside.

Once more the tiger made an effort to bound, but the dogs still held fast. It then rolled over, and in a moment was covered with the dogs, who at this signal of its agony simultaneously rushed in on all sides.

At this crisis Sir William came up. Lashing away at what appeared to be a perfect of dogs' tails, he soon cleared a way to the tiger.

"Whose is the knife?" he exclaimed, dragging it forth from the wound.

"Mine," I answered.

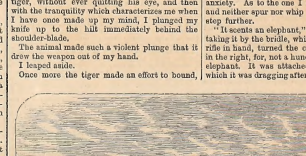
"Bravo, for a beginning."

"Excuse the faults of the author," I ventured to remark, as I wiped my knife with my pocket handkerchief and replaced it in its scabbard.

All this was done with a simplicity which earned for me the unanimous praises of all present. Hungry as we were, we could not eat a tiger, so barely five minutes had elapsed after its death when we were once more in the jungle. Another five minutes, and the dogs gave tongue again; but this time the noise moved away rapidly.

"A stag, gentlemen," exclaimed Sir William; "our dogs have found us a breakfast. Get ready the jacks and the gridirons; there will be enough for everybody."

Suddenly the noise ceased.



"Good," continued Sir William; "the animal is run down. Ah! they are splendid dogs, my dear Horace; I believe they would fetch up a hippopotamus from the bottom of the Ganges. Let us to the beast, gentlemen—to the game."

This time Sir William arrived first, and when we got up he was wiping his hunting-knife. A gigantic stag lay at his feet, breathing its last. Sportsmen and attendants alike shouted with joy. There was truly, as he said, enough for everybody. The attendants set to work at once, digging holes, lighting fires and extemporizing spits of ironwood. These were placed on poles, stuck crosswise in the ground, one on each end. Notwithstanding their indifference to heat, they had to be changed every five minutes. As to the offal, it was put into another hole and covered with live embers, and these, again, with dry wood.

In less than one hour we were at work, and wine, rice and biscuits made the complement of one of the most delicious meals I ever partook of.

Our repast finished, we mounted our horses and took the direction of Bintenul. It is between Bintenul and Badula that most elephants are met with. At less than a mile distance from where we had lunched the road makes a bend. At this turning our horses began to exhibit symptoms of anxiety. As to the one I rode, it got obstinate, and neither spur nor whip could get it to take a step further.

"It scents an elephant," said my horse-keeper, taking it by the bridle, while I jumped down, and, rifle in hand, turned the corner. My keeper was in the right, for, not a hundred paces off, I saw an elephant. It was attached to a great iron roller, which it was dragging after it, in order to level the rood. At a little distance, there was another, with its keeper, employed in piling stones for a parapet. It is needless to say that, although such mistakes have occurred, roadster elephants and mason elephants were not considered to be legitimate game, so we continued our way to Bintenud.

Arrived at Bintenud, we had to leave our horses and to cut our way through the jungle. This was in pursuit of elephants whose traces had been discovered by the natives some few days previously. Progress was laborious—for there were nearly two leagues of jungle to cut one's way through. At length we arrived, almost breathless, at a small round space, about twice as large as the Corn Hall in Paris, which had only been created for the elephants. Everything was trodden down by the bulky weight of the animals, who had made litter of the trunks of trees.

There were two or three gallis in the jungle, herd, separated into two bands, had gone off in different directions.

We stopped short—we had arrived.

Sir William, who was more familiar with elephant-hunting than any of us, imparted his final instructions. These directions were more particularly addressed to some as novices in the art.

Behmod is not with a population in my ears which told me very plainly that my blood was not in its ordinary condition.

I must acknowledge that I had been terrified on contemplating the evidence of destruction around me, and I could not help seeing myself with a mass, more or less, of those footsteps to bend the grass, which raises itself up again when he has passed—should one such a attack monsters that erush forever under their feet and tread down trees never to rise again.

Sir William had made a six or seven hundred elephants. He had kept a record up to five hundred beyond that he had given up enumerating his victims. He was the first to rush with his companions when, having fired at a young one, the mother had rushed at him before he could get another rifle from a native attendant, and had thrown him up in its trunk, only throwing him away to resist the accumulated aid that had come up. He had been in such peril as I was upraised to two before he could take a full breath.

Well, Sir William's instructions were, that we were not to aim at elephants with tusks,* they are kings; not at white elephants—they are holy. Nor were we to shoot young elephants, as the mother would charge the party. As to shooting the remainder, there was only one unreasonable point, and that was in the centre of the forehead, where there is a depression in the skull about the diameter of a man's hat. If fairly hit, the animal would fall at once; if not, it would single out its assailant from a hundred, and charge him. The point was, then, to await the animal till it was within a few feet, then step lightly on one side, and give it another ball in the ear. According to Sir William, this was the most common-place proceeding imaginable. I unwarrantably solved to surprise my companions by doing some feat that went beyond the instructions.

It was then, I say, in my mind, for the attendants were shouting out that the elephants were coming on. Suddenly, as I looked up, there appeared to be the sound of a hurricane, and we felt the earth quake under our feet.

About twenty elephants were coming along one of the tunnels. "Only three, a male, a female, and a young one," Sir William shouted out in English. "I have kept them for you and your friends. All I ask is, that I shall have these three."

Then calling to my attendants to come along with the spare rifles, I rushed before the elephants: I could have sought shelter behind a tree, but I did not. I was proud of myself of such ball, and took up my place in the middle of the path. As to my attendants, they changed color like cameleons. Then, with a loud yell, they gradually began—only one seemed resolute.

"Let those who are frightened go away," I said; and I told the more courageous one to take a rifle in each hand and to stand by me. The others disappeared in the jungle.

I had my eyes fixed on the colossuses; they appeared to be real mastodons. When they were not more than fifty paces from me, I took aim at the young one; it was trotting along between its mammy and its dad.

I pulled the trigger, and she just staggered as if drunk, and then fell like a heavy, inert mass. The mother uttered a fearful cry—a parent's cry —at once grievous and threatening, and then stopped to lift up her offspring.

The father rushed at me at once.

When he was within paces of me, I planted a ball in his forehead.

Carried away by his impetuosity, he went on beyond me. I had stepped on one side, and, while doing so, had got another rifle. The colossus attempted to turn round upon me, but he could not so, he stumbled. Soon his hind-legs followed the example of his fore-limbs; then, uttering a deep moan that rolled off into a sigh, he fell dead.

At this cry of agony, the female, abandoning her young one, turned toward me.

It occurred to me to take advantage of her having her head in front, as she came down upon me. I waited till the animal was only two paces off, then, jumping a little on one side, I placed my rifle close to her ear, and fired off both barrels at once.

Half the beast's head went in by the same hole as the discharge. Powder, balls and paper showed the way.

"Well!" I exclaimed, "let everyone do as much —three elephants in four shots. O'est joli!"

And, taking my seat on the young one, which was about the size of a horse, I took out my timbor-box and lighted a cigar.

* Sir James Emerson Tennant says: "Not one elephant in a hundred is found with tusks in Ceylon, and the few that possess these are exclusively males. Nearly all, however, have done stand a procesus, which are solid bones about ten or twelve inches in length, and one or two in diameter.

THE CAUSES OF RAIN.

THE sun, the great reservoir of rain, seems placed in the system of nature to be the grand medium between the land and water. Books inform us that the atmosphere is a compound of oxygen and nitrogen gas; but, in fact, an atmosphere consisting simply of these is not to be found in our system. So much greater is the affinity of air for water than the attractions of the particles of water for each other, that all over the world, even at the ice by, where water perpetually hastens from the liquid to the solid form, the air is drawing moisture into itself, lising as it were the surface of the water, and filling itself with vapor. Sir David Brewster has called this capacity of air when in motion to dissolve moisture, when at Zestoys its most common form, and compels it to become, like itself, a light elastic gas.

Suppose the sun by its influence to go on over the ocean, the surface of the two expanses will touch each other, and the air above the water will become charged with vapor. This moisture will gradually diffuse itself through the layer of air next above it, and so on till it has permeated the entire body of air, the owest stratum drawing up fresh moisture from the deep as fast as it is delivered to the former load. This, however, would of itself be a very slow process; it would be many days before the whole vast mass of salt is allowed to dissolve at the bottom of a vessel containing water; supposing the mixture to remain still, a long time elapsed before a portion of the compound solidification, but let it be stirred—that is, let the saturated solution of water be removed from contact with the salt and the less saline portion be substituted, and the process will be rapidly perfected. The rapid diffusion of vapor through the atmosphere is provided for by winds which remove the moist air from the aqueous surface, and bring in dry air in succession to receive its charge. From a square mile of water, for a hundred miles to windward, dry air evaporates. The extent of watery vapor envelopes our earth, at any moment, is a large quantity, and is the result of many and subtle rules. Notwithstanding the great extent of this moisture, it is attenuated form. If the air were suddenly condensed to liquid water and deposited on the earth, it would cover the whole globe to a depth of from four to five inches. It is estimated that the atmosphere contains at any moment a layer of moisture of water five times in every year.

The quantity of moisture which a given measure of air will hold is solution, depends on the degree of its temperature. The higher the temperature, the less the pulse, in consequence of the extreme cold, the air is held—that is, its power of solution is suspended, or on but very little water has been absorbed; hence the wind which, coming from the north, is generally very dry. Under the line, and throughout the tropics, evaporation goes on with extraordinary speed. When the water is warmer than the air, the vapor does not rise, but simply mixes with the atmosphere. On the contrary, the air is the warmer, the vapor rises, until, under certain circumstances, it becomes condensed, and appears as a cloud. It is for this reason that clouds are so frequently seen in the morning and evening, and almost always generally announces the approach of rain. Should the air be suddenly saturated with vapor that is, should its temperature produced by a very small elevation or depression, be reduced to the point of saturation, rain will be the instant result.

We have seen that the quantity of vapor in the atmosphere is subject to a rather close law, when the air is temperature. But it must be remembered that, at any moment, the quantity of vapor in the air is a very small consideration; it was like the number eight to represent the weight of a ton, or the figure seven to represent the may be represented by the number five. Hence the influence of temperature is very great. Suppose it to soon that, whatever the temperature of the air which contains it, it never increases in weight, but always has given body of air be taken to be four, and its capacity which shall raise the temperature to eight, or double, will increase the weight of moisture which it can hold, or almost four-fold. We have then, on the one hand, a mixture of air and water, every part of which is augmented by temperature, and on the other hand a tendency for every part of the mass of its gravity, to take the highest place in air, as oil does in water; the latter tendency is the stronger one, but the first second tendency to its consideration. What will distinct the balance in favor of the tendency to rise? or, in other words, what is the immediate cause of rain?

Any cause which may be supposed to interfere causes that a body of vapor shall be in a certain place to be carried upwards by the current of air, to take or cover supplying the same by evaporation, might be supposed to cause rain. Thus, if a body of air, as opposite, to meet a body of vapor, be chilled, an act was what we determine to be the point of saturation, it will deposit a portion of its vapor. If a body of saturated with moisture, may deprive it of its power to sound it to ascend. A cloud may have for hundreds of miles without meeting any object capable of changing it into rain; but suppose it to meet a mountain, it must rise at will hold, and to meet a colder cloud, as full of moisture; then the two temperatures—the cloud at first will fall. If the capacity of a cloud to hold vapor were increased in the least without heat, its low part of the warmer cloud would be the gain of the colder; and when, as it often happens, the two clouds are of the former, a little loss of heat causes a great loss of moisture, which, condensed into rain, falls. Suppose again that our warm cloud, instead of meeting another cloud, should be carried against the cold surface of a mountain, a like effect would be produced; the cloud would appear rough the cone, and be rapidly turned into water. The former of these instances illustrates the heavy rain in cloudy level countries, and the latter that of mountainous districts. In the case of thunderstorms, another cause is present to promote the through mixture of air; the clouds are generally oppositely saturated with moisture, and with the opposite electrical conditions. The fall of rain is then accounted for by the fact that the power of such clouds is to require a force of 36,000 pounds to produce a spark.

KELLY & Co.'s GIFT ENTERPRISE. — The first to embark in the Gift Enterprise business in this city was the house of A. E. Kelly & Co., located at 105 Randolph street. Who does not remember their advertisements, which, for more or less years ago, where many purchased books and other articles, and were so lucky as to draw the prize purchased a watch which entitled them to valuable gifts in jewelry or other goods. Thousands of our citizens were thus fortunate, and received the value of their purchase. Messrs. Kelly & Co. always perform all they promise; that they are a responsible, reliable business house only and on the square. Their Gift Concert which they now advertise, the drawing of which is to take place on the 2d of September, will be one of the most successful of the series of Gift Concerts that have taken place in this city.

1. The gifts to be distributed are all that they are represented to be.

2. All the prizes will positively be distributed to those only selling the lucky tickets after the drawing.

3. There is such a very large number of prizes that every one's chances are decidedly in favor of drawing something.

4. The citizens of Chicago, who know A. A. Kelly & Co., have confidence in their honor and integrity, and are largely investing in their Enterprise.

These are some of the reasons why we feel safe in commending Kelly & Co.'s Gift Concert to the public. Let the people come up and buy the tickets still remaining unsold. The firm will positively take place on the day advertised. Money may be sent by mail for tickets, and will be promptly responded to.—Chicago Journal.

FELLOW'S ORIGINAL
WORM LOZENGES.

We can with confidence point to FELLOW'S WORM LOZENGES as the most perfect remedy for those troublesome pests, Intestinal Worms.

After years of careful experiment, success has crowned our efforts, and we now offer to the world a confection without a single fault, being safe, convenient, efficient and pleasant. No injurious results can occur, let them be used in whatever quantity. Not a particle of calomel enters their composition. They may be used without further preparation, and at any time. Children will eagerly devour all you give them, and ask for more. They never fail in expelling Worms from their dwellings, and they will always strengthen the weak and emaciated, even when he is not afflicted with worms.

Price 25 cents per box; free for $1. A liberal discount to the trade.

In New Brunswick (British Provinces), where these Lozenges were first introduced, and their great value as a Worm Specific discovered, there has been over one hundred boxes a year used. Hereafter they will be manufactured at the New England Botanic Depot, Boston, Mass., under the supervision of the Proprietor,

Napoleon Fuit?

THE news from Europe, late and oracular through the cable, stale but detailed by steamer, is collectively to the effect that Prussia has "conquered a peace" almost under the walls of the Austrian capital. Her demands—which, if we are correctly informed of their purport were not extravagant, under the circumstances—have been fully acceded to, and her adjustment made, regardless alike of Paris and St. Petersburg. The principal point of the arrangement, which has all the elements of definitiveness and permanence, is the exclusion of Austria from Germany and Germanic affairs—the extinction of the last vestige of the "Holy Roman Empire." Henceforth Prussia is Germany, and Germany Prussia; for, if all the petty principalities which disgraced Northern Europe do not disappear to-day, they will do so to-morrow. The genius of Bismarck, the instincts of the Prussian people, and the concurrence of the populations of the petty States, have created a great nation—full of intelligence and life, and conscious of its strength and resources. From the States, great and small, which make up or will make up the new, we were about to say the first, power of Europe, we have drawn a large and by far the most valuable part of our emigrants. It may be that the new order of things will check the tide of Teutonic blood to our shores; but we shall be consoled with the consciousness that it has finally asserted its political as well as intellectual pre-eminence in Europe.

MR. CYRUS W. FIELD AT THE OFFICE OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH, HEART'S CONTENT, TRINITY BAY, NEWFOUNDLAND, SENDING TELEGRAMS, ANNOUNCING THE SUCCESS OF THE CABLE.

THE TOWN OF HEART'S CONTENT, TRINITY BAY, NEWFOUNDLAND, THE TERMINUS OF THE ATLANTIC CABLE ON THE WESTERN CONTINENT, LOOKING UP THE HARBOR.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOSEPH BECKER.—SEE PAGE 340.

Considering the existing state of European affairs, not the least satisfactory reflection is the dis-illusion (to borrow a Callicism) that it affords as regards that most egregious impostor, Louis Napoleon. The true calibre of this shallow pretender and most fortunate political gambler will one day come to be fully understood—we were about to say exposed. A concurrence of circumstances, and most important amongst them, the abdication by England of her legitimate influence in Europe, under the lead of that political Jeanne, Palmerston, enabled the adventurer of Boulogne and Strasburgh to take a leading part in Continental affairs, which he appeared to control, while he in fact drifted with them. Once he had real power in his grasp; and had he been Bismarck, instead of a much more insignificant person, morally and mentally, he would not have stopped to belie his words and take half a loaf at Villafranca.

How far Louis Napoleon favored the existing European complication is to be measured by precisely the extent of the advantages which he hoped to reap from it. But there is a greater than he, "whose shoe latchets he is not worthy to unloose," who has set aside, it may be with diplomatic formality, but not less peremptorily, all his pretensions, and unhesitatingly thwarted his plans. When he accepted the "cession" of Venetia, and undertook to exercise his "good offices" with Prussia, he forgot that he is hated by Italy, and that he inspired no awe in Berlin. Italy had to respect the territory which Austria had ceded to France, and Prussia firmly refused to halt her victorious legions, in order to permit him to shape out new boundaries for France as an equivalent for territory which she might win on her road to Vienna!

We some weeks ago suggested, when the French Emperor so ostentatiously took up the rôle of arbiter, that the Prussian premier, instead of waiting for French indications, would himself make peace on his own terms with his humiliated foe, and while prescribing and exalting German prestige, correspondingly humiliate French pretensions. Substantially this result has been achieved. Prussia and Italy have changed the map of Europe. Louis Napoleon has not. Italy will get Venetia, not through the French Emperor, but as the legitimate fruit of her alliance with Prussia, and will she be called upon to give up compensating territory to the confederate of Austria. Prussia will create a new German federation, of which she will be the head, while greatly exalting Germanic prestige, correspondingly humiliate French pretensions. Substantially this result has been achieved. Prussia and Italy have changed the map of Europe. Louis Napoleon has not. Italy will get Venetia, not through the French Emperor, but as the legitimate fruit of her alliance with Prussia, and will she be called upon to give up compensating territory to the confederate of Austria. Prussia will create a new German federation, of which she will be the head, while greatly exalting sufficient strength to make her the foremost power of Europe proper, and that without the recollections of humility" necessarily shadowed out in the Napoleonic letter, and which meant the surrender of the Rhenish provinces to France. The politician has been beaten at his own game; if he gets the Rhine for a boundary, he will have to fight for it, and he will hesitate long before he pits his his army against the legions that crumpled up Benedek and his army like an empty eggshell, in its iron grasp.

Prussia, having an equal population with France, at the new levy, is more than a match for the "nephew of his uncle," and can put a permanent check on all Gallic territorial ambitions. So much the better. We look to a great Prussian, Protestant Power as the salvation of Europe. She will be the standard-bearer in a career of progress that is to put to shame past centuries of misrule, ignorance and superstition. The panic-ising of the Napoleonic wind-bag will be a secondary but satisfactory incident in her rise to a position to which nothing in a paltry spirit of localism and a malignant Austrian influence has hitherto prevented her from attaining.

Louis Napoleon is no longer the arbiter of Europe. Italy has escaped from his humiliating influence, and with Prussia for an ally—and she can afford to be an unselfish one—may defy the power and sneer at the craft of the false friend who gave with one hand and clinched with the other, and the measure of whose friendship was the spoil he might gain by pretending it.

English Reform Agitation.—Atlantic Telegraph.

THE word Reform has been so long associated with English politics, that we are apt to give a broader meaning to it than the people themselves do whom it most interests. The world is a capitalistic one, and the spirit of progress and improvement of every kind; but in the restricted sense in which it is used by our cousins, it applies chiefly to the enlargement of the right of voting for members of Parliament. That it has not become a political catchword among us, is partly because we have long since advanced beyond the state of pupilage which the agitation of such a question assumes to exist among large masses of the people, and perhaps, also, because of late years the tendencies of our political changes have been more radical than the word Reform conventionally means. We tear down, we abolish, we reconstruct, but Parliamentary Reform does not suit our ardent temperaments. It therefore seems strange to us, educated as we are in the belief that it is the inherent right of every man to have a voice in the rule of the land of the commonwealth, in other words, in the right of manhood suffrage, that a strong political agitation should exist on the question whether fifteen or twenty dollars, more or less, of yearly rental, should entitle a man to vote; that while we are still in the flush and heat of the conflict as to whether two millions of white people, of another race than ours, and other habits of thought should have unrestricted rights of suffrage, the Mother Country should be upset, and the direction of the course of her empire be, if not changed, at least "shunted to another line," on the apparently trivial question of adding fifty dollars of annual rental, or thirty-five dollars of assessed value, should confer the right of suffrage.

But our wonder will be lessened when we consider that such a question as this naturally follows the doctrine on which the political creatures of Great Britain are founded, that property alone has the right of parliamentary representation. For, if property, then how much or little must a man have? You must draw a line somewhere. In the Reform Bill of 1832, the line was drawn at 50 dollars in towns, and 250 dollars in the counties. The late Ministry proposed to lower the qualification of those paying 35 dollars rental to the towns and 100 dollars in the counties. Agreed, said their opponents, only instead of rental, you shall make it the assessed value. This was the Ministry, and being beaten on the division of the House, they resigned. This may seem a small matter, but on such a basis is invested in it. The theory is, that property is enough, several sort of view, is the exponent of a certain measure of intelligence. But as education advances and the average of intelligence of the people is improved, it is obvious that a lower standard of property will represent the same average intelligence which a higher standard did a few years ago. Hence when the first Reform Bill was carried. It is also obvious that the classes paying thirty-five dollars will increase more rapidly than those in numbers than those paying fifty dollars, so that while the proposed Reform Bill of the late Ministry increased very extensively the number of voters, the general degree of the intelligence of those voting remained about the same.

This matter of rental is what strikes us American readers as so peculiar and unsatisfactory. So accustomed are we to the system of boarding, tenement-houses, and other contrivances for making one roof cover several families, that we can form no idea of the difficulty there is in small houses which radiate from the heart of the large towns in England, rising from thirty to two hundred dollars a year, and forming suburbs of immense extent. The influence of the home-life on families, which this segregation produces on the social system, is one which it is beside our purpose to dwell upon, but the slightest reflection will show that it must be immense, and we must take this into consideration when we look at the Bill by the institutions of England as compared with our own.

The statistics which have been gathered to show the exact status of voters under a rental of seven pound, or (thirty-five dollar) rental would enranchise, possess the highest degree of interest, and at some future time we hope to lay them before our readers. They are of such a nature that it is impossible to see how any Ministry can stand that refuses to bring in a Bill to lower the franchise, and we look for a reasonable doubt that the Derby Ministry will, in due time, propose a measure quite as liberal as that of their predecessors which would be no new thing for a Tory Administration to do. That public meetings should be held to express the popular feeling on the subject, is what we are too much accustomed to in this country, to feel any surprise about in another, having kindred institutions; and as to the threatened riots in London, they appear either to have referred to the place where the meetings were to have been held, than to the meetings themselves. It is as if the Central Park Commissioners had prohibited the Loyal League Club from holding a monster meeting in the Central Park; and as the citizens of London cherish the conservation of the grassy slopes of Hyde Park quite as dearly as our citizens do those of the Central Park, the Government, who are the conservators of the London parks, have very properly prevented a demonstration that would have acted under similar circumstances.

That the gradual lowering of the elective franchise in Great Britain is due to the example of this country, no less than to the increased intelligence of the people themselves, there seems no good ground to doubt. To us is due the demonstration of how safely the masses may be trusted with political power; and that, though sometimes mistaken, sometimes warped by passion or prejudice, and sometimes led astray by demagogues, the common sense of the people quickly resorts its power, to the preservation and progress of those who deceived it. But we do not see how, practically, the political influence of the one country on the other is to be increased by the Atlantic cable having accomplished a full share of its influence, at five dollars a word, must be of a very vague kind. There is quite enough in this Cyrogenic of the telegraphic union of England and America to challenge the highest admiration, and to excite the most sluggish imagination, without claiming for it a power of political influence which it cannot in the nature possess. By means of it we feel at once ten days younger, for to that extent time has been annihilated. We have no distinct record of how common people felt when the change was made in Europe from the old style to the new style; but we do know that one objection to that change was that it would twelve days, was that the days of the living generation were shortened so much. "Time brings about its revenges," and if our forefathers fancied they lost some time, we can have the satisfaction of knowing we have made it up. Seriously, however, there are many respects in which this cable may prove to be an additional bond of union between the two countries. The importance of knowing daily and hourly what is passing in the markets of the world cannot be exaggerated in value. Speculation may be checked, but the steady flow of trade cannot be diminished. The interchanges of commodities will, in fact, be more steady, loss will be avoided, although large profits may be more rare. The analogy of the trade between California and the Eastern States will show how the increase of telegraphic communication with Europe and the East Indies will affect the interests of our merchants and underwriters. It now takes to convey a letter from New York to San Francisco is much longer than from the former place to London, while the telegraphic distance is practically the same, and the time will be the same when the number of letters between California and New York is diminished, but, on the contrary, it is increased by the greater and more rapid, but less reliable, means of communication. When telegrams are charged the enormous price of five dollars in gold per word, only the most urgent will be transmitted, and that in the briefest and most condensed form, requiring letters by mail to corroborate and explain. When the cumbrous heavy losses which have been incurred in previous attempts to lay the cable, we are sure no one will grudge to the company any amount of remuneration that the public may run and the outlay they have made; but the proposed tariff of charges is so high that business is killed by it. We have before us the London Secretary of State hints at what he would have done in the way of patronage had the cable of 1858 been successful, and certainly we wish the Anglo-American Telegraph Company no more profitable task than that of transmitting Mr. Seward's dispatches at the rate of one pound sterling a word. We suppose that such a message was begun might even effect the market value of the shares. On the 3d inst. we are informed that the cable is working perfectly, at the rate of twenty-five words a minute, and that one thousand one hundred and thirteen dollars in gold were received on that day. Now at the rate of five dollars for a word, this would show that twenty-two minutes was all the time the wire was used, whereas one would have supposed that day and night would scarcely have been long enough to transmit the messages crowding for precedence. We trust to see a revision of this tariff at an early day, and certainly as soon as another cable is completed. The more valuable that this means of intercourse is, the greater ought to be the facility of access to it; and after the first flush of triumphant success is over, we hope the directors will take a correct view of the duties of their employés. We are not told whether messages may be transmitted on a Sunday. On this point a curious question might arise, for, supposing no delay in transmission, Sunday here is Saturday in Calcutta, and thus the enforcement of such a rule would be to exclude Saturday, Sunday and Monday from telegraph operations, working Eastward and Westward.

The Adjournment of Congress.

AFTER a session of eight months, Congress adjourned on the 28th ult., and the members returned to their homes and their constituents, leaving their record before the country for approval or rejection. Whatever verdict may be pronounced upon it, the people will possess very little to complain of in the patriot and the statesman. The people's representatives have not been very fortunate in attaining their fitness for the position in which the common suffrage placed them, and in evincing that comprehensive, impartial regard for the general welfare which we have a right to expect of our national delegates. It is true they have done well for themselves, in nearly doubling their salaries, but we look in vain among their enactments for any measures that seem to meet the great exigencies of the day, and prove that the manifest desires of the people were either comprehended or duly regarded. The paramount question demanding the attention and legislation of Congress was, undoubtedly, the full restoration of the whole Union to harmony and fraternity, and for participants in the rebellion were either to be punished for their political sins, or pardoned in full and admitted to the privileges they had sacrificed. While the infliction of penalty indiscriminately might have been technically just, it would have been obviously impolitic, and was never contemplated as a feature of a forgive-and-forget policy, that, sooner or later, we were to have an undivided Union and a proper adjustment of all the temporarily discovered parts. Some wise, generous, paramount policy, was therefore requisite to accomplish this end, and it devolved upon Congress to devise and announce such a policy. This has not been done. There was a reconstruction committee appointed, but it accomplished nothing but alienating the affections and embittering the feelings of those it was intended to conciliate. Certain conditions were proposed and again abandoned. Partisan rancor was excited, and partisan interests arose to override every consideration not that was not in accordance with the narrow, bigoted views of the politician. The war had settled finally and for ever the vexed and disgraceful question of slavery, and all subsidiary matters would rapidly and readily adjust themselves to the new condition of things, if left to their natural tendencies. But it is urged that there is no true loyalty at the South, and that the admission of the seceded States would imperil all that the country has gained by its struggle and sacrifice. Under certain interpretations, this statement is true, and the fear will founded; but we must remember that Southern people to cringe at our feet as cravens, and to discard, at our dictation, the spirit and sentiments they have entertained for generations. We must not expect that their feelings toward their former slaves will be very different from what they always were, simply because those slaves have been made freedmen. In a word, we must not expect that the temper and disposition and the long-cherished feelings of a race, will be wholly transformed, because their outward circumstances are altered. This is not in human nature. But so far as future duties and relations are concerned—so far as a willingness to be good citizens and promote the interests of the country at large are concerned—so far as a readiness to accept the issues of the contest is concerned—we believe the South is loyal, and that their loyalty should be recognized and rewarded. And because Congress has not made this recognition, but has demanded impracticable and impossible terms, we charge that body with having failed to meet a just and reasonable expectation. It is evident that further postponement will not add to the quality of loyalty, but reconstruction on the present anomalous condition of the rejected States will lead to anarchy, instead of harmony and peace, while the interests of the whole country are injured by the uncertainty connected with the political situation.

If, therefore, the South is ever again to be represented in the national councils, the sooner that representation is granted the sooner a proper temper will be manifested and an unmistakable loyalty cultivated throughout its whole extent. Industry, enterprise, self-interest, will prove more potent as means of reconstruction than Congressional resolutions; men who are trusted usually strive to become worthy of the confidence reposed in them. Denunciation and abuse have been tried and have failed, and though our shibboleth cannot be pronounced sufficiently by our brothers brethren, that should not be a reason for treating them as foes.

WE commence this week "Madeline's Marriage," an interesting story, written expressly for FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER by a popular American author, and which will be completed in six numbers. The story will be followed by an original Romance of the very highest and most absorbing interest.

THE composition of the city of New York, in respect of the nationality of its citizens, offers a curious study; but the interest of the statistics is further excited by the relations which the respective foreign and native elements sustain to the statistics of crime and disease—these inquiries leading directly to sanitary considerations, as connected with locality and modes of life. We shall not attempt to follow out the general subject, which would fill a volume, but confine ourself to a view of the activities of our metropolitan people. Taking the American, Irish and German races in the city of New York, they stand, or did in 1860, as follows:

Whole population of New York city.	813,669
American born,	465,449
Foreign born,	348,714
Irish,	203,740
German,	119,784

About 13,000 are of unknown nativity and about 63,000 are French, Spanish, Italian, African, besides English, Scotch and Welsh. We have some people from every portion of the globe. Very nearly one-half the population is foreign born. If we extend this inquiry, we find that the great body of foreign emigrants go into the cities and towns, notwithstanding they may have come from farms and rural districts. The propensity of the Irish to stay in towns is quite remarkable. The census report says that 94 per cent. of the Irish male emigrants over 15 years of age, and 92 per cent. of those under 15, were farmers, farm laborers, plowmen, grooms, etc. How, where are they in this country? When we come to consider the causes of disease in New York, we must recollect that we have 200,000 Irish here, most of whom came from the rural districts at home, and thus we have not only the fact that they are crowded into dirty tenement houses and close streets, but that they come from the country, and are more sensitive than city people to the poison of city air. It is a misfortune that, if we may receive so many of the ignorant, impoverished people of Europe, more of them do not go to the country, where their ignorance and their vices would be less dangerous, because not massed up in dangerous and inflammable bodies. Some of the Germans go to the country than the Irish. The German is thrifty and likes to be independent. It is a pity we cannot say as much of the Irish. The census of town and rural districts of the State of New York we have the following remarkable table:

Cities.	Rest of the State.
American born, . . . 721,749	1,160,236
Foreign born, . . . 690,049	408,721
Ratio of natives to foreigners in cities, 53 to 46.
Ratio of natives to foreigners in rural districts, 89 to 16.

If we were to mingle politics with statistics, these facts would furnish wholesome food for reflection. The country has reason to thank God that there are not more people in the cities. The districts[1] to counteract the ignorance and corruption of the cities are in the ratio of 89 to 16. When these are called "Conservative," it is certainly complimentary to be classed as a "Radical."

[1] The districts are the rural districts.

THE devices practiced by swindlers in this and other cities, are as numerous as various and original. One of the most apparently easy and successful forms of fraud consists in collecting the names of persons throughout the country, and forwarding to each a circular of lottery tickets. In the course of two or three weeks the recipient, who, in nine cases out of ten, has paid no attention to the circular, is informed by letter that one of the tickets he has received has drawn a prize valued at $165, or some other considerable sum. The ticket of the prize is informed that he is entitled to send on $5 to pay for the lucky ticket, and that, upon his remitting the money, and stating what manner he has prize he desires it will be at once forwarded to him. This but very often succeeds in catching the victim, although the letter announcing the drawing of the prize never states in what the said prize consists. The ticket-holder congratulates himself on his good luck, thinks perhaps he has drawn $165 in good, a splendid watch, or it may be, a piano or something of that sort. Accordingly he sends on the necessary $5, and then waits anxiously for his prize. In two or three days he receives a large envelope, marked "valued at $165," and upon opening this finds himself the lucky possessor of a certificate for 165 shares of stock in the "Overflowing Spring Petroleum Prize Company," each share valued at $1. Unfortunately the officers of the concern, whose names are duly appended, forget to state where their wells are located, where their oil is now being prospected, and what is the selling price of their stock. Of course there is no such company, and the stock is not worth the paper on which the shares are. These affairs are simple swindles, out of which two or three sharpers in New York realize, over their expenses for stamps, printing, &c., nearly $4 75 from each victim.

A RELIC has been received at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, which is supposed to have an important bearing on the question of the antiquity of man on the continent. It is a piece of matting wrought of cane by the hand of man, which was found on a stratum of rock under that in which were found, about the same spot, the fossil remains of an elephant of the remote period. The matting was found on Petit Anse Island, near Vermilion Bay, on the coast of Louisiana. The extent of the island is about five thousand acres, covered with a salt dome fifteen to twenty feet deep. At this depth, in any part of the trust, may be found a stratum of hard, pure rock salt, of great depth, and practically of inexhaustible quality. It is this, within three feet of which it was found, that preserved the matting referred to. This salt, of which a large mass is deposited in the Smithsonian Institution, is almost chemically pure, very strong and quite as hard as sandstone. Mention is historically made of its discovery by the early explorers of the Gulf coast, but without knowledge of the fact, the rebels made the discovery, and drew thence for a time considerable supplies of salt.

THE late "war correspondent" of a Boston paper, Mr. C. C. Coffin ("Carleton"), happened to pick up, in the streets of Richmond, sundry papers among the rest lying about the deserted rebel capital after its evacuation, which proved to be the correspondence between the Davis government and its agents about the famous cotton loan, which has brought (and how justly!) so many British sympathizers with the rebellion to abject grief. How Slidell, and Spence, and the editors of the London Times "worked the oracle," and D'Erlanger, and others, pocketed commissions, is officially recorded in the correspondence. It is too long to copy, but the record will prove a plump plum in the pudding of history. We have seen the letter of Slidell to Judah P. Benjamin; letter to Memminger, the rebel Secretary of the Treasury, about our excellent friend, Master Louis Napoleon. On the 31st of March, 1863, D'Erlanger wrote:

"The Emperor himself, through the medium of his cousin, Count Walewski, has given me his decision [of the rebel loan]; a proof with what interest the question has been received by all friends of the South!"

THE New York correspondent of the London Spectator hits off very fairly that extraordinary person known as Artemus Ward, who, instead of professing to be naturalized, and to have become Americans in fact and feeling, who, nevertheless, have an ever-increasing grievance against the country which are not Americas, and in which the true American takes no interest, or to which he may be opposed. Artemus Ward, however, says:

"Here are men whose 'American citizenship,' as it is called, is just as complete as ours, whose families have been established here for years, who have erected, built up this nation, and framed the society—a poor thing enough, but our own—and yet these men to-day who came here solely to get dollars where before they had pounds, not only stand at once in the full proportions of the hard-won power that we have inherited and created, but are, in fact, the masters of the situation, and are the men who, by their clamorous claims, say what they assumed so easily, and what at least now they will have, the advantages which we have acquired for their country, and to the detriment of ours which we have created for ourselves and children. Mr. Roberts—an 'American citizen,' mind you, as much as Chief Justice Chase—has a mansion in Fifth avenue, and sits in the shoulder-strap, would be an appropriate defender of the rights of the cold commanding officers of the armies.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

RETURNING from a visit to New Orleans, we were fortunate enough to secure a passage in a steamer with one of the passengers. Among the latter one especially interested us. She was the widow of a wealthy planter, who had returned to the city to look to her father's home. Her devotion to the child was very touching, and the eyes of her old black nurse beamed with delight, as she brought her mistress "out to love that boy too much, or the Lord would take him away from her."

We passed through the canal at Louisville, and stopped for a few minutes at the wharf. Some were wishing to see the city, while others on the guard at the back of the boat, where by a sudden effort the child sprang from the arms of the nurse, overboard. She swept toward the falls, and disappeared immediately. The confusion which ensued almost drowned the utterance of the mother, who was in the front part of the boat quite unconscious of the accident, and was preparing for the landing. Rising hastily, she handed him a tiny spoon and a full bowl. "Here, nurse, is the medicine. Turning to a she had torn off the clothes that was eagerly watching his countenance, he pointed first to the spoon and then to the night which was fast coming on, and gone under.

In an instant the bottle dropped from the mother's hand, and she was prostrated. For a short time the excitement was intense, and some persons, with praiseworthy daring, dove into the water, while others, procured a small boat and started off in search of the child. The latter succeeded in making his way with something in his mouth. Bravely he struggled with the waves—the precious burden was safe—a cry of joy rent the air—shouts from one breast gave a response—and the boat was soon by the side of the swimmer. Gently they drew the child from the deep and the child.

Giving a glance of safety herself that the child was really living, the young mother rushed forward, and shaking beside him, threw her arms around his neck and burst into tears. Not many could view the sight unmoved, as she caressed the restored babe and sharply head, she looked up to the owner and said:

"Sir, I thank you, I thank you! I am rich, take all I have, everything, but give me my child's preserver!"

The gentleman, modest, and pitying the lady's heart, said:

"I am very glad he has been of service to you; but nothing could induce me to part with him."

KAFIR CLOTHING.

BEFORE the introduction of Christianity, and even now to a great extent, the clothing of the Kafir of South Africa consists of a bunch of strips cut from the skin of a goat, sheep, ox, or goat, fastened together so as to make a small apron. His ornaments are necklaces made of the teeth or claws of the lion or the leopard, bracelets and anklets of the coils of iron and other plants, which serve him for medicine when he is sick. His hair is never shaved or combed. They all have fine foreheads; but while some shave their heads, others keep the hair short like a young man's beard, which they sometimes brush it out rather up, and let it fall in long, thick, bushy ringlets, all round. At certain seasons they grease it round a little on top of their head, adding tiers to it, till it looks like a sausage. They stick all sorts of things in their hair, from hen's feathers to wood spoons.

For grand occasions, or in full dress, a Kafir wears a head-dress of long strings made of goat's hair and girdles of beads. He is extremely fond of ornaments, and never sees anything in a navy button-maker. He hardly ever moves from his hut without something in his hand, such as a stick, bow or assagais, or spears, and a knobbed club in his hands. Thus armed he will never without a great deal of ease some of them leaving at the point a large thorn which he carries in his hand.

The Kafir women are very fond of ornaments, and they are often seen wearing it like a very short petticoat, made of goat skin cuts have intricate figures on or a narrow piece of blue calico. They sometimes wear necklaces of glass beads or blue calico. Many of the children are left entirely naked up to about their twelfth year.

In their savage state they have no sense of shame, and in the early days they lived before Adam's fall, when they have learned what a holy life is, and what a sinful life is, they acquire, and when they compare this with their own vicious, wicked habits, those who are acquainted with them, and lead a Christian life no longer go unclothed.

The Kafir girls are allowed to come into my town without wearing a shirt, on the penalty of being sent to prison, but beyond the British territory, in Zululand, there is no such law. Near a Mission Station, however, the heathen Kafirs, the men principally, will come to beg for a garment, and will wear it on Sundays when they attend church, but the moment they get out of it one of the bright spots of a missionary's experience when a Kafir wears his coat for a week, or even a month that something better will follow. On one occasion when a Kafir was going to church, I overheard some of the young girls who had only a piece of blue calico round their loins, and were proceeding to put them on, she called to them and told them that it was a shame for them to put on any such thing, and they were quite ashamed of themselves.

At Gibraltar, there was a great scarcity of water. An Irish officer said, "It is very well for the people on this side of the rock to do with water; if we only can see tea in the morning, and punch at night, it was all the be with us."

KNIGHTSTOWN, VALENTIA, IRELAND, THE TERMINUS OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

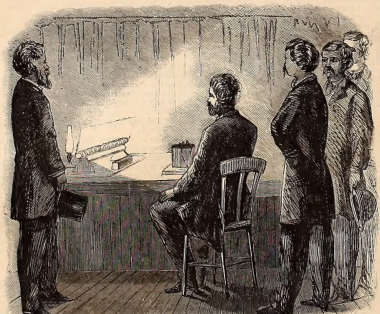
THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

THE great event of the age is the successful laying of the ocean telegraph, by which two continents are brought into instant communication and bound together by a multitude of ties. Whether regarded as a triumph of scientific skill, as a monument of enterprise and faith in human capability, or as evidence of persevering determination to overcome the most discouraging obstacles, this event will ever hold a prominent place in the world's history, and exercise an important influence over the world's progress.

In view of the absorbing interest of this successful undertaking, we devote a considerable portion of our paper, this week, to the illustration of various points and features, connected with the great ocean cable.

The first successful submarine telegraph was laid between England and France, a distance of twenty-four miles, in 1850, since which time a number of lines have been laid and satisfactorily operated. No one then dreamed of an Atlantic Cable, and in the development of electrical science then existing, such a dream would have proved wholly illusory. Experiments, however, soon demonstrated the fact, that, under certain conditions, currents of electricity could be sent through submerged wires for any distance, and also showed how certain scientific difficulties attending their transmission could be obviated or removed. These facts established, the way for an ocean telegraph was fairly open, and all required was the genius to plan, and the energy and capital to execute. These were happily found, and through the efforts of Mr. Field, who had devoted a large share of attention to the subject, a company was formed in 1854 for the purpose of connecting the Old and New World, with an ocean telegraph. In 1858 the cable was stretched across the Atlantic from Ireland to Newfoundland; messages were transmitted, and for a few days everything promised success, when, from some unknown cause, the wire ceased to convey signals, and the project proved a failure. But the possibility and feasibility of the scheme were now demonstrated. Only its details required attention, and it was confidently believed that science and skill could overcome the difficulties in the way of success, and that the actual working of such a line was only a question of time.

It is needless to say how unhappily the expedition of last year failed, and to this day it is not known whether the injury to the cable's insulation was caused by accident or wanton mischief. The commercial loss upon these failures has been great, but even out of the evil has come some good, for in the interim the science of making, testing and laying cables has so much improved, that an undetected fault in an insulated wire has now become literally impossible, while so much are the instruments for signaling improved, that not only can a slight fault be disregarded, if necessary, but it is even easy to work through a submarine wire with a foot of its copper conductor stripped and bare to the water. This latter result, astonishing as it may appear, was actually achieved for some days with the whole Atlantic Cable on board the Great Eastern. Out of a length of more than 1,700 miles, a coil was taken from its centre, the copper conductor stripped clean of its insulation for a foot in length, and in this condition lowered over the vessel's side till it rested on the ground. Yet, through this the clearest signals were sent.



The faith of the gentlemen connected with this wonderful enterprise in its ultimate triumph never for a moment wavered; if they met with disaster and disappointment, they were only more careful in making preparations for a new effort. On the completion of the entire cable, as above given, it was coiled and placed on the Great Eastern, a connection was made with the shore end, at Valentia, on July 13th, and the steamer at once started on her westward voyage, reaching Heart's Content, Newfoundland, on the 27th, making an average speed of about five miles per hour.

THE STEAMSHIP GREAT EASTERN OFF SHEERNESS, ENGLAND, RECEIVING THE ATLANTIC CABLE ON BOARD FROM THE HULK.

HER MAJESTY'S STEAMER THE MARGARETTA SAY NS'N, SOUNDING THE HARBOR AND PLACING BUOYS IN TRINITY BAY, FOR THE SAFE GUIDANCE OF THE GREAT EASTERN.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. JOSEPH BECKER.

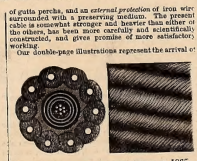
RECEIVING MESSAGES IN THE TEST ROOM ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN.

During the whole voyage, constant communication was kept up with the shore end of the cable, and no intermission of signals was experienced, while daily news from Europe was posted up outside the telegraph office on board the Great Eastern. Immediately on the arrival of the steamer at Heart's Content, Mr. Field announced the success of the undertaking to the directors of the company in this city, and shortly afterward sent a congratulatory message to President Johnson.

Heart's Content, the American terminus of the cable, is a little fishing hamlet, hitherto unknown, but destined to become a place of importance, as one of the main points in the history of the age.

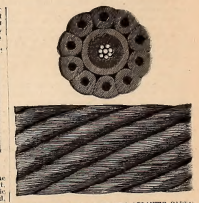
The bay on which it is situated is a very safe and capacious one, and on its shores was selected. On our first page we give a sketch of the town and harbor.

The eastern terminus of the cable is at Knightstown, Ireland, a few miles distant from the point previously chosen for the shore end. Like Heart's Content, it has no intrinsic importance, but will hereafter become famous.



On the 7th of July the end of the Irish shore cable was landed from the vessel selected for that purpose, and early the next morning the laying was successfully completed, and the end buried in ninety-four fathoms of water, the position indicated by a buoy, at a distance of twenty-seven miles from land. At this point the Great Eastern effected a connection with the portion of the cable already laid, and proceeded on her voyage. On page 340 we give a view of Knightstown, and also of the reception of the cable on board the Great Eastern.

That there might be no delay when the telegraph fleet should arrive at its destination, a steamer was dispatched to make soundings and station buoys in the harbor on this side. This every precaution was taken to insure success and facilitate the operations of the enterprise.



As already stated, tests were continually applied while the ship was paying out the cable, and no success in communication kept up with the office on the other side. The fact that there was no interruption of these signals augured well for the success that Mr. Field achieved, and was a great encouragement both to him and his associates, who watched the progress of their great undertaking with the most intense anxiety. On page three is a view of the testing-room on the Great Eastern, and a diagram of the three cables that have been laid. These are all similar in their construction, each consisting of a conductor composed of a copper strand or seven wires (six laid around one), an insulator of gutta percha, and an external protection of iron wire surrounded with a preserving medium. The present cable is somewhat stronger and heavier than either of the others, has been more carefully and scientifically constructed, and gives promise of more satisfactory working.

Our double-page illustrations represent the arrival of the Great Eastern at Trinity Bay and the carrying the shore end of the cable to the station at Heart's Content.

Thus the grand conception of establishing telegraphic communication across the ocean has been realized, and, as if in token of the benefits the world will derive from it, the first intelligence conveyed was of peace between the two leading Powers of Europe.

THE FUNERAL OF JOY MORROW.

The sorement of sorrow,
The shroud of despair,
Encircle Joy Morrow,
The bride of Adair,
The radiant Morrow
Who smiled on Adair.

"No sobbing will wake her,
Her spirit has fled,"
That damp undertaker,
Old mouldy Time, said,
That grim undertaker
Who measured the dead.

And grimly he fashioned
A coffin of lead,
A bosom impassioned
With utterless dread,
A coffin so fashioned
Of ponderous lead.

Curse Sin, the grave-digger,
Worked on with a grin,
As he made the hole bigger
To lay her within;
To feed with her figure
The foster within.

And Thoughts, the bier-bearers,
Attended, they say,
The mocking crape-wearers,
To bear her away,
The scoffing bier-bearers,
To tear her away.

The bells' muffled sobbing
Came fitfully slow,
The sad-hearted sobbing,
The heart-tolling woe,
The mad-hearted throbbing,
The corporal throe!

The parson belated
Came late from the town,
The lover he hated
His book and his gown,
And, unconsecrated,
Joy Morrow went down.

Madeline's Marriage, OR THE STEPDAUGHTER.

CHAPTER I.—SHRINKERS.

MRS. DONIVON'S voice sounded keen and bare, like an abstraction of a voice which has been stripped of every condition but that of pure communication.

"Madeline has lost her situation, Mr. Donivon," she said to her husband. She never gave the doctor his professional title.

That gentleman was opening a letter, tearing a thin strip of the side of the envelope, in a prim, methodical manner.

"Indeed!" he said, in his dry, hard way; "how is that?"

She explains the circumstances; will you read her letter?"

Mrs. Donivon extended the sheet in her hand. Spite of her self-control, a defiant sharpness cut through her every tone, and that flash came into her eyes which comes only of a deadly antagonism.

Her husband did not answer her immediately. That was his way of punishing and humbling her. He knew her pride and his own power; he knew what the communication she was making was costing her, and, being a sluggish-blooded tyrant in his way, he liked his small bites of revenge.

He let her stand, therefore, and went on reading the letter he had opened. He was a sallow, dyspeptic, uncertain-looking man. It was hard to understand how he could hold any power over the dark, handsome, impassive woman who waited before him with that habitual protest in her eyes, and that fierce, suppressed discontent about her mouth which showed that she was domineered over.

While she waited, an expression of satisfaction spread over his features. Evidently the contents of his letter were pleasing. He read it twice, and then, but rather as though to gratify himself that her, he imparted the news it brought.

"Mr. St. Hellens is coming," he said.

"Is he?" said Mrs. Donivon, indifferently.

"That was a politic stroke, Emily. I must give you credit for that. It will be everything to us to have the old man's favor. Cecil and cash, too," continued the doctor, not noticing his wife's coldness.

"Both of which we stand in need of," said the lady, with sarcasm.

"Yes, that's true. I confess I was beginning to fear the matter-over would be a failure, after all."

"A success with us would be an inconsistency."

Dr. Donivon did not like the reflection. A man with a genius for failure is sensitive, naturally; and this man, restless, peevish, arbitrary and unsuccessful, was the tragic fear of the woman who looked so mercilessly through his shams, and upon whose contemptuous independence he held but one check, was no exception. He winced; then he retaliated:

"What were you saying of Madeline?" he asked, suddenly.

Her face grew a trifle paler.

"There is the letter," and she watched him anxiously while he read.

But she was scared, therefore, not surprised, when he added:

"Well, what do you suppose she will do now?"

"S o can do nothing at present but come here."

"You can discharge Lucy while she stays," he reflected.

Mrs. Donivon's face grew rigid and white.

"That will be impossible if Mr. St. Hellens is coming. He is used to servants, and——"

"He will bring his own."

There was a moment's pause, during which Dr. Donivon referred again—the letter, and his wife made another effort to suppress the hatred and indignation in her heart.

"Do you mean," she asked, at last, "that Madeline can only come here for a few days or weeks in the capacity of a servant?"

"I hope, Mrs. Donivon, that we are to have no further trouble on Madeline's account. I supposed, a year ago, that you understood me to mean, I would not support her."

He spoke stiffly, standing on his mean dignity, using his power pompously, as an offset to the grinding necessities which necessity exacted from him toward every one but his wife.

"I do not ask you to support her. I would not accept her support from you; but I claim some rights here—not your bounty. I am your wife, but because I exact all my strength of body and mind in behalf of you and your business, and I tell you frankly that Madeline, in her present helpless ness, shall come here, or I shall go away. I have taken care of both her and myself before, and I can do it again."

Dr. Donivon never ventured beyond the limits to which his wife drew him, once. He enjoyed his tyranny over this handsome, high-spirited woman who had married, too well to imperil it. He needed her also, and he made some few concessions to this necessity. Their marriage had been a strategic mistake. Mrs. Donivon, a widow, poor and handsome, with one child, found, as she thought, in Dr. Donivon, a man who would give her position and comfort; and he, with one of those impulses into which shallow and selfish men are sometimes betrayed, had fallen in love with her fascination. A few months only sufficed to undeceive both. Mrs. Donivon believed to-day that she was born to misfortune, which was synonymous with poverty. Her first husband had been a spendthrift: her widowhood had been a struggle barely for bread, her present position was a severer strife, for hardly more. She had grown bitter and sarcastic. Of her original talents little but a suave policy and a keen will was left. The first she made subservient to the last, the last to herself. Way down at the very bottom of her soul, however, she retained an affection and a dream, and Madeline Orme was the object. She turned to the window after her husband's reply, and let a tide of emotion and remembrance blot out the present. She thought of her early marriage and her blight, of her widowhood and destitution, and how her golden-haired baby had cried with the cold, as she sat at the embroidery which supported them. Then, of Eustis Donivon; of the elder who had so coolly queered her repugnance to become his wife; of the long, drizzling November morning, and the cheap, comfortless boarding-house where he left, to marry him. She had not taken Madeline to the church, and she had cried for being left. Mrs. Donivon remembered the afternoon when the room looking out into the wet court; the ragged little urchin on the bed, the faded carpet, the unlit fire, and the little, artificial face at which she had tied on her bonnet for going out to a dance, a fashionable church—to be married. She had taken Madeline up in her arms at hearing her child said:

"Mamma will be back soon, darling. She'll take Lina away from here, when she comes, to a nice, bright home."

"And will you love me just the same, mamma?" Madeline had asked, gravely.

The mother's head had burst into tears.

"Madeline," she had said, impetuously, "remember—always remember—that I am doing this for you alone."

"My poor baby, how little it has profited you!" came to her lips involuntarily, as a sequence to these memories.

She turned with a start at the sound of her voice, but Dr. Donivon had left the room.

She had been startled in every way—so she mused. Her child had had, it was true, a year for five years, with the cheapest schooling, the poorest clothes, the scantiest food, grudgingly given; while the mother had had to bestow her handsome person, by stealth, for as little as her husband loved her, he would not have her wronged.

They had never known absolute poverty: only a constant, tantalizing insecurity, of wearing efforts to make ends meet, of harrassing bills and miggardly economies. A year previous, Dr. Donivon, more restless and scheming, had determined upon opening a fashionable establishment in Riverville. He had taken a large house, had had it refurnished, had sprinkling, sponging, planning and all that, and in the exacting anxiety for the success of his investment, had decided that he would not be burdened with his step-daughter any longer.

He got six fifteen then—it was as well for her to start in life. She had been themselves, according to the doctor's code, for a living, and must learn to marry. An opening for the first was accessible, an opportunity for the latter not. In a little Western town she was offered a desperate chance of a home, and there she had remained for a year, when some unexpected difficulty had duly and rather indifferently explained in the letter, thrown her upon a home.

Mrs. Donivon had her lips set very tight and firm together, as she turned from the window and opened the secretary.

"You are to come to me, Madeline, directly," she wrote. "Then we will see what can be done for the future."

After she had sealed her letter she walked the room.

It was a neat room, even rather handsome in its appointments, for it was the reception room, and Dr. Donivon always studied effects in his experiments. Consequently the house was well furnished: bright, exact carpets, precise window-shades, polished furniture, all the rooms open and on show, and Mrs. Donivon, tall, scrupulous, well-dressed, on show with them. There was no privacy in the house; the unpleasant patients seemed making perpetual inspections, flitting through the passages, mounting the stairs and loitering observantly, though unconsciously, everywhere, as people with nothing to do will.

Mrs. Donivon's hands were hot, her veins swollen; some of them would be passing presently and gossiping about her. Besides she had no leisure; she must put off her emotions till night. She looked at her watch mechanically; it was five o'clock, of a bright, delightful summer afternoon, and at that hour she should open Annabe sugar and tea, cut the cake, and see that Lucy had set the table properly; and then make her customary call upon the patients assembled in the parlor, previous to supper. Mrs. Donivon was system itself, and her management was faultless. In her sick heart, too, she had a sort of pride in the precision and perfection of her housekeeping.

"Here I am," she thought, passing the mirror, and involuntarily observed herself in it. Her appearance was admirable; the black-and-white checked silk fitted and hung most gracefully; her dark hair, arranged with the the utmost taste, was ornamented with a white lava comb, and a lace collar framed her linen collar. From her belt to the bows on her slippers, her dress, her figure, was faultlessly well-arranged, and the fact occurred to her. Her life long she carried. Her dress? her house? The extension-table might as well say, "My damask cloth!" She was part and parcel of Dr. Donivon's establishment—that was all.

She turned, and threw torn off her gow-gaws and dressed her darling in them, if it had been in her power.

She tried to shake off her bitter thoughts in action. She went to the kitchen and store-room, gave her orders with quiet decision, and then back to the parlor. Here she was very evidently welcome to the ennuied invalids, who lounged about with unread books and scraps of fancy work in their hands.

A young man who sat by a window, looking at a photograph album, rose and provided a seat for her. He was a newcomer, and such had always a special claim upon Mrs. Donivon's courtesy; so, as he remained standing beside her, after relinquishing his chair, she began the formula:

"You are somewhat better to-day, Mr. Hylder?"

"Yes, indeed, ma'am. I almost think this pure air would restore me to health. Quiet artist, or rather, on a counter-consolant principle. My throat and lungs have been abused by inhalation of gases from chemicals so long, that they demanded a respite.

Mrs. Donivon came to the Cure rather for relaxation than treatment. Her husband began with lank curls and a copy of "Lalla Rookh." Mrs. Donivon smiled mechanically, to indicate that she understood.

"I presume Miss Catty will claim the credit of his improvement," she said to the affected little schoolmistress who sat near the ringlets and had insinuated the relationship she bore Mr. Hylder.

Miss Catty sought to blush, but was unsuccessful.

"You're a chemist, sir?" said Mrs. Donivan, interrogating; somehow this young man attracted her.

"No, ma'am—a photographer."

"You were constantly engaged, then, when I came in—looking at our photographs, were you not, sir?"

"I was very agreeably engaged, but my study of the collection began and ended with one face."

Miss Catty simpered.

"Indeed!" said Mrs. Donivon.

"I would like to ask you who the original is. May I get at it in the album?"

"Certainly."

Mr. Hylder was square-built, sandy-haired, large-limbed, florid, awkward, and yet far from being unprepossessing. His blue eyes were honest and frank, his face Napoleonic; his voice had the right kind of ring. He rang out from a clear conscience. Such people interested while they pained Mrs. Donivon.

Two or three times she stopped the young man during his transit, but he made his way back beside her, opened the album, and past Miss Catty, and handed Mrs. Donivon a vignette of a young girl.

"It is rather like you, ma'am, only I think no one unaccustomed to look sharply at faces would detect it."

"Only that this is my daughter," she said, a little startled.

"Ah, surely. Not at all like the doctor, either," he mused, looking over the picture. "Remarkably pretty, I should say, ma'am."

"I see; and Miss—the young lady—she does not live near you, I presume?"

"Miss Orme, no—that is, she is not here now; but I am expecting her——"

"You are? By-the-way now—I beg pardon—but I hope she'll come. I'd really like to take her with me."

"What's that, Robert?" asked little Miss Catty, breaking in on the conversation, with a deeply injured air, and laying her hand on the young artist's arm.

Mrs. Donivon extricated herself from the explanation to escape from it, and joined the group. A vague presentiment filled her mind all evening, circling, as all her thoughts did, around her daughter.

The misfortune, as it certainly seemed, of Madeline losing her situation, might be destined to defeat. There were two or three young men among the patients—and Madeline was really pretty. Perhaps—but, then, was she to have no better fate—no higher fortune? The wife of some plodding, coarse-grained fellow—goodhearted, maybe, smart, kind, like this Hylder—well enough for some other mother's child—but not for dainty darling! Mrs. Donivon had always vaguely believed that her own defeated life was to be avenged in her child. Her fate was a blank, but of Madeline's future she could make a stately picture. Above this undercurrent of speculation, however, her gracious courtesies flowed on smoothly.

"The doctor tells me we are to have a new patient next week," remarked Mrs. Eames to her. "Yes; a rich widower," interposed Miss Knapp.

"Quite a pleasant addition," said the first.

"I should think it would be interesting," commented Mrs. Donivon, with her bland, unbetraying smile.

"Oh, yes; of course. But Southerners are always pleasant."

"He is a Southerner?" asked Miss Knapp.

"Talking of Mr. St. Velleus, ladies?" questioned Dr. Donivon, coming up, and growing gracious at his entrance. "He's a Southerner, from New Orleans. Rich as Croesus, ladies. You will all see your caps for him, or we'll have some unpleasant feminine scrapes springing up in our harmonious circle."

Mrs. Donivon could not suppress her look of contempt at this pleasantry. Miss Knapp bridled.

"Any one would think your young ladies were all very anxious to get married, doctor. Some of us, I suppose, have seen rich men before Mr. St. Velleus."

"Yes, I have no doubt; and had proposals from them, too," said Mrs. Eames, maliciously.

"Well, ladies, we'll have to see how long a life-lease our patients will hold before we dispose of him. I expect he's in pretty feeble health, from what he writes."

Mrs. Eames looked significantly at Miss Knapp, and the bell rang for supper.

CHAPTER II.—CINDERELLA AND HER GODMOTHER.

The same group which occupied the parlor of the Riverville Water Cure were assembled on the piazza, at the close of the same evening.

A carriage had just stopped at the gate, and a dozen pair of eyes were so engrossed with this central object that a complete silence reigned.

Dr. Donivon stood in the proper attitude for expectation. Miss Knapp, while disguised her actual interest with indifference. Miss Catty forgot Mr. Hylder, and Mrs. Eames her crocheting.

Meantime, the entire genteel party alighted from the back. A mulatto, first; a portly, well-looking man, attired like a gentleman; a child, then, or a woman—a beauty—so hamadryad dressed in a gay, beautiful hat, with a long, white plume, a cherry, flame-shade delaine dress, bare hands and a lace shawl, and a parasol—and a mulatto at the carriage-door and peered inside, and, turning, caught sight of Dr. Donivon, fled up the walk, and was clasped in her arms with a startled cry.

"Madeline!"

"Mamma!" a gentleman, so little, and old, and queer, wrapped, this summer evening, in a dark trimmed with fur, and carrying in his hands, which trembled with weakness, a small, silver-bound ebony box, which he did not relinquish to the servant-man, even in descending the carriage-steps, though the action was certainly an effort.

Dr. Donivon retained his self-possession.

"Mr. St. Hellens," he said, "you are very welcome to Riverville."

Without extending either hand, the old gentleman returned his greeting, politely, but stiffly.

"You are fatigued, and—somewhat unwell, my dear sir," he continued, with unction. "But you must not think me unmindful of you, sir, in this charming seclusion," and Dr. Donivon motioned to assist the mulatto in supporting his master as he walked up the walk with Mr. St. Hellens, in a sharp, quick way, deprecated his help, and eyed him with the habitual suspicion out of his bright, restless eyes.

"And your luggage, sir?" continued the doctor, officiously.

"We have come without, and came near not coming at all," said the new patient, with a little, nervous laugh and an upset and smash-up on the train yesterday."

"And the excitement has jarred my master considerably," added the mulatto, with a certain jealousy, as he helped the invalid up the steps.

Mrs. Donivon had carried Madeline into the house, and was returning to her explanations.

Oh, mamma, it was so funny! We were rolling and tumbling down the bank, and some of them were hurt and others actually hurt, and it was quite frightful. You see Mr. St. Hellens and Simon——"

"Who is Simon, dear?"

"Why, that's the black man, mamma."

"Well?"

"Mr. St. Hellens was right before me in the car, and we were all pitched out together, and, when I found I was not hurt, I jumped up and ran to the old gentleman—for I knew he was injured at first—and helped him into a comfortable position; and don't you think, when I found out my bonnet and shawl were lost, he actually thanked me as soon as we got to the city;" and the girl exhibited her self-possession to her mother, in a childish, delighted way. "And then we were examined, and found we were both coming here—that was so funny!"

"And your trunk lost, Lina?"

"Yes, indeed; my luggage went into the river, I cried, and wanted to stay and look for my things, and Mr. St. Hellens said no matter—better come right on home, for you'd be worried about me. You see, I told him about you, and then I had to explain that you were dead, and I was on the way, and that I had a stepfather, and only six dollars left after my fare was paid."

"Oh, Madeline!"

"Why, mamma, was it any harm? And then, don't you think he gave me these?" and she exhibited six gold eagles, "and he said they were——"

"But my dear child!—what have you done? You cannot keep this money," said Mrs. Donivon in distress.

"Dear mamma, I'll tell you just how it is. Mr. St. Hellens has only a daughter, and he can't find her; and so nothing makes him so angry as to give any little present—he called it a little present—cent—to any young girl near her age, for he feels as if he was doing something for her—for the daughter."

"But, my child, do you know so little of the world? It was very wrong to take money from a stranger."

"He is a dear old gentleman, anyway," said Madoline, abashed. "And I told him I'd a great deal rather not take it, and that I did not believe you'd let me; and he said he'd explain it all to you."

Mrs. Donivon smiled in spite of herself. She had led her daughter into the little attic chamber prepared for her, and, taking off the child's hat, she looked yearningly into her fair, earnest face.

"I thought you would come back to me a woman, after a year's contact with the world," she said.

"So I am, indeed, mamma. You would see how womanly I am."

"Did you speak to Mr. Donivon, dear?" the mother asked, suddenly pausing in stroking the rich, gold brown hair.

"No, I didn't. I looked at him, and couldn't."

"But, my child, you have come to his house—to ask his charity, while you stay. Don't you know that, darling?—don't you know how powerless I am here? For almost said you shouldn't come; and, if you offend him, he may send you away in an hour. What could you do, then, Madoline? See how intolerable you are, dear."

The girl's face clouded with a hard, worn look that dimmed its beauty. Her lip quivered.

"Don't I do dy'ffully right?" she said, in a sob.

Her mother drew her to her, and held her in her arms without speaking. For a few minutes they sat thus, with tears streaming down both their faces.

"Forgive me, mamma," Madeline said, softly. "I was very cruel to grieve you."

"You could never have done now, dear, and we will go down to tea," the mother answered, cheerfully.

Mr. St. Hellens had likewise been taken to his room, the handsomest the house afforded. He seemed very much exhausted, and they were obliged to lay him on the bed like a child.

"Your stairs are very steep, doctor," he gasped. "They have tired me quite out. I must have a little stimulant—just a little—to give me a trifle of strength."

"Let me prescribe some cold applications and complete rest, Mr. St. Hellens," said the doctor.

"I employ no alcoholic stimulants in my method."

"Well—I—that's nonsense, sir, we'll begin but to-night—— That's not the one, is it, Simon? Oh, yes, I see—just a spoonful."

The man poured liquor with careful accuracy into a small silver cup, belonging to a case, which, curiously enough, had been preserved amid the debris of the steamer accident. In a few minutes after Mr. St. Hellens had swallowed the liquor a faint flush came to his hollow cheeks, and he reached one hand toward the servant, who stood respectfully at the bedside.

"His is gone, Simon?"

"Yes, sir."

With a slight, nervous shiver he arose from the bed, took the ebony casket which he had placed beside him, and carried it to a cupboard fitted into a niche in the wall, which, with its secure fastenings, had been constructed after directions he had intimated to Dr. Donivon, in making his application for admission to the Water Cure.

Simon laid the case there, and attaching the key to a guard, placed it around his master's neck, who then crept back to bed.

"Ah, Simon, if that had been lost with the rest, it would have been a sorry thing. Poor little Isa —poor little child! Do you think we shall ever find her, Simon? Do you think Cyril is doing all he can?"

"I think so, sir."

"He knows it's to his interest; I was careful to make it to his interest to find her;@ If she's never found, I'll leave it to the church—do you hear?" said the invalid, in a helpless, appealing way.

"That is the way your will reads, sir."

"But if any one should alter my death—strange that that shouldn't have occurred to me—wouldn't it be well to make provision for that, think you, Simon?"

"We've been looking for her these fifteen years, sir, and if she is found soon, I should say all's never be. If you put such a clause in your will, it would be apt to tempt pretenders."

The man gave his advice craftily, reading his master's face, and stamping his words in the weaker mind like a print in wax.

"The little Isa looks like mother," continued the invalid, fretfully; "not in looks, you know, for Isa, Simon, looked like her mother—wasn't that so?"

"Yes, sir, she had black eyes and hair."

A dreamy, chiroyant expression crossed Mr. St. Hellens' face. He seemed to lapse into thoughts of the past, and by-and-by fell into a heavy sleep.

The valet, with his soft, noiseless step and flexible face, moved about the room, modulating the light, giving some changes in the furniture, pervading the whole place, as it were, with a subtle influence, forming a strange contrast to the pale little gentleman asleep upon the bed, with his refined, sickly, fretful face, and withered, shrunken frame; and making one think, somehow, of the Genii.

* * * * * * *

Robert Hylder had a keen, artistic instinct under his rather uncouth exterior, and having turned with the rest, to look at Madoline come, as she followed her mother to the table, he could not get his eyes from her face. There was no impertinence, hardly even the personality of admiration in his gaze; he looked with the same delighting study into the living, as he had at the photographs of it, which had attracted him. Yet the face was one somewhere to be really found—not one of those rare faces that promise something better than the freshness of sixteen, in compensation for the loss of the first bloom. The eyes were large and velvety, of a violet gray, shy and troubled in their expression; the complexion pale, the form thin, and hardly graceful. The hair only was very beautiful; riotous in its length and thickness, brown in the shadow, and auburn in the sun; twisted back hard and tight at the neck its own weight loosened its coils, and showed their surpassing richness; for the rest, the girl's whole appearance was unattractive. Bright, childish impulses flashed over the surface and sank, and the face grew cloudy and still, and the child disappeared, and the woman, with unconscious interest.

Her ladies saw that Miss Orme was dowdy that her clothes were half cotton; that she was an intruder and a dependant, and they took their cue. A slight, well-dressed and well-fed, she approached Dr. Donivon, who had taken his place at the table, and held out her hand. The doctor took the hint and passing the dried beef; he nodded and frowned:

"Better sit there by Mrs. Donivon," was his greeting.

They had all looked mercilessly at her, as she walked the length of the table, to have her appearance met with such a reception; and such a girl of coarser figure would have been ready to die of excessive shame, but Madoline passed over the ordeal unconscious. She threw her head back, a very little, a gleam of her mother's triumph crossed her face, as she acknowledged her outstretched hand, she said, quite clearly:

"Yes, sir, I am going back there. I came to ask leave to stay with you."

Dr. Donivon had no resort; he took the girl's hand a moment in his finger-tips, and let it fall.

The laughter sitting near, smiled, and Mr. Hylder scowled.

CHAPTER III.—THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

A NUMBER of days elapsed before Mr. St. Hellens had sufficiently recovered from his fatigue to be seen by visitors. His appearance in the threshold became a sort of contested territory.

Early on the morning following his arrival, there was a tremendous sitting next, smiled, and Mr. Hylder scowled.

Madoline made no replies; her tears were dried, and the sunshine seemed to have turned her face among the verbenas to hide its agitation.

Dr. Donivon brushed a spider gingerly off his sleeve, and smiled. He did not like the audience for his little meannesses.

As he steps died away down the gravel walk a sharp, quick step came from Madoline's dressing her garden-trowel, she sprang into a thicket of lilac bushes, and throwing herself on the ground, she cried bitterly.

Mr. Hylder had heard enough of the conversation to be interrupted, not to have to ask what was the matter. His great honest heart throbbed with indignation.

"I wouldn't care a bit, Miss Madeline," he said, following her.

"But I can't help caring," she sobbed. "It wasn't my fault, either, that I lost the baleful did they get it? I know I don't want them because I didn't know enough, and I couldn't help that."

"Of course you couldn't. But it was a great shame; I'm sure you knew more than any of them."

"Oh, no—oh, dear—I didn't. Oh, if I had anywhere in the whole great world to go!—oh, how sad and lonely I am! What shall I do!"

Mr. Hylder was greatly distressed and wholly at a loss. He had conceived such a respectful admiration for the beautiful girlhood in this forlorn child, that it withheld him from offering her advice. And, as any rate, what advice had he to offer her?

He plunged his two great hands into his hair, resting his elbows on his knees as he sat on the grass in the midst of the lilacs, while the girl exhausted her wild indignation in tears.

"I'm afraid you haven't a friend, Miss Madeline?" he said, with hesitation, after a pause.

"To get—another—place, she answered, choking with sobs, and pushing back her hair.

This was tangible at least. Mr. Hylder was eminently practical. He knitted his brows, and said, "Well, you have a place, in Boston vacant, in a certain seminary which he had visited just before coming to Riverville, having left there a number of photographs of the graduates," as he expressed it. He remembered —he was one of those in whose memories circumstances are apt to be grouped like tableaux—that there had been a great deal to do on the last day over a teacher in the "primary," who was not to come back until autumn. A young girl she was, Mr. Hylder gathered, that she was going to be married; for, though not inquisitive, as I have said, he was naturally acquisitive of simple facts, always gathering up and storing them away, whether they were needed—why, he could never have told—it was his way.

This situation, he reflected, might not yet be filled, and the matter could be sure might obtain it. Mighty is the potential mood. The girl brightened with hope as she heard Mr. Hylder's proposition to write immediately to the principal in her behalf.

She thought she could keep a place better if some one besides her grandfather obtained it for her. And her courage rose at the prospect of emancipation from him.

"You are so good," she said to her new friend.

But the young man's shy reverence refrained as she grew calm. With a kind of deference, he did language to what she might say, and honored an invis ble crown she wore.

They both had risen, and Madeline was drying her eyes on her apron.

"I wish I might ask you to do me a little favor," he said, with confusion.

It seemed so absurd that it should be in her power to do any one a favor, that she smiled.

"Why, what can I do for you, Mr. Hylder?" she asked, wonderingly.

"I would like so much to take your picture."

That that should be a favor seemed to her more absurd still. She laughed outright.

"Why, of course you may!" she exclaimed. A little, bird-like voice, chirping through the shrubbery, in a rather high key, was heard just then.

"Well, I do declare! I thought you had gone to the village all this while, Robert," pronouncing his name in French, and Miss Catty came nibbing indelight. "Ah, gardening!" Miss Catty darted a little malignant look at his earnest face, and Madeline blushed, and so made an enemy.

"I've washed you much, Robert, dear——"

"Yes, Catty, in half an hour. I'm just going to write a letter and post it," and Mr. Hylder walked away.

"Why, who are you going to write to, to-day, mon ami?"

"Only a business letter, Catty.

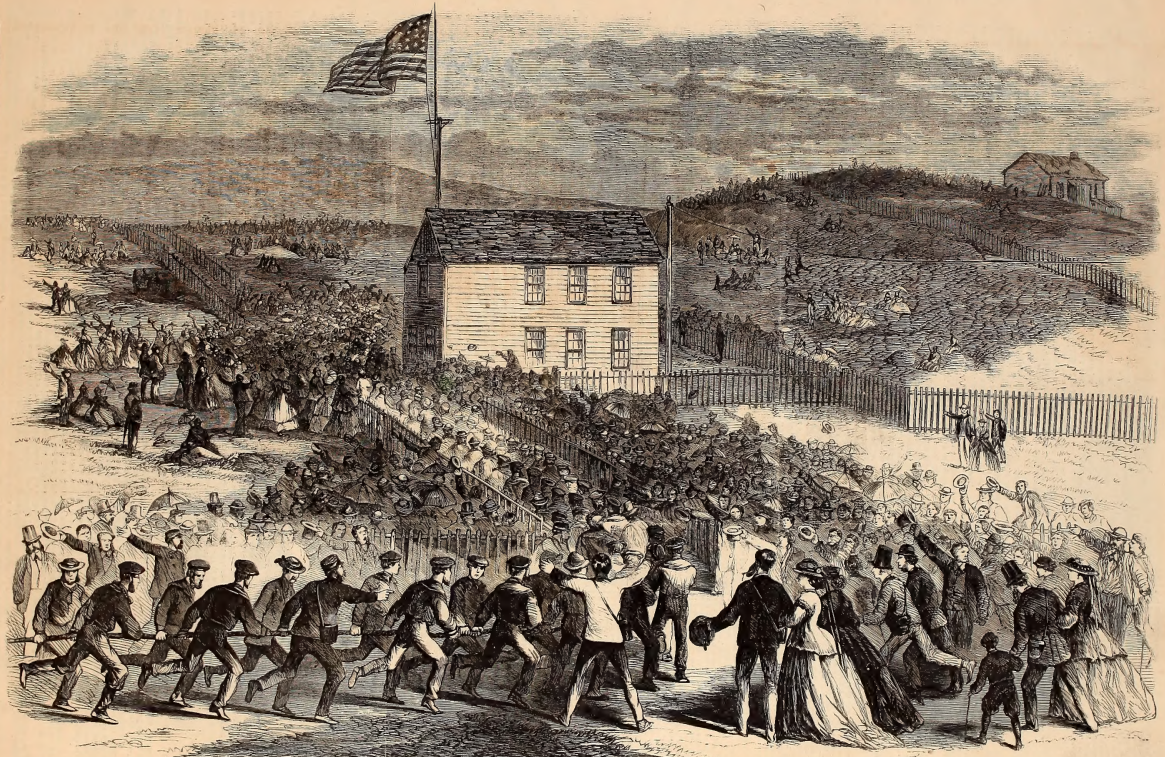
Just then came Mrs. Donivon.

"Daughter, I want you now."

"Yes, mamma."

LADIES' FALSE HAIR.

AS THE centre of all fashion, hair collected all over Europe to go to Paris, to give it a character, precisely as the days when men drank Madeira, and that was almost to drink, that wine was not considered the perfect drink till it had been a voyage to India and back. From Paris, the hair—manufactured and unmanufactured—is prepared and imported, sorted in lengths and as it comes from the head, clean and dirty, burnished and unburnished, and in all sorts of Europe, say, to all parts of the new and of the old world.



There is one most unpleasant feature connected with this business, which calls for strictest attention. This is the operation of the hair thieves. Even in the greatest day it has happened several ever and then that a good crop of hair has been laid in wait for, and shorn from the trembling victim, who has not only too glad to get free with the loss of her hair. Surprisingly enough, these ruffians never attempted in past times to plunder the hair of a corpse laid out on the state of the law, apart from the robbery of the hair. Perhaps this unlikeness of corpse part from actual wearers enabled them, during the hair-selling panic, to continue their business without any impunity. Now, there have been about forty years back, when this crime in Brittany was carried on a pace so did the same crime in London.

A certain physician thought fit to treat the panic with vast contempt. At first sight this would appear inexcusable, when it is remembered that this magazine, in these instances small local mayors, are, as a rule, considered to be the most timid of all people. Perhaps a solution of the difficulty may be found in the supposition that these men were nevertheless by themselves actual thefts, on the principle that there are too many valuable articles advertised in the crime columns of the Times as lost, not to suggest the idea that the advertisers are in a secret of a vast to their people who always ready to advance money on any security—not to mention the fact that a certain Mr. Hyam, with many a French girl, wanting to sell her hair, and yet too proud to do it openly, at the difficult dignity by their characters, by only purchasing in public. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that the hair-pulling might be willing to take "something off" as a compensation for secrecy, while in every case there are always ruffians who will sacrifice the honor of that, rank to the pleasure of their own adventures.

Singularly enough, some months back a very extraordinary case was brought before the public notice, in culprit being a well-known physician. In this case the ruffian was a man of both their fancies. He had a quarrel with his colleagues, a little of insanity, and as he was a respectable man, he had the means of carrying on his speculations successfully. But by the time he had his obtained an immense number of beautiful locks. Then he obtained apprentices. His boys were sent to her came into his possession as the result of juries. Upon the premises of this extraordinary man, a cabinet was found in his house, on the shelves and in the drawers of which were the hair of a thousands maidens who had contributed to the spoils. And it at once that this discovery being, as the real perpetrations taken to bring the ruffian to that trial which he was to undergo condemnation. But matters which has to exert the power of both position and money to prevent him from being brought to trial, and further he assist in punishing the fiend. The climax of this extraordinary case was reached when the jury, in their verdict "were so exact that every murder recovered her short locks.

HIPPOGRAPHIES will now have an opportunity of indulging in their equine fashion. The French Government has officially authorized the sale of horseflesh for human use, whether for food or handsome, subject, however, to severe regulations. And the Paris papers contain long descriptions of the Israelites' shops are about to be opened in that city, which, by relieving the streets of horseflesh, will announce a horsefleshy bonjour, it is to be trusted.

CHINESE BRIDAL COSTUME.—Some two or three days before the marriage the wedding is held over is sent by the family of the bride to the future party, consisting of a roll of silk, a fan, a pair of shoes, a dower, and the number of baskets, boxes, and packages is in proportion to the goodness—sometimes the remarkable. The articles are carried in procession by the bridegroom's friends, and are generally displayed in order, with as much parade and show as the amount of furniture will permit of. Not unfrequently, when the parties are near neighbors, the procession of porters or bearers is a long one, during the shortest route from the residence of the bride to the residence of the groom, and is sometimes accompanied by a band of music, for the purpose of exhibiting the furniture. In the case of the rich, it is often a large amount of superior household furniture, as wardrobes, tables, chairs, bedsteads, mirrors, a clock, one exterior of which is silk or satin, and various and showy yet extensive articles, are first carried in procession through the streets. The number of persons employed in transporting these things sometimes amounts to one hundred or even more. Those who can afford them have some of the articles bound around or fastened to the carrying poles with pieces of red silk, or red crape, or red cotton cloth. The procession entered a street by the smallest most especially commonly, and everything connected with it, and the bridegroom's house by the largest, or, if there is quite as much vanity and display about it as in western lands.

AMALIA.

THE grace of womanhood enveloped her
As does the robe of royalty a queen.
Her feet walked over hearts; but with a tread
So light, it only crushed affection upward
Into eyes, that, looking on her, smiled: while
All should say her a tender air, which,
Like sweet incense, melted in its fire
Each thought of harshness born in coldest breast.
Soft thrones-like trifled through her talking voice,
And when she sang, it was as though a choir
Of angels keyed the notes, and one freed soul
Dissolved its essence to prolong the strain.
God! how I loved her! o'er the rustling sound
Of her light step, o'er carpets mossy-thick,
Made for a queen, I've run mad-hasting to my cheek
And burn there like a flame! The faintest touch
Of her white fingers fluttering in mine
Woke in my soul a thousand blissful dreams.
That made it drunk, as opium does the brain.
I saw in them the lotus of the Nile,
Damascus roses, and the waving palms
Beneath the purple flush of the Orient skies;
Arabian spices wafted their perfume,
And fanned my cheek with winds that swept o'er flowers;
Clad with the radiance of the starry night,
The hours fled past on wings, that, passion-plumed,
Returned again, still bringing new delights.

Often and often must my eyes have told
The lover's story: "I love you" was still;
So wildly did I worship, that I feared
To break the silence, lest a jarring sound
Should rend the charm which, in a magic spell,
Enwrapped the world, and us.

At length I saw
A change grow on the face which made my heaven—
Not palpable, but like the shade that creeps
Athwart the earth when clouds sail o'er the sun.
This shadow first, and then a haughty glance;
A cold disdainful smile, and each word,
Each act and tone; alas! I deemed her wroth,
For false, or she who never had loved; and so
I left her, thinking I could thus forget

Years passed before her eyes again met mine;
And then a dark-faced stranger clasped her hand
And fondly called her—" Wife!"—Sweet Christ, forgive
The deadly hate which, in that moment, changed
My being—hate for Amalia's husband!

I hear them yet—the words—the answering blow—
I see my rival, prone and bleeding, lie
Dead at my feet!—Then see, as in a dream,
A face, with horror blanched, droop over him
And mingle kiss his lips, beseeching God
To pardon some great sin—the dead speak not;
And I—Christ!—I went mad!

My hair was white
When next my eyes took note of God's fair world!
And then I found that memory had fled me
Even as I loved her—too late, I knew! for crime
And madness lay between—she died.

Each day I lie for hours where tufts of rank, cool grass
Grow on a grave; and gazing at the shaft
Of gleaming marble, white above my head,
Reading the name, and telling o'er my sins
As pilgrims do their beads; and round each one
With sighs; then read again—"AMALIA!"

CHAPTER XLII.—RUPERT'S LEGACY.

WHEN fear does come upon the constitutionally bold, it is overwhelming indeed. The timid fleeth from the shadow of the coming peril, whereas the other stands his ground until the substance comes upon him, and it is too late for flight. Wesa a brave woman at all times, but the mind was in complete chaos in one unused to war, which breaks and scatters at the first onset, and rallies again without much effort, having been beaten. In her infancy, the measles are lightly caught and easily got rid of; but when they do seize upon the adult, they cast in their proportion to the rarity. Through life Grace Clifford had been almost void of fear; not so much from natural courage as from the possession of a large amount of self-esteem, personal aggrandisement—which had left no room for it. When the mind is completely fixed upon one object, it is callous to influences which, more otherwise grievously affect it; but when these rise beyond a certain limit, it is none the stronger for having inferior ignored them.

Except in the case of Raymond, when he stood by the couch of his dying father, she had witnessed his murderous with such vengeful eyes, we have never seen Grace Clifford tremble, save with rage; and the events of the night, which would appear as they did utter two whole years of anxiety and self-repression, had made themselves felt within her, nevertheless. The violent death of her hated step-son had been eagerly desired, and the news of its accomplishment greedily welcomed; the destruction of his wife and child had been coolly planned and executed (as she thought) without costing her a pang of remorse. When she looked down, but a few moments back, on Rupert's lifeless body, as it lay in the moonlight, with a broad streak of evil athwart the white shirt-front, she had involuntarily uttered a sigh of relief, as one might do whose toilsome task is over at last, and who has only to reap the reward. All these terrible occurrences, in short, had been shocks which she had survived, but by no means with unimpaired powers of resistance; and, like a bridge which has bravely borne some tremendous feat of its strength, her mind stood firm, but vastly weakened by the ordeal. Her physical powers, too, had been severely tried. Appetite had long deserted her, and the snatches of sleep which were still vouchsafed to her scarce brought any rest or dreams that were not disturbing. Let us not dis-please by day. She had suffered more than she would care to confess, and those watching her late loved watch upon the roof-top; nothing but the reflection that what was about to be demanded of her by the world around would require her best would require of her failing strength—after which should surely succeed unbroken repose and ease—had kept her up so long. Even the sudden fate of her only fellow-creature who had ever loved her had so miserably perished, and she waiting there to accomplish the mutual end as believed, and see, had gone through with it all, and more; for was not Rupert's blood upon her hands? And now, when mind and body—the exhausted body—felt a dread removal of that last obstacle, and craving for the repose which had been promised them—lo, the step of that dead man upon the turret-stair.

The words she had answered so contemptuously when spoken that morning by Clement, and which had intruded upon her more than once that night, again moved her lips to reiterate them. She have heard that spirits will sometimes re-enact the self-same scene which was fatal to them, or to those dear to them in the flesh, on the very same place." Was she to see her husband once more stagger and fall yonder! and was his dead son indeed coming up to succor him? Was he about to cast again upon her that look of hatred and execration which had never faded from her memory! As though to reveal the answer to her, the face of the moon shone forth for a moment free from the lowering clouds, and her straining eyeballs beheld the full form of her son Raymond, in and on the threshold Raymond Clifford, standing as he had left it, before outstretched, and pointing to herself, while she heard his voice, thundering like the Trump of Doom:

"Thou hast slain my father!"

At that dread sight and sentence reason forsook her seat in the wretched woman's brain, and she lied up the stairs, wild, shrieking with maniac mirth. Her features, still distorted with agony, evoked by her late struggle, and crowned with streaked hair, "as though fire—if I can so term a son's blood, but not to evoke his pity. Everything was what had happened at a glance, but it moved him scarce at all in comparison with that which he did not see.

"Rue, Rue!" cried he. "Where art thou, Rupert? Answer, for God's sake!"

The echoing walls that stood about the sky-light returned, "Rue, Rue!" The hearse-like wooth replied in the same. Then a sound was heard in the night that dwelt in Bibble Fell gave dimly back, "Rue, Rue!" The startled owl, taking its noiseless flight from that solitary spot, rose by seemed to give like reply.

"Rupert, good Rupert!—Rue is I, your brother Raymond!"

"Look in the garden—look in the rose-garden!" cried a mocking tongue; and two fair hands were clapped together in mirth, and a voice of silvery ring forth, which, to the ear that has once heard it, makes all music after sound for ever.

Sick at heart, Raymond hurried to that part of the battlements which he knew commanded the spot in question, and looked over. As he did so, a prostrate figure upon the gravel-walk beneath raised itself with difficulty upon one arm, and looked up with a face blanched with agony, as for the first time after years of absence, and after what separates brother from brother far more than years, was more than broadest seas—suspicion, injustice, wrong.

"Ray."

"Rue."

Little indeed to say; but when heart speaks to heart, there is no need of words! Each loving personality knew the other's voice, and, as it long revived, enmity forgotten, kinship and old affection brought to mind, he could have been contented to die together.

"I come, I come!" cried Raymond, passionately; and he dashed down the turret-stair, while the poor gibbering wretch, who had wrought his deadly foe, besought him in vain to tarry and hear him. Not for a moment would she had wrought so cunningly for Rupert's self.

From the rose-garden, along the broad moonlit terrace, now crowded with the Master of Cliffe into the house, which would still be for a little time. There was a fire in the library, where Clifford, invalided, was sitting, and he reclined sleeping child and Lucy (for she and not dared to retire rest that night), and so they laid him there. A surgeon, brought by Raymond for the double purpose, was at the Hall, and did what could be done for the dying. It was a question of an hour more or less of life, he said; if the patient had been previously insane, that was not the case now; the shock which had given him his death-blow had restored him as it appeared, to right reason. Clifford remembered well, when Rupert had been brought to him on the night of his father's death, what a change for the worse had been worked in his mental ailment, which began to develop itself anew only as he grew strong. She tended him as of yore, although in circumstances far different; and as she sponged away from his broad brow, so cruelly marred, the blood that still welled slowly forth from his life-springs, his blue eyes swimming in painless tears seemed to beg of her forgiveness.

"I think," said Raymond, tenderly, "that my dear brother wishes to say something to you, Mildred, alone."

A look of affectionate gratitude rose over the face of the dying man.

"I go, my Ray," murmured he; "we have been apart too long: stay you with her. We three—and yes, her child."

Then the rest withdrew save William Cotor, who, shaking his head in token of resolution, not to interrupt, but, at the same time, not to leave his master, took his old station noiselessly upon the doorstep, like a dog on watch. Except the low moan of the wind upon the terrace-walk without, there was not a sound to be heard; and the only light came from the wood-fire, which shot up and awoke by fits—now shining full upon some battered old escalade or lance-head with its tattered and moth-eaten pennant, now flickering upon the heraldic panes, and calling into light the weird Italian form of lord or lady now sinking into semi-darkness, more suggestive of those unearthly surroundings still.

"I am dying, Ray," began the Master of Cliffe, calmly, "and can see nothing clearly with my outward eyes; but the inward sight, which has been so long denied me, is very clear. It seems to me, brother, that I see myself for the first time. Selfish—hard—I have been all my grave palace, and holding up one white, transparent finger, "I know it—self-seeking, self-indulgent, from the first. From the very first. This was the mischief, and no other, which I drew in with my mother's milk. My father had it before me, and his before his, and all were the same reader, whether they lived mad or sane. The motto of our house, writ in that forbidden scroll there, is nothing to the purpose; it should be but—Self—Self. From the cradle I was taught how great a thing it was to be the Master of Cliffe—one of you dull, stern folks, by whose hands, I think, no act of good was ever planted—so great, that hardly could one grow to such a height. I was taught to scorn all men, and had interposed an obstacle. We were so high and strong, we Clifords, because we had called a church of God our own, and never left it for a few consecutive years in the vast sum of Time—we were so prosperous, I say, that out of jealousy, or, perhaps, from the counsel of heaven had fallen upon us a special burden. This I was given to bear by kinships, but not directly; I gathered it from hints and from looks, placed together with scraps of vulgar rumor heard without the walls, which told the story which my father's gloom corroborated. Then, I suppose, I put it by myself for one moment suffering my thoughts to stray from him whom I was about to—me, Rupert Clifford

"I grew from worse to worse until the prophecy was fulfilled itself. I think, if Mildred here had loved me, I might have been—if I can say it—myself. I myself had helped to bring upon myself—might have been delayed—delayed, kind, generous woman, not driven away. But I drove her away, and she died, to death, dear brother, my say so much—I should have only loved her through myself. Sooner or later I should have fallen upon the very threshold of the grave, the habit rules! And yet, for once, though I deal with 'I' and 'me,' it is not for my own sake. Dear brother and sweet sister, since God has willed it so, think not I take advantage of my neighborhood to death, as some have done, to cheat you, or to pack your memories with recipes I have not made myself, of how to die right—myself, who have written these lips, indeed, even if you deserved it—you, than whom I know no worldly sort upon this earth. For yourselves, you know how to die—kind, simple, unmeddling wise; but for that little one—and others, if heaven should send them—bearing this name of Clifford, I have not left a single word. Mildred, you will give them this bane of 'Self—Self—Self'—the only forerunner or doom which, in truth, haunts Cliffe Hall—the only curse that clings to this unhappy house.

He paused for breath, with pained and laboring chest, which throbbed, beating by his side, in silence wept, and Raymond, holding the cold hand in his, and chafing it in vain, dropped man's rare tears. Lucy, meanwhile, more calm, came a grass from nigh the door,

"What is that?" asked Rupert, hastily.

"It is I," said Cotor, rising, and approaching the couch, with downcast looks.

"Away, thou villain!" ejaculated the dying man. "Oh, and we have survived Raymond!" he added, as Lucy meant us well, both he and his sister Lucy."

"Ay, and Raymond survived Rupert, passionately, and covering his eyes with his hand.

"It is only natural, sir," sighed the poor sex servant, "that I should have known by the company we keep; and I have kept the secret. Heaven bless you, master, though you love me not. When we have gone, you will be left alone with her."

With that he moved away, cut to his faithful heart.

"Dear Rupert," whispered Mildred, "she loved you deeply, although him definitely; bired himself to baccat masters to help your Uncle Geoffrey all he could."

"Away!" still murmured the feeble voice, quivering with rage as much as with its feebleness.

"Then no man wrong, dear Rue, at such a time as this," said Raymond, gravely. "He did his best, indeed he did, however it may seem, for you, and for me, Rue."

The voice was silent, but the lips still moved the name "Away, away!"

"Rue, I have loved you and day to guard my child and me," urged Mildred, piteously.

"Did he guard thee?" cried Rupert, with sudden energy, and all his old look. Cotor, I know not whether you be a true man or no, but give me your hand; and if I do not grasp it, it is my last of strength forsaken. I thank you; and if I have anything to forgive you, I forgive it."

Cotor carried the thin fingers to his lips, and kissed them like one who touches sacramental bread, then reverently withdrew.

"Where is that man's mistress?" inquired Rupert, when the serving-man had left the room. "I will forgive her too. Is she not Mildred's aunt?"

"She is out of the reach of forgiveness and punishment also," returned Raymond, solemnly.

"Is she dead, then?"

"No, Rue, worse than that. A terrible retribution has overtaken her; her mind has left her."

"Alas, poor wretch! You well say, brother, it here a shudder shook the wasted limbs, "that is worse than death."

"You have not told us, Rue—and we must know," said Raymond, hastening to interpose—"how came you in this plight? Did the unhappy woman—Mildred suggests—"

"No, Raymond; I fell backward of myself."

"Thank God!" cried Mildred, fervently; and from the depths of Raymond's heart arose a great sigh of relief. Then over Rupert's lived and wasted face there stole a smile which made it almost young again.

"Remember, brother, for the sake of all who follow you, the warning which I receive—the only legacy poor Rupert has to leave. Self—self—self! that is the Clifford's Curse. And if your children ask to know its history, then tell them mine."

CHAPTER XLIII.—EVER AFTERWARD.

THE seed which Rupert sowed with his last breath in that good ground, his brother Raymond's heart, took full effect. From the moment that he began to be a man, a new system was built whatever his influences extended. Over all the lands of Cliffe there was now a master indeed —not merely a slugging and supine dreamer of his family greatness, or creating for himself imaginary rights, but a true and real, because strong for him and his. He was not feared, as all his race had been before him; nor was he merely honored, as his father—he was revered and honored, loved. Time never hung heavy on his hands. Generation after generation of minerals, of rule by Clifford, or of labor and skill, found him quite enough to do on fell and field, in farm and forest. The spreading park was no longer a shut paradise to all save some half-dozen human creatures. The Hall, as soon as the long days of mourning were accomplished, was set in order as it had never been before, and kept so for guests. The county families welcomed with open arms and hearts the once-so-much-repentant prodigal of their own house—a Clifford that was neither Abandoned nor a Recluse. He was as good a landlord as the best of them; but he had learned to live not only for his own pleasures. I do not say that in all this Raymond Clifford was seconded by his wife, for the word would be untrue to the wrong; not that she took the lead in anything wherein it become a woman to follow or not to meddle, but that she had a further part to act than he, and played it to perfection.

Ever ready to start with, one of an upstart race, despised wherever known, as she had known in those parts, and no mere town-bred folks can be despised, she understood that to the machinations of Grace Clifford—a hopeless, dangerous lunatic for life, but well and carefully tended in a private asylum—was due that to which she owed her poor Rupert—it was understood, I say, that Mildred's aunt and uncles had worked great evil to her family—that she had starved her child, and in itself almost unpardonable, even if such had not been the case, for eagles, said the country code of moral obligation, should mate with eagles, and not choose their mates out of the nests of sparrows. Therefore, as soon as household misnamed something of the, and remembering withal the last lady of Cliffe had been, at first submitted to her name rule with an ill grace, Mildred had been used to be misjudged when friendless, and now she had her husband's love to strengthen her, her children to be her living eyes of all, and ti they saw her aright, she was content to do her duty, and waive recompense from others. But at same all had to be done, and she gained her first all over to her own side, by bribes that none with a heart could withstand—a present for Lucy—Humility, Good-will and a Desire to Please, that would not be denied, but was speedily beaten, and by her cause to walk smiles and tinkling bauble. Through all her trials, she was the crown of Christian charity undaunted; not only that whose hears, without reproach, gave comfort to the floor, although the path betwixt the Hall was well worn now by many an almoner's feet, and her own purse was always at the disaffair to the sick or sick folks as was the dower in their window—but that which forgives Peace, and Trust, and Love, and from whose genial light strive discord and oppression, as the nightshade shuns the sun. "Sister Mildred," said Rupert, "under all my coldness of manner, I have felt for you, and your jealous of her, with all the strength of his stubborn nature. "Forgive me!" "Ought I to say reciprocate those who are merely my foes." And she was right; for to all but the veriest cowards it is hard indeed to hate when none return the hate in kind, Peace and Good-will always remain the conquerors.

I am sure that Raymond and his wife, thus carefull of their conduct to their kind, did not forget their friends. Mildred's cousin, Owen at Sandby, had soon no need to smuggle for the remainder of his days, although to did it to the last, from love and hatred of the Cliffords. Richard Barnard's uncle, (which was to have been such a long engagement, because he had no boat of his own, poor fellow,) had an easier time of it. The faithful servants, for the Clifords' sake, had borne so long his burden of customely and disgrace, reaped as great reward as he could be permanded to accept, in holding the same fields and farm his fathers held; there he worked and prospered, but a solitary and self-nigh friendless man, for the new times at Cliffe were not to his taste; the Master and his wife understood, he thought, too well, at last to dispute what they gained in more love and honor; moreover, Cotor, like his new mistress, had old antipathies and mistrusts to contend against, which, to one of his unpliant spirit, were insuperable. A his own special desire, Lucy remained at the Hall (a great domestic power, and, especially in all things pertaining to the nursery), for he was unwilling that she should suffer through his misfortune, and felt fully equal to bearing his own burden, the carrying of which, indeed, it must be confessed, was not entirely displeasing to his sombre nature. From time to time, however, he kept in play the fountain of kindly feeling, which lay too deep within him for ordinary occasions to evoke, by coming to see the Master, who received him always with the most cordial greeting, and to dandle Miss Milly, until that young lady grew too big for such attentions. She was not at all repulsed by his grim and forbidding features (as had been the case with Mr. Stevens of evil memory), but caressed him with a child's unerring instinct for what is really estimable, as though he had been the Apollo Belvidere.

Another countenance, not remarkable for personal beauty, was always welcome to Milly, as honey and the honeycomb, which latter it so greatly resembled. "Lor, godpapa," she would exclaim, alluding to the ravages of small-pox, "what a funny face you've got."

"Yes, my dear," would the good lieutenant make answer, enjoying the child's naive remark, while it chilled its parents' veins; "it's very expressively carved, is it not, Milly?"

But godmamma was even a greater favorite yet. The Careys had, of course, been informed of all that had taken place at Cliffe, and of so much of Raymond's strange imprisonment as did not hazard discovery of the Martin's Nest. But at first, and indeed for many months, no invitation was issued from the Hall, even to friends so dear as they. When it did arrive at Lucky Bay, couched in the most affectionate terms that Raymond and Mildred could jointly pen, it could not be immediately accepted, for a reason as satisfactory as valid. Another stranger, very much smaller than Mr. Stevens, was expected shortly at the coast-guard station, whom not even the sanguine lieutenant could suspect of being an Admiralty official. Of this promised joy, Mr. Carey wrote to Raymond jocosely, as men write to men, and yet with rapturous welcome of this coming child of his old age; while his wife wrote to Mildred in a very different strain, reminding her of certain talk they two had held together when left alone at Pampas Cottage. "I then referred ungratefully enough to that prematurely autumnal life of mine, crowned though it was with love and plenty; and now kind heaven, rewarding, as its manner is, ingratitude with an unlooked-for blessing, vouchsafes me springtide. In a few weeks I hope to be a mother." So when the Careys paid their visit to the Hall at last, they brought with them an infant son, who bore the name of his father's friend and host. The next year they came again, and every year, and more than once the Cliffords returned their visit, but not to Lucky Bay. Somehow or other, the lieutenant's merits did get acknowledged at last; and although he never got a ship, which would have separated him from his darling child, out of whose sight the affectionate old fellow could scarcely bear to be, he got promotion, and increase of income, such as enabled him to meet his growing charges, and even to put by for little Ray.

"I know how it all comes," whispered Mrs. Carey, with eyes that swam in tears, to her beloved friend, as true in prosperity as in her days of bitter trial; I know who jogs the elbows of these gentlemen in office. We might have waited long enough for this, but for your husband's influence."

"But not one word!" cried Mildred, sealing her quivering lips with a dainty finger. "If you owe him any thanks, he is best paid by Silence. Let the lieutenant credit these people with it all; it is always good to think well of those we serve. To hear a sailor praise the sea-powers that be, is rare indeed—and 'By the Lord Harry, too!'—— No, not one word, dear Marion, if you love us.

So Time drew on, touching with mellow and tender tints the natures of Raymond and of Mildred, but leaving the core of youth untouched. As though to make up for the stormy springtime, the summer of their lives was well-nigh cloudless. Perhaps in the wife's secret heart there may have lurked a desire for a son, whose life should have borne witness against evil tradition, and rescued his family name from superstitious slur. But this was not to be. What could be done to chase away the shadows from Cliffe Hall, however, was done, and that effectually. It was so given to hospitality, that the very idea of an apparition, the origin of which could not be clearly traced to supper, would have been scouted. At Christmas-time, in particular, there really was no accommodation for a ghost; the rooms were full. Many a glorious game of "Hide and Seek" had Milly and Ray Carey, with a host of happy romping boys and misses in the once shunned secret chambers of the Hall, while the echoes of their childish laughter filled the gloomy corridors; often, on the walls of the long gallery, the frowning Cliffords were made unwilling witnesses of "Hunt the Hare" and "Blind Man's Buff." The most favorite place to hide in was, I think, that very chamber within the chimney of the Blue Room, where Grace Clifford had concealed herself (for it had an entrance from without), and caused her brother Clement to pass so uncomfortable a night.

As Milly grew up, there were, of course, festivities of another kind, of which her old playmate was no less constantly a partaker—"Ray" still to her, although to the world, especially the Admiralty (who kept their eye upon him, by the Lord Harry, as they had done upon his father), he was Lieutenant Raymond Carey, R. N., a very rising young officer indeed, who had been mentioned in dispatches. At last a day arrived when playmate and lover led up—like leaf and flower to fruit—to Husband. There were many, of course, to call the match unequal; some even to say that after all there must be something wrong in the Clifford blood which led them to ally themselves so strangely. But since Miss Mildred had decided thus for herself; and since the marriage in question had been the most cherished wish of her parents' heart for years; and since the scruples of the bridegroom's father (who was, however, proud and obstinate against it, much beyond what had been looked for) were finally overcome—perhaps, after all, the alliance was not so monstrous and deplorable. At all events, it took place; and none even of those, I have understood, who had spoken against it with the greatest reprobation, declined to accept the invitations that were issued for the ball.

If any gloom still clung to the family mansion of the Cliffords, the last shade of it must have been expelled upon that occasion. It was observed by one old county fogy (who made a reputation out of the remark for the evening) that night had not been so turned into day since Rupert Clifford's time; and it was certainly a most brilliant and joyous affair. The ancient lieutenant and his still comely wife, in spite of the "scheming" with which they were credited by the great folk who had marriageable sons, won all hearts.

Ere the bride had departed that morning, she had embraced them both with an affection scarcely less than that she exhibited for her own beloved parents.

"Look here, godpapa," said she, pointing to the bridal vail, which was indeed a miracle of beauty, and worthy of the fair face it covered. "This is a present, sent—from whence do you think? Now guess. No, not aloud: I must whisper it in your ear. It came last night, from some old friends of papa and mamma—at Sandby."

"At Sandby," cried the old gentleman, throwing up his hands in horror. "Your parents, my dear, kept very bad company in those parts." He took the delicate fabric between his finger and thumb, and ruefully delivered himself of this opinion: "Smuggled! by the Lord Harry, smuggled!"

THE END.

The Love Philter.

The Count de Foix, although the nominal vassal of the King of France, exercised all the authority of a sovereign in his own domains. Indeed, the feudal system rendered every baron as absolute a tyrant over his retainers and tenants as the most powerful and arrogant monarch.

Without education or industrial pursuits, the nobles of the olden time were simply irresponsible brutes; the exceptions being the few whose inherent goodness was so strong as almost to carry them out of the pale of humanity. Holding everything with the strong hand, their only lesson was war—the gods of feudal idolatry were valor and strength. The only softening elements were superstition and sensuality, whose representatives were the priests and the ladies. The first appealed to their fear of the future, the other to their love of present pleasures. Purgatory and passion, terror and beauty, both ruling through the baser part of our nature, were all that kept humanity from becoming demonized. The Roman church, despite its errors, was the ark which received civilization at the flood of the Dark Ages. That this is a true picture every student of history will admit. Chivalry, which was only a little magnanimity and sentiment gilding a reign of murder and devotion to the fair sex, was merely the tinsel glitter on a corrupt idol, rendered the world one whitened sepulchre, which will ever be a marvel to all who believe in the dignity of human nature.

Among the brightest ornaments of this feudal darkness was the famous Gaston, Count de Foix, one of the most powerful, wealthy and warlike barons of his age.

But, despite his military renown, wealth and power, there was a skeleton in the count's house. He had married, some twenty years before, Agnes, the daughter of the King of Navarre, whose dower was to be paid upon her father's death. The latter had happened three years ago; but the young King Charles the Bad, who succeeded to his patrimony, refused to fulfill the condition. This had caused great dissension between the count and countess, a very beautiful and imperious woman, whose love for her husband was very much tempered by her own family pride and self-respect.

Their only child was Gaston, now in his nineteenth year, and who was the pride of both his parents.

The dissension between his father and mother was a very heavy grief to the young and chivalric Gaston, who tried in every way to heal the breach between them. Some three years before the commencement of our story, the countess had persuaded her husband to allow her to pay a visit to her brother, trusting that her personal entreaties would determine him to pay over the dower. But her efforts were unavailing, and she had lingered month after month, unwilling to return with her mission unfulfilled. Her continued stay had very much increased the count's bitterness, until at last he had forbidden Gaston to mention his mother's name in his presence.

This harsh command caused Gaston the profoundest sorrow, since it implied that he would never see his dear mother again. Despite the count's imperious manners and overbearing behavior, he was tenderly attached to his son. His family pride was touched when he looked upon his elegant form, hands and face, and courtly manners, while his courage and truthfulness were no less conspicuous than his physical advantages.

Gaston returned his father's love with all the earnestness of his nature, and yielded him the most implicit obedience.

Toward his uncle he felt the indignation of a young and generous nature, who traced to his avarice the estrangement of his parents.

The countess had been absent nearly three years from her husband's court, when the count resolved to send an embassy to his brother-in-law demanding the dower, and, also, a special messenger to his wife, charging her to return forthwith to her home and allegiance; in default of which he would apply to the Pope for a release from his marriage vows.

This news having reached the king, he resolved to counteract the count's plan. He, therefore, anticipated the embassy, by sending a confidential agent to the Count de Foix. This was Castellar—one of his squires—a middle-aged man, of great plausibility and accomplishments.

He brought letters from the countess full of duty and affection to her husband, and conveying the gratifying intelligence that she had at last brought her brother to listen to her entreaties, and that she hoped, in the course of a short time, to return, bringing the dower with her.

Castellar brought also a special letter to young Gaston, from his mother, charging him to give him his confidence, as he had great influence with her brother, the King of Navarre; and, adding that it was owing chiefly to his advocacy that she hoped to bring the affair to a satisfactory result.

The unhappy estrangement of his parents, both of whom he so tenderly loved, was the great subject of conversation.

One day, when they had been hunting in a neighboring forest, Gaston and Castellar sat to rest themselves in the shade.

"I fear me much," observed Castellar, "that the breach is too wide between your noble mother and the count, to be lightly leapt over. With all his magnanimity, the count is a man who will not lightly overlook your noble mother's absence from his court, of which she was so great an ornament!"

Gaston looked upon the grassy weed at his feet, and was silent.

Castellar resumed the conversation.

"I am grieved to inform you that your noble mother is so fully persuaded of this, that she commissioned me to tell you that without she depended upon supernatural skill she would never regain her position in your father's heart. But before I make you the confidant of her plan, I must demand your knightly word of secrecy, for your father has no faith in magic, and the efficacy of the spell would be broken if aught save our three selves were to know it."

"God knows," said Gaston, "that I would give my life to restore my dear mother to her rightful place in my father's heart; and I therefore pledge you my knightly honor to carry out my mother's wishes."

"What I am about to tell you, noble Gaston, is not a fallacy, nor an experiment. It is no idle dream, but a certainty, and has never been known to fail."

"What is it?" eagerly inquired the youth.

"A Love Philter," responded Castellar.

"But does my mother know of this?"

"She does."

"And approves of it?"

"She gave me the powder herself, and these directions for your guidance. You must know that whoever administers it has merely to breathe the name of the one he wishes the other to love; and the mere taste is sufficient to compel him or her to conceive a deep and lasting affection for the person in whose behalf it is given. The husband restores to his wife, however long estranged, the heart she has lost. You have, therefore, merely to take an opportunity to sprinkle some of this powder on your father's meat at the banquet today, and, as you do it, mentally pronounce your mother's name. Within six hours a growing desire will arise in your father's heart to see your mother again, and their reconciliation will be complete."

The soul of Gaston was so guileless and noble that nothing but his wish to see his parents united again could have tempted him to practice even so harmless a deception as this; and his mother's letter, commending Castellar, greatly disposed him to place implicit confidence in his assertion that his mother had entrusted the powder to him.

That night the Count de Foix held a great festival in his Castle of Orthes. He had been hunting all the day, and his banquets were invariably served in regal state. Seated near him was Castellar, for the count was very anxious to impress the envoy of his brother-in-law with a fitting idea of his splendor, and it must be confessed that there seldom lived a more hospitable baron than the haughty Gaston de Foix, Count of Bearn. He had now reached his fifty-second year, but was still full of health and vigor. When he was not engaged in war, he spent much of his time in the chase, a pastime to which he was so passionately addicted, that Froissart mentions the fact of his having no less than sixteen hundred dogs. Indeed, he never was seen without several splendid hounds, and these remained about his chair during his meals; ever and anon he would throw a morsel to one dog and then to another, looking with considerable interest at their eager eyes as they watched his every action.

It was not without much trepidation that Gaston, as he carried his father's plate to him, sprinkled the food upon it with the powder. One of the count's retainers, who had been struck with Gaston's behavior, observed this singular proceeding, and just as Gaston had presented it to the count, and was returning to bring him his goblet of Burgundy, he went behind the count's chair, and whispered a few words in his ear.

"Ha! is it so? I will test it!"

Taking a piece of the meat, on which the love philter had been sprinkled, from the plate, he cried:

"Here, Marco!"

As he said this he threw it to the dog, who devoured it with avidity. The next minute the faithful animal rolled on the ground, howled, and with protruded tongue, writhed in terrible agony. Death soon put an end to its sufferings.

"Traitor and poisoner!" cried the count, springing to his feet.

"But for the interposition of some of the count's old retainers, he would have stabbed Gaston to the heart.

"Drag the parricide to a dungeon!" exclaimed his father.

The banquet broke up in disorder, and that very night Castellar disappeared from the Castle of Orthes.

* * * * *

The rage of the count at his son's attempt was intense. He at once concluded that it was a conspiracy between his wife and son to destroy him, that the latter might succeed to the goodly inheritance of Bearn. With all the arrogance that belongs to such characters, he openly declared that the plot had been formed by his brother-in-law, Charles the Bad of Navarre; proposed by him to the countess, who had appealed to Gaston's ambition to execute the atrocious scheme. This also explained the mission of Castellar, which, he affirmed, he had like a true knight accepted as a token of the king's sincere desire to do justice. It was terrible for any one, even his confessor, to approach the count for the two succeeding days to that of the banquet. So profoundly overcome was he that he gave up his daily hunt. In vain his dogs howled around his castle. In his own apartment he moved like an imprisoned eagle. At last he restored his serenity of mind by a resolve highly characteristic of that barbarous age. He would declare war against his treacherous brother-in-law, invade his dominions, and perish himself or destroy the cowardly assassin.

For this purpose he resolved to ascertain from his guilty son the full particulars of the conspiracy, that he might spread it throughout the land, to confound his wicked wife and her brother. When his confessor came to him, the count said:

"Father Francis, was there ever perfidy so black as that which that faithless kinsman and his sister have shown toward me?"

"The wickedness of the human heart is great," was the churchman's reply.

"Reverend father, I do not choose to allow such special wickedness as that evinced by this attempt to poison me, to be slurred over in any general censure of the human heart. I can make some excuse for sudden rage, but this deliberate plotting leaves no life safe. The laws of God and man justify me in exacting vengeance, and that I will take into my own hands; for I will carry fire and sword into the very palace of the miscreant of Navarre. He shall find," continued the count, "that to wound my pride, by keeping the countess from my court, and then to tempt my only child, the heir to the noble name of De Foix, to be a parricide—the commission of which fearful atrocity he was only saved by the special interposition of my guardian saint—are offenses only to be washed out with blood. The King of Navarre and the Count de Foix cannot both tread the same earth."

"My son," interposed his confessor, "have you examined into the matter?—you should have questioned your son. It is against all probability that a young knight so well trained, and who has hitherto been so exemplary as a son, should attempt your life."

"It would seem so," said the count, bitterly. "But who would have believed that a lady so highly esteemed as my countess was, so courteous, and who was treated every whit like a queen, should, at the instigation of a miserable villain like her brother, absent herself from her husband and son for years on the wretched pretext that she did not like to come without her dower. By the Holy Cross, I would have fetched it at the head of my gallant men-at-arms long ago, had she not staid my hand by her treacherous excuses and lying representations that her brother was becoming more inclined to do me justice; and to dispatch his minion, Castellar, to entice my own son—the heir to these broad domains, the last of a noble line—to corrupt him so far as to poison me!"

The count clinched his hand, and smote the table with a force which showed the intensity of his feelings.

"I would counsel you, sir count, to hear your son—peradventure he knew not of the deadly nature of the powder. Certes, most noble count, prudence as well as justice demands that your son be heard in his own defense."

"What defense can a murderer, caught in the act, make? Did not old Hubert see him sprinkle it over the meat? Did he utter a word when he saw that his villainy was discovered? My poor Marco, too! and to think if it had not been for Hubert's sharp eyes, I should myself have died that dog's death! By St. Quenton, I will have full vengeance for this wrong!"

"I tell you again, sir count," returned the friar "that you will bitterly rue your obstinacy in refusing to see your son. As your spiritual adviser, I urge you to what, in your calmer moments, you will acknowledge is due to your son, the last of an illustrious race."

"It shall be so!" cried the count.

Sending for his steward, he made some inquiries concerning Gaston.

"My lord count," replied the man, "he remains on his pallet with his face to the wall, and obstinately refuses all nourishment."

"By all the saints, I'll make him take his food! Away! bring me some food, and a flask of wine—I will convey it to him!"

When the refreshments were brought, the count, accompanied by the confessor and his seneschal, descended to the dungeon where he had ordered his son to be confined.

"God's mercy!" said the count, with a shudder, "this is but a sorry place for the young heir of De Foix to rest in!"

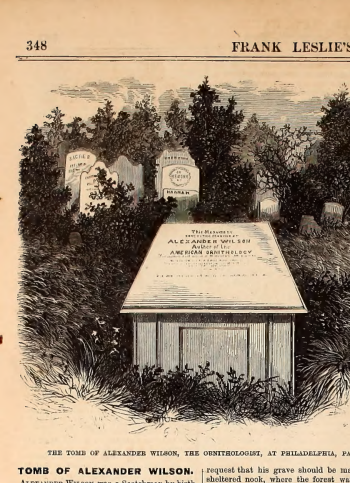
Observing his son still remained on the pallet, with his back to the wall, the count cried:

"Here! arouse thee, Gaston; here's food for thee, and without poison in it. Come, Gaston, I wish thee to take it, for I want to speak to thee about this matter, and see how much thou knowest of thy guilty kinsman's plan!"

But no answer came. The confessor, who began to have his misgivings, now bent over the slumberer; he put his hand to Gaston's wrist, then felt his heart, and then, in a low, deep, whisper, he said:

"My lord count, your unhappy son is beyond a human tribunal—he's dead!"

"'Tis false!" cried the count. "He could not—dare not die without confessing his crime, and without my forgiveness."



But a terrible fear fell upon the count, and, as though slowly gathering up his resolution, he was about approaching to where his son lay, when the confessor said;

"My lord count, here is a paper which he has put by his side."

The count eagerly took it, and holding it to the lamp which the seneschal carried in his hand, he read:

"Honored Sire and Sovereign—I was told by Castellar that the powder which I sprinkled on your food was a famous love philter, and that when you had tasted it, all your former love for my mother would return; and that you would send me with a gallant cavalcade to bring her home again. By the knightly honor of a Gaston de Foix, I swear this to be the truth. Do me justice when I am dead!"

The count gave one groan, and throwing himself on the dead body of his son, he remained for hours a prey to the most terrible anguish. When the obsequies were performed, he led an army against his wicked brother-in-law, who fled to the Court of Charles VI. Castellar confessed before he was executed that the countess and Gaston were innocent of all participation in the crime. The count thereupon took the countess back to Orthes, but the joy of both their hearts had departed.

THE TOMB OF ALEXANDER WILSON, THE OSNITHOLOGIST, AT PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TOMB OF ALEXANDER WILSON.

ALEXANDER WILSON was a Scotchman by birth. The first years of his residence in this country were devoted to school-keeping in Pennsylvania. An early acquaintance with the venerable William Bartram, Professor of Botany in the University of Pennsylvania, kindled within him a love of science, and after he had commenced his ornithological inquiries, he pursued them for the remaining short period of his life with an enthusiasm, perseverance and self-devotion which have rarely been equaled. His "American Ornithology," executed under every possible disadvantage, and with encouragement so slender as hardly to keep him from the heavy pressure of want, is a monument to his name that will never decay.

But when it is considered that Wilson taught himself, almost unassisted, the arts of drawing and engraving; that he made his way in the science with very little aid from books or teachers; that he entered a path in which he could find no companions; none to stimulate his ardor by a similarity of pursuit or communion of feeling; none to remove his doubts, guide his inquiries, or to be deeply interested in his success. When these things are considered, the labors of Wilson must claim a praise which is due to a few only of the solitary efforts of talent and enterprise. In the strictest sense of the term, Wilson was a man of genius; his perceptions were quick, his impressions vivid; a bright glow of feeling breaks through his compositions.

The cold repulses from the many from whom he solicited subscriptions he bore with equanimity, unabashed by disappointment, unsubdued by toil and privation. The acquisition of a new bird, or of new facts illustrating the habitudes of those already known, was a fountain of joy in his gloomiest moments; it poured the waters of oblivion over the past, and gave him new energy in his onward course. His last and almost daily request that his grave should be made in some sheltered nook, where the forest warbler could pour forth its sweetest notes, was but too soon granted. On the 23d day of August, 1813, he died in Philadelphia, at the age of forty-seven. His remains are deposited in the Old Swedes' Church burying-ground. Our illustration gives a view of his grave as it appears at the present time.

JOHN RANDOLPH'S ROOM IN COLLEGE.

JOHN RANDOLPH was a celebrity, because he prided himself on being peculiar, and led many to mistake his eccentricity for genius. He was not destitute of talent, but he is remembered more for his cynical manners and indifference to the feelings and opinions of those among whom he was thrown, than for any elements of greatness he possessed. Still, an interest attaches to what he did and said, and on this page we present a view of the room he occupied while prosecuting his college career. It is plain and unpretending, and, aside from the fact that Randolph for a time used it, would be passed by without particular notice.

THE TWO FOXES.

THE following story of disappointed hopes and redress of a supposed insult, seems more characteristic of the "birds of creation" than of dumb brutes, though the fox is notorious for his cunning and varied pranks:

A keeper was one day in the fields, near a stream where several geese were swimming. Presently he observed one disappear under the water with a sudden jerk. While he looked for her to rise again, he saw a fox emerge from the water and trot off to the woods, with the unfortunate goose in his mouth. He chanced to go in a direction where it was easy for him to watch his movements. He carried his burden to a recess under an overhanging rock. Here he scratched away a mass of dry leaves, scooped a hole, hid his treasure within, and covered it up very carefully. Then off he went to the stream again, entered some distance behind the flock of geese, and floated noiselessly along, with merely the tip of his nose visible above the surface. But this time he was not so successful in his manœuvres. The geese, by some accident, took the alarm, and flew away with loud cackling. The fox, finding himself defeated, walked off in a different direction, opposite to the place where his victim was buried. The man went to the hole, uncovered it, put the goose in his basket, replaced the leaves carefully, and stood patiently at a distance to watch further proceedings. The sly thief was seen returning with another fox that he had invited to dine with him. They trotted along right merrily, swinging their tails, snuffing the air, and smacking their lips, in anticipation of a rich repast. When they arrived under the rock, Reynard eagerly scratched away the leaves; but, lo, his dinner had disappeared! He looked at his companion, and plainly saw by his countenance that he more than doubted whether any goose was ever there, as pretended. He evidently considered his friend's hospitality a sham, and himself insulted. His contemptuous expression more than the mortified fox could bear. Though conscious of generous intentions, he felt that all assurances to that effect would be regarded as lies. Appearances were certainly very much against him, for his tail slunk between his legs, and he held his head down, looking sideways, with a smoking glance at his disappointed companion. Indignant at what he supposed to be an attempt to get up a character for generosity under false pretenses, the offended guest seized his host an t cuffed him most unmercifully. Poor Reynard bore the infliction with the utmost patience, and sneaked off, as if conscious that he had received no more than might naturally be expected under the circumstances."

MEXICAN PRIESTS.

It is well known that Mexico was subjugated by the Spaniards under the pretext of Christianizing the natives, by making them members of the Catholic Church, and that ever since no form of religion but the Catholic has been tolerated in that country. The priests and monks affect a great deal of sanctity, adopt peculiarities of dress and exert an immense influence over the people, though their character and conduct are often at variance with their pretensions.

Our picture gives a view of the appearance of two of these monks as they go about the streets. Their long gowns and peculiar hats are somewhat picturesque; but as they are generally indolent and vicious, we cannot entertain a very high respect for them.

INCONSOLABLE.

THE attachment of the dog and his fidelity have grown into a proverb. He gives a preference to human society, following his master everywhere, and, like man, he is spread over every zone and climate. It is by means of the keenness of this attachment that he accustoms himself to every change and circumstance, and allows himself to be trained to every purpose, as watch-dog, as guardian, for the chase, for draft, and on the St. Bernard he is the zealous assistant of the monks in rescuing the benighted and snow-covered traveler. His fidelity and affection are unshaken even under the cruelest treatment of blows and starvation, and the death of his master hardly severs the bond of attachment, of which many affecting anecdotes are on record. In the parish of St. Olave, in Tooley street, London, the churchyard is detached from the church, and surrounded with high buildings, so as to be wholly inaccessible but by one large close gate. A poor tailor of this parish, dying, left a small cur-dog inconsolable for his loss. The little animal would not leave his dead master, even for food; and whatever he ate was obliged to be put in the same room with the coffin. When the body was removed for burial, this faithful attendant followed his master's remains. After the funeral he was hunted out of the churchyard by the sexton. The next day he again found the animal, which had made its way by some unaccountable means into the enclosure, and had dug himself a bed on the grave of his master. Once more he was hunted out; and again he was found in the same situation on the following day. The minister of the parish, hearing of the circumstance, had him caught, taken home and fed, and used every endeavor to win the animal's affections; but they were inseparably wedded to his late master, and he took the first opportunity to escape, and regain his lonely situation. With true benevolence, the worthy clergyman permitted him to follow the bent of his inclinations; but to soften the rigor of his fate, he caused a wooden shed to be built on the grave, which was replenished once a day with food and water. Two years did this pattern of fidelity pass in this manner, till death put an end to his griefs.

A BRAZILIAN PORTER.

THE negro porters in Brazil and other countries of South America have the strangest power of carrying things on their heads—no matter how heavy, no matter how light. A traveler thus describes some every-day scenes among these people: "I once saw six of these porters take up a grand piano, and carry it off on their heads without touching it with their hands, grinning with their enormous mouths as they went along, and looking as jolly as if it were nothing at all. Another time I saw three negresses, one with an orange on her head, another with an umbrella closed, and the third with a little bottle; and they went strutting along with their hands in front, looking as erect and dignified as possible, the things never thinking of tumbling off. Another time I saw a negro with five casks bound together, all on his head. These he was forced to hold with his hands, but one can imagine what sort of stuff his skull must have been made of." The slaves in the Southern States were accustomed to carry things in the same manner, and it was surprising with what dexterity they would convey a bucket of water, a tray of delicacies, or a trunk, moving along apparently unconscious of their burden.

OUR BASE BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.

In reply to several queries as to the clubs and players we exclude from our base ball columns, we have again to state that none but Association Clubs can be noticed. But for this rule we should have welcomed the contribution from the Etna Club of Jersey City, a first-class organization of young Jerseymen.

The subject of our illustration this week is Mr. G. A. Flagg, of the Harvard College Club of Cambridge, who was justly selected by that club as their representative man; but in sending us his name, they forgot to accompany the same with sufficient particulars to make our sketch of him as interesting as we should have desired, and we are, therefore, constrained to confine our remarks to his physical qualifications, and to such an account of his personel as the visit of the club to New York in June last afforded us an opportunity of observing.

The Harvard Club, composed of students of Harvard College, was first organized in October, 1864, and since that time have played nearly twenty matches, a majority of which they have won. Up to their last contest with the Lowell Club, of Boston, they were the champion club of the State of Massachusetts. During their visit to New York, Brooklyn and Newark, in June, they most favorably impressed the fraternity here with their skillful exhibitions on the field, and by their quiet, gentlemanly deportment, and manly play generally, they won hosts of admirers, and most creditably sustained the excellent reputation of the fraternity of New England. Had the selection of their best player been left to a committee of the clubs they played with during their visit, there is little doubt that Mr. Flagg would have received the palm of superiority. His quiet unassuming manner, his thorough Yankee pluck, his excellent play in his position, and the fact that he led the averages of his club in the series of games, and made the most difficult fly catches, alone would have won him the premium.

If there is one attribute of a first-class ball-player more than another, which merits and receives the approbation of the reputable class of the fraternity, it is that quiet, gentlemanly style of play which characterizes such players as Flagg, of the Harvards, Fisler, of the Athletics, and, in fact, a dozen others whom we could name. Next to those thoroughly good-humored chaps like Woods, of the Eckfords, commend us to the quiet and modest, but plucky and enduring players like Flagg, who, even under the most exciting circumstances, never forget themselves, and who are always to be relied on in critical positions in a closely contested game. Skill in the physical excellencies of the game is worthy of admiration, but to excel in these moral attributes is to achieve a reputation any man might be proud to attain, for it ranks with the highest honor that society can confer on him. It has marked a Grant and a Farragut, and characterized a Franklin, and we are happy to say has been made a feature of the American character, especially of those of eminence hailing from New England.

Next week we shall give the portrait of Mr. C. C. Cammerford, of the Waterbury (Connecticut) Base Ball Club.

A CALL TO DINNER.

THE hog is usually deemed an obstinate, stupid animal, incapable of being trained, and destitute of any commendable traits, but the following incident, related by a traveler on the Western lakes, shows that the common estimation of the porker is a mistaken one:

"As we approached a farm on the American side of St. Claire river, belonging to the captain of our steamer, a curious fact fell under my observation. The pigs belonging to a farm came squealing down to the waterside, a thing which, the persons at the farm assured me, they never did when other steamers passed. The captain explained this singular recognition on the part of the pigs by stating that the swill of his steamer was always reserved for them; and that, on reaching the landing-place, it was immediately put on shore to feed them. The animals having been accustomed to this valuable importation during the whole summer months, had learned to distinguish the peculiar sound which the steam made in rushing through the pipe of the steamer, and as they could do this at the distance of half a mile, they, immediately upon hearing it, hastened down to the river, whilst the noise made by the other steamers was disregarded. This is a curious instance of the possibility of sharpening the faculties of the lower animals by an appeal to their appetites, and a conclusive proof that the readiest way to make all swinish animals reasonable, is to provide plenty of swill for them."

An Eastern Juggler.

WHILE traveling through India, between Surat and Nagpore, my body-servant one day informed me that a great juggler and snake-charmer wished to have the honor of showing me something of his wonderful skill.

MEXICAN PRIESTS.

"What can he do?" I asked.

"Almost everything that is marvelous, I've been told," was the answer received.

"Admit him."

My servant withdrew, and returned with a small, withered old man, about whom I saw nothing very remarkable, except his eyes, which were small, black and piercing, and seemed to have lightning imprisoned in them. I do not know that the man could see in the dark, like a cat; but there was at times that peculiar fiery appearance of the balls which is so often observable in night-prowling animals. He wore a white vest, Turkish trowsers, a sort of crimson petticoat worked with strange devices, a turban of many colors, and red morocco shoes, pointed and turned up at the toes. His arms and neck were bare, and with the exception of a couple of heavy gold rings in his ears, he displayed no extraneous ornaments. His age I judged to be rising of sixty, and his short mustache was almost white. He made a low salaam, and then appeared to wait to be addressed.

"Your name?" said I, in Hindostanee.

"Pramjar, your excellency."

"I am told you wish to show me some wonders?"

"If your excellency wills."

"Well, what can you do?"

He suddenly produced—from where I did not see and cannot tell—a large ball of twine, which he appeared to toss into my lap, keeping hold of one end, so that it unrolled the whole distance between him and me, at least ten feet, saying, as he did so:

"Will your excellency please examine what you see?"

Now, I honestly ever that I saw that ball of twine when he threw it as plainly as I ever saw anything in my life—saw it come toward me, saw it unroll, and apparently drop into my lap, so that I brought my knees quickly together to catch it—and yet, when I put my hand down to take it and looked down for it, it was not there—nothing was there—and at the same instant I perceived the juggler balancing it on the end of his finger.

"Pshaw!" said I; "you deceive me by making me believe you threw it toward me."

"Does your excellency think I have it?" he asked: and before I could answer, I saw, in place of the ball, a large, beautiful rose, which he was balancing by the stem, and yet he had not altered his position and scarcely stirred a finger.

I began to be astonished.

While yet I looked, I saw in his right hand a large cup, and in his left a rose. He stepped forward a few feet, laid the rose down on the ground, and placed the cup over it.

Here, it will be observed, there was no machinery to assist him—no table, with its false top, concealed apartments, and confederate, perhaps, to effect the change, as we see similar tricks performed in a place fitted up by the magician for the purpose—but only my own quarters, in the full, bright light of day, with myself sharply watching him within five feet, and my attendants grouped around almost as near. Having covered the rose with the cup, as I would be willing to make oath—for I saw the rose distinctly, as the hollow vessel, held by the top, went slowly down over it—the conjurer resumed his former place, and said:

"Will your excellency be kind enough to lift the cup and see what is under it?"

Of course I would have wagered a heavy sum that the rose was still there for one thing, because, expecting some trick, I had kept my eye on it to the last moment, and was certain there was no possibility of its being removed after the hand had let go of the cup at the top. I complied with his request, stepped forward, and raised the cup; but instantly dropped it, and bounded back with a cry of terror—for there, instead of the red rose, was one of the little, green, deadly serpents of India, coiled up and ready for a spring, with its small, glittering eyes fixed intently on mine. Snakes of any kind are my horror; and this one not only horrified me, but all my attendants, who, with cries of alarm, enlarged the circle very rapidly, for they knew its bite to be fatal.

"No more such tricks as these, conjurer!" said I, sternly.

"It is perfectly harmless, your excellency," grinned the old man, walking up to it, lifting it up by the neck, putting its head into his mouth, and allowing it to run down his throat.

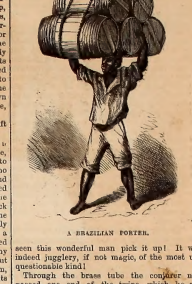
"It is perfectly harmless, your excellency," grinned the old man, walking up to it, lifting it up by the neck, putting its head into his mouth, and allowing it to run down his throat.

I shuddered, and half-believed the juggler possessed of a devil, if not a devil himself.

He next produced a tube that looked like brass, about two feet long and half an inch in diameter, and next the ball of twine again.

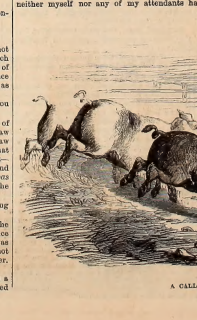
Where these things came from, or went to, I could not tell. They seemed to be in his hands when he wanted them, but I never observed his hands passing near his dress, either when they appeared or disappeared. When I looked for the cup that I had lifted from the snake, it was gone, and yet neither myself nor any of my attendants had seen this wonderful man pick it up! It was indeed jugglery, if not magic, of the most unquestionable kind!

Through the brass tube the conjurer now passed one end of the twine, which he put between his teeth; he then placed the tube between his lips, threw back his head, and held it perpendicularly, with the ball of twine on the upper end. Then suddenly this ball began to turn, and turn rapidly, and gradually grew smaller, till it entirely disappeared, as if the twine had been run off on a reel. What turned it, or where it went to, no one could see. The juggler then set the tube the other end up, and a new ball began to form on the top, but apparently ribbon, of half an inch in width and of different colors. These rolled up, as if on a bobbin, till it formed a wheel of two or three inches in diameter, when the performer seemed to toss ribbon and tube over his shoulder, and that was the last I saw of either.



He next reproduced what appeared to be the swine cup I had lifted from the snake, showed something that looked like an egg, advanced the same as before, and placed the latter on the ground and the former over it, and again requested me to raise it, which I declined to do, fearing I should see another serpent, or something equally horrifying.

"Will any one lift the cup?" he said, turning to the others.



No one volunteered to do so, but all rather drew back.

At this he took up the cup himself and appeared to throw it into the air, and there sat in its place a beautiful dove, which flew up and alighted on his shoulder. He took it in his hand, muttered over some unintelligible words, seemed to cram it into his mouth, and that was the last I saw of that also.

He performed some other tricks similar to these, and concluded with the mysterious bag. This bag—which somehow came into his hands, as did all the other things he used, in a manner unknown to myself—was from two to three feet long and about a foot wide. It looked as if it had been used to hold some kind of flour, and I certainly saw something like the dust of flour fly from it when he turned it inside out and beat it across his hands. He turned it back again, and tied up the mouth of it with a string, muttering a low incantation all the time. This done, he threw it on the ground, and stamped on it, treading it all out flat with his feet. He then stepped back a few paces, and requested us all to fix our eyes on it. We did so: and after a lapse of thirty seconds we saw it begin to swell up like a bladder when being expanded with wind. It continued to swell till every part became distended, and it appeared as round and as solid as if filled with sand. Its solidity, however, was only apparent; for when the juggler went up and placed his foot on it, it yielded to the pressure, but immediately sprung back or rounded out as soon as that was removed. He then jumped on it with both feet, and flattened it all out as at first. He then went away again; and the bag, being left to itself, as before, again began to rise or inflate, but this time as if some animal like a cat were inside of it. In fact, I could see where there appeared to be legs; and then, to my utter amazement, I may almost say horror, it began to move toward me, as if signalling by the unknown something in it!

I do not think I am a coward—my worst enemy has never accused me of being one, at least—but I confess that on this occasion my nerves would not let me remain passive as I retreated from the advancing mystery, and informed the natives that I had seen enough to satisfy me of his wonderful occult powers. At this he seemed pleased, walked up to the bag and trod it down again, pieced it up and beat it with his right hand across his left, caused it to unaccountably disappear from my sight, and then made his concluding salaam.

How these wonders were performed—by what art, power, or influence—I do not and never expect to know. I have conversed with many persons who have seen, or claim to have seen, many strange things, but never before any one capable of conviction that I considered at all satisfactory. I simply relate what I saw, but scarcely expect any one to credit my statement, well knowing that I myself would not have received such marvels as facts on the testimony of the most reliable friend I have in the world.

"If your excellency will, I shall now have the honor of showing you how I charm wild serpents," said the sorcerer.

I had heard something of this singular power, and was desirous of seeing it displayed, more especially myself and attendants all repaired to an open field, at no great distance, where, after some search, Pungee discovered a hole, into which he said he dashed not there was a snake.

"But I cannot see him forth," he proceed to say, "I must be assured that some show of sufficient courage will stand ready to cut him down when I give the signal, or otherwise he, being so severe to be a colora capella, my life may be sacrificed."

"I will myself undertake that business," said I, drawing my sword.

The man hesitated, evidently fearing to insult me by a touch, and yet not eager to risk his life on the chance of my being able to overcome my timidity I had already made. I thought I read all this in the man's face, and I said, very positively:

"Now I will try it! I will cut off the head, ever you bring up this time, be it snake or devil!"

"My life is at your excellency's mercy," bowed the man, with a slight air of humility, "if you give the signal. When I raise my hand above my head, may the snake be still, sure and deadly!"

He then gave his whole attention to the hole before him. Putting an instrument not unlike a small flageolet to his lips, he began to play a shrill, monotonous, disagreeable sort of a tune, keeping his eyes riveted upon the hole in the ground; and I, with my sword in a convenient attitude, though I should have been prepared for anything, I saw the ugly head of the hooded snake, like a monstrous viper, slowly and cautiously out all deadly reptiles, come slowly forth, with its spectacled eyes fixed steadily upon the strange musicians, who began to dance forward slowly, a step at a time, the snake following him.

When, at length, in this manner, he had drawn the hideous creature some ten or fifteen feet from its hole, he suddenly squatted down and began to play more loudly and shrilly. At this the serpent raised itself on its tail, as about to make its deadly spring, and actually commenced a dancing motion, in time with the music, which was continued for about a minute, when the sorcerer gave me the signal to strike. Quardly and stealthily I advanced to within reach for the head, and then struck, cutting the reptile in two, and sending the head flying to some distance. I never took life with better satisfaction.

Whatever deception there might have been about the juggler's tricks, there was certainly none about the snake, for I have in my possession the body of the same. The man a couple of gold mohurs, and he went away perfectly satisfied, wishing my excellency prosperity and long life. I was perfectly satisfied, too, and would not have missed seeing what I did that day for ten times the amount paid.

THE LAST GIBBET.

I LIVED, in my young days, in the quaint, old, out-of-the-way town of Cloyne, under the very shadow of one of those wonderful round towers whose history, use and date have proved such a puzzle to antiquarians.

A few miles from Cloyne is the magnificent harbor of Cork. Its entrance from the sea is through a deep channel some two miles in length, and about a mile or less in breadth. This entrance is guarded on each side by high steep shores. The defense of the entrance is placed on the two opposite each other, and rise abruptly from the the basin of the harbor made, consisting of two forts occupying the summit of two high walls of rock, the water's edge. These forts are called Camden and Carlisle, and were formerly used as barracks for officers and artillery; latterly they have been employed for a less honorable purpose, and are now penal settlements for our convicts.

It is with the latter of these forts my tale is connected; and, as I may observe, en passant, that I have often found strangers, and even some of my Cork friends, unable to tell which was which. Some say that Camden was on the right, and Carlisle on the left; others say that Camden was on the left and Carlisle on the right. Of course both were true; for you change sides according as you sailed in or sailed out the harbor. But whether in or out was the puzzle. I could not teach some of them the difference until I found out an easy rule for refreshing their memories. There are no public conveyances of any kind at Camden, whereas near Carlisle there are abundance of horses and cars to convey passengers to Cloyne and other parts of the country. So that Carlisle is the "car" side. None of those to whom I told this rule ever forgot the fact.

In the year 1800 some soldiers were quartered at Carlisle. About two miles from the fort there is a small hamlet called Ballinrostig. A peddler and his wife lived at that place, and carried on some little business there, trading chiefly with the soldiers. In those days communication with Cork was difficult. Carlisle then could not be so easily distinguished from Camden, as there were neither cars nor steamers. It was a long sail to the city, and a longer one round by the road. So that the journey of the peddler's wife to Cork were—

"Like angels' visits, few and far between."

The peddler and his wife were both old, and used to go to Cork as seldom as possible—only when their little stock was exhausted and they had sufficiency of money to purchase a fresh one.

One day the old man was at the fort, and mentioned to his wife his intention of going very soon to Cork to buy new goods. She was about three of the soldiers left the fort, apparently for the purpose of taking a walk in the fields. One of them had in his hand a remarkable-looking walking-stick. They bent their steps to the peddler's dwelling, but it was deserted—empty. Having scanned the door, they told the old man him with them for a drink. He went with them. The peddler had his money in a purse which he carried in his pocket, and which the soldiers fell on him for the purpose of seizing it. But he was too much for his wife, who caught it; but when she saw that they were resolved on the violence of these men, with the ready wit of a woman, she threw the purse on the top of a heap of turf which was close by, and, pretending to join in the struggle, commenced searching for the purse, but the turf, being loosely packed, tumbled about the dwelling. At last she found the purse, and, with a cry of fury at their disappointment, they then fell on the poor old defenseless couple, and soon left them dead. The murderers then commenced their search for other purse or stick. With heavy hearts and guilty consciences, they took the same way homeward to Carlisle Fort, with what hope of escape or punishment I cannot tell.

The next day the murders were discovered; and on raising the body of the peddler, under it the corpse the stick was found. The stick was recognized as belonging to one of the soldiers of the fort; inquiry was made, and the officer's servant admitted that he had lent it the evening before to one of the three men. The men were arrested, tried, found guilty, and confessed that they had murdered the old man and his wife. They were hanged near the scene of the murder, at the Cross of Ballinrostig, and their bodies were conveyed to Carlisle Fort, where they were buried, and remained hanging in chains on the top of one of the ramparts for many years.

I have been frequently at the spot, and have sat upon a turfy bank enjoying the lovely scene around me on all sides round me; the magnificent harbor of Cork, studded with its numerous Queenstown rising from the water, terrace above terrace; the winding its way toward the sea—the far distant mountains of Kerry, Glengariff, and Tipperary; the "kindly Galtees," and the lesser "Knockmeldown"—a panorama of nature in its richest beauty—wood, rock, mountain, and ocean—all proclaiming the power, wisdom and goodness of the great Creator. Though lovely the scene, yet a feeling of oppression, a sense of sadness occasionally creeps over me when looking at those lonely grassy mounds that mark the spot the dishonored and unmarked graves of the unhappy murderers who were discovered by the winds, and who have left no trace on the soil of Ireland whose remains were exposed upon a gibbet.

I have met with those of the present day who well remember seeing their bleached and rattling bones swinging, and in the dreadful iron cage in which they were suspended. Such is my story of "The Last Gibbet."

In a local paper, the Cork Constitution, I read the following paragraph, published in August, 1862:

"A discovery of three human skeletons was made on Saturday by the workmen employed on the Government works at Carlisle Fort. They were engaged in excavating a portion of the ground upon a large iron frame, which, upon examination, was found to contain the skeleton of a human being. Close by the iron frames were also found, each having a skeleton within it. The bodies were enclosed by the framework, which consisted of iron hoops. From inquiries made, it appears that they are the skeletons of Irish soldiers who, in the year 1800, were hung and gibbeted near Carlisle Fort for the murder of a man and his wife at a place called Ballinrostig. The remains have been given Christian burial. The bodies of Cook and Stacey remained hanging, it is said, for eleven years, and that of Kelly for seven. The unfortunate man had to undergo the ordeal of suspension twice; for on the first occasion, before life had left him, the rope broke, and he fell; but another having been got, he suffered the full penalty of the law. It is believed by some persons that the framework in which the bodies were found was iron hoops, which had been bound round them for the purpose of keeping them together when on the gibbet, as otherwise the bones, separating from each other, they could remain up for the length of time that these bodies were suspended."

ANIMAL DEFENSES.

NOWHERE more than among birds are the various gifts and endowments which Nature has so liberally bestowed for support and protection, more curious and effective. The weak are frequently enabled to elude the pursuit of the strong by a mere rapid flight or by strategem. Some are screened from their enemies by an arrangement of color hardly sustainable in the places which they most frequent and where they find their food in greatest plenty. Thus the sea-duck is scarcely to be distinguished from the tree on which it feeds; or the bittern, in the soft, mossy springs of water which it frequents. Some are indebted to the brilliancy of their colors as the means of alluring their prey—of this the humming-bird is a remarkable instance. This beautiful bird has been observed in some sequestered place near the flowers which display the richest colors of the rainbow to the full rays of the sun, and fluttering with expanded wings by the smooth surface of the water; the fish, attracted by the brilliant colors and splendor of the objects, are detained, whilst the wily bird darts down upon them, and, seizing its unsuspecting victim, bears the same advantage from the simplicity of their exterior appearance. The common wren will serve for an example. He stands by the edge of a piece of water, sometimes for hours together, with as much resemblance to a block of wood, waiting patiently the approach of some fish, which he never fails to secure, and which he instantly conveys to his long neck. He then reassumes his former position, and, with the same success, repeats the act with the greatest facility and skill.

The power of flight is also of their great attributes, whereby the weak may refuse and their strength. The symmetry and elegance of their forms are not only conducive to their safety, but of great importance in reference to their habits and mode of living. Instead of the short, thick neck, broad shoulders, deep chest, the broad shoulders and sinewy limbs of quadrupeds, we have the long neck, the long and slender beak, the gently swelling shoulder, the expansive wings, the tapering body, and the short legs which the nature laid wisely and rapidity of motion the couch the yielding air requires. The bones of birds are hollow, and the air finds its way into the bones and feathers hollowed into cells, which may be inflated at pleasure, and which assist by respiration in the pleasure of the animal. This latter provision is most wonderful, and is found to be surprising to the extent to what the condition of a balloon filled with lighter gas gives the animal, and by which it is enabled to rise and carry to rise of itself without effort on the wing—a most wonderful provision, by which long structures a gramnivorous and most appropriate aërostatic machine. The proper-ties of the wings are also very various in birds in diverse manners, and, of courses, favorable for flight. The skeleton, which is the frame-work on which the body is built up for beauth, was found by the French Academicians to weigh only twenty-four ounces, while the entire bird weighed nearly twenty-five pounds. With such a framework of body the action of the wings is easy and effective.

THE ORICINAL NICARACUANS.

THE Nicaraguans are supposed to have been a people of Mexican origin, driven southward by a great deluge. Their traditions and mode of writing were similar to that of Mexico; their religion differed slightly; their customs were more simple; they had a rough form of social polity; and their dominion was on one respect unique. A young Nicaraguan beauty would have no lovers; but after a long and forbidding her that it would be well to marry and settle, she would receive the visits of a suitor and a kind hear to where he lived. When he had appointed the time when she should have, she would call her lovers together, and tell them she wished to marry, and that one of them as her husband; that she did not possess a house; but that she desired that they would provide her one on the land which her father had given her. So the prudent damsel set her husband to enter into details as to the kind of house she wished to have built, such as the size, etc. The lover decided that the house would be built by such a day, giving them a week or a fortnight, as the case might be. No one she would give the chance of furnishing the wood-work, the lime, the thatch, the stone, the cotton for the hammock, the water, to another, to provide the cordage; to another, to gather the canes for the walls; to another, to prepare the dried fish to stock the house; to another, to get the maize; and so on, to another, to collect the money. The work was usually put in hand with the utmost expedition, and by the time the lover had completed all that she had asked for. At last the house was ready, the provisions collected, the money got in it, and the hearts of the overworked competitors beat rapidly as the fortunate lover was informed that the house at last was built in the new house. When supper was concluded, the lover, rising, said made a short but gracious speech. She first thanked them all heartily for the kind manner in which they had helped her, and then said that she wished it was in her power to make so many wives as there were guests, so as to suit all parties. In those past they had seen what a loving husband she would make, and how happy the man was going to be married, and to be long to one alone—"And now, my friends," she said, whereupon, she took the chosen one by the hand. Her choice having been declared, the dancing commenced, and was kept up with great spirit and hilarity, and concluded the feast by dancing and drinking to the success of each of the newly married pairs. The recited matters, after that day, could never hope to be disturbed by the husband, who, in his turn, was expected to be present with meekness; but sometimes one or two of these husbands, tired of quarreling with their wives, committed suicide, and were found next morning hanging on a tree in the neighborhood of the palace of love built partly by their hands.

THE BIBLE.

THE following, showing the size, manner, and authorship of the various translations of the sacred volume into English, will interest most readers. Such of our readers as may be cut out and pasted in some copy of the Bible. Indeed, it might be embodied in the margin of all the editions of the sacred hereafter:

Date. A.D. Translation.
766.—Aldhelm, Saxon Psalms.
721.—Egbert's Saxon Gospels.
734.—Bede's St. John's Gospels.
1000.—Anglo-Saxon Version of Psalms.
1140.—Rolle's (or Hampole's) Psalms.
1290.—Scottish Version.
1526.—Tyndale's Jonah.
1526.—Tyndale's New Testament.
1532.—Coverdale's Bible.
1535.—Coverdale's Jonah, Psalms, Songs of Moses.
1538.—Cranmer's Great Bible.
1539.—Taverner's Bible.
1557.—Geneva (c.e., i. Rogers's) Bible.
1560.—Whittingham's Bible.
1561.—Bishop's Bible.
1582.—Rheims New Testament, Roman Catholic translation.
1600.—Douay Bible, Roman Catholic translation.
1611.—King James's version.

In speaking of the different translations of the Bible, such expressions are frequently used as would leave those unacquainted with the fact to suppose that they formed so many independent works; but these is, in fact, only one version of the Protestant English Bible in print, altered and improved by different hands, and which has received the subsequent amendments of many learned men; yet, from the first to the last, there is only one authorized or standard version. Let us now compare the earliest to the latest, and he will find a discrepancy indeed or rather such a similarity of expression as cannot be accidental.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

WHAT bar is that which often opens but never shuts?—A rib-ward.

WHY is a retired oculist like an inland revenue officer?—Because he is an ex-eyeman.

A LITERARY man on retiring into private life said his occupation was gone because he had no silliest itself into notice!

AN Irishman having been told that the price of bread had fallen, exclaimed, "This is the first time I ever heard of the price of bread falling!"

HEARING a physician remark that a small blow will break a nose, a rustic exclaimed, "Well, I suppose, then, that a big blow will just nose a great many times, and I've never broke it."

BY the ancient laws of Hungary a man convicted of bigamy was compelled to live with both wives in the same house. As a consequence, the crime was extremely rare in that country.

A LAWYER on his death-bed willed all his property to his needy relation, giving as a reason for doing so, that he wished that his property should be "dead rich, who pilfered him.

"DEAR me, how fluidly he talks!" said Mrs. Partington, recently, at a temperance meeting. "I am always reproved when he makes his speech, for his eloquence warms in every cactridge of my body."

A YOUNG and beautiful, but poor widow, was about to marry an old and wilowy. Her friends wished to know what she wanted to marry him for? She replied, "Because I love him for the grounds of his estate, (or, generally,) on which he wales, and the very house in which he lives." Such is the power of love! There is none of your school-gal romance in that.

"I DECLARE, Mr. Goldthumb, you have read everything."

"Why, ma'am, after working thirty years as a trunkmaker, I've had to read up to my chance if I'm to stand a fair show in the literature of my country."

"Pupils should be seen and not heard," shouldn't talk. Their mouths will do well enough as banks of deposit, but not of issue.

IT is said that doctors can mitigate the pain of sickness; certainly a good many of them make dying a very long job.

THE ladies sometimes get up bonnets of diminished size, but never of diminished cost.

A MUSICIAN by trade does not always speak quite so simply as a chanteuse. The latter lives upon air, the former upon fare. And, by the way, a musician should enjoy good health, for he has a change of air whenever he moves.

THE Press, the Pulpit, and the Petticoats—the three ruling powers of the day. The first spreads information; the second spreads morals, and the last spread considerably.

A CONFERENCE.—A little more than you have.

"YOU mean to bring up that ere one to be pretty starry at a bargain," said a fellow to a woman who was speaking of her darling child all her might to a little possibility.

"Why?" asked the fond mother.

"Because you're bowling, by low baby, by low baby, in his ears all the time."

AT Acapulco (Mexico), the pretty peasantgirls have a curious custom during the carnival. A solemn mass of shells principally on the days when steamers arrive from Panama, and the mails are opened.

"HE gives you present, sonor," and then they retire with a low courtesy. Returning, however, in a few moments, they say, sweetly:

"You give me present, sonor, of quarter dollar?" and they get the money.

"OUT of sight, out of mind." We don't see it, we don't think of the other day, and it hasn't been out of our mind since.

A PERSECUTED WATCHMAN.—A man was arrested in Boston for disturbing the peace by simply keeping watch and guard of another man's property.

AT Springfield, Mass., a lady sent the following telegram to a friend: "Spruce oil tasteless, the evergreen of society."

THE man who lends an umbrella is a real philanthropist, because he is the very soul of practice.

A horse is a bee-hive like a decayed potato? Because a bee hive is a bee-holder, a beholder is a spectator (a spocked later), a spocked later is a decayed potato.

A PERSON asked an Irishman why he wore his stockings upon the outside.

"Because," said he, "there's a hole on the other side."

A FRENCH officer, quarreling with a Swiss, reproached him with his country's vice of fighting on either side for money. "Sir," said we Frenchmen," said he, "fight for honor."

"Yes," replied the Swiss; "every one fights for what he most wants."

Full Plan and Details of the Drawing.

The Subscription Books will be closed on the 25d of September, and will be placed in the hands of the following gentlemen, who have kindly consented to act as the Chicago members of the Committee to conduct the award of Premiums on the 1st of October following:

WM. F. COLBAUGH, President Union Nat. Bank.
AMOS T. HALL, Treasurer C. B. & Q. R. R.
E. G. HALL, Hall, Kinsbark & Co.
CLINTON BRIDGE, Ewing, Briggs & Co.
J. C. DORE, President of the Board of Trade.

JAS. H. BOWEN, President Third National Bank.
JAMES G. FAGAN, Superintendent American Ex.
FRANCIS A. HOFFMAN, Ex-Lieut. Governor.
J. T. MUNN, Munn & Scott Elevator.
J. A. ELLIS, President Second National Bank.

These gentlemen, together with such others from different parts of the country as they may add to their number for the purpose of fairly representing the shareholders at large, will have the SOLE MANAGEMENT OF THE AWARD IN ALL ITS DETAILS. The plan of the award agreed on is the following: Two hundred and ten thousand numbers, representing the certificates issued, will be placed in one wheel, and three hundred and two tickets inscribed with the names of the premiums (as will the Opera House, three hundred paintings, and the bust of Lincoln), will be placed in another. From these wheels a number and a premium will be drawn simultaneously, the number drawn in each wheel making the premium drawn such.

The premiums will be ready for delivery immediately upon the result of the award being known; and the person by whom the FIRST PREMIUM is drawn will receive a CERTIFICATE IN FEE OF AN UNINCUMBERED TITLE TO THE CROSBY OPERA HOUSE. Information relative to the title and legal arrangements will be furnished on application at the real estate office of Messrs. Rees & Agnew, Chicago.

CERTIFICATES FIVE DOLLARS.

NOTICE.—In ordering Certificates, please name Express destined. Send Drafts, Post Office Money Orders, on Greenbacks, with address of Town, County and State carefully written, as every Certificate is fully registered.

All orders for Certificates and communications should be addressed to the CROSBY ART ASSOCIATION, A. A., and directed to either 625 Broadway, New York, or to 58 Crosby's Opera House, Chicago, Ill.

NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT.—Among the first Gift Enterprises ever commenced in Chicago, was that of Messrs. A. A. Kelley & Co., which has been perpetual for more than three years past, and has given the most perfect satisfaction—if we are to judge by the extensive patronage accorded it. They are the proprietors of the "North American Prize Concert," now so extensively advertised in the leading papers, and endorsed by some of the best business firms in this country. From what we know of Mr. Kelley, we are positive that he will, "in the fullness of his heart," do what is fairly and honorably with all who shall send him their orders—he is liberal-hearted and numerous, and will, without doubt, be scrupulously awarded to holders of lucky tickets. Every alternate ticket will draw a prize. Call at the store, or at their office, No. 108 Randolph street, Chicago.—Chicago Times.

KELLEY & CO.'S GIFT ENTERPRISE.—The first to embark in the Gift Enterprise business in Chicago was the firm of A. A. Kelley & Co., located at 103 Randolph street. Who does not remember their store, which opened two or three years ago, where many purchased books and other articles, and were so lucky as to find with their purchase tickets to the Gift Concert, which entitled them to valuable gifts in jewelry or other articles? Thousands of our citizens became customers, and these have the best of evidences that Messrs. Kelley & Co. always perform all they promise; that their patronage is reputable men, and do business honorably and on the square. Their Gift Concert, which is now open for exercise, the drawing of which is to take place on the 23d of August, promises to be one of the most popular Gift Concerts that has ever been given in Chicago. The gifts to be distributed are all money; they are represented to be. All the prizes will positively be distributed to those holding the lucky tickets after the Drawing. Success to such a worthy house, and we recommend to our readers who may desire to purchase in favor of drawing something. 4. The citizens of Chicago, who know A. A. Kelley & Co., have confidence in their honor and integrity, and are largely investing in their Enterprise. These are some of the reasons why we feel safe in commending Kelley & Co.'s Gift Concert to the public. Let the people come up and buy the tickets still remaining unsold. The drawing will positively take place on the day advertised. Money may be sent by mail for tickets, and will be promptly responded to.—Chicago Journal.

Cholera Cradles.

The history of the cholera shows that it has had its origin in those great Hindoo and Mussulman festivals which bring together great bodies of enthusiasts and devotees, from all parts of the Moslem and Hindoo world, at stated intervals, in places having no facilities for accommodating the concurrent crowds with shelter or supplying them with food. As many as 700,000 pilgrims sometimes meet in Mecca, living in the most abject manner and on the scantiest food, and esteeming death, in the sacred city and within sight of the Kabbah, as insuring immortality and all the delights promised to the faithful. Without medicine, ignorant of all sanitary laws except those which the founders of their religion incorporated in their religious creed—fanatical optimists in the widest sense, it is not surprising that disease should be generated and propagated among them to the widest possible limit.

It is a significant fact that the greatest curses of mankind have originated in religious fanaticism. When we speak of curses, we mean war, pestilence, and enforced ignorance.

Our great cholera epidemic of 1832 had its origin in India, in a great concurrence of pilgrims at some spot sacred to Juggenath on the Ganges.

The second, of 1848, originated in a great Mahometan religious gathering in Tantah, in Egypt.

According to the report of the French Commission appointed to investigate the cause of the present visitation of the cholera, it appears that it originated with the pilgrims returning from the celebration of the festival of Kourban-Bairam, the feast of sacrifices at Mecca. The number of individuals of all ages and both sexes assembled from the various Mahometan countries to go through the consecrated ceremonies was estimated at 700,000, and the number of sheep and camels slaughtered, the offal of which was abandoned upon the ground, exceeded a million.

"The pilgrims came to this festival," says a writer in a recent number of the Medical Times and Gazette, "badly clothed, badly fed, many exhausted, and all fanatically ecstatic—to them death had no terrors, and this common result was the future. To die was to enter Paradise the earlier, the transition from life to death a mere dream, the prevention of death a curse rather than a blessing, and pain even an ecstacy. In many a year that vast multitude has never assembled without being subjected to the ravages of some disease. How could such a calamity be avoided? The history comes together unprepared for all the exigencies and necessities of life. They have no encampment, no sufficiency of food or water, no latrine, no drain, or, in a word, no way of keeping their dead. Into such a host as this cast a speck of disease-producing matter that will reproduce disease, and the passively wet mass becomes one mass becomes actively poisonous. Unfortunately, too, it is a movable pest, for of the hundreds of thousands attacked, few after all reach the goal they long for. By the time the final hope, the majority remain tied to the earth, and these, when the great celebration is over, tragging their plague honeycomb unmodified, west Hejk, before whom common mortals must uncover, carry with them the germs of disease, and disseminate it wherever they go."

We are sorry from the above to find cholera engendered, and it seems not improbable that, even if the present inoculation dies out, we may have a new infection next year, or later. We infer this from the fact that we have official information that the latest Mecca pilgrimage has developed the pestilence anew. The following information has been received from the United States Consul at Port Mahon, dated June 30, 1866. It is directed to the Secretary of State, and says:

"I have the honor to inform the Department that information has been received here that the mortality among the pilgrims at Mecca, from cholera, is very great this season than the last. The information says that at Medina there had died 15,000 persons on Saturday last. It is reported that the infection has spread to Alexandria, Egypt. It is also information that the disease has as yet reappeared in Spain. The quarantine regulations, acting upon the supposition that the disease is contagious, have instituted a rigid quarantine against the Turkish and Egyptian vessels from the ports of the United States and British ports, because of the lingering cases in the Medway, Bermuda, to quarantine here. There is now at quarantine the British Bark Lucinda, and the American Bark Ida Clarendon, owned in and direct from New York, and Master of Malaga. Both vessels sail daily. The English outnumber all other nations, the vessels being about five to one of any other nation."

Financial Soundness of the Country.

WHEN in December, 1864, Mr. Fessenden, then Secretary of the Treasury, made his estimate for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1866, he calculated the receipts from customs, for the year, at $70,000,000, and the receipts from other sources (excepting under the Internal Revenue Law), at $25,000,000, making a total of $95,000,000.

The accounts for the year have now been made up, and we find these estimates greatly exceeded by the returns. The customs have yielded $170,000,000 in gold, and "other sources" a total of $50,000,000, respectively, nearly four times as much as Mr. Fessenden's estimates. So much for the unanticipated strength, wealth and elasticity of the United States! Disappointed, too, in their fond anticipations of her own children, how must she bring shame on the hostile prophecies of her enemies!

We have thus far only spoken of two of the sources of the income of the country. Beyond these, and gigantic by comparison, is the Internal Revenue—the product of our domestic taxation. From this source (apart from State and municipal taxes), the Treasury has received, for the year ending July 1st, $368,000,000. The income of the United States, therefore, for the year, has been, in round numbers, $550,000,000!

This is in excess of the interest on the public debt and expenses of Government not far from $200,000,000, which will be appropriated to the liquidation of the national debt. At this rate, the heaviest debt ever owed by any nation will be paid off within ten years.

The exports from the United States for the year ending July 1st, were $457,000,00. The imports for the same period, $301,000,000. Balance in favor of the United States, $186,500,000.

The exports of gold from the United States to foreign countries, for the year, has been $57,729,000.

The receipts of gold, on consignment (as distinguished from purchases), from private (private hands) from California, for the year, $25,000,000.

To more healthful or satisfactory exhibits of the finances of a nation can be desired.

No nation on earth has been taxed so heavily, or has paid so cheerfully. The national life and integrity are above all price. They are determined, on the field of battle and through the price of blood, that the nation should live; they have equally determined, in the fields of peace and through the power of their self-imposed burdens, that the decision reached through blood and battle shall be sustained.

But, it is asked by those who would, at any hazard, prophesy ill of the great Republic: "How will the European complexion affect you?" In the disruption of a continent, can you hope to escape the storms that rage around?

To this we have only to respond, in the language of the London Times. After reviewing the financial crisis of England, and noticing the fall of Bavarian stocks from 96 to 80, and Frankfort from 95 to 79, etc., it concludes by saying:

"American securities still attract regular investors, as capitalists regard them as out of the vortex of speculative excitement."

Comment on this is unnecessary. Nor can it be disguised from themselves, by the most bigoted of Englishmen, that it was the opportune supply of $40,000,000 in gold from the United States that saved the Bank of England and the whole banking interest of Great Britain from complete disaster during the late financial crisis.

AMONG the numerous applications of photography, none is more interesting or more useful than those which relate to the aid it lends to astronomy. When Arago detailed to the French Academy of Sciences the process of Daguerre, he pointed out the importance which it might have of astronomy. His prediction has been completely fulfilled, and astronomers have largely availed themselves of the resources which it has placed in their hands. But none have been so successful in this direction as Mr. L. M. Rutherford. He has devised a mechanism by which he ensures that they bear being enlarged to a diameter of five feet, and which he found to exact, when submitted to micrometrical examination, that they furnish correct data for the measurement of the situation of the stars. They serve also as a foundation for a lunar map, six feet in diameter. Photography has enabled us to determine the relative altitudes and depths of mountain ranges and ravines with which the surface of the moon is corrugated. Nor have the labors of the photographer been confined to the production of mere pictures of several of the planets also have been obtained.

THE Empress of France has done much to mitigate or abate the senseless fear of the cholera, which, as much as anything else, tends to induce the disease. It is well-known that nothing is more efficient to contribute to the spread of this terrible scourge than the panic which often and so rapidly spreads among the emotion people. Not even here does the fear of the number of those who actually die are killed by fear rather than by positively being in circumstances which lead to the disease. Thus, it is said, it is to use all possible means to mitigate the terror but too universally felt! The visits of the Empress to the cholera wards of the hospitals, and this year at Amiens, are to be admired, not only for the kindness of heart which prompted them, as for being a practical way in which the fears of the people may be allayed. If the Empress were afraid or among the patients, to stay by them, to touch them, to give them, of comfort to them, it might be possible that she would herself be a victim. Indeed, from the fact proves nothing, it is yet a remarkable coincidence that, whereas before the visit of the Empress the number of cholera patients in Amiens amounted to eighty-six in a day, on the day after she had been there it fell to sixty-seven, and the following day to forty-seven. It is also prominent a part as the Empress has done on these occasions, we think that she has not women generally an example of courage, and of calm good sense, which cannot be without beneficial results.

WE not long ago quoted an extract from Lady Emily Eden's letters, in which she sneered like a passage from the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." We quote another paragraph:

"Runjeet Singh's tomb is the majestic private stud. I suppose fifty horses were led past us. The first had on its saw-cut trappings, necklaces strung on its neck and between its ears, and a large saddle two enormous emeralds, nearly two inches square, carved all over, and set in gold frames, like little looking-glasses. The cropper was all emeralds, and there were stud-spaces of gold put on something like martingale. Henry Singh said the whole was valued at thirty-five or less (three hundred and seventy thousand pounds sterling). All those trappings are for nobody knows the worth of these enormous stones; they are not worn, and are never sold. They are simply stirred in diamonds and turquoises, another in pearls, and there was one with trappings of coral and pearl that was very pretty. Their saddle-cloths are stones woven into them. It reduces European magnificence to a very low mark. We were told that there was a large amphitheatre of elephants, belonging to our own people, on to the State, and thousands of Runjeet's followers, all dressed in yellow or red satin, with quantities of gold lace. Horse troopers all had silver trousers, and all or them sparkling with jewels. It was altogether a splendid sight."

In the midst of all this magnificence comes one of the sharp contrasts so marked in Oriental life. "Budget is at 10, Dr. Low is out, and then is the room:" "A little glass closet, in a corner of his palace, with a common cot to lie on; no other furniture whatever, and hardly room for any."

FOR the benefit of our city readers, and such as live in towns where street cars implies a ride of six cents, under the plea that it is authorized by the Internal Revenue Law, for the benefit of such, we have to say that by the 1st of August, the amendment of that law went into effect, in terms as follows:

"And whenever the addition to any fare shall amount only to the fraction of one cent, any person or company liable for the tax may collect one half per centum may add to such fare one cent in lieu of such fraction; and any person or company may sell and issue, at any convenient public, tickets in packages of twenty, and multiples of twenty, at the price of which only an amount equal to the revenue tax shall be added."

The Fifth Avenue and other car companies must sell twenty tickets for 1020 cents or 102 cents, or a fraction over five cents each—and at "convenient points."

THE statistics of the decline of the Hawaiian or Sandwich Islands are so positively frightful, that we believe almost unparalled in modern history. In 1823, three years after the arrival of the American missionaries, the population of the islands was estimated at from 130,000 to 150,000 souls, while twenty-five years later, in 1848, there were not more than 84,000 inhabitants. The census of 1853 gave the total population at but 73,137, of whom 2,487 were foreigners, while the enumeration of 1860 showed a population of but 69,800, including 67,084 natives and 2,716, foreigners. Thus there was a decrease of 3,337 individuals, or nearly five per cent., in the course of seven years. When it decreases the meaning of these figures is, that the rate of decrease is much faster than appears, as the excess of males over females amounting at the census of 1860 to not less than 6,136. It seems not long since that the Queen, then the consort of Hawaian race will follow the Dodo, and be extinguished within the term of our own generation. The remaining individuals, are nearly all victims of regeneration by means of police and hard work. But what on earth can ever induce a people to live in a country where "Kaw pig, having for area of an ordinary dressing-room, will keep a family in luxury for a week?" Even a sub-editor would go on strike under these conditions. The natives seem inclined to look upon the degradation of the Hawaiian race with the same sort of stolid resignation of the race, but it appears very doubtful whether this is not rather a consequence than a cause.

AMONG the possible, if not probable results of the Fenian raid, will be the extinction of the old "sick man" Turkey, who has only been kept alive through the jealousies of other powers. England and France, Russia, and Austria, Russia, and England paid for her—that is to say, gave her money to spend in immoral extravagance, while France got the glory of the war. England knew very well with whom she had to deal, and bound the Ottoman Empire to her by the Anglo-Constantinian policy. But it turns out that Turkey is insolvent, the coupons of the consolidated debt have not been paid, and it is said that bonds which the government had pledged itself not to issue till 1867, have already been secretly sold. The consequence is that we hear but its every day completely, no one will lend it anything, and it must, if its expenditure goes on, speedily come to a crash. It is plain that Russia as well that the inevitable break-up of this empire should be preceded by no hostile policy. Englishmen never like a defaulting State, and it is as well that the final arrangements should not be impeded by an ignorant prejudice. Russia's interest is now to supply a massive in Europe. At the same time the break-up will probably not be too rapid for safety. For once her own affairs the Sultan's people go on as they did before they began raising loans—spend when they have money, and when it runs out they borrow.

INSTEAD of a tunnel between England and France, it is now proposed to establish an ocean ferry, worked by steam vessels of immense size, constructed to carry across the channel not merely passengers and their baggage, but railway trains in which they are brought from London or Paris. The passengers start from their cars in specially constructed at Dover and Calais, and will, like the Great Eastern steamship, convey them in a state of perfect physical immunity from the discomforts of a sea passage. The details have, it is stated, already been worked out in the design of the vessels, and they will insure to the passengers protection from weather and from all delays and inconvenience of transhipment. The scheme is one which could be completed and brought into operation in less than two years, and which would cost, it is said, seven and a half sterling. "Few will deny," says a writer in the Times, "that this appears the more practical proposal, and the most likely to benefit the present generation. The tunnel could not be completed in less than twenty years, or at less cost than £20,000,000, to say nothing of the possibility that after years of labor and enormous expense it might turn out to be impracticable and a failure."

THE condition of things in Vienna, after the great battle of Sadowa, is thus depicted in a private letter, dated from that capital, July 6th:

"This city was for four-and-twenty hours in a state of stupor; people could with difficulty realize that the battle had been three days of the place, and that the road to the capital was entirely open to their triumphant army. Yesterday I saw the Emperor pass, pale and shrinking into the corner of his carriage. The Empress overwhelmed with grief; she went to the hospitals. That is the first occupation of every one since the cannon ceased to thunder. At three o'clock in the evening, when the last telegram arrived, it seemed as if the entire city had received the same electric shock. Then, with reflection, a reaction set in, and nothing else was discussed but the means to avert, or to continue the war against Prussia. 'Let us abandon Venetia to Italy,' was the cry of the people, 'and let us join the southern army to the help of that of the north!' A Council was held, in the presence of Napoleon's envoy, and 'Long live Italy with Venice!' Men are at work night and day fortifying Vienna, and the Danube Canal, where the roads meet by which the Prussians will arrive. The enemy's army does not seem to follow up its triumph and a demoralized population make but a feeble resistance. The Austrian army is composed of men's minds. This morning the removal was commenced of the Imperial Treasure, and the Northern Railway of all the stock, to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy. Last night the Archives were packed for a time. The Prussians are going to occupy Moravia, which they will retain as a pledge. Perhaps they will also Brunn, an open town; and Olmutz, where the Emperor Ferdinand resided, and which vigorously defended Prince Windischgratz's manœuvring in that corner. A new army will be formed in Hungary, and the Archduke Albert will probably place himself at the head of it. These people who comes and offer themselves, some as Italians, others as Germans, are ridiculous. They are Kind. To whom will this new army be confided? To the conqueror, of course! It is said, even now, that the Emperor, who is perhaps the best tactician in the army, has refused the command of the armies at the Ministry of War. There is a proposal to eliminate a Hungarian corps, which is said to number 40,000. In the afternoon, the venerable King of Saxony arrived at the Northern station, where the Emperor received him in the imperial family awaited him. The two sovereigns were in a carriage with four horses abreast. Late events appear to have greatly aged King John."

"GOING to the bad," or going to Baden-Baden, which many people seem to think is about the same thing, is the fate that has at last overtaken, for the Grand Duchy of Baden has sided with Austria in the European war, and is, consequently, "going to the bad" as well as Austria. A correspondent, examined of Europe, undertook lately to go Baden, knowing it to be "a dreadfully expensive place," but he found that his number straight nor broad. He says, with well-feigned tears:

"Now you approach the station, and are absolutely obliged to carry your own bag. Not a carriage is to be seen, but instead of it a number of rough-looking porters and a fierce-looking policeman; the three together demand exorbitant fees for the service through them. The streets are lonely, and when you arrive at the hotel, instead of a crowd of waiters and a bustling bar, the landlord himself unders you to them, a power of attorney, and requests you to inquire for your self. Then comes the very grand occasion. The shops are still there, but very grand occasion. The shops are still there, but very few people are in the streets, the spirits of the rooms—and the gambling devolution; and the Kursaal—are deserted. Here and there a solitary waiter is lounging about, and a few more are miserable in the roulette-room playing for thalers; the croupiers are sitting in their places, looking as if they rush to the adjoing cafe to support human nature; but, alas! they have to wait a long time before they get one waiter, or, at the most, two, positively asleep in a corner of the room, and the rest of the gambling tables are full of last year's fashions, and the Lichtenthal Allee, which is usually so gay, is now a perfect wilderness which lies it remain unoccupied, and all this because the Grand Duke of Baden has chosen to side since this year to chronicle—the miscontenting of the Continent, the public opinion of Europe, the whole world—the cause, the order and discipline which Prussia has introduced into the affairs of the Germanic land of war, which is at present slowly but surely working out its own ruin."

"The war has certainly produced many and divers evils, but it has also produced one good—namely in the incunation it has brought upon an otherwise prosperous people; and we hereby declare ourselves to be the Louse-monde files and takes refuge in the Soden mountains, and for a time Germany wears a mourning shroud."

TOWN COSSIP.

OUR heated term has been followed by the most delightful weather, and the usual social exclusiveness of August has given place to breezes borrowed from Newport and Saratoga, already in full enchantment. Our old hides his jaded face behind cooling sheets of cloud, and gentle showers drop down upon us as if in commiseration of our sufferings. Hardly a day of enchantment such a season of delight, and rarely does nature so clothe herself in smiles and brighten the world with such generous cheer.

One would think, from reading the daily accounts of the ad the summer resorts, that the city was the very location of any source of pleasure, and that all the beauty, fashion and intelligence of the world must have gone on a holiday excursion, leaving behind them only a population of the very dregs of guilt, and to this fable the shenories are scarcely inured, the streets are no less crowded, and no outward sign bekoens any diminution of the population.

A cent is an insignificant title, and a fraction of a cent a still more insignificant one, but the corporations of our especially since we have become accustomed to count dollars by millions and hundreds and thousands of millions, and by the fractions of a cent by the tens on the occasion of no small degree of public imitation, and not to very considerable difficulties. Our people have been in the habit of charging seven-eighths of a cent for a single ride, which has subjected the public to the injustice, as they submit to many abuses, if not cheerfully, still without murmuring. Now, a recent law changes the value of the fare to the more practical pieces at the exact legal rate, but they evade the enactment by charging their tickets at only two for practically inaccessible points, exacting from every passenger who has failed to provide himself with the proper fractional currency the extra amount which we indignantly refuse to pay it are subjected to gross insignities and annoyances. Surely it is time that individual is stifling, but the aggregate gain to all the roads from the shortcomings amounts to several thousand dollars per month—a sum they are very unwilling to lose; while the patient community, feeling that the difference is too small to be worth legally unwilling to submit to further extortion, and, with law and the Corporations combined, have no practical redress to be recalcitrant. Weather the monopoly or the individuals will gain the day is still a matter of doubt.

The even banner of our may has been slightly disturbed by the arrival in our city of a real Queen, one who has worn a crown and swayed a sceptre, and received the cheerful homage of willing subjects. Of course in a land where all claim to be sovereigns and none to pay to any master, royalty is somewhat at a discount, but the good lady has been greeted very cordially. The municipal authorities have improved the opportunity to make a public demonstration of welcome, and Mr. Chilton, from the State Department at Washington, and Mayor Hall, have both done honor to the guest. Then her Majesty, and assure her of the very flattering attentions bestowed which she is held at the Capital. Probably the Queen is more honored by the attention of the gentlemanly representative from the Government than the representatives by the nations upon which he has been sent; but it is, nevertheless, a becoming recognition of Queen Emma's personal worth, and of the claim of her country from our record, that she alone is cordially welcomed to our shores. She is the widow of the late Kamehameha IV., of the Sandwich Islands, and went to England about a year since, partly to visit the country, and partly to excite an interest in the commercial affairs of her dominions. She is represented as an amiable, interesting person, of considerable public character, and is not out of place for us to afford her both gratification and attention.

There are some things we would not relish, removed from their accustomed places. The attendance to have our bread brought fresh to our doors every morning, and to be regularly supplied with our daily newspaper, are two we would not care to have eloquence dealt out to by the latter, or the pleasant greeting of each fresh morning's loaf, in parcels like packages of tobacco, or the perplexity of a puzzle, however, seem to be the chief attractions of American life. The sweetness and length of the strains by the amount of perspiration it excites, a little more entrapped than his fellows, has rounded his organ on a cart, and with an undisciplined spasmodic power, executes the streets retailing sweet sounds, and looking with contempt upon the more pretentious of his less melodious imitators. Verily a locomotive organ is a new device, and a convincing evidence that the world moves.

Speaking of enterprise suggests the fact that one of the daily papers, in the exercise of a wise liberality and business tact, issued on Saturday morning with a column of special dispatches by the Atlantic telegraph. As all the news papers are practically the same intelligence, the unlimited have been pushing themselves to the wonderful extent of the daily consumption. This, however, is one of the mysteries of journalism, which has come in the line of almost all of its ordinary publishers. By-the-way, the great cable is proving somewhat of a single-new-story diary of its progress. We still have to depend upon the st-amers for important and reliable news. The dispatches are much more accustomed to the new beat, and somewhat relieved from carrying unenlightened news, and we are not surprised that the latter itself as a good-natured, trustworthy cable messenger, which it deserves to be, and which it deserves in public favor.

The cholera has not yet appeared, but creates no panic, though the mortality is considerably in excess of last year at this time, and larger than at any time during the season. As we have passed by the period when such afflictions are the most fatal, and as there is a decided abatement of the malady, we have reasonable hope that the present year will not prove a severe scourge, and that the wise sanitary measures will effectually check the ravages.

Of the theatres little can be said. The summer is not their proper season, and, as in many other things, has merit in its emptiness as gauged very much by the size of the audience. No novelties have been introduced during the week, and no new performance has been retained for a considerable period. Preparations for the season are, however, quite active, and we are promised some fine entertainments.

PHYSICAL EXERCISES FOR FEMALES.

THE tendency of the modern mind to the appreciation of robust health, and of the active exercises which are so favorable to it, is shown in nothing more clearly than in the new fashion which has become of a novel, in order to be interesting, and not be of the commonplace, every dress must have a train, must be able to ride, and row, and walk, and play croquet, and perhaps cricket, with the most active of her fellows, or she is out of the mode entirely does not prevent her from being a highly sentimental and otherwise personal creature. Ladies, now, indeed, in three anything "masculine" or "strong-minded," according to modern notions, is a woman's dress subject to a process of physical as well as mental education.

Now that every one has gone into the country or to the seaside, or to journey to foreign lands, it is perhaps a little superfluous to allude what physical exercises there are which are open to and practised by women, especially by those who have left their schools. In this connection we wish to bear in mind that active exercise appears to us one desideratum, and an element in the physical welfare of the single out-door employments as gardening, or looking after domestic matters, some more under the description of light work than of actual recreation.

Of course, almost the first thing that suggests itself as an amusement when the season purse is dropped, is some which appears to exercise unbounded fascination over all who once indulge in it. We have, indeed, heard it highly spoken of by more spectators, who "don't see nothing in it," but a consideration of the hours spent in its practice would appear to be the conclusion that there must be an occult satisfaction arising from its practice, and the conclusion it seems to us have but one good point—namely, that it keeps the players in the open air. It is a game very graceful and exercise, and leads to much stooping and lounging about, which cannot, we imagine, be always advantageous. Of the game of croquet having acquired a certain amount of "society," and affording opportunities for flirtation, it is not now the occasion to speak.

People (and their name is Legion) who are now at the seaside, are enamored of bathing. Bathing, as it is practised at our coast resorts, is, no doubt, a delightful recreation; but to it swimming could be added, and delight would be increased, and the possible use and advantage much extended. Though swimming is an art so easy of acquisition, and so useful in practice, it is a surprising how few possess it. Women who can swim may be able to go out beyond their depth, and cannot must only swim their handle in despair of being able to bring it. Not long ago a lady member of the British Humane Society had awarded one of its medals to a young man, for saving the life of another, which he was endangered while they were bathing. It would be well if medals were awarded as a matter of course for all of their physical education. It may be said that the means of teaching are also very cheap, because people are not always on the seaside. But there are rivers, and lakes, and ponds, which are open for the purposes of bathing and swimming; and in most large towns there are swimming baths which might be employed. In some of the London baths a certain day is specially appropriated to the women. In the country it is there made clear that women would use the bath in greater numbers were the bathing day, we do not say certain days, but would be so difficulty in ensuring a similar appropriation.

Boating is another exercise which is pleasing and not favor among women as a physical recreation, and ought one to be among the most popular. It is not very objectionable by skill on the part of women as on that of men, and, if the amusement be limited to a walk, it cannot be aimed at. Whether ladies will ever condescend to compete in rowing matches is a question of the dim future. Perhaps the highest excellence is only attained through competition; but for all that, we are not prepared to speculate about the matter at present. When rowing becomes more general, it will be time enough to consider it.

The question of competition suggests the recreation of archery, which is so much in vogue among large sections of society. Archery has some of the advantages of croquet in bringing people together, and in its practice it gives a good deal of active exercise, and requires great skill and exactness. Its drawbacks are that it requires somewhat expensive appliances and a considerable space of ground, which is not always at command.

For young girls of from twelve or thirteen to seventeen or eighteen we have heard a modified species of rounders recommended. We have heard of a large girls' school where cricket matches are regularly played, and entered into with a spirit which speaks to us the hoped that they are more amenable to discipline than the boys who play the game. We believe it to be possible to so involving too much strain on the bodily powers of girls, as to endanger health, but we should indeed in active sports, taking, if possible, a second place to the boys. We are not saying them to set up muscle, but we do not see why they should not be allowed to run, and jump, and throw without any deterioration of the delicacy which is the charm of girls.

There remain to be noticed two of the physical exercises which are common to both sexes—riding and walking. These may be dismissed in a few words. The former is a luxury which few can know to whom it is attainable it needs no recommendation. The latter is for many reasons the most valuable exercise, and practised by many as a species of rather melancholy duty. The pedestrian tour, with knapsack and stick, is a delightful recreation, a little more enterprising than his fellows, has rounded his organ on a cart, and with an undisciplined spasmodic power, executes the streets retailing sweet sounds, and looking with contempt upon the more pretentious of his less melodious imitators. Verily a locomotive organ is a new device, and a convincing evidence that the world moves.

Speaking of enterprise suggests the fact that one of the daily papers, in the exercise of a wise liberality and business tact, issued on Saturday morning with a column of special dispatches by the Atlantic telegraph. As all the news papers practically the same intelligence, the unlimited have been pushing themselves to the wonderful extent of the daily consumption. This, however, is one of the mysteries of journalism, which has come in the line of almost all of its ordinary publishers. By-the-way, the great cable is proving somewhat of a single-new-story diary of its progress. We still have to depend upon the st-amers for important and reliable news. The dispatches are much more accustomed to the new beat, and somewhat relieved from carrying unenlightened news, and we are not surprised that the latter itself as a good-natured, trustworthy cable messenger, which it deserves to be, and which it deserves in public favor.

The cholera has not yet appeared, but creates no panic, though the mortality is considerably in excess of last year at this time, and larger than at any time during the season. As we have passed by the period when such afflictions are the most fatal, and as there is a decided abatement of the malady, we have reasonable hope that the present year will not prove a severe scourge, and that the wise sanitary measures will effectually check the ravages.

Of the theatres little can be said. The summer is not their proper season, and, as in many other things, has merit in its emptiness as gauged very much by the size of the audience. No novelties have been introduced during the week, and no new performance has been retained for a considerable period. Preparations for the season are, however, quite active, and we are promised some fine entertainments.

THE BOUNTY BILL.

THE following is the bill to equalize the bounties of officers and soldiers who served in the late war against the rebellion, as it finally passed both Houses of Congress:

SEC. 1.—Be it enacted, &c., That to each and every officer and soldier who served in the army of the United States after the 19th day of April, 1861, for a period of not less than two years, and who was honorably discharged from the service, and has been honorably discharged, and who has not received the bounty provided by law, and who shall hereafter receive a bounty or grant of land, or both, from the United States under existing laws, or who shall hereafter be entitled to receive a bounty or grant of land, or both, from the United States under existing laws, or who shall hereafter be entitled to less than two years who has been honorably discharged on account of wounds received in the line of duty, and the widow, minor children, or parents, in the order named, of any such soldier who died in the service of the United States, or of diseases or wounds contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, shall be paid the additional bounty provided by this act, and the widow of any such soldier who has forfeited, sold, assigned, transferred, loaned, or pledged any right he may have to such bounty or any control in the bounty provided by this or any other act of Congress, shall not be entitled to receive the additional bounty whatever; and when application for the bounty provided by this act shall be made it shall be required, under the pains and penalties of perjury, to be stated in the affidavit of the claimant that he has not bartered, sold, assigned, transferred, pledged, or loaned the right to the bounty provided by this act, or any control in the bounty provided by this act, and such bounty shall be ascertained by the Paymaster-General from the muster-out rolls on file in his office, except upon receipt of the claimant's discharge papers, countersigned by the Secretary of War, or by such person as he may designate.

SEC. 2.—And be it further enacted, That in the payment of additional bounty herein provided for, it shall be the duty of the Paymaster-General to pay such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and to pay the bounty to the party to each and every soldier who makes application therefor, and is entitled to receive the bounty under this act.

SEC. 3.—And be it further enacted, That in the receipt, acceptance, settlement, and payment of claims for said additional bounty due the widows or heirs of deceased soldiers, the provisions of section 5 of this act may shall be governed by restrictions prescribed for the payment of arrears of pay and bounties, and that the payments shall be made in like manner under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Secretary of the Treasury has appointed Mr. Thomas Corwin Mendenhall, of Ohio, superintending statistician in the States and Territories west of the Mississippi River, with his office at St. Louis. He will count by steamer on the 11th inst. The appointment is a temporary one.

—A morning paper is slightly worried over the fact that Andrew Johnson is President. It has a great inclination to be worn by Gen. Grant. There was a good deal of talk about it in 1865, but it is nearly forgotten nothing to do with this matter. The one-hundredth section of the Act of Congress of April 30, 1790, says "the President of the United States shall have power to remove from office at his pleasure all officers for whose authority, we presume that President Johnson will prefer to be called Andrew Johnson, and not Johnson. We see no reason why he may not choose to adopt.

—Many of the newspapers now published by negroes south of Mason's and Dixon's line—namely: Colored Citizen, Atlanta; Colored Tribune, New Orleans; Nationalist, at Mobile; Legal Gazette, at Charleston; and Freedman, at Memphis.

—Rev. B. H. Gardiner, a Methodist Missionary to the Freedmen, has been appointed Assistant Commissioner by men in Georgetown, Kentucky, lately, for preaching to the negroes.

—The statement of the public debt, dated the 1st of August, shows that the total debt is $2,770,418,668, against $2,757,689,571 on the 1st of July. The increase in amount of the debt over and above the cash in the Treasury during the month of July was $12,729,097. But in the total debt is shown by the statement since the 1st of August has been reduced to $2,691,524,189.

—The Raleigh (N. C.) Standard assures American Israelites that the recent action of the Legislature relating to qualification, has been framed so that two Jews may be elected to the Senate, and four to the House; holds that since 1861 Jews have held office under it.

—The Boston Post says that the Yale crew sailed lately, according to the milliner's dicta, should have been "Yale keys" to a man. Of course, it is a matter of condition. Now, to be excruciating, the front must be "Yale keys" to a man, the sailing "Yale keys," the act of arranging the tuft in the shape of several little rolls "Yale keys" to a man, and so forth.

—The Fair of the New England and Vermont Agricultural Society, which opened on the Fair Grounds of the Windham County Park Association at Brattleboro, Vt., on Tuesday last, will close on Friday next. Grounds are pleasantly located, on the bank of the Connecticut river, and are ample for the purposes of the exhibition. Premiums amounting to over six thousand dollars will be offered in the various departments. Arrangements have been made with nearly all the New England railroads for the transportation of stock and articles free, and conveyance of passengers attending the fair at low rates. Among the orators announced are Henry Clark, Poultney, Vt.; David Goodale, Brattleboro, Vt.; and Daniel Needham, Worcester, Mass.

—Beaufort, S. C., which was formerly an aristocratic winter resort of the Southerners, has become completely Yankeefied with New Englanders. The Mayor of the city is a Massachusetter, and every business, landowner, and storekeeper hails from the same section.

—The whole amount received by the Mayor of Portland for the relief of the sufferers by the fire, up to and including Saturday last, was $37,419 39.

—Carpenters at Portland, Me., receive $2.50 a day. Those employed at work for them receive $1.50 a day, and will be for some time to come.

—Mrs. E. Wright, of Cincinnati, in spite of difficulties unknown in the ordinary practice of photography, has succeeded in producing a series of stereoscopic pictures views of the Mammoth Cave, as vivid and clear as if they were seen personally. The series of views will probably embrace two views of Gothic Chapel, the avenue behind the Giant's Coffin, the view over the Amphitheatre Hall, the Deserted Chamber, and several others. Light is admitted through ruined battlements.

—P. T. THE WORCESTER REGATTA.

THE Annual College Regatta at Worcester, Mass., came off successfully on the 17th ult., and attracted unusual attention, not only among the collegians, but also among rowing men throughout New England.

As Yale and Harvard were the contestants, there was, of course, a general exodus from the "ancient halls" of those two institutions. Other colls. were not represented, and, indeed, all classes of people were out in force. Ladies—some flying the blue ribbon of Yale, others decked with the red colors of Harvard—were in full attendance, and added much to the gayety of the occasion. The day's performances consisted of a base-ball match between Harvard and William's College, in the morning, and the citizens' regatta, followed by the college regatta, in the afternoon. A base-ball match had been played in the afternoon previous, between the Freshmen of Yale and the same class in Harvard. Harvard lost both the ball-matches. In the Freshmen match the score stood: Yale, 29; Harvard, 24. In the match with William's the record is given: William's, 39; Harvard, 35. After the ball-playing was over, and the crowd had given its attention, the scene became anxious to proceed to the lake, which is distant about a mile from the city. The procession of the rowing people thither were ample. Special trains were run for the occasion, and the majority took to the road. The walk from the stopping-place to the lake is short but picturesque.

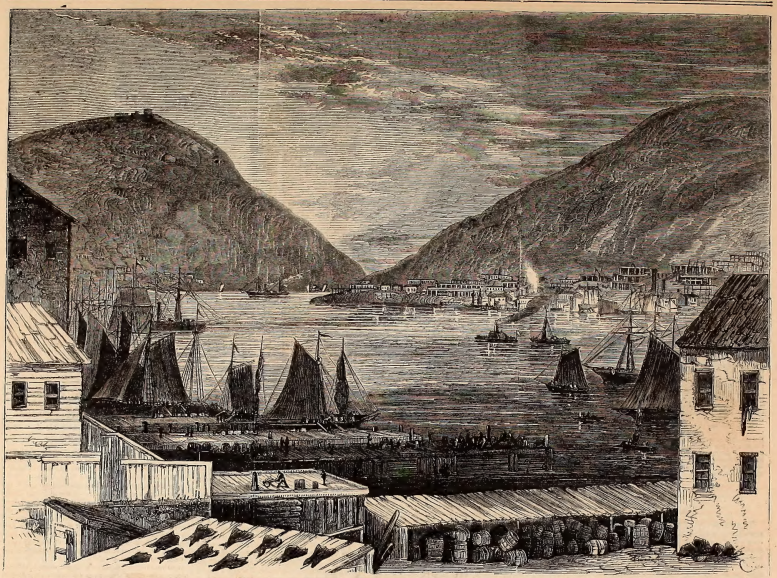
The regatta-course is about two-and-a-half miles from Worcester, and is four to like long and about half a mile in width. The shores are well wooded, and present a pleasant scene, and gently undulating fields lend a charm to the peculiar beauty. It was a shining place for the display of boats, and of boating. In training, which thousands came to witness, while the friends of each party party fanned the excited feeling favorite, and two red designated the kindly interest manifested in the result of the contest.

The first race on the programme was a single scull race between the rotted champion, Joshua Ward, and a young man from Portland, named Gilman Hanscom. Considerable interest focused on this occasion by winning an easy victory, accomplishing the two miles in three minutes and fifteen seconds.

The second race was a four-oared race, for a distance of three miles, for which four boats entered.

This race was won by the boat Pocahontas Queen, in nineteen minutes and forty-one seconds. But the great race of the day was the two college races, the Scientific and the University.

Up to this time the interest of the sporting fraternity was centered in the small bets of ten, twenty and fifty dollars, and the enthusiasm of the multitude had been aroused to a considerable pitch. But the excitation became close. When the Scientifics came on, however, the sympathetic enthusiasm excited by the spectacle of the appearance of the whole institution on the shore of the lake and on the crowded bridge which crosses it. This prevented any loud demonstration, and their senses comparative insignificant. But when Yale and Harvard appeared about rent the air, the pandemonium in white handkerchiefs to the gallant youths whose claims to consideration were to be decided by their oars, and longing to wipe away the stain of defeat and to vindicate the skill of her rowing representatives. Yale, on the contrary, had refused to discipline from its high standard of last year; her crew has had no regular trainer. This year the professor of gymnastics was absent, occasionally with them, to be sure, but seldom, and with nothing like that view of perfecting the muscular capacities of this nature, demands to be observed. Her bottom has save evidence of good muscular development. The whiteness of their arms and face offered a not a favorable contrast to the bronzed color and defined sinews, as well as the keen watchful and vivid appearance of Harvard. She, the vanquished in the past two years' regattas, had been looking for the victory which was to be her triumph. The officers of the college regatta were, on the part of Harvard, Mr. E. Agassiz, son of the late Prof. Agassiz, of Cambridge; and Dodge, of Cambridge; on the part of Yale, Mr. W. Bacon, of New York; Mr. Wm. Walker, of Providence, and Mr. Hopkins, of the upper stake was Mr. J. N. Ellison, of Providence.



The prestige of Yale assured her many friends, whose confidence in their favorite horse would admit of her renown. But the result proved their expectations vain; for Harvard came in victorious. It is engraved in red, winning the race in eighteen minutes and fifty-three seconds, the knights of the blue ribbon joining in the applause, and the cheering for success of the University race, on which the championship depended.

Best and last, and most exciting of all, came the trial of skill between the University crews. Yale this time had the inside track, and, after considerable difficulty in getting the crews properly in the line, the signals give the signal, and Yale got the start. Both boats skimmed lightly over the surface of the lake, scarcely sweep of the oarsmen. Harvard slowly gained with her quick, strong stroke upon Yale, yet long and steady and handsome but effective impulses. As before, however, the Harvard style was in the ascendant. Though the harvest of success appeared to fall, and the multitudinous assembly on the shores moved restlessly to and fro, the cheering was not so much a result of interest in the issue, and they held on with unflinching purpose. At the buoy or turning point, Harvard was about one length ahead, and as they came, Harvard increasing the distance between her and her rival. Her crew arrived in the judge's boat only a comfortable length ahead, after an absence of eighteen minutes forty-three and a quarter seconds. Yale came in nineteen minutes and forty-one and a half seconds last year the college Regatta was; Yale, eighteen forty-two and a half (18:42½) Harvard, eighteen forty-three (18:43). The regatta at the time the last regatta took place, the referee differed in the length of time it was agreed that the result of this year should decide the record question, and it is considered that the Yale victory in the former match was accidental, or a second better than last year's. But Harvard is satisfied, and holds the garden of roses.

Notwithstanding the heavy rain which fell during the entire race, the interest and enthusiasm of the spectators continued without abatement. It was a very time for millinery and swindles, but the fair ones who had come provided themselves with their parasols, or bore as fair, and persistently remained in their places, though drenched and bedraggled. The procession of the crew of the University race, the great feature of the regatta. At the conclusion of the races the members of both colleges were invited to the Lincoln House, and quite a festive time, keeping it up till a late hour, and spiting the rain to the spite of the poets.

"No sleep till morn when youth and pleasure meet."

A POPULAR FALLACY.—That out-door exercise before breakfast is healthful. It is never so; and, under the ordinary circumstances of things, is injurious to persons of poor health; although the very vigorous may practise it with impunity. In winter the body is really chilled through and through, unless the stomach has been fortified with a good warm breakfast; and in warm weather, miasmatic and malarious gases and emanations speedily act upon the empty and weak stomach in a way to vitiate the circulation. Bowel fever and ague, diarrhœa and dysentery, are the results of this fallacy. Eat a hearty breakfast before leaving the house, and exercise in the open air will then be a source of health and pleasure.

THE HARBOR OF ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. BECKER.

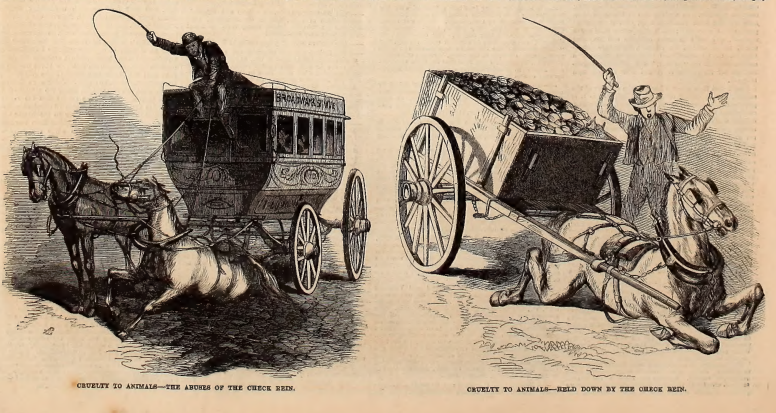
THE HARBOR OF ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND.

On this page we give a fine view of the harbor of St. John's, a town of very considerable importance to the fishing interests. The harbor is spacious, and sheltered on all sides by high hills protecting it from the fierce storms of the Atlantic, so that there is always a safe and commodious anchorage. The place is quite strongly fortified; in fact, its position is a defense, and it needed but little expenditure to render it secure from any ordinary assault.

The town lies along the north side of the port, consisting mainly of one street. There are a few handsome and well-built edifices, but most of the houses are of wood, and, in consequence, the place has frequently suffered severely from extensive fires. The population of St. John's is about 26,000.

THE CHECK REIN.

Our ignorance often betrays us into the perpetration of injustice and cruelty, against which all our better feelings revolt, and we are sometimes unconsciously guilty of acts about which, if we reflected, we would be heartily ashamed. The horse is a universal favorite—we admire him, we are proud of him, we value him very highly, and yet abuse him incontinently. True, we do not violate the law against cruelty to animals, we do not stone and beat our pet, but in a mistaken kindness we subject him to many hardships and burdens wholly unnecessary, and confine and trammel all his natural movements most unmercifully. The harness we use is so constructed as to interfere with the easy, natural and graceful gait the animal would voluntarily assume, and is frequently the cause of accident and danger. We cover his eyes so that he cannot see distinctly, we curb and fasten his head so that it is impossible for him to go forward, except as if he were on stilts.



On this page we give two illustrations of the cruelty of this device, showing how the horse is tortured unnecessarily and imperiled by this worse than useless appendage. If he stumbles in consequence of being blindfolded, he must inevitably fall, because, denied the use of his head, he has no power to recover his step. It is time we understood more fully the character and wants of the noblest of our animal servants; we have no excuse for our ignorance, and we ought not foolishly to abuse and torture so useful and docile a friend as the generous, patient horse.

OUR BASE BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.

In another column will be found the portrait of Mr. C. C. Commerford, of the Waterbury Club, of Waterbury, Connecticut, being No. 8 of our series of Base Ball portraits. Mr. Commerford is well-known to the New York ball-players of the old school as the noted short stop of the original Gotham nine, and afterward, as one of the first nine players of the Eagle Club in its palmy days. Of late years, however, he has been a resident of Waterbury, Conn., and he had not been a citizen of the pretty little Yankee town long before he became instrumental in organizing a base ball club, of which, of course, he was the master-spirit and the leading player, by right of skill as well as experience. Under such leadership the club flourished from the start, and the Waterbury Club now ranks as high as any organization of the kind in the State.

Of one thing the club has a special right to be proud, and that is, its beautifully located and exceedingly picturesque ground. Standing on the grounds of the Waterbury Club in such position as to take in the whole landscape at a glance, a view is presented unequaled in its beauty by any ground in the country. On the left winds the Naugatuck through its charming valley, inclosed by grand old hills, not only adorned with the original woods, but embellished with the shrubbery and gardens of the wealthy citizens of the town, whose handsome residences are located on the hills, that of Mr. A. B. Wilson, of sewing machine notoriety, being prominent in the picture. The scene presented to view on the occasion of the grand match between the Union and the Waterbury Clubs, on the 27th of July last, was one ever to be remembered by all who witnessed it. Some three or four hundred ladies added beauty to the prospect on the occasion.

Mr. Commerford's forte as a ball-player is his play at short field, in which position he excels. Quick and active in his movements, and graceful withal, and play-ng with judgment at all times, be is at once the strong point of the nine, and a good model for his less-experienced companions. In batting skill, too, he ranks high, his grounders being a feature of his play at the bat. Though short stop is his regular part, Charley can be very effective in other positions, he being also very efficient in governing his nine, a position few can occupy as creditably. Skillful as he is as a player, his moral traits of character merit the highest commendation, for Charley is quite the beau-ideal of a gentlemanly ball-player, his good humor making him the choice spirit of his club, this very desirable characteristic of a gentlemanly player being far too rare in the community.

With such energetic leaders as Charley Commerford to manage the affairs of a club, and to give tone and character to its members, our national game would soon be seen flourishing throughout every town and village in the Union to an extent not even dreamt of yet. It is to such as he, however, that the fraternity must look for the permanent establishment of the game on a thoroughly reputable footing; and to his exertions, ably seconded as they have been, is the Waverley Club indebted for its popularity and high reputation as a fine playing club, and one of the most hospitable party of ball-players in the National Association.

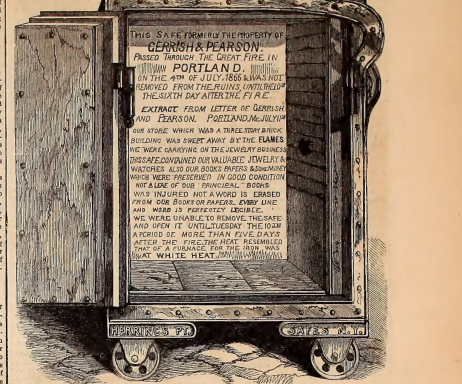
A FOGGY MORNING ON THE BANKS OF NEWFOUNDLAND.



THE perils of the sea are the greatest near the shores, and when a good ship has nearly completed her voyage, she is often in the most imminent danger. The Banks of Newfoundland are always the dread of mariners; they are near a rocky coast, they abound in dense, impenetrable fogs, and their unexpected currents drive the vessel far out of its proper course. The hardy fishermen alone feel at ease, and pursue their work amid fogs and currents unconcerned. They also furnish pilots to the various steamers whose captains are unwilling to assume the responsibility of going over this dangerous part of their route.

We give on this page a view of a very common scene, a fleet of fishermen, the steamer awaiting her pilot, and the fog driving along in dense foreboding masses, forming, altogether, a wild and grand spectacle, yet one that must be seen to be duly appreciated. The boom of the signal gun, and the tolling of the bell as the vessel proceeds slowly and cautiously, heighten the gloom; and a feeling of relief is always experienced when the Banks are safely passed.

HERRING'S SAFES.

AS IT is impossible, or at least impracticable, to construct buildings absolutely fire-proof, it is a matter of the first importance to devise some means of preserving books, papers and other valuables, in the event of a disastrous conflagration. The intense heat of an immense fire, like that at Portland, sweeps away stone and iron walls as if they were mere wooden frames, and it matters not how well-built a city may be, it is at all times liable to destruction from the devouring element. The merchant who would protect his valuables must not trust to his building; it may crumble and fall—but a good safe will secure what stone walls and fire defenses fail to guard.

On this page we give a picture of one of Herring's safes, which was taken from the ruins in Portland. Its appearance shows plainly the effect of the ordeal to which it was subjected, but its contents were uninjured, and though at one time it was at nearly a white heat, yet so perfectly was it made, that it resisted the power of the fiery furnace, and proved what it professed to be —a safe. There were several of these safes in that fire, and in every instance they stood the test, preserving their contents perfectly. No better evidence of their excellence could be given; they are a convincing proof of the skill and perfection obtained in their manufacture.

THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

THE necessity of making some provision for the protection and direction of those who were suddenly elevated from slavery to freedom, became obvious as soon as the difficulties connected with the new condition of things presented themselves. The freedmen needed security from injustice on the part of their former masters, many of whom were not disposed to recognize the claims of their old servants, and likewise security from many of their own race, whose ideas of right and wrong were not very clearly defined. Hence the origin of the Freedmen's Bureau, which was designed for the mutual benefit of both the white and colored population, and which, on the whole, has proved an institution of great benefit, notwithstanding the incompetency and unfaithfulness of many of its agents. It is impossible in any large organization to find men who will always be dutiful, prudent, just and honorable, but the shortcomings of a few individuals are no argument against the propriety and necessity of the organization. The concurrent testimony of all parties and classes is conclusive in favor of the Bureau, and on the whole, its operations have been beneficial and its influence salutary.

On the first page we give a view of the Freedmen's Bureau building in Richmond. During the war it was the headquarters of the Provost Marshal. The Episcopal church which Jeff. Davis attended is seen in the distance, while in front appears the familiar market-wagon. The building is plain and unpretending, and was erected by Gen. Winder for a military office.

We also give a sketch of the court while in session, representing a scene of constant occurrence. The Court consists of three Judges, two clerks and a crier, and was established in October of last year. The person sitting at a table is a colored man, who draws up petitions and transacts other business for the Freedmen, though they may employ lawyers, if they choose. The Richmond attorneys generally practice in this court, which holds its sessions every other day, and tries all cases in equity.

MARKET SCENE AT NORFOLK.

SOME of our wants are artificial, arising from our culture and habits; some are natural, being a part of our constitution, but all clamor loudly for supplies, and to meet that is the great task of life. There is one especially importunate and unwearied, which we cannot deny for a single day, and which impress upon us our heaviest burdens. This is our want of food. Whatever else we do, or leave undone, we must eat, and be our fare coarse or dainty, rich or plain, we cannot forego the demands of appetite, subject to its clamors, Be still. To supply this great demand of humanity is the end and aim of a great share of all our industries. Agriculture, commerce, trade, are largely occupied in furnishing the world with something to eat. The market is, therefore, one of the prominent features of every town, upon which, more than anything else, depends social comfort, and even existence itself; and the scenes at the market are oftentimes exceedingly striking and picturesque. There is the accumulation of fish, flesh and fowl—the contributions of the heavens above and the waters under the earth; there is the array of things beautiful to behold and tempting to the taste; there are the original characters, who so well know how to set off the good points of their stock, and persuade a purchaser whether you will or not; there's the crowd, the jargon, the cunningling of cashe, and ages, and sexes, in one sage, anxious, surging mass, that make going market such a feature in our daily experience.

Our illustration of a scene at the Norfolk market has some features peculiar to the latitude of the sunny South, and which will readily suggest themselves. There are no better marketers than the sable race, who monopolize the great share of the business in Southern towns. They know how to praise their own wares, and at the same time to flatter an indifferent visitor into a prompt investment of any stray dimes he may happen to possess, while there is nothing you need they will not obtain for you or provide.

And withal, they are so cheerful and shrewd, as to be almost irresistible. A visit to the market gives one an insight to human nature he will hardly obtain as readily at any other place, and whether it be made for business or pleasure, will well repay the time it consumes.

Two Quaker girls were ironing on the same table. One asked the other which side she would take, the right or left. She answered promptly, "It will be right for me to take the left, and then it will be left for you to take the right."

MEMORY.

BY MRS. HALE SOUTO.

Save me that song: I am weary of battle,
Weary of toiling the treacherous steep,
Weary of mirage-lights, luring me onward,
Weary of harvest I never can reap.
Sing! it is years upon years since I heard it,
When I was calling life's garlands and leaves,
Ere the cold mountain-tops gleamed in the distance.
Sing! ah, what pictures its memory weaves!

I will forget, as I listen, the dangers
And the rough places since then I have passed,
Linking a daisy-chain with my man's fingers—
Sing but the melody—song to us all.
Trying to think I have only grown larger,
That I am still the same boy in my heart,
Back to the golden memories wandered in distance.
Down boyhood's hopes, and old wounds and their smart.

Loosing the rear of the world and its rattle,
Schemes and inventions, losses and gains,
Watching the light on the meadow, and blindes
Here I sit, weaving a child's daisy-chain!
Feeling a calm stealing over me gently—
O God, what quiet single in closet and strife!
Hear the brook's murmur, that swells to a river:
So I rushed on to the ocean of life.

How it comes back, the old mood, as I listen!
There's a flaw in the diamond, a blight at the heart;
Then I was purer—the gem has been tarnished,
And all my long life I shall feel but the smart.
The meadows are green, I am knee-high in clover;
Ha, butterfly! flashing your wings in the sun,
Catch you—I hold you, you flutterer rover!
What's this?—a sad tear! The sweet song is done.

The Circle of Light.

CHAPTER I.

I HAVE, for some years, dwelt in a house which stands on the corner of two streets in a certain city.

It is not a fashionable neighborhood, though a populous and busy one, and the two streets that form the angle referred to are seldom solitary during the hours of traffic and toil.

My rooms are on the first floor, and have windows looking upon both thoroughfares, and directly upon the corner there stands a gas-lamp.

When this lamp is lit it projects its yellow rays in a large circle of light, illuminating a segment both of causeway and sidewalk, and as I sit at one or the other of my windows, I can plainly discern the style of the equipages, the color of the horses, and the general appearance of their drivers, and, occasionally, even catch a glimpse of the features of those who sit within. Then, at times, while the forms and faces of the foot-passengers are perfectly clear to me.

Being a quiet, dreaming kind of man, and very sedentary in my habits, I often spend whole evenings—sometimes, indeed, the greater part of the night—sitting at my window, and gazing absently at the figures that pass and re-pass out of the shadows into the circle of light, and again out of light into those shadows, like the fantastic images of the magic lantern. And I am prone, now and then, to speculate vaguely, and, as it were, involuntarily, upon the possible individualities of some of these passing figures; to fancy their occupations, their purposes, their hopes and fears, their schemes and purposes, their good deeds and good thoughts, and their evil deeds and evil thoughts, until I have come to have a sort of belief in my clairvoyant powers, and to feel a dim kind of confidence in my capability of reading the hearts of these lives, which I see so nothing save a form and face coming suddenly out of the darkness and as suddenly vanishing into it again. Whether I ever have touched the margin of the actual in this midnight sailing over the sea of imagination, however, heaven only knows.

Like enough I may have done so, now and then, however; for, after all, am I not a man? and are these not my fellows? and are not the secret springs of being, and doing, and suffering —but enough of such speculations. I am not writing a psychological essay, but simply a sketch —a story, if you like—of persons and things visible and audible. Let me to my theme, then, without further vagaries.

CHAPTER II.

One evening—it was a windy, rainy, comfortless evening in February—I sat by my east window, smoking my meditative pipe, filled and lighted and smoked, and ever and anon glancing at the gas-lamp, that seemed to glare angrily at me in return from the other eye, and I grew out of some sort of wink, now and then, through the driving rain.

Thus looking, at a certain moment I became aware of a figure standing under, and leaning against the iron post of the lamp.

It should state that it was about nine o'clock, and that there was no light save that of the candle in my window, for it being my favorite hour without other illumination than the circle of light outside).

The face of the figure was turned from me—partially toward the street—but it was evidently a woman. She held an umbrella over her, but it gave little protection against the shirt, sharp storm, and she found, besides, great difficulty in maintaining it against the rough, sudden matches of the blast, which, every now and then, wrenched and twisted it in her grasp, till she was fain to clutch it with both hands, and to set herself more firmly against the gust.

Was she young? Was she beautiful? I could not tell, though her figure seemed lithe and slender, and her hands—delicate as they were glanced whitely at moments in the gas-light—were delicate and shapely. One thing appeared certain: she was waiting for some one. What a night, thought I, and what a spot, for a delicate woman to choose for a rendezvous! Surely it must be a stern necessity that brings her here at such an hour in such a storm!

And instantly, as was my wont, my brain took hold of the mystery, and wrought it out like Arabian Prince did the winged steed, and went dreaming into the fairest regions of imaginative adventure to discover the solution of the riddle.

But my fanciful flight, the chimera of which it is useless to record here, was suddenly cut short, and my Pegasus brought back to earth, by the dull rattle of wheels over the sodden causeway, and in another moment a carriage drove up to the curb, a few feet from the lamp.

Out of this vehicle leapt another figure—that of a man—hastily seized the stranger of the woman, who had quickly advanced to his side, he closed it, and handed her rapidly into the carriage. Then springing in after her, the door was shut with a bang, and the vehicle rattled dully away.

During the brief space wherein the male figure had rested within the circle of light—scarcely a dozen seconds—I had been able to observe but this: that he was tall, slender, and wore a short military cloak, or rather, cape; and that he had on the little finger of his left hand a ring, with a green jewel—to all appearance an emerald—set within it.

In fact, as I saw nothing save a dark beard and mustache, trimmed in the martial style, for he wore a broad-rimmed felt hat, and the rim was pulled downward in such a manner as to cast a deep shadow over his more characteristic features.

For the next three hours I was once more careering on my hippogriff through the realms of romance, lawless and wild like a mountain eyrey. I retired to rest, the last impression on my mind being, that I had witnessed the clandestine flight of a pair of lovers, to whom elaborate parents, of stern guardians, or inexorable law, forbade the blissful bonds.

CHAPTER III.

How LONG I had been asleep I did not know when a violent ringing at the bell awoke me. I sat up, and waited, to ascertain if any of the household lodgers were astir, but all was still.

Klang, ki-lang, ki-lang, lang, lang, ki-lang, ling, ling!

No one stirred.

Ki-lang, ki-lang, lang-lang-gling—snap!

The bell-wire being now evidently broken, I started up, and flung on my indispensable garments, went out and opened the door.

"You sleep soundly here. I thought you must be a bit deaf, or drunk!" said a boy, in a tone of mixed agitation and anger.

"What the devil do you want at such a time?" I suddenly replied, for, at that instant, the man—it was a man—stepped quickly back from the door, and I saw him doorway into the circle of light radiating from the street gas-lamp—and I recognized the figure in the military cloak, and the left hand "holding" the green jewel on his finger. I also now perceived a carriage drawn up by the curb, just outside the circle of light.

"Come and help me," said the man, rapidly, catching me by the arm; "a lady fainted away in the carriage. I saw you, and have not neglected to state, by the way, that there was a tin-plate on my window, announcing the unimportant fact that you were being 'furnished rooms' probably because no one else had ever seemed to think it worth noticing before)"—and lucky I did! Come, we'll carry her into your office—only a swoon, I hope."

By this time we were at the carriage-door, and the stranger had, with my assistance, lifted out his unconscious occupant, at the same time making a sign to the boy, who had remained silently on his seat, muffled up to the eyes in a huge india-rubber overcoat, for it was still raining furiously.

We bore the patient (almost my first patient) into my sitting-room, and laid her upon a lounge. I was hastily lit the gas and stirred the fire.

Her face, which was deadly pale, I had, of course, no recollection of having ever seen; but her form, shape, her dress, especially her hair, her slender, white hands, I knew her to be the woman who had waited under the iron lamp-post, at the time that evening. Also, that she was in company with the same man who came for her and then had returned to the same carriage. So the identification was simple.

I gently took her left hand, and put my finger on her pulse.

"Well!" said the man, anxiously, "how long before she will recover her senses, doctor?"

"Doctor!" I replied, "I am no professionals, or a little—ah! I will go up and wake Mrs. Jones, the landlady; she probably——"

"No, don't!" interrupted the stranger. "There's no need of rousing any one. Just write a prescription, and I'll get it from the druggist in the next block but one. I noticed a night-light in his shop as we passed just now. I shall not be gone ten minutes."

"As for that," said I, "the lady will probably come to herself in a quarter of an hour or so, through a little sal-volatile——"

"Exactly," exclaimed the man, quickly, "so give me the prescription, and let me get it at once."

I hastily scrawled a prescription, and he at hastily seized it, and vanished. In an instant I heard the carriage drive rapidly off.

During all this time—it was not over five or six minutes—the stranger had not taken off his heavily slouched hat, nor unclosed his cloak, so that my glimpses of his features still remained vague and unsatisfactory, the dark and luxuriant beard and mustache being very prominent in my mental photograph of his countenance.

While I waited his return I took the opportunity of looking more particularly at my patient, (I like to call her my patient—pray pardon this little vanity). To do this more easily, I raised her head and took off her bonnet, or rather hat, the article of her attire being one of those semi-masculine things so much in vogue of late years, and flung it on the floor, together with her shoulder-cape.

She was a charming blonde, with bright, golden, almost flaxen hair, soft, wavy, and curling naturally all round her head, and did not look over sixteen or seventeen. Her figure was delicate, but rounded and lovely. Her dress, very plain, evidently of fine material, and fashionably cut and fitted.

I began gently tapping her hands and applying my smelling-salts to her, till the more powerful stimulants should arrive.

Ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty minutes passed, and still the fair stranger and stranger did not return.

At length her pulse gave a few spasmodic bounds, and fell to beating with gradually augmented force, a faint color rose like the blush of dawn in her cheeks, she sighed heavily several times, opened her eyes, closed them, opened them again, and, looking wildly upon me—

"Has he gone?" she asked, in a faint voice.

"Yes, he has only the prescription," I replied, soothingly; "he will be back in a few moments."

"Who—who do you mean? Who are you? Where am I?"

She raised herself on her arm, and asked these questions rapidly, but as one awakening from a dream.

"I mean your—your friend—the gentleman who brought you here in a carriage—to my office. You are safe, perfectly safe. You are quite right now, and he will soon return. Drink this glass of cold water, with just a touch of brandy in it, and you will soon feel strong again."

She sat up, took the glass, sipped a mouthful, then drank it off at a draught.

"He has gone, you say, for a prescription—in the carriage?"

"Yes, in the carriage; not long ago; he had to wake the apothecary, you know——"

"He will never come back," said she, slowly, and with an expression of calm assurance.

"Eh? You don't mean—good God!—you don't mean that he has gone off and left you here, in my office, at this time of night, or rather morning, for it's after four o'clock; and—and—is he—your—husband?"

She shivered at the word; but answered, quietly:

"He is my brother."

I was more mystified than ever. Why, in the name of heaven, should a young woman's brother elope with her in a lamp-post at nine in the evening, in a heavy storm, then bring her back in a swoon, and desert her in a medical man's office at four o'clock in the morning?

Under these extraordinary circumstances, I decided to walk Mrs. Jones, and place this forlorn damsel under the motherly care and excellent lady's protection and scrutiny. And the young person eagerly seconding my suggestion to that effect, we immediately proceeded to execute it, and, in a few minutes, after a short dialogue through the key-hole, Mrs. Jones was aroused, partially, and mollified by my patient. Upon which I returned to my apartments, and once more retired to bed, but not to sleep. My brain had become rampant during the hour, and during the three hours that elapsed before the "get-up bell" rang, I rode a race against Fancy, that beat Sirrah Puck, the celebrated time all hollow.

CHAPTER IV.

At breakfast, Mrs. Jones (a widow, by-the-way, with one child, a daughter, of about the same age, I should think, as that of my patient), was unusually communicative and silent.

The forlorn damsel had departed. Mrs. J. had been forced to let her go, alone and on foot, at her own imperative request. She told me all in confidence, after breakfast; for at the table, when I was there, she was all the mysterious affair, she had an imperative sign to be silent, as soon as it was fairly day.

And what did she say? How did she explain the—the mystery?" I asked, anxiously.

"She said nothing, explained nothing," replied Mrs. Jones, solemnly. "I accept that you would hear from her. She did nothing but weep, poor child."

I should hear from her, eh? I suppose she meant that she would send me a fee for my services! I do not desire any fee. D—n the fee! And then Mrs. Jones, but a few seconds more anxious to know—I suspect a dark drama lies beyond the circle of light in which I first saw that girl last evening; but——

Here we were interrupted by the servant, who brought me a letter.

"It is from her—from my patient!" I exclaimed, tearing it open.

"Is—is she hurt?" asked Mrs. Jones.

"Of course."

I closed and locked the door (we were in my own sitting-room) and read the letter. A sad-bill fell out of it. I did not even stoop to pick it up. But Mrs. Jones did.

"It is a fifty dollar bill," said she, laying it upon the table.

I read the letter aloud without noticing her exclamation, or its cause. It, the letter, was as follows:

"Sir,—I thank you gratefully for your kind offices. As we shall never meet again—we three —neither you, nor he, nor I, in this world—and lest you might otherwise be tempted to make inquiries or investigations which could lead to nothing but further suffering and shame, I resolve to confide to your honor the truth of the terrible circumstances which culminated at your office last evening. When you have read this, you will wonder how I could have written it so calmly. I wonder at it myself. But there is a kind of coldness about my heart and brain that I cannot account for. I feel as though I were writing and thinking in my sleep. But no matter; I tell you a terrible tale, briefly, and rely upon your honor to keep it locked forever in your breast."

I looked at Mrs. Jones; she returned my look with a half-melancholy smile. I read on:

"I am eighteen years of age; my family was once wealthy and influential; I am not a native or resident of this city.

"When the story we began, I was betrothed to a young man whom I ardently loved, and by whom I was as deeply loved in return. Our parents were not specially opposed to the match, with one exception—my only brother, a man of bitter passions, feelings, and sanguinary temper. My lover and he were political enemies. When the war broke out, they became foes in the field. My brother bade me renounce my love or my lover. I refused indignantly; my heart was with him, and through him, with the cause he served." (Which cause this was I shall ask, for many reasons, as a reveal to my readers, and I have, therefore, some what modified the letter of my patient in this particular.—C. D. O.) "My brother swore a private oath me. I laughed. He brought one of his fellow-soldiers to court me; I scorned him.

"My brother was fearfully incensed, and threatened horrible vengeance upon me as a traitress and the shame of my family. One of my father has long been dead, and my mother was a hopeless invalid, so that I was to a great degree at my brother's mercy. He kept me prisoner for several days, whenever he had the chance, for more than a year, he suddenly altered his demeanor. He wrote to me kindly and contrite. He begged me to forgive and forget his violence. He even promised to 'have an eye' upon my lover's career as far as he could consistently do it, and from time to time he gave me news of his whereabouts, his promotion, his recovery from a slight wound, as he and through deserters or prisoners.

"At length he came home on furlough, wounded himself. His wounds were very slight, but than his gloomy nature warranted; but there was a look in his eye that I could not understand.

"'You shall see your Herbert again,' said he; 'I owe you this atonement. I will find means to bring him to you, if only to renew your mutual vows. I have found a way to communicate with him when I return to the front.'

"'But, Edward,' asked I, hesitatingly, 'what means—why have you changed your—your mind so?'

"He was silent a moment; then his brow grew dark, and—

"'The man I chose for you has proved a villain!' said he, quickly. 'Let us speak no more of it. I have changed—is not that enough?' and he laughed.

"He returned to the army, and continued to write me hopefully. A month ago my mother was ordered to this city to seek celebrated professional advice. Of course I accompanied her. The two opposing armies, in one of which my brother and in the other my betrothed served, were gradually advancing each upon the other. They were but a hundred miles from here. A week since, I received a hurried letter from my brother, saying:

"'I have changed him; we have made a plan. In three days at furthest, you shall hear from me again—if I live. We go into battle at dawn.'

"Yesterday a second letter reached me. This was from my brother also, and was as follows:

"'To-night you shall see your beloved Herbert. To procure you this bless, I make myself almost a deserter, for I have had to become almost a traitor, for I bring with me in secret an enemy. But this is nothing. As I come stong, I dare not deceive for long. Be ready to meet me at nine in the street. The corner of ——— and ——— streets is, I recollect, a quiet one after nightfall, and not very far from your abode. Meet me there, at nine o'clock! I will come in a carriage, at every hazard. Be punctual, and silent as death!—as death, mind!'

"The word death was repeated, and underscored, as I copy it. I was on the appointed spot in advance of the hour, and I saw no one but—Herbert.

"My brother continued to speak from time to time, as we rode on; but I hardly understood, or even listened to him. Now, however, I remember the horrible—but no matter.

"We continued to ride on for more than an hour. We left the city, passed beyond the suburbs, entered, out into the dreary, dark, sodden country.

"How much further, Edward?' I whispered.

"'Not much further,' he said, in a strange tone. He

"I thought his voice sounded hoarse, and that it trembled. I looked up at my escort. My brother handed me out. As he stepped forward with the wet soil, I locked about me, and saw that we were at the end of a lane, which seemed a churchyard. There was a large black mass that appeared to be the church, some distance to the right, and a smaller one, somewhat nearer the gate, on the left.

"'Oh, Edward! where are we?' I murmured, recoiling.

"'Come on; will you keep Herbert waiting in this damp place?' said he, hoarsely, drawing my arm through his, and moving quickly to the gate.

"We entered the churchyard, and passed between the graves toward the small building on the left. When we reached it, my brother took a small lantern from his pocket, lit it, and flung its circle of light on the front of the building. I then saw that it was a sort of rude hut of unpainted boards, doubtless used to contain the tools and implements of the sexton. The door had evifirmly been left unfastened, for my brother pushed it open, and throwing the light of his lantern on the ground, bade me enter. I did so, and walking a few feet forward, with my hands stretched out, halted till he should raise the light, at the same time crying, in a low voice, 'Herbert! dearest Herbert! where are you?'

"At that moment my brother exclaimed—'Oh! behold your dearest Herbert!' and suddenly flashing the lantern upward and forward, my eager gaze, following the bright circle of light, encountered the pallid face and ghastly, glassy form of my beloved, rigid and ghastly in death!

"One single instant I saw this, as though it had been a flash of lightness in a lightning-flash, and then a rushing, roaring sound was in my ears, my heart gave a convulsive leap—and I knew or more!

"Three times I regained my consciousness, but to lose it the moment after, during my struggles from that awful scene. When I finally recovered my senses, I lay upon the lounge in your office, and when you told me the pretext of my brother's departure, I knew he would not return. He had fulfilled his dark threat; he had sated his infernal vengeance; and he had gone as he came!

"And though he thinks it not, in this world we shall never meet again.

"This, sir, is the terrible truth, in all its naked hideousness. Farewell!"

There was no name signed to this strange and fearful epistle. I looked at Mrs. Jones. She was very pale, and two rivulets of tears were slowly coursing down her cheeks. She dashed them fiercely off:

"What a fiend!" cried she. "Oh, what a demon! I can't credit it!"

I looked at the bank-bill. There was not a word of it in the letter.

"It is meant as a bribe," I muttered. And quick as thought I seized it and cast it in the fire. It was an act of folly; but the impulse was instantaneous, irresistible.

Mrs. Jones shook her head sadly.

"Oh, men, men, men!" exclaimed she, bitterly, and so left the room.

CHAPTER V.

I HATE never read, nor heard of my patient, since that day.

But more than a year subsequently, in a military hospital, "the opium-chief of which was a dear friend of mine, an "interesting case" was shown me. It was that of an officer who had received a wound (the part of which it is not necessary to detail here), causing intense suffering, and a sure but lingering death.

He lay on his side, moaning terribly. His face was nearly hidden by his left arm, but I saw that he had a dark, luxuriant beard and mustache, and on the little finger of his left hand glittered a ring with a green jewel—evidently an emerald—set within it. His hair I seen shut, I was told, while under the influence of opium, or, more correctly, as a spy, three weeks previously.

That night he died.

I have sat by my window many a night since that case was recorded, and the yellow eye of the gas-lamp has glared at me, through storm and calm, over and over again. But never from its circle of light—no, nor even from the darkening of my ideal hippogriff—has there come to me such a world beyond of life as the story of that sister's love and that brother's hatred!

And I earnestly pray there never may! Amen!

Indian Adventure in Ohio.

In the year 1792, on the banks of the Rockhocking, a few miles above the Junction with the Ohio, stood a small stockade, then one of the frontier posts of the North-west. Its inmates had been assailed by repeated attacks of Indians but, protected by their works, and actuated by the hardy courage of their class, they had uniformly repulsed their assailants, and frequently with considerable loss.

Sometime in the month of October, intelligence reached the post of a person that the savages were preparing an expedition against the settlement in great force. A council was immediately held, and scouts were sent out with instructions to ascertain, if possible, the number of the enemy, and the probable point of attack. Two of these, named Blandel and White, ascended the river as far as the picturesque promontory now known as Mount Pleasant, a high eminence which commanded an extensive view of the surrounding country.

Here the two scouts took their station, and were so busy in discovering the objects of their search. The smoke of an encampment rising through the trees betrayed the presence of their foes, at a distance much better adapted to scrutiny than to securing the safety of the watchers. Creeping back on the fresh accounts of the warriors; and every new arrival was greeted with prolonged and exultant yells. Such sounds were well calculated to appall those to whom they were unfamiliar; but to our gallant scouts they served, like martial music, to string the nerves and stir the spirits. From early youth they had lived on the frontier. It was not likely, therefore, that they would be circumvented by their foes, or, without a desperate struggle, fall victims to the scalping-knife.

On several occasions small parties left the encampment and ascended the hill, at which times the scouts would hide in a cleft of the rocks, or creep among the branches of some fallen tree, till the danger was past. For food they depended on the supply in their knapsacks; for they dared not kindle a fire, and the report of one of their rifles would have precipitated upon them the entire band of savages. They had recently rained, and a pool of water among the rocks served them for their drink. In a few days, however, this disappeared: and the alternative was presented of finding a new supply or abandoning their undertaking.

McClelland volunteered to make the attempt. Carrying his trusty rifle in his hand, and with two cutlasses strung across his shoulders, he cautiously descended to the verge of the prairie, and keeping within the thickets of bushes which skirted the stream, directed his course to the river, on the bank of which he had the good fortune to find a little spring of water. Here he secures it, filled his canteens and returned in safety.

The success of this enterprise determined the two friends to make a daily visit to the water hole, and the task of procuring it was to be performed alternately. The next day, when White had filled the canteens, he saw a few Indians wending the limpid element as it gurgled from the earth. While thus employed, a sound of light footsteps fell upon his ear, and, looking up, he saw a couple of squaws (Indian women) within a few feet of him, the elder of whom immediately uttered one of those far-reaching whoops peculiar to her race.

White at once comprehended the peril of his situation. A general alarm would reach the camp, and he and his companion must inevitably perish. Self-preservation prompted the infliction of a merciless death upon the two squaws—a proceeding to which, in all probability, he felt but little repugnance from any scruples of border humanity. The purpose was no sooner formed than acted upon. He sprang on his victims with the strength and activity of a panther, and hardly pausing to inflict a single blow, plunged into the river. Without difficulty he succeeded in thrusting the head of the elder beneath the water, and holding her there with supreme resolution; but the younger made a stouter resistance, and during the struggle, to his great horror, he found him in his own language, though in words scarcely articulate. He quickly released his hold, when she informed him, in a manner never before, she had been made a prisoner by the Indians, who had brutally murdered her mother and two children before her eyes.

During the narrative White let go his grasp upon the squaw, whose body floated where it was most likely soon to be discovered; and then, after directing the girl to follow him, with wonted speed and energy he pushed for the hill. They had scarcely gone two hundred yards, when shouts of alarm were heard about a quarter of a mile below. Some warriors, on their way to the spring, probably reached the spot as the body of the drowned squaw floated past. White and the girl pursued their course up the hill, where McClelland had remained no indifferent spectator of the commotion so suddenly excited. The sounds of alarm reached his ears, and, in every direction, and a number of them, before the fugitives could reach the summit, had commenced the second hue-and-cry—the yell of fiends. With caution, and keeping constantly under cover, they descended the hill on the side that was remote from the camp, and, by making a circuit, reached every place of escape cut off.

Nothing was left the two pioneers but to sell their lives as dearly as possible. This they resolved to do, directing the girl to lose no time in making her way back to the Indians, whom she knew how to avoid, and to convincing that she had just escaped from capture.

"No!" she exclaimed; "death with my own people is a thousand times preferable to a longer life of captivity!"

Further remonstrance was useless, and the scouts silently awaited the approach of the savages in vigorous resistance. The only perceptible access to the hill was by a narrow causeway or "backbone" of rock, which, from its steepness, rendered a direct assault impossible. Here, though, for the most part, under shelter of rocks and trees. But in making their way to the top, they were also obliged to incur a moment's exposure, and two inches of his dusky form was a target sufficient for the unerring rifle of White.

For several hours the outnumbering foe was held in check; but a new and hitherto unknown danger now threatened the devoted scouts. Their crafty enemies were preparing to assail them in flank—a movement which might be successfully executed by means of a detached portion of rock which lay adjacent to one of the sides of the causeway. The brave men saw it was his only chance, and resolved to take it. Coolly raising his rifle, and aiming with the precision of a man who knew that his own no less than his adversary's life hung on the result, he drew the trigger. The hammer fell; but instead of striking fire, the flint, through some inherent defect, was crushed to fragments!

McClelland now perceived a savage mount pain the rock before he could adjust another flint, he set about the task with composure, resolved that his antagonist should derive no benefit from his remissness. Glancing from his work to the place of the warrior's concealment, he saw the stalwart savage, with every muscle nerved, prepared to take the leap. With the agility of a deer he gave a bound; but instead of reaching the rock, his progress was midway arrested through the rock, his mysterious conversion of his limbs and body, and fell heavily down upon the rock, a distance of fifty feet. He had evidently received a death shot from some unknown hand; and a terrible shout from below announced the loss of a favorite warrior.

A few moments sufficed to prove that the advantage so unexpectedly gained would be of short duration, for already another Indian was seen approaching the cover recently occupied by his comrade. Again the stitock in front was resumed with increased fury, so as to engage the attention and detention of both the scouts. With this diversion in his favor, the second warrior prepared to take his leap unmolested by the pioneers. With the spring of a tiger, the fierce and wary savage darted upon the rock; but not the same unseen hand had intercepted his career; and turning a complete somersault in the air, his body rolled down the declivity, a mangled mass of corruption.

This last mysterious sacrifice struck dismay to the hearts of the assailants, who, it being now evident that they were under some order of attack—a respite which came seasonably to the scouts, wearied, as they were, by the protracted and unequal conflict.

It was now that the absence of the girl was first discovered; and the pioneers, supposing that she had taken the opportunity to her former captors, or had been killed in the fight. But they were soon relieved from their fears by the appearance of the object of their conjectures was soon emerging from the cover of a rock, carrying a rifle in her hand. In this act of courage, she, and each warrior fall some fifty yards in advance of the main body; and crouching in the undergrowth, the girl was soon discovered, and secured the bundle and ammunition. Her practiced eye had not failed to notice the danger in which they were placed by the position of the rock; and here was the mysterious hand by which the two warriors had fallen. The girl was the favored and most bloodthirsty of the Shawnees, and it was he who had, ten years previously, murdered and scalped her parents and children.

The night was dark and cloudy, a circumstance which enabled the scouts, under the skilful guidance of the girl, to elude their enemies and withdraw from their perilous situation.

After a toilsome march of three days, the party reached the stockade in safety. Their escape deterred the Indians from their contemplated attack, the surprise they had planned being thereby rendered impracticable.

MR. RUSKIN ON WAR, WOMEN, AND BIBLES.

The following passage is from Mr. Ruskin's lecture on "The Queen of the Air" in "Crown of Wild Olive." The lecture was addressed to the Royal Architectural Museum, from the quaint passage was specially addressed to the ladies: "You may wonder, perhaps, that I have spoken at this night in a manner that was, for me, if it might be, I for one would fain join in the cadence of hammer-strokes that should beat down every habitation, and build up what cannot be is not the fault of us men. It is your fault. Wholly you have the power—command, or by your persuasion, can any contest take place among us. And the real, final reason for all the poverty, misery, and shame of human life, is simply in the single fact that women, whatever good, honourable, virtuous, feminine nature they have, do not use it in the affairs of nations. Not one woman in a million knows, or cares to know, anything about the causes for which men slay one another. Your praying is useless, and your church-going mere mockery of God. You have not faith enough in Him to pray for this. Let every lady in the upper classes of this country declare that she will not visit or treat war process, she will wear black—a mute's black—till it is ended, and war will cease as much as cruelties like prize-fights; I tell you again, no war would be a week's talk, if women refused to look at it. And now shrieking with one voice—you and your clergymen together—'Good God, this is cruel!' Your Bibles lying ab hand. If you chose to obey your Bibles, you will have no more war. Not one of you, I believe, does or never fulfill a single downright precept of the book that you suppose you obey. You don't sell all you have and give to the poor; you don't take no thought for the morrow; you don't resist the letters of them. The Bible tells you to relieve the fatherless and widow, but it tells you to leave pity on the poor—and you crush them under your poisonous luxuries. The Bible tells you to do judgment and justice—and you do not know, nor care to know, what is done to the poor in the next street to you. But learn so much of God's truth as that He means to do what He promises when He tells you to be just, and teach your sons that their bravery is but a boy's bravery, and their strength but a weakness, unless they are indeed just men, and perfect in the fear of God; and then, and then only, no more war, unless it be indeed such as is willed by him of whom, though the voice of Deity, it is written, 'In righteousness He doth judge, and make war.'"

LENGTH OF GEOLOGICAL PERIODS.—All the data of geology are against the antiquity of which we are beginning to form but a dim idea. Take, for instance, chalk, almost entirely composed of animalcule shells of England. The coniete entirety of shells and fragments of shells which go to the formation of a single inch of chalk have been produced by the destruction of many square miles of animal life. But many of the shells now existing have been former at the expense of the chalk which is being washed away by the waves of England have been produced by the destruction of chalk. Thus, again, is a very slow process. It has been estimated that a cliff five hundred feet high will be worn away at the rate of one inch in a century. This may seem a low rate, but we must bear in mind that along any line of coast there are, comparatively, few points which are suffering at one time, and that, even on these, when a fall of cliff has taken place, the fragments serve as a protection to the coast until they have been gradually worn away. Mr. Alfred R. Wallace tells us that, in the two miles in breadth, and on these data it has been calculated that the entire mass of the chalk must have required more than 190,000,000 of years.

SUPERNATURAL PREMONITION.

BY AN EMINENT.

I WAS running a night-express train, and had stands of ten carriages, and all were well loaded. I was behind time, and was very anxious to make a certain point, and therefore I was some very exc ting, putting the engine to the utmost speed to which she was capable. It was on a section of the road usually considered the best running ground on the line, and was endeavoring to make the most of it, when a certain unaccountable trouble-e. A sensation seemed to tell me that to go ahead was dangerous, and that I must pull up instantly.

I looked back at my train, and it was all right; I strained my eyes ahead, but could see nothing and could see no signal of danger, and there I could see five miles in the daytime. I listened to the workings of my engine, and she was right, looked at the gauges, and she was right. So, as you may suppose, I tried to laugh myself out of my unaccountable fancy. I could not. Still, like Banquo's ghost, it would not down at my bidding, but grew stronger and stronger hold upon me. I thought of the ridicule I would have heaped upon me if I did stop; but it was all of no avail. The conviction—for by that time it had ripened into a conviction—that I must stop grew stronger and I shut off, and blew the whistle for the breaks accordingly.

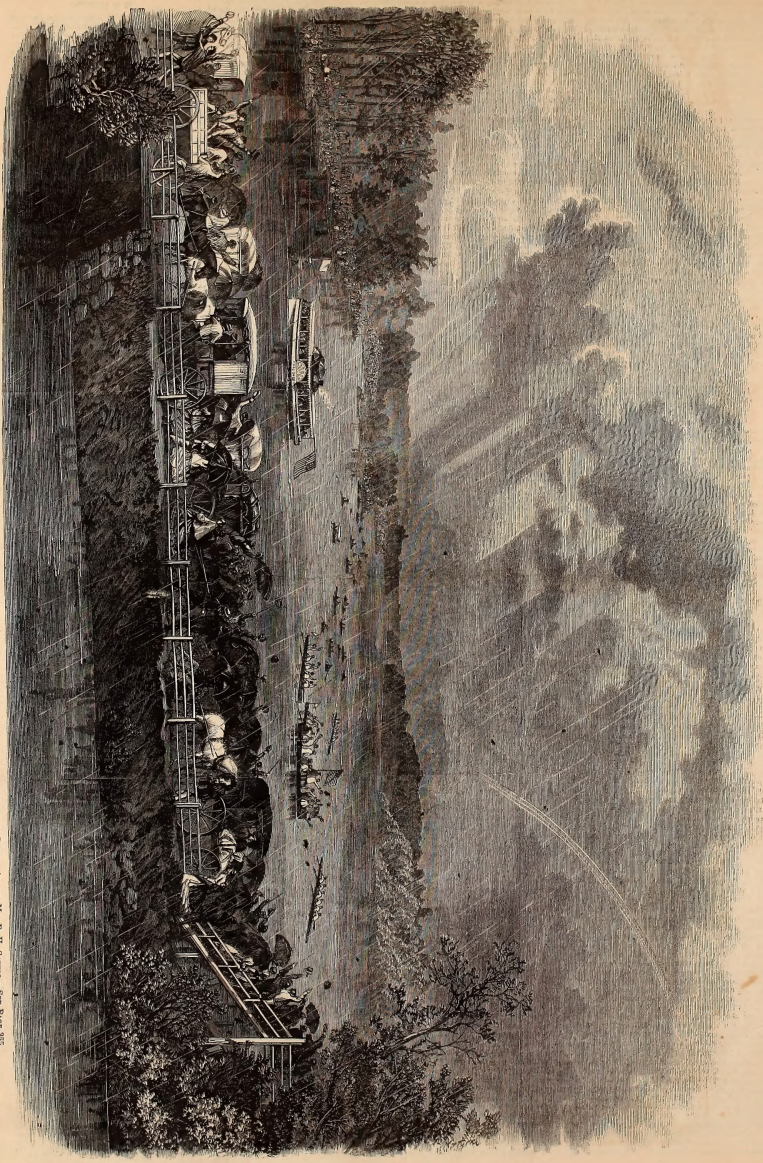
I came to a dead halt, got off, and went ahead a little way. I looked, but my hand in my hand, and saw, at about sixty feet, when I was what convinced me premonitions are sometimes believable. I dropped the lantern from my nerveless grasp, and sat down on the track, utterly unable to stand; for there right before me the thought of which had never entered my mind, as it had never been supposed since I had left the roof, and was known to be spiked, but which now was open to load-gun of the enemy.

This switch led into a stone quarry, from whence the stone had been taken for the new bridge, and the switch was left there in case stone should be needed at any time. The switch was always locked, but was never spiked. Yet here it was wide open; and had I not been warned, I should have run into it, and at the end of the track, only ten rods off, was a heavy engine and tender, lying at the vale of to-by-dye miles per hour, would have swept the switch clear of the track, and have caused a fast high. The consequences, had I done so, can neither be imagined nor described; the wonder is, by no possibility, be otherwise than fatally horrid.

Now, I had received no signal whatever from a source that I know not and cannot divine. It is a mystery to me—a mystery which I am willing to solve, but which, however, although I dare not attempt to explain it, nor say whence it came.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE grayhound runs by eyesight only, and this we conclude as a fact. The carriage-horse has no two hundred and fifty miles homeward by eyesight—sometimes, indeed, with the reins on his back and marched; but this is only our conjecture. The fierce dragon-fly, with twelve thousand lenses in his eye, darts at his prey, and dashes with the rapidity of a flying sword, and so rapidly darts back, notwithstanding in the air his wings are moving the action at the rate of sixty, and instantaneously calculating the distance of the object. Can the human head imagine the power of the exact conformation of the eye does this consist? No one can answer.



The ant can ten thousand gnats dance up and down in the sun, the minutest interval between them, yet no human being can distinguish upon the minutest gnats a leg or a wing, long and delicate as these are. Suddenly, amidst your admiration of this machines dance, a peculiar gnat detaches itself from the throng, independent nose, darts out of the rising and falling cloud, and returns to its place with the rapidity of lightning. What possessed the little wretch to do this? Did he receive a blow on the nose from the back of a gnat?

A carriage comes suddenly upon a flock of geese, on a road—a common occurrence—and they rise from their throne. A goose was never yet fairly run over, nor a goose's leg broken by the wheels and hoofs, nor do we remember they conserve to find and waddle safely off. Geese are, indeed, very wary and cautious, but very fearless, equal to any emergency.

Why does the dog, in his discomfort, when he exceeds his tone and goes to drink, stop several times on his way to the water, and then drink with great rapidity? No one knows. How is it that the species of ant, which is taken in a hive by other ants to be their slaves, should be the black, or negro ant? No one knows.

Why does the dog, when he is permitted to run free and easy bedisnes which results from it, are by no means inconsiderable, holds never to have any more accurate notion of a gun's range, and while scrupulously careful to keep clear of the muzzle, take care to this caution, though the most obvious resource would be to fly right across the line of sight and so avoid all risk of the shoot to do. And they sometimes appear to make even an ostentatious display of their fleetness, their activity and cleverness in antagonism to that of man, for the benefit of the latter. We lately read a newspaper, by a naturalist of Brazil, of an expedition he made to one of the islands in the mouth of the great river, Amazon, and other of the magnificent gravitational birds, which are found in those forests. His desire was to be absolutely baffled, however, by a wretched little sand-piper that perched on the muzzle of his gun, and by its cries and shrieks drew accurate all the birds within hearing. Not a single shot could he get at, and the sand-piper continued to perform the part of sentinel to admirable purpose, preventing the approach of the rower to the game, and yet managing to keep out of the range of his gun.

BLACK RAIN.—The black rain showers, which are now so well known in Scotland, and about which the attention of a part of the philosophers are in the way of speaking with no great r astonishment, are now one of the facts of the day. Showers of black, dead, blackening materials exposed to it that they speak of as black rain have been a showery season at last recognized in England. Between the beginning of June and the end of July, black showers have, it has been no fewer than eight authenticated black showers in Scotland, and seven or three of these in and the calamitye surrounding district. Two or them were of unusual violence, and one of them was a shower of which measured eight to ten inches in diameter, and was one which was spread equally over the first four, including the Carluke shower, and the eighth, which was the most extensive of all, including Glasgow and the immediate there with those of Ayr. But now, in the last week of July, and the first week of August, the black rain has fallen in new ground, and, in the Scottish showers, it has been observed that the black rain has fallen in showers of unusual violence. It she did not think that she was so distinguished. On the 31st of July, in the county (1866), at 4 h. 30 m. and at 4 h. 30 m. the town of Birmingham and surrounding country was visited by a shower of black rain, which was followed with black clouds, producing darkness and rain. Another shower took place a few minutes were spent, not gas had to be lighted at some of the counting-houses, and many in all places of business. Mr. Dent, writing for information, got inquiries institute, and the result is found to be that a drop quantity of black rain, similar to the Scottish, fell, and blackened linen-water in hands, and clothes on grass, not only in Birmingham itself, but at other places many miles distant, manufactured by soot and smoke, and even windward of that town. So far as known, however, no word as to the nature of the deposit has been found, although, judging from what has taken place in Scotland, a probability exists that some matter has been in a state of carrying, emitting fuscolenes, whether it be heard or or not.

THE CLOVE.

SINCE you have asked, I needs must tell the history
Of how I gained you pearly little glove:
A'nd it is the key to no soft mystery—
Nor page of tourney in the lists of love.

'Twas thus I found it: Through the city's bustle
I wandered one old still autumn eve, alone;
A tall, slight form brushed by me with silken rustle,
And passed into a carriage, and was gone.

One glance I had; in that I caught the gleaming
Of violet eyes, o'er which the rippling tress
Glanced gold—a face like those we see in dreaming,
As perfect in its shadowy loveliness.

And so she passed, a glorious light about her,
Clothed, like a summer dawn, in silver gray,
And left the crowded street as dark without her
As winter skies whose moon has passed away.

This little casuistet, which her hand was clasping,
Fell from her as she reached the carriage-door,
And floated down, as flutters from the aspen
Some trembling leaflet whose brief day is o'er.

And I—I found it on the pavement lying,
Pale as the marble Venus-missing hand,
Or some small wreath of foam which, dying, flying,
Leaves in a furrow of the moistened sand.

She was so like some queen of the ideal—
With that bright brow, those soft eyes' shadowy gleam—
I felt would keep the pledge to prove her real,
To mark her difference from an airy dream.

And though her glove has unto me been donor
Of much sweet thought, yet I can think it well
That she should have so little of its owner
As I of her from whose fair hand it fell.

Why should I drag her from her high position,
Her whole above this work-day world's long reach?
Hardly a fact, not wholly yet a vision,
She joins for me the better parts of each.

Madeline's Marriage;

OR,

THE STEPDAUGHTER.

CHAPTER IV.—OFFENSIVE AND DEFENSIVE.

A POSITIONY passed away. Every morning Madeline placed fresh flowers for her benefactor, whom she had not yet seen since his arrival, for as day after day passed without indications to Dr. Donivon that he should be appointed relief of his wife's daughter's support, he had obliged her to take the place of the servant, in setting tables and washing dishes, really that he might have his petty revenge, ostensibly, as he said to his wife, because it was against his principles to have any thing to do but actively public persons, his little clawlike hands concealed by the cambric frills on his wristbands, his scrupulous linen fastened by studs of single, brilliant diamonds, looking, as the ladies remarked, "rather delicate, but by no means old, and very gentlemanly," and attended by Simon as by a shadow, joined the convalescent circle.

Several days more had ashed after the little girl, and wondered if she had forgotten him. Mrs. Donivon told Madeline of this, and of how indignant he had been when she had endeavored to restore the money which her daughter had accepted from him.

"It was for Isa's sake. I wish I might do more for her," he mused, "so that perhaps some one else might find Isa in turn."

"You have lost a daughter, sir?" inquired Mrs. Donivon, with sympathy.

Mr. St. Hellens bowed.

"My life has been a long retribution, madam," he answered, indefinitely.

Simon, standing behind the chair, moved uneasily, and caught his master's eye.

Mrs. Donivon's quick perceptions recognized some mystery in her sort of spell the mulatto exercised. Not discomposed, she said:

"If does not, probably, differ from most lives in that, sir."

There was no response. She added, with a sort of desperation:

"You grieve for a daughter, but is not my fate harder—to have my daughter before my eyes, with my duty so bound that I can do nothing for her happiness?"

Mr. St. Hellens looked up quickly.

"Why do you never come to see me?" he asked. "I liked her happy, pretty face."

The "pretty, happy face" at that very moment looked into the parlor through a crack in the door, thinking her mother alone, as indeed she was but for Mr. St. Hellens and the servant. But catching sight of these, she drew back.

Mr. St. Hellens had recognized her.

"Little girl," he cried, imperatively, "why don't you come and see me?"

Madeline put the tip of her little nose to the door.

"I'm not fit," she said.

Mr. St. Hellens laughed.

"Come in here—let me see you," he said. She obeyed him, shyly.

"I'm worse Cinderella than ever, sir." On the care she had called him, playfully, the "fairy Godmother," and herself Cinderella, which had pleased him.

"Well, come here. You've never been to ask how I was since we got here."

"I always ask, sir," she answered, reproachfully.

"Who—who do you ask? Why don't you ask me?"

"I ask Simon. It's so early, I don't dare come in."

"What's so early? What are you talking about?"

"Flowers! Did you bring me flowers?" He turned inquiringly to Simon.

"Miss Orme has brought you some flowers, sir, but you know you cannot bear the perfume. I thought it would hurt her to refuse them, I set them in the adjoining room," and the man looked meekly into his master's eyes.

Mr. St. Helens face flushed angrily. He passed his hand across his forehead, as though he was endeavoring to recollect. The flush was succeeded by a pallor, his eyes dropped. It seemed that his intellect, somehow impaired, made a feeble effort to assume its old habits.

"Yes—yes," he continued, slowly, "but I'm sorry I didn't know it. You must come and bring me—no not any flowers, but come and—let me see—you must come and read to me every day. Will you?"

"Yes, indeed, sir."

Her face, so ready to cloud and so quick to brighten, flushed at this unexpected encouragement.

That Mr. St. Hellens should have noticed her gave her value, this, a new, quick importance in the household. The doctor was ready enough to have his profitable patient humored; and Madeline was only too happy to betake herself to a spot where, for an hour at least, she was free from persecutions.

"You need very nicely," said Mr. St. Hellens, interrupting her, one morning. She had been so absorbed in the book she was reading to him, that she started at his voice, and colored.

"I'm so glad," she answered, innocently.

Mr. St. Hellens was awakened in deep confidence that that day Madeline was not a footstool beside him. He had listened dreamily to her voice, as though its tone, rather than the matter of the book, interested him.

"Why so?" he inquired.

"I don't know. Hardly any one ever tells me that I do anything right, and when they do happen to, it makes me happy, that's all."

"I forget, child, with my own little irritation. "Why, child, ain't you always happy?"

She looked at him wonderingly. His petulance frightened her a little.

"Oh, yes, sir," she said, apologetically, "I shall be, when I get away from here, you know."

"Away!" he answered, some fresh irritation fact occurred to him. "You are going away, aren't you, Madeline? Is it soon?"

"I don't know, sir. I pray for every day, but it hasn't come yet," and her lips quivered.

"You will be sorry to go, will you?"

"Oh, yes, sir, very glad."

"Have you spent all the money yet—the little fortune?"

"No, indeed. I am saving it."

"What do you save it for?"

"To pay you back, sir. And I want to get a new cloak and dress when I go to the seminary; that is if they take me there."

"Humph!" he said, "you get spend it. You shall have some more, then."

"I don't want any more, sir." She spoke very resolutely. Her cheeks were flushed and her eyes fixed on the covers of her book, which she was crimping nervously with her fingers.

"Tut, tut," said Mr. St. Hellens, impatiently. "you've shut yourself up here with a sick old man every bright day for a fortnight: and don't you suppose he is going to do something in return?"

"I shall not take anything, Mr. St. Hellens," flushed Madeline, with passion. And then catching the gentleman's eye on him, she hastily, she burst into violent tears, sobbing brokenly:

"I don't—don't—like—to—to—to make me unhappy. After you've been so good and spoken so kindly to me——"

"Don't—don't—well," he said, soothingly, loosing his hands to stroke her hair. "Why—why, child, I didn't mean to hurt you."

"I know you didn't," she said, trying to keep down the sobs—"but I don't want you to feel as if I was a servant."

"Poor, silly, little child!" he returned, caressing her, as she dropped her head upon his knee. "Why, Madeline, I feel as if you might be my daughter! Simon belongs to me, and I like little friend. You don't know how I shall miss you if you go away. You're thinking what I should ask of you for a keepsake, when you leave me."

"I haven't got anything in the world that would be worth giving you," she said, quite sad and practical.

As she spoke, Simon entered the room. Whatever was his errand, he had rarely shook off an expression of dejection in his presence.

If Simon was surprised to find Miss Orme and his master both agitated, and at the clinging attitude of the one and the protecting air of the other, no one would have guessed it.

"Miss Orme," he said, "Mr. Hylder told me to say that he would like to see you when you were at liberty."

"Oh, Simon, has he got a letter for me?" she asked eagerly, springing up, radiant with expectation.

"It appeared to be something about a picture, miss, he answered, looking at her wanly, without altering the even respect of his tone. "The appears has come, and two or three of the ladies are waiting."

"Oh, is that all?" said Madeline, slowly leaving the room.

Simon passed through the main chamber into his own apartment, which communicated with it. Some sudden kind of resolution glittered across his face as he found himself alone.

"I must be his mischief done," he whispered, hoarsely, "unless I act promptly. The beads and alms are not enough for him, forsooth! A sick old man, with only a little time remaining for repentance, and he must have her for the sight of a pretty face. Weak idiot! will he pollute even these late garments of redemption with the stain of passion? What does he want more of earth?" The mulatto's lips parted across his teeth, and as they did so a sharp gleam flashed in his eyes. He worked his fingers nervously, some inarticulate words rattled in his throat, and his whole frame shook with the violence of the struggle which this spasm of emotion passed. He saturated a sponge in an aromatic vinegar and bathed his heated temples, and, when enough time having subsided as sufficiently as they had risen, he returned to his master's room.

Mr. St. Hellens sat where Madeline had left him, propped in his cushioned chair, and gazing with dreamy eyes through the open window upon the sun-decked lawn and the maple branches swaying idly in the summer wind.

"It is a bright day, Simon," he said to his servant.

"Yes, sir, the youth of the year is gay, like the youth of man," said Simon, in a tone of rebuke, and with an expression of familiarity and equality and of culture and education which he seldom betrayed, before others.

Mr. St. Hellens appeared to muse.

"The youth of man is a dreary time: ach, Simon?" he said, when he seemed to have reached the end of his train of thought.

"That is according to nature, sir," Simon answered, looking sharply into his face.

Mr. St. Hellens sighed.

"Some high temper, some living or other ought not be amiss at any time of life, Simon," he said, pleadingly.

The man did not wait for his master to express himself more clearly.

"The laws of life are of compensation," he said, with sententious truth. "A man who blinded yourself with pleasure because you could not admit a shadow of pain to tone it. You had your gratifications all at once, Mass Hens; you must have your due proportionals in the same way.

"Well, Simon, life is very lonely," he said, piteously.

The man's features worked again.

"What would you do?" he asked, sternly, "to take your thoughts from your salvation? What would you barter for the peace of your soul?"

"No, no, Simon," he remonstrated; "I don't mean that. I will give what I have to them, you know; but I think if I had—if I could find Isa, or some dear friend, I could be to stay with me, you know, and read to me, as this little girl here, and—and cheer me up, why, it seems to me, I should be better, and—and recover at all for it."

The mulatto's features were stamped with alarm. The passionate whispers he had treated to himself, took their true significance. He scrutinized his master's face. "We must get away from here," he said, with determination.

Through the silence that ensued he busied his active brain with plans for their removal from Riverside. It was not many years since Mr. St. Hellens had opposed any obstacle to his plans or suggestions, but he remembered too well the comfortably luxurious character to trust around it. He beheld with dismay that a new element was at work in the mind which had so long been plant to be his own, and he approached it with a caution worthy of his craft.

"It is a week, sir, since we have seen Father Ambrose," he said, breaking the pause at length.

"You are so well to-day that, if you can spare me, I will walk over to see him this afternoon."

Mr. St. Hellens started at the sound of his servant's voice from his reverie. His face wore a happy, tranquil expression, which vanished as he listened to the words.

"Of course, of course," he said, impatiently, in reply.

"I can't sit for my picture this morning," Madeline had said, in reply to Mr. Hylder, when, after waiting like Mr. St. Hellens, she found the young man, who had erected an awning and improvised a gallery out of doors, and who, at that moment, was employed in arranging Miss Caity's posture for her picture.

"Well, you must come this afternoon, then. I think it will be necessary to-day; and, if it is, I'm going to try and get a view of the house, so I shall have time enough."

Glancing upward, Madeline saw Mr. St. Hellens at his window, apparently interested in watching the proceedings. As she passed Mr. Hylder, she asked, in a low voice:

"Have you not heard anything for you?"

"Not yet, but I shall have this afternoon."

"What did she say to you, Robert?" asked Miss Caity, impatiently.

"Nothing of the least consequence, Caity. Turn your head a little more to the left." He threw back under over the camera and took out his watch. It is said to relate that the picture he presented depicted Miss Caity's most unamiable expression.

Shortly after the hour this afternoon, Madeline saw Mr. Hylder coming up the avenue with an open letter in his hand; and, stealing away from the dining-room, where she and Simon were taking the britannia, she followed him into his little gallery, where he stood, with a somewhat troubled expression on his frank face.

"Has it come, Mr. Hylder?" she asked.

"Yes, Miss Madeline——" and he hesitated.

"And they will not have me?" She spoke huskily, growing very white.

"No matter now, Miss Madeline," began the young man. "Folks mustn't always expect to succeed the first time, and——"

"Oh, Mr. Hylder, what shall I do?—what shall I do?" she moaned.

"You don't, now please don't feel so bad, Miss Madeline—now just hear this: the young lady that had the place—I told you about her, you know—well, you see, she accepted it in a hurried, and somehow it's fallen through, and she's got to go back there to teaching. Now you see that's a great deal worse than your case, for which awkward consolation the young man approached Madeline, who stood in a listless, despairing way against the tent-pole, looking bewilderedly at her disappointment.

"But what shall I tell him? what shall I do next? I can't stay here," she sobbed.

She buried her face in her little hands, so troubled and inconsolable that Robert felt great sympathetic heart yearned over her to its very depths. He could not leave her, so tried and thought. He would find his life, and strength, and labor to lift the cloud from the saintly little face which he had shrined as an epitome of beauty in his breast. For an instant a wild dream of love for the little maiden before him stirred his whole heart. He wanted to take her in his strong arms, and shield her for ever; to work for her; to live, to watch over, and to worship her.

Trembling at his own audacity he drew her hands from her white face and stole one arm around her. She started from him, her eyes with frightened eyes into his, which were radiant with tenderness; and with a sudden comprehension, she spoke all trembling, and a little, moaning cry, she fled from him.

"I——"

"An artful, good-for-nothing mink!" Miss Caity's voice was shrill with excitement, as she confronted her sister that afternoon.

Dr. Donivon laid his hand heavily on Madeline's arm as she hurried through the hall; her mother, with Miss Caity, looked on, from a window in the passage. Several of the patients sitting about enjoyed the novelty of the scene.

"I will have you to know that I am engaged, and she knows it," pursued Miss Caity; "and she's done nothing but follow him around with her little, contemptible, cunning ways ever since she came; and now there's got to be an end to it: either she goes, or I go, and I'll be hanged if I go."

Madeline quivered with pain and passion at the unmerited abuse. She tried to free herself, but Dr. Donivon kept his hold upon her. She turned her imploring eyes upon her mother, who only looked upon him, and trying again to loose her arm, said to him, suppressing her voice, "Let me go."

"Not yet, sir," he answered. "Not yet," he sneered. "In a hurry, too. Just as quick as you can pack yourself out of this house."

"I will be glad to pack," she said, in a kind of despairing stupor.

"Well, out then—out with you," and he drew her hand toward the hall-door, as if he would push her into the street.

"Oh, mother!" she cried in affright.

In the shadow of his servant, Mr. St. Hellens had come below that afternoon, on the arrival of the letter which Madeline and his unopened letters in his hand, had witnessed the scene. He sallow, sunken cheeks flamed with anger, and stepping forward he struck violently than he had done for many a day before, he half-raised his cane at the doctor.

"Monster! coward!" he cried out. "By my faith, what are you about? Here, give me the girl—I am her protector."

Madeline sprang forward him in her helplessness.

"Oh, Mr. St. Hellens!" she cried.

"Come here, my dear. We'll see! A pretty piece of business, I do declare. Come, my child, to my room. We'll see about this! Come, Simon," he said to Mr. Donivon.

"Will you give her to me? I ask for her," he continued, impetuously, as his chamber-door closed upon them.

Even then Mrs. Donivon's controlling policy did not desert her. Some instinct assured her that the instant was a crisis, in which she should not interfere.

"Mr. St. Hellens," she answered, with emotion, "what can I say? I am so grateful to you for your child hardly belongs to me. I have had to force her upon me by my own hands, and she holds it, independent of her unhappy mother."

"Madeline"—he looked affectionately into the girl's frightened face—"will you stay with me, dear, and let me always take care of you?"

She made him no answer. All these trials were endured by the sweet woman—her self-respect, indignance. A month ago, she would have abandoned herself to him with the confidence of a child. Now——

She put her hands into his.

"I will, sir, and will get my work to do," she whispered, with a proud face. "You will not think me ungrateful, will you, Mr. St. Hellens?"—oh! I owe so much to you! But I am a woman. I have promised mamma that I would not be weak and childish, and, don't you know, I would rather work. I could not bear to——" and she paused in embarrassment.

"That is a foolish feeling, child, and yet," gazing into her fair, young face, "I honor you for it. But, Madeline," and a perplexed, pleading look came into his eyes, and he smiled with a sort of fond indulgence upon the girl. "I want you with me, little one. Do you know that somehow I have made me very happy? that I cannot bear to give you up?" It was striking her hair, with his pale hands. His eyes were pensive and wistful, as in his morning's reverie, and his voice coaxing, like that of a child.

A confused consciousness dawned in the girl's mind. Mr. St. Hellens's words were like a silver sand dangling down into the abyss which seemed between him—a slender chance of succor. hemmed her in—a slender chance of succor. With him? Where else? Not with the house, in an outcast way. Here as the home had been, it was still a shelter—its boundaries a protection. But alone in the great, wide world!—her fright at the picture of it to her face and blanched it still the plainer for the hectic flush that followed it and more. She caught her benefactor's hands and covered her wet face with them.

"Will you let me work for you, Mr. St. Hellens?" she sobbed. "I was proud of my skill this morning: now I would be glad to be your servant."

Mr. St. Hellens again loosed his hands and closed them across her young head, with its bowed shining hair. He hesitated, seeming to protect his desire to utter words which trembled on his lips.

"I am an old man, little Madeline," he began after awhile, "and I might ask you to come with me as a daughter, but I have a strange, weak feeling that it would be sacrilege to offer such a child any other than the one who has far, far more than any common claim upon me. And yet there has been a time—" his pained, wistful look I want you with me—" his pained, wistful look into the blank, earnest face, that met his for the first time, as his look dimly revealed his meaning, with a faltering expression.

"I think we need each other, little one," he continued, in a wistful tone; and drawing her partly toward him, he added, very simply and quickly:

"Will you marry me, Madeline?"

Perhaps Madeline Orme had thought, as girls will, of some such words being some time said to her. If so, the picture she had made of them was not like this. It seemed to her that there was a violent wrench at her heart, a spasm of nervous palpitation, a choking denial of the request.

And then—— It is hard to say what followed; a sense of incapacity for resistance, of weakness, a glance of dumb appeal at her mother; but Mrs. Donivon's encouraging look of relief and contempt; Donivon's encouraging with breathless interest; her sinister wife struggling with this chance for her consummated ambition, and she could only retort her daughter's look with eyes whose expression sealed them to discouragement.

"You are too good, Mr. St. Hellens," Madeline murmured, in a vague tone.

"It is you, child, who are good to me," he answered, taking her words for acceptance, and pressing his lips lightly to her forehead, and suddenly relinquishing her.

Madeline sat down at Mr. St. Hellens's feet, as she did when reading aloud for him.

"Mrs. Donivon," he said, in a tremulous, agitated way, "I will do right by her."

An hour or two elapsed before Simon's return from his visit to the priest. There was a look of satisfaction on his face as he came to be opened the door of his master's room, but it faded to a dull glare at a glance at the faces which met him.

"It has passed the help of words," he thought and bowing respectfully to the ladies, proceeded to busy himself in silence about the room.

Suddenly Mr. St. Hellens's unopened letters caught his eye.

"You have not looked at your letters yet, Master Henri," he observed.

"True—true, you may read to me, Simon," answered the invalid; "or, no, I will look at them myself."

He glanced over two or three hastily. But as he perused the contents of that last opened, his face glowed with excitement, his eyes seemed glued to the words, and his hands fairly clutched the paper.

"Simon," he gasped, rather than said, and stretching the letter toward the man, he fell back fainting in his chair.

That evening after Madeline was in bed, her mother went to her room. Mrs. Donivon somehow felt little of the exultation which a short time before she would have undoubtedly known such a brilliant prospect as seemed to await her daughter. She was rather pale and agitated as she sat down by the bedside. It had all come about so strangely and suddenly.

"It seems, dear, that you will have to be married directly," she said, in a hushed tone."

How little marriage meant to Madeline Orme that hour!

"If that has happened, mamma?" she asked, quietly.

"One of those letters Mr. St. Hellens received was from his son—his adopted son, you know—and it seems he has got some trace of the daughter Mr. St. Hellens lost. They were young men together, you know, Madeline?" asked Mrs. Donivon, thoughtfully.

"No, ma'am."

"And it is necessary for him to return directly to New Orleans, inasmuch as he has all the evidences with identifying marks, and that he has them, he told me, in that ebony box which he is always so careful of."

"I wonder what she is like, mamma?" wondering, with a childlike curiosity, from the point.

Mrs. Donivon caressed her child tenderly, without replying.

"Mr. St. Hellens says that you must get a traveling suit, and leave everything else until you reach New Orleans. He has been talking to me about his property. He is very liberal, dear. He will settle a hundred thousand dollars on you as soon as he gets home. He has settled the same on this adopted son he speaks of. The remainder of his fortune goes to his daughter, or, as his will stands at present, to the church; he is a humanist, it seems; but he will alter it directly if this prove to be she."

"Wasn't it odd that she should be lost, mamma?" answered Madeline, in the same tone.

"Curious old, rich families sometimes have strange doings among themselves," replied Mrs. Donivon.

CHAPTER V.—BRIDAL BELLS.

MADELINE ORME'S wedding-day broke gloomy and gray. It was still early in September, but the summer was ended.

Miss Carlyle had departed from the Water Cure on the morning following the emeute, after a brief interview with Robert Hylder, who still remained. He would have wanted a favorable answer, but he might, before he went, take a good photograph of the house, which was really quite an imposing mansion, having been built originally for the summer residence of some wealthy family, who, poor trial, had not found Saratoga fashionable.

On the day following his singular and sudden betrothal, Mr. St. Hellens had been unable to leave his room. Excitement seemed to have left his mind and mind. He was drowsy and prostrated body and mind. He was drowsy and depressed. At Madeline's voice or touch he seemed, smiled kindly and with satisfaction at her presence, but further than that he observed very little.

Madeline exhibited a genuine distress at his situation, but Simon assured her that his master was liable to such attacks after excitement; that his nervous system had been shattered by painful scenes which he had gone through, and that there was no danger at present. The girl trusted to the man's judgment during these few days. A dim appreciation of her position seemed to have sealed her lips against complaint, and left room to be admitted of hope or fear. Perhaps during the moments which she had had in which to reflect upon the change that had come, there had been some vague revolt of instinct against this marriage. If so, she was too ignorant of the world to examine its nature, and she accepted the protection which Mr. St. Hellens offered her with grateful tranquility, as she had done the kind attentions of her marriage morning, listening with half comprehension to her mother's talk.

"You will have quite a complete independence, Madeline, if you are only judicious," said Mrs. Donivon, thoughtfully.

"Yes, I suppose so, mamma," was the calm reply; and so she went to her dusting.

It seemed as though a great effort of will alone prevented Mr. St. Hellens from lapsing, even that morning, into the lethargy which had ensued upon the excitement consequent upon the reception of the letter whose perusal had followed his offer of marriage. He complained of a deadly numbness, a sort of paralysis of muscle and brain, against which he strove in vain.

When Madeline went to his room, when the carriage which was to convey him to the depot waited at the door, she found him in a trembling, half-fainting condition, while Simon was making hasty preparations for his departure. He seemed nervous, hurried way, as was quite unusual to him. He motioned to Madeline to leave the room in a way that was almost imperious.

A half hour later, however, Mr. St. Hellens joined her in the parlor, at least partially restored, but retaining a dreary and bewildered look.

"Let us wait till to-morrow, Mr. St. Hellens," entreated Madeline; "you are not well enough to start upon this journey."

"No, no, child, we'll not wait," he said. "I shall be better and stronger for the day for traveling: but it is the dizzy numbness which creeps over me. It seems—it seems," and he pressed his hands to his head, "as if the fever, with its strange all sensation and capacity, came on again. Pray for me, child. Come, Simon, Simon! Simon!" he called, sharply, to the man, who had not yet descended.

A minute after he appeared, carrying portmanteau and shawls, in a way as though they had been snatched up carelessly. Mr. St. Hellens's sense of order was keen.

"I know how you have those things," he said, petulantly.

"I was very much worried, sir," answered the man.

The atmosphere of the little chapel was still heavy from incense even as they entered it, although the hour was early, so, seeing the doors open, had dropped in, sat in a kind of nervous quiet in the seats next the chancel, their outlines dim in the cloudy shadows. Just where Mr. St. Hellens and Madeline stood a pool of purple light, which, streaming through the colored panes, had caught their stain, settled heavily. The still, white face of the marble Madonna looked from out the shadowy niche above the faces strangely pale, as white and still; upon that of the groom, with its pale, delicate features and compact form.

Owing to the fact that Madeline was not a Catholic, the ceremony was simple and brief. The charges and questions were spoken, answered, bowed, blessings given, and the wedding was over. There were no congratulations. Before turning from the altar, Mr. St. Hellens said, in a low, impressive way, to the officiating priest, who had sometimes visited him since his arrival in the village, taking his bride by the hand as he spoke:

"Mrs. Henri St. Hellens, father."

Madeline looked up with a childish start and a pale smile. The priest declined his head gravely.

After they walked down the aisle, Mr. St. Hellens again pressed his hand to his head.

"I am so faint," he whispered.

In the porch he took Simon's arm. His face was so ashy pale that the bride hardly repressed a cry at the sight of it in the daylight.

All day in the cane he lay upon blankets piled on a seat, sleeping heavily. Madeline, sitting near, watched him with perplexed alarm. Sometimes, in a strange, stony composure, she gazed upon him, and then her eyes would close—she seemed to elude them as they sped along—the yellow and crimson forests, the crisp blue ripples of the stream, the white flecks of the September sky, which came and went, came and went, hour by hour, all day long, before her.

She had so much to realize, and she realized nothing. A little after dark they reached their first stopping-place. Mr. St. Hellens roused for a moment. He was very, very tired, he said. Simon almost lifted him to the carriage, and from it to the hotel. Before their supper was served he was obliged to retire.

Long after, late into the night, Madeline sat by the window in a room adjoining her husband's, listening to Simon, as he moved about to the invalid's occasional calls, uttered in a feeble, fretful, petted vexation, and to the strange position, to forces her new career.

When she looked at Mr. St. Hellens in the morning he hardly roused to notice her. Lying upon the bed, oppressed and drowsy, with his fine, delicate features pallid, his hair dishevelled, his sharpened features, and emaciated frame, he seemed as if under a blighting spell. He grew old, inexpressibly old, in her surprise. He appeared to wither and shrivel through each instant of his strange sleep, till his bride, catching her breath from time to time, began to fear him—to feel that she was mated to the victim of an evil incantation or malady. It was no mental disease that possessed him, she thought, but some weird influence, which sapped his strength and veiled his wits. Once she had shuddered. She recalled she saw the thin, filmy web weaving about him, excluding him from all the world but herself. Then she saw it no more. She felt a morbid loathing creeping over her.

Day after day they traveled on, without change of Mr. St. Hellens's condition. Simon naturally assumed the direction of their movements, and Madeline yielded without comment.

But the long journey down the river was inexpressibly tranquilizing. It even appeared as a transition from one existence to another. Shifting through the scenery, so change, the tide was as a fate which admits of no return. The irreclaimable past lost itself entirely in the present. The hard trials of her young life faded from recollection. The shock that had followed her marriage softened. She sat with her head on the boat's railing, smiling out of the chill autumn air into a southerly summer, the shore still vivid with green and gay with flowers, the calm, warm sky, the sun, starring the amber air, the dull plash of the waters making a monotony of music. She was far from being unhappy, and she abandoned herself with ease to the present.

CHAPTER VI.—CYRIL.

MR. ST. HELLENS'S family residence was two or three miles from the city. A large, rambling house, surrounded by extensive grounds, with a low front, down the family pride.

For generations of St. Hellenses had come and gone in the house, and for that reason had been by one; lovers had loitered in the parks, fountains leaped in the sunshine, and stately dames and children had been known in those by-gone days when some hapless St. Hellens had chanced the homestead. Under the spell of this strange sickness, who was bringing his girl-wife to her house, was the last of the race on his side, and had adopted one of false blood; the daughter he had sought for had a blotted birth; the wife he had married was a step-mother; the heir of his wide inheritance was an abstraction; and he, blighted and helpless, a dependent upon once of his own servants.

On the day when the household had been notified, the travelers were expected, Mr. St. Hellens's adopted son was awaiting them at his wife. No intimation of the master's condition had been received, and so some little attempt had been made to render the grim, old house cheerful for the reception. A suite of apartments, constituting a wing, were in good order. Mr. St. Hellens had furnished them after his father's death, and had occupied them exclusively for a good many years. They communicated by a dark, narrow passage with the house, where the best set of rooms was faded and tarnished in the disused grandeur of state.

In these there had been little change since the days when the windows and building huge fires to dissipate the gathered dampness, in being supposed that Mr. St. Hellens's health required the change. They, indeed, constituted a house in miniature, with library and bath and boudoir. On the afternoon lights had been ordered in the new wing, where the fire burned cheerfully, a delicious tone; vases of roses garnished the stands and shelves, and saturated the air with their perfume, the warmth of the fire increased it from their hearts.

Here Cyril St. Hellens waited for his father and his father's wife.

There are lives which seem to attract and appropriate the treasures of other lives, and which seem constructed for the fruition of hopes and dreams and longings cast into their unconsciousness, as the gold and silver ornaments were cast by the Egyptians into the molten metal which was to form the Panama cathedral bell.

Cyril St. Hellens's was such a life. He was decorated with decorations.

He stood before the hearth as the afternoon waned, gazing fixedly, fully into the heart of the fire. He was superbly handsome. Tall, muscular, heroic in his mold, with clear, brilliant eyes, a skin tinted with all the self-assured gorgeous of twenty-five in his mien. He was vain—too vain to show his vanity. Standing there, he looked like a "picture to be proud of my reach;" and, if you looked a little deeper; "Nor anything worth the effort of reaching."

One of the servants came to the door.

"The carriage is coming, Massa Cyril."

He glanced through the little dark passage into the mahogany, and found the great doors ready opened, a crowd of domestics waiting with their welcome, while the carriage was being driven the avenue; and he saw that Uncle slowly up the flight and black on the box. Daniels's face looked heavy and black on the box.

He hastened down the steps as it stopped; Simon was slowly unfastening the door, Mr. St. Hellens lay, in his unnoticed lethargy, propped with pillows in one corner, and Madeline, suddenly stricken with a cruel sense of embarrassment and intrusion, shrank back beside him.

Cousin Henri has one of his attacks," Simon explained, and Cyril seemed to understand; "and Mrs. St. Hellens is considerably fatigued, so Simon explained.

"Mrs. St. Hellens, you are very welcome to Desire," said Cyril, with a low bow, as Simon prepared to lead the invalid into the house. "You will take him, I suppose, to his own apartments, Simon?"

"Yes, Massa. How do you do, mamma?"

The mulatto received the salutations of the servants as his master's proper due, and passed together to a different grade, to possess a different position. Cyril St. Hellens deferred to and the others came obsequiously.

"Your rooms, dear chambers prepared, Aunt Chloe?" he asked, moving along through the hall, and ascending his unoccupied staircase. "Mrs. St. Hellens will need the oak-room for the present."

Cyril offered the new mistress of Villa Desir his hand to assist her from the carriage, with polite indifference. He had, in fact, bestowed very little consideration upon the subject of his father's marriage. His own fortune, his own ict in life, were his chief concern. The existence of a Henri St. Hellens was a matter of annoyance unconcern to him. He confessed, however, to a start of surprise at the extreme youth of the bride, to a sense of slight, indifferent embarrassment in her new position; to an evident indefinite scorn for her probable motives in the marriage, to a sort of cursing presentation to the servants, he escorted her to the house, and into the state drawing-room, where he left her with a peculiar glance like the fire, and evasion himself upon the plea of going to his father.

Madeline had not spoken; she dared not speak. She looked around the dilapidated room, moldy, and damp and grim as it was, at the servants waiting for the word of command, and wondered what right she had there at all. She shivered with excitement; she would gladly have gone to her mother's room, but she had not the courage. And if she should go—he could not help her. Her one friend in the world was powerless to help her—to defend her title, to account for her presence. Her servants, lingering and fearing to intrude upon her, seemed like Cyril's style a mockery. The great round tears rolled down her cheeks, and not attempting to take off her bonnet or gloves, she sat without moving where she had been placed.

By-and-by Cyril came back. He did not find that it was in his place to be kind to Mrs. St. Hellens, so he sat down with gravity on the opposite side of the fire till supper was announced.

"I regret that you should find the rooms so cheerless," he said then; "we had supposed, not knowing Mr. St. Hellens's plans, that a long would give you enough room until the remainder of the house should be refurnished."

"Is Mr. St. Hellens worse?" Mrs. St. Hellens to the ving?"

There was something so plaintive and childish in her voice, that the young man looked at her with surprise. "Because I would like to go and see him."

To find herself at her journey's end so singularly left out of her husband's protection; to find his helpless state unchanged, and all preparings so far in his continuance, herself unprovided for from him; her position so questionable; her self-dependence unrelieved by the presence of a single person; Madeline could not but look to the young man before her for advice or support, as a severe strain upon the self-control of a girl of seventeen, who had been, practically, the future full of stumblingblocks. What she had said to her mother on her wedding morning, in reference to this significance, she hoped she should do right."

In her dreary room, whose oaken panels seemed made to prey upon and admit the ghosts of buried St. Hellenses to her company, she reflected that night upon her reception.

She thought that Mr. St. Hellens's son might have been a trifle more cordial and kind. Then, with even her limited knowledge of the world, she reasoned that he might not like his father's marriage, and thus accounted for his coldness.

She thought of the quiet of servants who had helped and waited on her simplicity, and smiled at having allowed their scrutiny to embarrass her. With the preparation which she had received, she also called facts, and their review helped her. Pride, too, helped her. She justified and believed in her husband, and she became composed.

There are some natures in which antagonism breeds submission, but those in which it is given birth to defiance are the safer, on the whole.

A NOVEL WAGER.—An amusing story is going the rounds of the Paris clubs. It appears that a short time ago a wager as heavy bet that he would be arrested by the police without committing any offense or doing any act to warrant their suspicions. The bet having been taken by a member of the Imperial Club, he at once proceeded to the office of police in Paris, dressed in a battered hat, a ragged blouse, and boots all in holes, and, addressing the chief, asked to speak with him confidentially. He, however, paid no attention to the gentleman's request, but ordered a sergeant de ville to be served, sending, at the same time, a telegram to the commissary of police, where he stated who he was, and requesting the latter to send a sergeant to the gentleman with whom he was about to prove his identity. A similar story was made the last, by some time ago, of a Rue aux Fèves boil at Vienna. Mr. Mackenzie's son-in-law, who, in order to make his arrest quite sure, took the bank notes out of his boots.

"I am all heart," said a military officer to his comrade.

"Then you're not part pluck," said the latter, coldly.

THE ARTILLERY-MAN

And the Elephant.

THE remarkable intelligence of the domesticated elephant has been exemplified so frequently as to become proverbial. If he possessed the power of speech, he would be almost more than human; as it is, he often puts to shame the higher pretension of his lordly masters.

Our illustration represents a corroborative fact. A battering train, going to a siege of a town in India, had to cross the sandy bed of a river, that resembled other rivers of the East, which have, during the summer season, but a small stream of water running through them, though their beds are mostly of considerable breadth, very heavy for draught, and abounding in quicksands. An artillery-man who was seated on the tumbril of one of the guns, by some accident fell off in such a situation, that in a minute or two the hind wheel must have gone over him.

The elephant, which was stationed behind the gun, perceiving the danger, instantly, without any warning from its keepers, lifted up the wheel with its trunk, and kept it suspended till the carriage had passed clear of him.

THE GRAVE OF COL. ELLSWORTH.

COL. ELLSWORTH was one of those brave young men who gave themselves promptly and heartily to their country when it called for help. Just at the beginning of the war he was shot at Alexandria, while attempting to replace the national colors over a hotel in that place.

His remains were buried at Mechanicsville, on the banks of the Hudson, a few miles from Troy. Our picture gives a representation of his resting-place. It is situated on a gentle rise of ground, apart from all other graves, in the south-eastern part of the rural cemetery, in the outskirts of the pretty village of his youth, Mechanicsville, about twelve miles north from Troy, N. Y., and on the western bank of the Hudson.

At his head, the only mark of respect his countrymen have thus far seen fit to erect, is a flagstaff, upon which, for about a year after his death, was accustomed to be raised and lowered, at sunrise and sunset, that flag he loved so dearly. But now the plain board fence and staff alone are the solitary tokens of remembrance of one who was mourned in every patriotic Northern family as an only son. It is a solemn reproach to his country that one who so devoted his whole interest and life to its service should now be so neglected and apparently forgotten.

CROSSING A RIVER.

YANKEE ingenuity, highly as it is commended, would hardly devise more convenient appliances than the natives of Asia adopt for their comfort and convenience. The picture of crossing a river represents a very common spectacle in that country—the huge and powerful elephant being tamed and made the gentle servant, willing to do his master's bidding, even if he convert himself into a ferry-boat. The elephant is a good swimmer, and one might have a much more objectionable conveyance. The novelty of the thing might warrant its introduction here; as a paying enterprise it would doubtless prove successful, however it might comport with our notions of enlightened progress.

A MEXICAN HAT MERCHANT.

IT does not require a very large capital to carry on business in Mexico. There a man can carry his whole stock in trade on his head, and instead of waiting quietly and anxiously for customers to come and make purchases, he adopts the commonest method of taking his goods to the customer. Our illustration represents an every-day specimen of a Mexican trader, who is not ashamed to wear his own hats, and thus recommend their excellence.

CURIOUS FACTS ABOUT RATS.

THERE are many interesting and sometimes very funny instances of cats suckling and bringing up the offspring of animals altogether different from their own species. A gentleman told us some time ago, when paying a visit to a friend of his, he noticed a cat and two kittens, which were having a good time in his room.

"Keep quiet for a moment," said his friend, "and you shall be witness to a very curious spectacle presently."

The two friends quietly took a seat and did not stir. After a few minutes a low noise, not unlike the rustling of a creeping animal, was heard from behind the stove, and presently a saucy rat made its appearance; at first it looked round about the room with great caution, and then without much hesitation made its way toward the old cat, which was quietly reposing on a cushion, the kittens resting by her side. Nay, even more, the rat forthwith began to suckle the old cat as if it were a member of the family. The cat did not even stir, as if so extraordinary a proceeding were a matter of course, though the kittens seemed to be somewhat startled by the boldness of the rat.

The owner of the cat, who had always been fond of a practical joke, had succeeded in smuggling the rat into the cat-family on the day the kittens were born; the experiment turned out to be a perfect success. One of our artists has thought the touching scene described to be an object worthy of his pencil.

In a similar manner puppies, rabbits, young hares, squirrels, and the like, are known to have been suckled and brought up by cats; it is a spectacle particularly amusing to see the old cat promenading in company with her step-children, and participating in their droll and youthful sports. It is also a scene, funny beyond description, to observe how the half-grown squirrel is hurrying up a tree and petulantly jumping from branch to branch, whilst the wiser mother is startled out of her wits by the boldness of her little offspring, and visibly at a loss to guess who taught the saucy creature how to climb up trees.

The cat has been supposed, without any good reason, to be nothing but cruelty embodied and wanton thirst of blood endowed with four legs; this is unjust. Nature has gifted that much-abused animal with the tender heart and kind feelings of a mother; in this respect it is second to none of the rest of animals, four-legged as well as two-legged.

BESIEGED BY A BORELE.

HUNTING in South Africa is no holiday pastime, affording a temporary diversion, but is attended with a degree of excitement and danger, demanding, on the part of the sportsman, the highest quality of cool courage and determined bravery. The following adventure with a borelé, or rhinoceros, points out the nature of the perils to which the hunter is often exposed:

On one occasion a horse belonging to a party of sportsmen escaped, and, in pursuing it, one of the party, named Arend, encountered a borelé.

Pulling up his horse, or rather trying to do so, for the animal was restive in the presence of such danger, he fired.

The shot produced a result that was neither expected nor desired.

With a roar like the bellowing of an angry bull, the monster turned and charged straight toward the horseman.

Arend was obliged to seek safety in flight, while the borelé pursued in a manner that told of its being wounded, but not incapacitated from seeking revenge.

A MEXICAN HAT SELLER.

At the commencement of the chase there was but a very short distance between pursuer and pursued; and, in place of turning entirely out of the track and allowing the monster to pass by him—which he should have done, knowing the defect of vision natural to the rhinoceros—the young hunter carried on in a stright line, all the while employed in reloading his rifle.

His mistake did not arise from any want of knowledge or presence of mind, but rather from carelessness and an unworthy estimation of the abilities of the borelé to overtake him.

He had long been a successful hunter, and success too often begets that self-confidence which leads to many a mischance that the more cautious sportsman will avoid.

Suddenly found his flight arrested by the thick scrub of thorny bushes, known in South Africa as the "wait-a-bits," and the horse he was riding did wait a bit, and so long that the borelé was soon close upon his heels.

There was now neither time nor room to turn either to the right or to the left.

The rifle was at length loaded. There would have been but little chance of killing the rhinoceros by a single shot, especially with such uncertain aim as would have been taken from the back of a frightened horse.

Arend, therefore, threw himself from the saddle. He had a two-fold purpose in doing so.

His aim would be more correct; there was a chance of the borelé keeping on after the horse, and leaving him an undisturbed spectator of the field.

The field of view embraced by the eyes of a rhinoceros is not large, but, unfortunately for the hunter, as the frightened horse fled from his side, it was he himself that came within the limited circle of the borelé's vision.

Hastily raising the rifle to his shoulder, he fired at the advancing enemy, and then fled to ward a clump of trees that chanced to be near by

He could hear the heavy tread of the rhinoceros as it followed close upon his heels. It seemed to shake the earth.

Closer and closer he heard it, so near that he dared not look around.

He fancied he could feel the breath of the monster blowing upon his back!

His only chance was to make a sudden deviation from his course, and leave the borelé to pass on in its impetuous charge.

This he did, turning sharply to the right, when he saw that he had just escaped being elevated upon the creature's horn.

This manœuvre enabled him to gain some distance as he started off in the new direction; but it was not long maintained, for the borelé was again in hot pursuit, without any show of fatigue, while the tremendous exertions he had himself been making rendered him incapable of continuing his flight much longer.

He had just sufficient strength left to avoid an immediate encounter by taking one more turn; when fortunately he saw before him the trunk of a large baobab tree lying prostrate along the ground. It had been blown down by some awful storm, and by resting upon its roots at one end, and its shivered branches at the other, so as to leave a space of about two feet between its trunk and the ground.

Suddenly throwing himself down, Arend glided under the tree, just in time to escape the long horn whose point had again come in close proximity with his back.

The hunter had now time to recover his breath, and, to some extent, his confidence. He saw that the fallen tree would protect him. Even should the rhinoceros come round to the other side, he would only have to roll back again to place himself beyond the reach of his terrible horn.

The space below was ample enough to enable him to pass through, but too small for the body of the borelé.

By creeping back and forward he could always place himself in safety.

And this was just what he had to do, for the enraged monster, on seeing him on the other side, immediately ran round the roots and renewed the attack.

A CAT NURSING A BAT.

This course of action was several times repeated before the young hunter was allowed much time for reflection. He was in hopes that the brute would get tired of the useless charges it was making, and either go away itself or give him the opportunity.

In this hope he was doomed to disappointment. The animal, exasperated with the wounds it had received, appeared implacable, and for more than an hour it kept running around the tree, in vain attempts to get at him.

As he had very little trouble in avoiding these, there was plenty of opportunity for reflection, and he passed the time in devising some plan to settle the misunderstanding between the borelé and himself.

The first he thought of was to make use of his rifle. The weapon was within his reach, where he had dropped it when diving under the tree, but, when about to reload it, he discovered that the ramrod was missing!

So sudden had been the charge of the borelé, at the time the rifle was last loaded, that the ramrod had not been returned to its proper place, but left behind upon the plain. This was an unlucky circumstance, and for a time the young hunter could not think of anything better than to keep turning from side to side to avoid the presence of the besieger.

The borelé at last seemed to show signs of exhaustion, or, at all events, began to perceive the unprofitable nature of the tactics it had been pursuing.

But the spirit of revenge was not in the least weakened within it, for it made no move toward taking its departure from the spot.

On the contrary, it lay down by the baobab, in a position to command a view on both sides of the huge trunk, evidently determined to stay there and await the chance of getting within reach of its victim.

Thus silently beleaguered, the young hunter set about considering in what manner he might accomplish the raising of the siege.

The sun went down, the moon ascended above the tops of the surrounding trees, yet the borelé seemed no less inspired by the spirit of revenge than on first receiving the injuries it was wishing to resent.

For many hours the young hunter waited patiently for it to move away in search of food or any other object except that of revenge, but in this hope he was disappointed. The pain inflicted by the shots would not allow either hunger or thirst to interfere with the desire for retaliation, and it continued to maintain a watch so vigilant that Arend dared not leave his retreat for an instant.

Whenever he made a movement, the enemy did the same.

It was a long time before he could think of any plan that would give him a chance of getting away. The at length occurred to him.

Although unable to reload the rifle with a bullet, the thought came into his mind that the borelé might be blinded by a heavy charge of powder, or so confused by it as to give him an opportunity of stealing away.

This seemed an excellent plan, yet so simple, that Arend was somewhat surprised that he had not thought of it before.

Without difficulty he succeeded in pouring a double quantity of powder into the barrel; and, in order to keep it there until he had an opportunity for a close shot, some dry grass was forced into the muzzle.

The chance soon offered, and taking a deliberate aim at one of the borelé's eyes with the muzzle of the gun not more than two feet from its head, he pulled the trigger.

With a loud moss of mingled rage and agony, the rhinoceros rushed toward him, and frantically but vainly exerted all its strength in an endeavor to overturn the baobab.

"One more shot at the other eye," thought Arend "and I shall be free."

He immediately proceeded to pour another dose of powder into the rifle, but, while thus engaged, a new danger suddenly presented itself.

The dry grass protected from the gun had ignited and set fire to the dead leaves that were strewed plentifully over the ground.

In an instant these were ablaze, the flame spreading rapidly on all sides and moving toward him.

The trunk of the baobab could no longer afford protection. In another minute it would be enveloped in the red fire, and to stay by its side would be to perish in the flames. There was no alternative but to get to his feet and run for his life.

Not a moment was to be lost, and, slipping from under the tree, he started off at the top of his speed.

The chances were in his favor for escaping unobserved by the rhinoceros; but fortune seemed decidedly against him.

Before getting twenty paces from the tree, he saw that he was pursued. Guided either by one eye or its keen sense of hearing, the monster was following him at a pace so rapid that, if long enough continued, it must certainly overtake him.

Once more the young hunter began to feel something like despair. Death seemed hard upon his heels. A few seconds more and he might be impaled on that terrible horn. But for that instinctive love of life which all feel, he might have surrendered himself to fate, and, urged by this, he kept on.

He was upon the eve of falling to the earth through sheer exhaustion, when his ears were saluted by the deep-toned bay of a hound, and,

BESIEGED BY A BORELÉ.

close after it a voice exclaiming, "Look out, baas Willem, somebody comes yonder!"

Two seconds more and Arend was safe from further pursuit. The hound was dancing round the borelé's head, by his loud, angry yelps diverting its attention from everything but himself.

Two seconds more and Groot Willem and Hendrick came riding up, and less than half a minute after the monster, having received a shot from the heavy roer, slowly settled down in his tracks—a dead rhinoceros.

THE TUG OF WAR;

Or, an Encounter between a Tiger and an Alligator.

The tiger in India makes sad havoc among the herds of cattle, often carrying off the choicest and best to satisfy his rapacity and hunger. The owners, however, frequently revenge themselves on the marauder, by gathering certain poisonous berries, pounding them to powder, and rubbing them on the carcase of a bullock that the tiger has killed, but not entirely eaten. As he returns at dark and renews his feast, he soon finds his blood in a fever, and his mouth parched with intense thirst; and, hastening to the nearest stream, laps the water greedily, and in a few minutes is stretched on the bank, dead, so subtle and speedy is the effect of the poison.

An English captain was once in ambush, by the side of a river, when he saw a poisoned tiger come down to drink and die; but it singularly happened there were awaiting his approach two other potent agents of death—the captain's rifle and the jaws of a monstrous alligator. Rushing toward the river, the tiger plunged in and commenced lapping the water with greedy avidity, as if to allay the burning fire raging within from the effects of the poison. He then came out and commenced rolling on the ground and biting savagely at the bushes. A second time he took to the water, and made as though he meant to swim across, and the captain, to end the agony of the poor brute, was about to pull the trigger, when an alligator rose suddenly and snapped at the tiger with his terrible jaws. Instantly the brute forgot his sufferings, and fell on the alligator teeth and nail. Teeth and nails, however, made little impression on the mail coat of the amphibious monster, who did his best to haul the tiger down to his slimy bed, and, to prevent it, the latter fought and beat the water with his broad fore-arms till hills of foam partially hid the combatants from the sportsman's view.

THE TUG OF WAR.

Now they sank, now they rose again, the hooked teeth of the alligator never losing their grip, and the white foam taking a deeper tinge each moment. The struggles of the forest prowler grew fainter and fainter; and, drowned, poisoned, and mauled by the terrible teeth, he was about to succumb. But the alligator was not destined to have his own way. Just as he stretched his ugly body out of the water, the better to take a pull long and strong, a bullet from the captain's rifle smote his exposed side and turned him belly upward, dead as a herring. A ball from the second barrel mercifully ended the tiger's existence.

More Sinned Against than Sinning.

"Yes. He's fine-looking enough, and talented enough, but such a flirt! I wish some one would surprise and carry off that guarded heart of his, and then laugh at his discomfiture. It would pay him off nicely for his trifling."

"Suppose you try the experiment, Annie. You are practiced enough in the art of captivation, if report is right! I wonder at your censure of flirts."

"What reports? You cannot think me a flirt?"

"Oh! I only referred in jest to something I heard to the effect that you had jilted Frank Marvyn, and that it was too bad for you to flirt so."

"Oh, dear! I suppose because Frank Marvyn chose to force his presence upon me till I got tired of the sight of him, and encouraged Phil Dalande in sheer self-defense, it is something dreadful!"

"But could you not have given him to understand that his case was hopeless at the first?"

"To be sure; I might have turned to the gentleman and said, 'My dear Mr. Marvyn, I have a very kind disposition, and as I am a very charming person, and you may fall deeply in love with me, I wish to warn you to avoid my fascinating society, for I consider myself too much your superior to return your regard, if you do!'"

"It is not necessary to say anything, Annie," laughed her cousin. "Your manner should have repelled him."

"As if he could understand manner! Ugh! His oh-do-have-pity-upon-me-face is before me now."

"And this Phil Dalande—I suppose he is in a state of suspense by this time?"

"Oh, no; we understand each other perfectly.

He has too much sense to care for such a butterfly as I am. I suppose my intimacy with him strengthens the idea that I am a coquette, but what of that? When people are talking about me, they are not indulging their amiability over any one else."

"And how about George Sylvester?" pursued the other.

"How you do tease me, cos! One might as well be shut up in a cloister till marriageable age, and then brought out into market-place to the highest bidder, as to live in this enlightened age and feel obliged to accept the first one who offers. If we have not the privilege of choosing, we certainly ought to have the privilege of knowing those we accept. I was too much blame there, for I really wanted to like the man, but he showed such a jealous, exacting nature, that I was convinced he could never make me happy. His intellect and person are superior, and I have no doubt he would make nicely with some gentle, yielding creature; but I could not endure to see him look and act as if every word and glance belonged to him—even before he had asked the right to monopolize me. I'm sure I'm no coquette."

"Perhaps Thorne can find as many excuses for his conduct."

"Oh, no; he has the right to choose, you know; and after he has paid attention to one for awhile, off he goes after another, and I'm sure it is not because I refuse him."

"Take care, Annie! There is a lurking admiration in those words, spite of your condemnation. I am afraid if you act on my suggestion, that you will lose your heart instead of gaining his."

"Never fear, cos. Indeed, now I think I shall, if only to show you I am not so easily conquered." And with this resolution away went Annie.

Let us now take a peep at the subject of this discussion. He stood in a comfortable arm-chair, with his dressing-gown falling over a graceful form, and his hair thrown carelessly back from a white, expansive forehead, he seemed really such a very bad specimen of manhood. He has one habit, though, which, to say the least, is rather careless, that of thinking aloud. Listen:

"What a simpleton I was, though, to offer my precious self to her! I might have known that Cupid and vanity had not blinded me, what her answer would have been. I suppose by this time I have got her name on the back of a fan; but what is one to do? I'll not marry those I don't like; and if these I do like won't marry me, I'm not to blame. I must own that I like Annie, and that Emily Arne's affections! They give her credit for more heart and me less taste than she or I possess. If they only love soon, they'll make a fool of myself by proposing, how she laughed at my 'boyish fancy,' as she called it, 'in thinking myself in love with a woman quite twice as old as' him myself—time' in which to form four more as serious attachments as this'—and hear her assurance—when I, deeply indignant at her intimation of fickleness—that I did really care as much for her as I thought, I would have proposed, and would compares his wife with any of the women he ought to have married?' And then, when I assured her that time could not alter her affections, to hear her still incredulous tones as she said, 'She had not suspected this; and to end an interview that was becoming painful, she would state that she was already engaged.' And then to crown all, to see the ridiculous haste with which I left; I think they would transfer their pity, if they could. I'll not tell them! It's better to be known as a lady-killer than as a rejected one. I don't like to do so, but that others do is evident, though they do moralize to the contrary. Hugh-ho! I must do something to keep off the blues. I have it! I'll go ask that little witch, Annie Clarke, to have a drive with me! And it wouldn't be a bad idea to have a little flirtation there. It will divert my mind from Emily, and there'll be no love lost, for Annie is a coquette, if ever there was one."

On that afternoon "cos" entered Annie's room, crying:

"Annie, there is an opportunity for you; read this," handing her a note.

"Sure enough!" cried Annie, dancing round the room, with mischief sparkling in her eyes. "I wonder what he brought this about? I believe the fates are working it!"

No doubt of it, Annie," was the reply, as she assisted in adjusting the appearance of the pouting Annie as attractive as possible, and soon the gay pair were on their way for a ride.

Their road lay through a delightfully-shaded retreat, and as they talked of its quiet beauties their thoughts unconsciously took a deeper tone, and once the young man sighed, upon which he looked up quickly to see if his mischief-loving companion had overheard, and was ready to rally him upon it.

As he looked, they were passing a more open space, and the twilight just then cast some shadowing through the trees, and danced fitfully among Annie's golden-brown curls; and his questioning glance turned into one of admiration. She raised her eyes, and as she saw his expression, blushed, while she said:

"That was, of course, a pitying sigh for the weakness of those who indulge in sentiment, judging from your words a few minutes since."

"Please make allowance for many things I say, Annie."

"Of course, I shall," was the meaning rejoinder. "Everybody knows that Hal Thorne says and does unaccountable things."

He understood her.

"Do they? I am aware of it, and that 'everybody' is prejudiced."

"But they agree that they are done in a graceful manner."

"Now, Annie, I suppose you think my vanity is quite healed by that timely flattery?"

"To be sure! Like a skilful physician, I understood your case, and applied a medicine, which I hope you have taken, like a dutiful boy."

"Certainly. And in return I shall insist on your not protesting against 'open flattery,' as you set us the example."

"Oh, I'll agree not to protest against it; but bear in mind that that is not receiving it; and if not received, what good will it do to offer it?"

"I shall have the satisfaction of wishing to do a benevolent act, of course."

"Deeply thankful I am averse to flattery, after all, or you would not intimate that it was agreeable to me—don't go, now. Ah, I can read a disappearing, 'Annie,' for beautiful eyes with a roguish glance to his face.

"Never trust the eye, Annie. It can be schooled to flatter as well as words can."

"Can it? How can you to learn this, pray?"

"By practice, of course. Admire my frankness in admitting it."

"Oh, yes. I am ready to admire good qualities in any one."

"Thank you. We ought to be very good friends —having so many sentiments in common, if we have not the same opinions."

"Or the sensible. But here we are at home."

They parted, with the mutual wish expressed to meet again.

"I wonder," thought he, as he drove away, "why Annie blushed so? Was the spirit of coquetry working under that modest and retiring exterior? That blush and that glance into my eyes would lead one to think so. What glorious eyes she has! I wish I had those instead of the brave him.

"Well," thought Annie, "a favorable beginning, really! I wonder if he has decided upon a conquest or poor me in addition to the rest, that he discovered so evident a desire to cultivate my acquaintance. He has commenced sighing rather early, though, I think. However, he will be ready, or I'm not Annie Clark. A splendid flirtation."

He was mated, as will be seen.

But Annie and Hal had a splendid flirtation;" and for once people did not object. The gentlemen said:

"They were a well-matched pair"—wondered which would win in the "Game of Hearts" they were evidently playing with such zest, and all were thing that Annie Clark was appropriated by Thorne, as there was less danger of their being bewitched by her bright beauty. And so they each decided that Miss Annie was welcome to him. "They did not care to listen to his tender speeches, for his looks were so full of love that Girls' would not find pleasantly to either party," all of which comments, though they do remind us slightly of Hal's own thoughts, must be set down to poor human nature.

But Annie did not know how hard it was to refuse the unconscious homage of thought and feeling, and still be heart-free. All unconsciously to herself she would sigh in his presence, and if she caught herself sighing he was wise to appeared—sincere and noble—she would condemn herself for "silly sentimentality," as she called it.

"Rather mortifying, though," she would say, "to think how poorly I succeed. Here have I, who have been considered a coquette, failing to win all other admirers for this most worthy object, and am no nearer accomplishing it than at first, for aught I know, or can see. I wonder what I succeeded or not? Of course look and manner are under perfect control; and how should I know that he was not thinking words and not looks meant for effect? I have a good will to give up the idea after all, and be myself. Hal Thorne, Mrs. Grundy, and all, they say would decide wisely as usual that I was not to blame for his non-attendance. I wish I had thought of that before!"

She was saved the necessity of dropping him by his appearance on an evening shortly after.

"I have come to bid you 'Good by,'" he said; "I start in the early train to-morrow for New York. I have offered to take the management of a friend's affairs, and shall be gone some months, for I could not go without seeing you once more."

A sudden flush dyed her face as he spoke, leaving it very pale: but he did not see it, as her face was from the light. Her voice was quite calm, though low, as she replied:

"But is not this a sudden resolution? I shall miss you very much. But," assuming a light tone, "as it can't be helped, there's no use in being sad about it, is there? We shall see each other again, sometime; meanwhile, you will find some one more worthy, and I rose high hopes that I should be my attendant beau till you come back, and then we can renew our little flirtation, can't we? Indeed, it is not a very bad thing to have a real bond of change," she said, looking up with a bewitching smile.

His lips were compressed for a moment, and a pale, stern expression rested there; and then, in a light, gay tone, he said:

"To be sure—that is, if your changing fancy shall not have selected some one else ere that time."

"Do you think it possible for me to prefer another? You are modest."

"I am!" It was about what I possessed that desirable virtue. But I must away. Good-by, Annie."

"Good-by."

He held her hand a moment, looked searchingly in her face, and was gone. She did not observe the look, for all her powers were concentrated on control—in trying to seem what she was not; for the sharp pang of pain that nearly stopped the beating of her heart, at his first words—forced an unhappy truth upon her consciousness; and, as the door closed upon him, she abandoned herself to bitter thought.

"It was well for my pride," said Thorne to himself, as he walked away, "that her manner warned me not to commit myself. It has ended just as I feared. I did hope to prove that there was a little womanly feeling under that light exterior; but they are all equally heartless, and I—I am astonished at my own changeableness! That I did love the other sincerely, my feelings assured me; yet now Annie has entire possession of my senses! Oh, Annie, why have you no heart?"

The coldness of the air aroused him to the fact that he was giveless; and remembering that he had left them at Mrs. Clark's, he retraced his steps.

"I shall see her once more," he murmured; "but can I trust myself? I must. I cannot deny me that."

He re-entered the house with the freedom of old acquaintanceship, and, as he entered the parlor, heard a low, passionate voice, saying:

"And it has come to this! But he does not know it! I am sure he could suspect nothing! Annie, I love you, spite of all! What shall I do? what shall I do?"

And he saw Annie, with her head bent upon her hands, leaning forward down through her fingers.

"Come to me, darling, and let me comfort you," replied a tender voice, and Hal Thorne, bending over her, drew her bowed form within his arms.

She burst from him, and stood up with flashing eye.

"How dare you," she cried, "come here and steal away my secret from me? You learn my weakness, and dare to pity me!"

"Hear me, Annie," he said, gently detaining her, and drawing her again to him. "I have loved you long; but your manner taught me to guard my feelings. I came here this evening, received a note all cut, and in your nature. I had not much hope, and your manner chilled me. I went away, resolved never to see you again—and I am thankful for the accident which called me back. I had a wrong impression of you, as you doubtless had of me; but if you will trust your happiness in my keeping, I will strive to undo that impression. Will you, Annie? and am I forgiven?"

"You."

DON'T JUDGE FROM APPEARANCES.

"HALLOA, Limpy, the cars will start in a minute; hurry up, or we shall leave you behind."

The speaker was standing on a station at one of our Western railroads. The baggage-master was busy with checks. The men were hurrying to and fro with chests and heavy carpet-bags and trunks. Boys, women and children were rushing for the cars, and hastily securing seats, while the locomotive emitted its shrill whistle.

A man carelessly dressed was standing on the platform, as the call for "All aboard" was heard around him, and seemingly paid little attention to what was passing. He was easy to see that he was lame. At a hasty glance he might have been supposed that he was a cripple or neither wealth nor influence. The conductor gave him a contemptuous look, and swearing him familiarly on the shoulder, called out:

"Halloa, Limpy, better get aboard, or the cars will leave you behind."

"Time enough, I reckon," replied the individual, and he took out a large silver watch, and looked.

The last trunk was tumbled into the baggage-car, the last carpet-bag was thrown in. "Get on, Limpy," said he, as he passed the lame, carelessly-dressed man. The lame man made no reply.

The bell on the train was slowly moving away the lame man stepped on to the platform of the last car, and with much quickness and ease. The train had run only a few miles when the conductor appeared at the door of the car where our friend was sitting. Pausing along, he came to where the stranger whom he had seen at the station.

"Hand out your money here."

"I don't pay," replied the lame man, very quietly.

"Don't pay?"

"No, sir."

"Well see about that: I shall put you off at the next station, and you shall be seized like white man on the rack over the head of car-friend.

"You will not be so rough, young man," returned the stranger.

The conductor examined the carpet-bag for a moment, and finding that he could do no more than, passed on to collect the fare from the other passengers. As he stopped at a seat where two young men were sitting, he heard the conversation just mentioned locked up at the conductor, and one remarked:

"Do you know whom you were speaking to just now?"

"No, sir."

"That was Peter Warburton, the President of the road."

"Are you sure of that?" replied the conductor, trying to conceal his agitation.

"I know him well."

The color rose a little in the young man's face, but he said nothing, and passed on through the train, and collecting his fare as usual.

The conductor's face expression set quietly in his seat; none of those near him could unravel the expression of his face, but he was very quiet for the next succession of the scene. And he—of what thoughts he? He had been rudely treated by a man who unkindly sneered at his infirmity perhaps which had come through no fault of his. He could overlook that, but the fact that he—he—he'd the directors the simple truth, and the young man was put off the train in a place at once. Should he do it? Should he not?

Could he put why should he error? He knew what he was about. He knew that he was only doing his duty, and the questions he now held. When a little man, with a large head and a very powerful countenance, with many a rebuff. He had outlived those days of hardship and trouble, and had come to be one of the strongest roughnesses or hurts? Those who sat near him noticed a change in his face.

Presently the conductor came back. With a steady energy he walked up to Mr. Warburton's seat, and took his books from his pocket, the bank-bills, the tickets and the cash, and then he said, and laid them in Mr. Warburton's hand.

"Here, sir, place, sir," he said.

The President looked over the accounts for a moment, and nothing was said. Then he arose, and said:

"Sit down, sir; I would like to talk with you."

Then the conductor sat down, the President turned to him a face in which was no angry feeling, and spoke to him in an undertone:

"My young friend, I have no revengeful feelings to gratify in this matter; but you have been very impudent. Your manner, had it been thus to a stranger, would have been injurious to the interests of the company. I might tell them of this; but I will not. By doing so I should injure you out of your situation, and you might find it difficult to get another. But in future remember that no person is to be insulted in the cars, no matter what his appearance may be. Every person should be treated with civility. Take up your books, sir, and I shall not go out of what has passed. If you change your course, nothing that has happened shall injure you. Your situation is continued. Good morning, sir."

The train of cars swept on, as many a train has done before; but within it a human heart beat gratefully, and the purport of the lesson ran somewhat thus: Don't judge from appearances.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A FEMALE school-teacher, in her advertisement, stated that she was "complete mistress of her own house." If that is the case, she needn't consider old bachelor, "she can't ask too much for her services."

"HAVE you any lumbrikum for insects?" inquired a very modest young lady at a shopkeeper.

"Any what?"

"Any lumbrum bonnets."

"Any—you don't mean leghorn?"

The young lady was relieved by the proper nomenclature.

THE DIFFERENCE.

If fellows break into a house,
And steal the valuables they find,
And get off safely with the swag,
They're called "burglarious cracksmen."
If bankers do the self-same thing,
Which is larger scale,
And they get safely all the swag,
The said the bankers fail.

O'CONNELL, in addressing a jury, having exhausted every ordinary epithet of abuse, stopped for a word, and then added, "this scoundrelous ruffian." When afterward asked by his friends the meaning of this word, he answered he did not know, but said "he thought it sounded well."

"BUT, as I said before, we have proved to the satisfaction that cows have no tails. Is not that fallacy, there it is, and there will it remain forever; and all the logic in the world, my learned friend, can never efface it—can never wash it out. No, gentlemen; he may plant himself on the extreme verge of the planet Saturn, and plant the other on Arcturus, and seize the Pleiades by the tail with the other wing; but he cannot wash out that town line—never, never!"

INDIANS SPEARING STURGEON IN OREGON.

THE spearman stands in the bow of his boat, armed with a most formidable spear. The handle, from seventy to eighty feet long, is made of white pine wood; fitted on the spear-butt is a barbed point, in shape very much like a shuttlecock, supporting each feather represented by a piece of bone, thickly barbed, and very sharp at the end. This is so contrived that it will be easily detached from the long handle by a sharp, downward jerk. To this barbed contrivance a long line is made fast, which is carefully coiled away, close to the spearman, like the harpoon in a whale-boat.

The four canoes, alike equipped, are paddled into the centre of the stream, and side by side drift slowly down with the current, each spearman carefully looking down the bottom with his spear, constant practice having taught the crafty savages to know a sturgeon's back when the spear comes in contact with it. The spearhead touches the drowsy fish; a sharp plunge, and the prehistoric animal, the ancient pouna-fish, armor and cartilage, deep into the leather-like muscles. A skilful jerk from a long handle frees the barbed end, which remains inextricably fixed in the fish; the handle is thrown aside, the line seized, and the struggle begins. The first impulse is to resist this objectionable intrusion, so the angry sturgeon comes to the top to whirl it in the air, but is quickly secretly hauled by a second spear and crushed by a tomahawk. He is towed ashore, never seeing a flight, and the real excitement commences.

With might and main the bowman piles the paddles and the spearman pays out the line, which is passed through the water; the slightest tangle, the least hitch, and, to the poor, it becomes fatal, as sheer twine paddle serves fin. Twist and turn as the sturgeon may, all the canoes are with him. He flings himself out of the water, dashes through it, under it, and skims along the surface, all in a vain, he cannot shake off your; canoes follow all his efforts to escape, as a cat follows a mouse, knowingly the sturgeon grows weak, and tired, obstinately floating on the surface. The arrows known he is not vanquished, but will improve a chance for revenge; so he sputters up the line, and gathers quietly on him, to get another spear in. It is down and down viciously dives the sturgeon. But pain and weariness begin to tell, the struggles are weaker and weaker as the orbs slowly show, until the mighty armor-plated monarch of the river yields himself a captive to the dusky native in his frail canoe.

A Rebel Victory.

An election for certain State and county officers has just taken place in Kentucky, and has resulted in the election of out-and-out rebels for every important position. In some cases, where the candidates were accused of not having been thoroughgoing traitors and active participants in the rebellion, they were obliged to bring evidence to show that the charge of sympathizing with the Union in its peril was groundless. The candidate for Judge in Daviess county pronounced the charge that he had been false to the rebel cause as "malicious, mean, and false." And he produced and published certificates from prominent rebels to prove that he had been a persistent and consistent traitor. He was, of course, elected.

The "victory" in Kentucky is claimed to be a "Democratic triumph," and the Democracy, or any other party, is welcome to any glory that may result from the humiliation of the Union cause. The notorious Vallandigham was one of the speakers on the successful side; and we are told that during his speech at Louisville he made references to McClellan, Buell, Lee, Johnston, Grant, and Sherman as being names that belonged to the nation in common. At the mention of the names of Lee and Johnston one wild and prolonged yell echoed through the house for at least five minutes, but at the mention of Grant and Sherman one universal strain of hisses rang out sharp and clear for the same length of time.

Well may the Louisville Journal deplore, in shame and sorrow, the disgraceful result in Kentucky. It says truly:

"Kentucky, and the Southern people, and the Republic, will bitterly rue and deeply curse the unnatural and deplorable work of Monday. The New Orleans Outrage.

For three weeks the country has stood aghast in view of the bloody doings of the 30th of July in New Orleans. An event of so terrible import as that which then took place cannot be passed over in silence in these columns. If we have abstained from comment or criticism, it has been from a desire to avoid any hasty or unjust conclusion as to the origin and purpose of the so-called riot, and above all, to be sure on whom its fearful responsibility must rest.

We have now before us the numerous, conflicting, partial and frequently exaggerated accounts of the affair that have found their way into print, and have faithfully and impartially analyzed them, educing what we believe to be the simple truth in the premises.

In the first place it must be understood that Louisiana is what is called in the somewhat vague political language of the day a "reconstructed" State. In other words, she has been assumed on all hands to have a regularly organized State Government, existing, vital and recognized, taking its origin in a Convention held in 1864, and which adopted a State constitution prohibitng slavery, etc., etc. That Convention was elected and held while some portions of the State were either under rebel control or influence, and its members were mainly, if not wholly, from the districts protected by the Union armies. There is no pretense that it represented the whole State, any more than that Gov. Pierpont was elected by the people of the whole of Virginia, or represents as Governor a majority of them. The Convention grew, as did Pierpont's Governorship, out of the exigencies of the times, when affairs were in an anomalous state, and was therefore somewhat anomalous in character. Not more so, however, than the State Government of Tennessee, which President Johnson assisted to organize. In times of war and commotion, it always happens that many things are done and accepted as final, which, at other times, would be deemed irregular and revolutionary, as, for instance, the erection of the State of West Virginia.

The Convention, from some or many motives, and among these probably the consciousness that it did not represent the whole State, and that its final action should not be taken until the whole State was represented in its body, instead of adjourning sine die, after forming a Constitution, adjourned to meet at the call of its presiding officer. The Convention also anticipated that, with the suppression of the rebellion, the General Government would impose some conditions to the rehabilitation of the States, which would require additional modifications of the Constitution. Rightly or wrongly, they considered it their duty to retain their hold on the work of their hands, with a view to its perfection, in consonance with anticipated changes of circumstances.

The legality or propriety of this reservation of its powers by the Convention, is a question on which men may honestly differ, and which would, probably, in due course, have come up for decision before the competent judicial tribunal. At any rate, the anticipations of the Convention were realized; Congress passed certain amendments of the Constitution, and made their acceptance a condition precedent to the admission of the representatives of the late rebel States in their body. The Convention was consequently called on to reassemble, and the Governor of the State, the legality of whose election has not been called in question, in order that the whole State might be represented in that body when it met, issued his warrant for the election of delegates in the districts not previously represented.

The Convention was to meet on the 30th of July.

Now what was the posture of affairs in New Orleans at that date? The city was as essentially in the hands of the rebels as at the date of its capture by Gen. Butler, with the exception that there was a small United States force stationed in its vicinity, and whose presence alone made the lives of Union men at all safe. The same blatant, blustering Mayor Munroe, who was Mayor at the time of the capture of the city, and whose offensive conduct after that event resulted in his close confinement in Fort Jackson, was again Mayor, by the votes of returned rebels. One of the most obnoxious of the generals in the Southern army was Sheriff; and the police was made up of men who had graduated in the rebel army.

These men, sustained by the whole rebel rabble of the city and State, resolved that the Convention should not meet, and the Mayor issued a proclamation against it, and undertaking to denounce it as "unlawful," proposed to "disperse" it, and to "hold its members accountable to existing municipal laws!" The astounding impudence of this Mayor is unparalleled even in the extraordinary history of rebel pretension! Who constituted him judge of a body elected lawfully, and to which not less than sixty members were to be added, under writs of election issued by the acknowledged Governor of the State? Not alone this, but the unrepentant and still insolent traitor, with the smell of the casemates of Fort Jackson still in his garments, and his heart full of the black blood of rebel hate, proposed not only to "disperse," but punish the body of men who framed the very constitution under which he lived and his State had an organized existence!

The purpose of the Mayor, however, was stayed by significant words addressed to him by Gen. Baird, commanding the Military Department of Louisiana, as follows:

"If these persons assemble, as you say is intended, it will be, I presume, in virtue of the universally conceded right of all loyal citizens to meet peaceably and discuss freely questions concerning their civil Governments, a right which is not restricted by the fact that the movement proposed might terminate in a change of existing institutions.

"If the assemblage in question has the legal right to remodel the State Government, it should be protected in so doing; if it has not, then its labors must be looked upon simply as a harmless pleasantry, to which no one ought to object. As to your conception of the duty imposed by your oath of office, I regret to differ from you entirely. I cannot understand how the Mayor of a city can undertake to decide so important and delicate a question as the legal authority upon which a Convention claiming to represent the people of an entire State bases its action.

"This, doubtless, will, in due time, be properly decided upon by the legal branch of the United States Government. At all events, the Governor of the State would seem to be more directly called upon to take the initiative in a step of this kind if it was proper and necessary."

Mr. Mayor Munroe understood well enough that this cool and carefully-worded response meant that he must neither "disperse the Convention, or hold its members accountable" to any interpretation of laws of his own; and it appears probable that after this the Convention would have met and peaceably transacted its business, on the legality of which, had it been called in question, the competent tribunals would have duly decided.

But, unfortunately, sadly for the country, there were in Washington, enjoying an easy access to the Presidential ear, a group of traitors as unrepentant, rancorous and unscrupulous as Munroe himself. One of them, named King, editor of the traitorous New Orleans Times, and another named Rozier, seem to have been active accomplices in Washington of the Mayor in New Orleans. What their representations to the President were, may be inferred from their dispatches, which will appear further on. They appear to have fully prepared him for a dispatch forwarded on the 27th by Lieutenant-Governor Voorhies, who telegraphed the President that in his belief "the agents of the law [Munroe & Co.!] would be prevented [by the military, see extracts from Gen. Baird's letter] from arresting members of this illegal assemblage unless definitive instructions were received from Washington."

The answer to this dispatch was characterized by the traitorous Times as "prompt, clear and emphatic," and was as follows:

"Washington, July 28, 1866.

"Albert Voorhies, Lieutenant-Governor of Louisiana:

"The military will be expected to sustain, and not interfere with the proceedings of the courts. A dispatch on the subject of the Convention was sent to Governor Wells this morning.

"Andrew Johnson."

The dispatch to Gov. Wells here referred to, and the reply to it were, as follows:

"Washington, July 28, 1866.

"To His Excellency Governor Wells:

"I have been advised that you have issued a proclamation convening the Convention elected in 1864. Please inform me under and by what authority this has been done, and by what authority this Convention can assume to represent the whole people of the State of Louisiana. Andrew Johnson."

"State of Louisiana,
"Executive Department, New Orleans,
"July 28, 1866.

"To His Excellency Andrew Johnson, President of the United States:

"Your telegram is received. I have not issued any order convening the Convention of 1864. The Convention was reconvened by the president of that body, by virtue of a resolution authorizing him to do so, and in that event for him to call on the proper officers of the State to issue writs of election for delegates in unrepresented parishes. My proclamation was issued in response to that call. As soon as vacancies can be ascertained they will be filled, and then the whole State will be represented in the Convention.

"J. Madison Wells, Governor."

Great was the elation of Mayor Munroe and his ruffian allies, as they proclaimed exultantly through the streets that "the President was with them," and that now the Convention should not meet. The Mayor at once proceeded to organize and arm his confederates under the name of "special police," and a contract was made by his tool, "the chief of police," with a firm formerly holding a contract with Jeff. Davis, to supply him with arms, to furnish the populace with pistols. Everything was made ready to commit the very deed of horror which was enacted on the 30th.

But there were still to get out of the way not only Gen. Baird but Gov. Wells, the acknowledged, lawful Governor of the State, (and so recognized by the President), and to whom alone belonged the right of "dispersing" any "unlawful assembly" seeking to overthrow or usurp the powers of the State. It was as imperative to set him aside as it was to bind and fetter Gen. Baird "by definitive instructions from Washington." How was this to be done?

It could be done only by one power, and by that only through the most startling assumptions. In the name of "the Law and the Constitution," and with an emphatic denunciation of "usurpation," the President of the United States suspended the functions of the lawful Governor of Louisiana, and conferred them on the Attorney-General of the State—a man holding his position under authority derived primarily from the very Convention which a petty Mayor undertook to pronounce "unlawful."

The dispatch of the President was as follows:

"Washington, July 30, 1866.

"To Andrew S. Herron, Attorney-General of Louisiana:

"You will call on Gen. Sheridan, or whoever may be in command, for sufficient force to sustain the civil authorities in suppressing all illegal or unlawful assemblies who usurp or assume to exercise any power or authority without first having obtained the consent of the people of the State. The people must be first consulted in changing the organized laws of the State. Usurpation will not be tolerated. The law and the Constitution must be sustained, and thereby peace and order. Andrew Johnson."

The delight with which the knowledge that this dispatch had been sent was received by the treasonable accomplices of Mayor Munroe may be inferred from the exultant telegrams sent by them to New Orleans:

"Washington, July 30—9.30 p.m.

"J. Ad. Rozier and myself had an interview with the President, according to appointment, at eight this evening. He read my dispatches from your city, and I found that he was fully informed in regard to the riot in New Orleans.

"An Executive order is now being made out, addressed to Attorney-General Herron, investing him with authority to put down all disturbances of the public peace, arrest all persons assuming to set up a new government, and to call upon the military, if necessary, to insure the execution of his orders. This is positive and entirely reliable. W. H. C. King."

"Washington, July 30, 1866.

"Judge J. N. Lee:

"Just called on the President with King, editor of the Times. The President will send a dispatch to the Attorney-General to put down all disturbances of the public peace, suppress any assemblage of persons getting up any pretended government, and call on the military authorities for aid.

"All right and bright. Publish this in Times.

"J. Ad. Rozier."

The conspirators took new courage under these cheering assurances, and perfected their half-abandoned plans. The Attorney-General, instead of calling on Gen. Baird to send into the city a force sufficient to prevent disturbance, as he was authorized to do by the President, lent himself to the schemes of the Mayor. To give the rioters ample time to accomplish their work without interruption, he falsely represented to Gen. Baird that the Convention would not meet until late in the afternoon—well knowing that the meditated murderous work would, meantime, be over.

The Convention met according to call, only to be wantonly assaulted, dispersed, and its members murdered, amid cheers for Jeff. Davis, and furtive displays of the rebel flag. The vengeance of the mob, organized and armed by the Mayor, was not limited to the white men comprising the Convention, but expanded into a general raid on the negroes, who were hunted and killed as if they were wolves, under every circumstance of atrocity. We refrain from copying all the horrible details, as given by witnesses, and limit ourselves to a few extracts from the New Orleans correspondence of the Times of this city, against which paper, in its new affiliations, no charge of partisan exaggeration can be made. It says:

"The affair commenced at 12:45, and, lasting three hours, ended at 3:45. It did not end until every negro and white man in the institute where the Convention met had been either killed or wounded and captured, with the exception of three or four whites. As there were over one hundred men of both classes in the building, and about fifty wounded outside, the total casualties will amount to one hundred and twenty-five, of whom fifty were killed or have since died from their wounds.

* * * * * *

"On Common, Baronne, Dryades, St. Charles, Rampart and Carondolet streets, freedmen were murdered by the police and the mob in cold blood. Standing in the door of the telegraph on Carondelet street, I saw about two hundred men chasing one negro along the sidewalk. Six policemen were nearest to him, and in advance of his pursuers. They emptied their revolvers into his back; and finally another one, when he was near enough to his victim to lay his hand on his shoulder, shot him in the head, and he fell dead in an alley. Another freedman, trying to escape from the institute, was climbing over a fence, when I saw him fall from a policeman's shot. As he struck the ground, at least a dozen police and rioters surrounded him and fired their pistols into his head and breast, at the same time pounding him with clubs and canes. The blood flowed from wounds in his scalp, covering his entire face; but they continued their brutal assault until he breathed his last, although he several times raised his feeble and wounded arms to gesticulate for the mercy his tongue could not ask for. I saw a white man draw a stiletto and strike it into the heart of a dying negro on Common street. The blood spurted out in great red jets, staining the murderer's clothing, face and hands. He got up and displayed the gory marks, as though they were proud emblems of a praiseworthy deed. These and other incidents which I saw, suffice to show you how the freedmen were treated in a majority of cases.

* * * * * *

"The police impressed the baggage-wagons of an express firm in this city to carry off the dead. One load, consisting of eight or ten bodies, had two living men at the bottom. They were wounded, and perhaps would have died; but they had life enough left in them to struggle for air. An eye-witness, whose name I can furnish, says that a policeman mounted the cart, and shoving his revolver down between the bodies on the top, killed the poor fellows, with one shot for each. The fiendish thirst for blood which seemed to possess some of the rioters was too brutal for even the imagination of a savage. Their eyes gleamed with it, and rolled in their sockets; their tongues protruded from their mouths, parched and shriveled, almost, and their voices grew husky from demoniac yells. I have no doubt but that some of the policemen and rioting whites were wounded by members of their own party, as some of them seemed possessed with a desire to shoot at human beings regardless of caste, color or sex. No females were hurt, that I know of. Houses were pillaged, but the outrages were mostly confined to the immediate vicinage of the institute. One man in a livery stable deliberately took up a rifle and killed a negro who ran through the door looking for a place of refuge.

"It is impossible to give you any more details than I have without going beyond the limits of my desire to furnish only authoritative statements. I saw with my own eyes almost everything that I have described, and have responsible witnesses for all the rest. I have not accepted any rumors; but as I was fortunately 'on the spot,' I am able to give you the facts."

The estimate made by this correspondent of the killed and wounded falls far below the truth. About one hundred were killed, and upward of two hundred wounded.

We have only to add the following extract from a private letter of a resident in New Orleans, who served with distinction in the rebel army during the war:

"The substance of my knowledge of the riot is that it was a premeditated affair, on the part of Munroe and his associates, to murder colored people, which they succeeded in doing to the number of one hundred killed and two hundred wounded."

Altogether the New Orleans outrage was only a repetition of the affair at Memphis, in which forty-six negroes and two whites were killed, seventy-five wounded, and four churches, twelve school-houses and one hundred cabins burned.

Reflecting, Christian people in the South should see to it that affairs like those of New Orleans and Memphis be not repeated; and that malignants like Munroe never again be entrusted with power. And above all, it behooves those in authority, from the President downward, to see to it that no act or language of theirs shall be used or abused to foment or give color to crimes unparalleled in atrocity by the blackest acts of the French Revolution.

Canada.

It is no new thing for persons who disclaim desires which the world persists in attributing to them, to be told that "the grapes are sour." Energetic protests of indifference are regarded as a species of hypocrisy, and it is as hard to prove your disinterestedness as it is in logic to prove a negative. The position is worse when your antagonists have some show of reason on their side; when, for example, the object which, they insist, is the secret but unavowed desire of your heart, has, on a superficial view, some great advantages in itself, but is placed beyond your reach by some obstacles not easy to overcome. In that case, the very earnestness of the disclaimer is but another proof, not of the absence of such aspirations, but of the intensity of the desire to conceal them. Your moderation may be praised, but it is at the expense of your sincerity.

Under such circumstances, the only appeal from words which are discredited, is to a consistent course of conduct, of which the intent and meaning cannot be doubted; and this is, we conceive, at the present moment, very much the position of the United States toward Canada. Our detractors persist in crying aloud that we, as a nation, are bent on territorial aggrandizement, and our absorption of the great West is pointed out as a proof of an omniverous appetite. They argue, that if Idaho, Utah, and the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, are of value to us, so much the more should we prize a fertile territory lying on our northern frontier, through which runs the great river that is the natural outlet to our North-Western States.

As evidence of our intolerance of neighbors who are not of our own political family, the old story of Texas is trumped up; while as to our restlessness and desire to meddle with the affairs of other people who chance to live near us, we are gravely told that Lopez and other filibusters only represented national cravings which it was the policy of the Government to disown, at least for a time. If we answer that such arguments are inconclusive, because the analogies on which they are based are incomplete, and that such assumptions as to national character and tendencies are not warranted, being only founded on the acts of a few lawless individuals, such as always hang on the outskirts of all large societies, we are still met with an airy sort of assertion that all this may be very true, but that it is very well known to the world that, in spite of the assumed indifference of the United States, they have an intense longing for the acquisition of Canada. We should feel inclined to protest against such accusations, if it were worth while; but, as we said before, there are certain circumstances in which protests are of no use, and this is one of them. Yet, if it were possible, we should like to convince our half-brothers on the other side of the lakes that, if the people of the United States have any feelings at all about Canada, they are certainly not those of covetousness of her territory. We have that kind of regard for them, that we should like to be able to restore to them their usual tranquility, which the Fenian disturbances interfered with so sadly.

Having been hastily, and we must say, rather cruelly roused from their normal state of inactivity, we are afraid our semi-somnolent neighbors magnify into an enemy every phenomenon they observe in our social or political world. We should like to be able to lull their fears, and to demonstrate to them the fact that little that goes on in the United States has any reference, either immediate or contingent, to the narrow strip of cultivated land skirting the northern sides of our lakes. It might scarcely be kind to the Canadians to desire a full return of their lethargic habits, but while they are aroused, they may pardon us for wishing they would be more observant than heretofore of what the rest of the world is doing. There are interests superior to theirs, which occupy the attention of mankind.

As a nation, we have almost reached that desirable point when the praise or blame of others ceases to affect us. So long as we know we are right, we can see with indifference our manners and actions derided, and our motives misunderstood, confident that in the not far-distant future full justice will be done to us. Our enemies had persistently accused us of a restlessnsss, or what phrenologists call, acquisitiveness, which made us very unpleasant, if not dangerous neighbors. They would not understand the difference between our fencing in the unappropriated lands of the West, and seizing territory and population together, as is now the fashion in Europe. Perhaps we shall be better understood a few years hence. If the late war has taught us our strength, it has also shown our magnanimity. Surely, in face of the proceedings in Europe, the taunt against us of removing "our neighbors' landmarks," must lose its sting. If Canada had been of the slightest value to us, we had received provocation enough to have seized it; or if we had not disdained to employ the arts taught to the world by the nephew of his uncle, there was room enough in the late disturbed condition of the province to have done toward it what France did to Savoy and Nice, and probably with no greater subsequent trouble. But we do not want Canada, and the sooner the Canadians know and appreciate the fact, the better it will be for them. Within our own possessions we have room for carving out many more States, so rich in mineral and agricultural wealth, that Canada is a desert compared to them. Emigration will not flow to a country sealed up by ice for six months in the year—it flows toward us, and thrives in the genial homes we can offer. What do we want with the fringe of the Arctic zone, while the riches and comforts of the Temperate zone are at our command?

And even supposing that, for other reasons, the possession of Canada were a geographical necessity for us, we do not want the Canadians also. In some respects, it is rather a misfortune than otherwise that we speak a common language. There is, therefore, no tone of speech or shade of expression such as they habitually use to convey their assumed superiority over us which our ears are not quick to catch. If we do not resent the silly airs these provincials give themselves, it is because we regard them with the indulgence granted by a metropolis to cousins from a cathedral city, or society to the sons of bishops. Their affectations are looked upon as the misfortunes of their birth and breeding, and it is hoped that time and the cessation of the benighting influence they were born under will work their cure. But we do not want political affiliation with populations all of whose prejudices are opposed to ours, and whose manners and social habits are totally dissimilar to our own. Perhaps in these respects they may be our superiors. We are not going to dispute the point—it is a matter of too great unconcern; all we know is, that radical differences exist, and we will not be annoyed by too close an intercourse with people who give themselves airs. If the Canadians should choose to leave their hyperborean abodes and emigrate to some of our fertile Territories, their deserted lands—except in some favored spots in the Upper Province—would lapse into primitive barbarism, or be frequented only by the sportsman or tourist; and the only inducement the United States could have to assume supremacy of the region, would be to guard the mouth of the St. Lawrence on the north, in the same manner and with the same design as the Mississippi is guarded on the south.

Let our Canadian friends, then, resign themselves to their unhappy fate. They cannot enter into our society. They can scarcely agree among themselves. They are barely tolerated by the mother country, to whom they are a nuisance and an expense. They are the Switzerland of this continent—not worth dividing, and not worth quarreling about, and they preserve their independence simply on condition of their good behavior. The theory of gravitation, applied to politics, assumes that the larger bodies attract and absorb the smaller; but if metaphors may be used as arguments, it must be remembered that centripetal motion is opposed by the centrifugal, and that while large bodies, in their revolutions, attract other and lighter bodies to themselves, they, at the same time, repel those lying on the edge, as it were, of their orbits. The United States cannot fail to influence all the nationalities surrounding it. While some are drawn in and absorbed, others may be repelled, and it is those most distant by associations and education who will suffer this latter unhappy fate. The moral of this the Canadians may lay to their hearts.

IN "A Rebel War Clerk's Diary at the Confederate Capital," just published by Lippincott & Co., we have some curious glimpses of men and things in the "burst up" Confederacy. The War Clerk deplores the loss of some of his papers, and says: "Among them are some of the veto messages of President Tyler, and many letters from him, Gov. Wise, etc. With the latter I had a correspondence in 1856, showing that this blow would probably have been struck then, if Fremont had been elected." Jones, it should be explained, was organ-grinder to Tyler when that worthy Johnsonized from the Whig party. At the opening of '65 the difficulty of finding recruits caused Davis to turn his attention to the proposal for black soldiers. "The proposition," runs the diary, Jan. 1, 1865, "to organize an army of negroes gains friends, because the owners of the slaves are no longer willing to fight themselves; at least, they are not as 'eager for the fray' as they were in 1861; and the armies must be replenished, or else the slaves will certainly be lost." For months before the date of this last entry the mean whites had imitated the superior classes in shirking their military obligations, and, in some cases, recruits were actually brought in chains to Gen. Lee. On the 10th of April, 1864, the writer says: "To-day I saw two conscripts from Western Virginia conducted to the cars (going to Lee's army) in chains. It made a chill shoot through my breast."

THE spirit of Union is breaking down all party and sectional lines in Northern and even Southern Germany. The late Minister of State, Baron Von Roggenbach, has written to Bismarck: "I can have no hesitation in offering you my services, provided the work—the unity of Germany—is carried out with a high hand." The invitation by the Emperor of Austria to Napoleon to intervene in a German quarrel is considered a treachery, and in Bavaria, Baden, and Wurtemburg, the middle class now declares that Prussia is the only honestly German Power. This feeling is also perceptible, we are told, in Vienna, where men by no means too Liberal declare that they have been taxed and oppressed for fifty years only to ask the grace of the Frenchman at last. "Adhesions" from the South are constantly reaching Berlin, and even the Viennese at last realize that they are to be turned out of Germany, and writhe under the prospect of Slavonic ascendancy.

THE whole number of pedestrian visitors to the Central Park for the year 1865, was 3,219,000; the number of equestrians, 98,300; of carriages, 1,425,000.

"THERE is no Abraham Lincoln now!" was Mr. Vallandigham's exultant exclamation, when stumping Kentucky on behalf of the rebel ticket, recently elected. And the red-handed mob which he addressed shouted a gleeful response.

TOWN GOSSIP.

SIRIUS is a very benignant deity this year, commiserating our poor mortality and withholding the usual rigors of his reign. He has thrown aside his fiery apparal and put on robes of a subdued cast, whereat we, who have been accustomed to class the dog-days among the dies iræ of one's experience, takes courage, and as we find the summer gently passing away, feel that one's lot is by no means an unenviable one. Such charming summer weather as has been vouchsafed to us during this month of August is a rarity worthy of especial remark, and city and country alike rejoice in its invigorating salubrity.

The police of our city have made a general and successful raid upon the pickpockets and other gentry, who live by their wits, and disregard most scrupulously the eighth precept of the decalogue, conferring upon them the distinguished honor of soliciting their photographs, as memorials of a past acquaintanceship, and showing them many other attentions which honest men never receive. Whether or not such efforts will expose all the rogues with whom our city is burdened, is questionable, since there are certain official persons that are proof against the prying eyes of the most astute policeman, and, as tax-payers know to their cost, certain methods of manipulating contracts and jobs for the benefit of interested parties, not quite in accordance with the requirements of honesty. But then this is a fast age, and one of its most prominent features is the propensity to accumulate rapidly, and regard ends, rather than the means by which those ends are obtained.

London is now, practically, nearer New York than Albany was twenty years ago, and our morning papers greet us with dispatches from England and the Continent, dated on the preceding evening. Thus far the great cable is a grand success, and even cavilers are silent, and doubtless convinced. The great problem of science has been solved—henceforward the whole world is to be brought into constant and instant communication. There may be temporary interruptions, but the gravest difficulties have been overcome, and hereafter only trivial details are to be taken into account. When Solomon had completed his investigations and recorded his experience, he complacently declared "there is nothing new under the sun;" but if the Jewish King were living in the nineteenth century, he most likely would modify his opinions, or at least express them less confidently. Things never dreamed of in his philosophy are now current facts, and a wealth of knowledge, compared with which his attainments were poverty, is the common heritage. Without disparaging the wise man, it is, perhaps, not too much to say that, in all that relates to physical law and fact, and the application of natural forces to human wants, the present age is incomparably superior to any preceding one, and the masses are now wiser than the most favored ones in former times.

The old egotism, "Aut Cæsar aut nullus," is especially applicable to the American people in all their political movements, which invariably are inaugurated in Conventions. Probably these gatherings are the legitimate successors of the grand pow-wows the red men were accustomed to hold before engaging in any important enterprise; at all events, it is convention or nothing with our politicians, and, whether they wish to nominate a President or select a borough constable, they must meet in grand conclave, with all the paraphernalia of speeches, resolutions, etc., that constitute the staple of such gatherings. Thus it is that, during the last week, Philadelphia has been the grand rallying-point of patriotic delegates from all parts of the land, who have promised themselves and their constituents that a Convention would be the great panacea for national disorders, would encourage the President, by endorsing and sustaining his policy, and harmonize and unify the feelings that sectional discords and jealousies had disturbed and embittered. Some anticipated a stormy session, and some a riot, but such forebodings of evil have, happily, been disappointed. The Convention met, did its work and adjourned, with no more disorder than inevitably attends any large gathering, and its record is now before the country, either to shape the policy of the future, or else to show how futile are all schemes that do not accord with the popular will and enlist the popular sympathy.

The watering-places have been less crowded this season than they usually are, but their attractions have not been diminished; and all diversions that occupy the attention of such resorts have been regularly presented. The Continental Hotel, at Long Branch, so well-known to the frequenters of that favorite retreat, gave a fine entertainment a week ago, which was largely attended and well managed, the hotel band furnishing the music; and on Friday last a grand ball came off at the same hotel, which was the crowning effort of the season, and gave unbounded satisfaction to the devotees of Terpsichore and the guests and patrons of the establishment.

In the way of amusements in the city there is little of which to make note. Bryant still reigns at Wallack's; the "Ice Witch" attracts the the patrons of the Olympic; the Hanlon Brothers are exhibiting their feats at Wood's; but active preparations are making for the fall campaign, and very soon we shall have presentations worthy the name.

Mr. Draper, who some time since gave a very pleasant season of English opera, intends next week to repeat his effort, and, with a new troupe, to present some of the pieces that before gave so much satisfaction.

Great preparations are being made by Mr. Grau at the new French Theatre, for the reception of the great tragedienne, Madame Adelaide Ristori, who is expected in this country about the middle of September. The sensation created throughout the country by the mere mention of the distinguished artiste's name, is universal.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE "NATIONAL UNION CONVENTION."

The Convention held in Philadelphia, August 14–16, adopted the subjoined "Platform":

The National Union Convention, now assembled in the City of Philadelphia, composed of delegates from every State and Territory in the Union, admonished by the solemn lessons which, for the last five years, it has pleased the Supreme Ruler of the universe to give to the American people; profoundly grateful for the return of peace, desirous, as are a large majority of their countrymen, in all sincerity, to forget and forgive the past revering the Constitution as it comes to us from our ancestors, regarding the Union, in its restoration, as more sacred than ever, looking with deep anxiety into the future as of instant and continuing trial, here issues and proclaims the following declaration of principles and purposes on which they have with perfect unanimity agreed:

1st. We hail with gratitude to Almighty God the end of war and the return of peace to an afflicted and beloved land.

2d. The war just closed has maintained the authority of the Constitution with all the powers which it confers, and all the restrictions which it imposes upon the General Government unabridged and unaltered, and it has preserved the Union with the equal rights, dignity and authority of the States perfect and unimpaired.

3d. Representation in the Congress of the United States and in the Electoral College is a right recognized by the Constitution as abiding in every State, and as a duty imposed upon its people, fundamental in its nature and essential to the existence of our republican institutions, and neither Congress nor the General Government has any authority or power to deny this right to any, or withhold its enjoyment under the Constitution from the people thereof.

4th. We call upon the people of the United States to elect to Congress as members thereof none but men who admit this fundamental right of representation, and who will receive to seats their loyal representatives from every State in allegiance to the United States, subject to the constitutional right of each House to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members.

5th. The Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof are the supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. All the powers not conferred by the Constitution upon the General Government now prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States or the people thereof, and among the rights thus reserved to the States is the right to prescribe qualifications for the elective franchise therein, which right Congress cannot interfere with. No State or convention of States has the right to withdraw from the Union, or to exclude, through their actions in Congress or otherwise, any State or States from the Union. The union of these States is pepetual.

6th. Such amendments to the Constitution of the United States may be made by the people thereof as they may deem expedient, but only in the mode pointed out by its resolution, and in proposing such amendments, whether by Congress or a Convention, and in ratifying the same, all the States of the Union have an equal and an indefeasible right to a voice and a vote thereon.

7th. Slavery is abolished and forever prohibited, and there is neither desire nor purpose on the part of the Southern States that it should ever be re-established upon the soil or within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the enfranchised slaves in all the States of the Union should receive, in common with all their inhabitants, equal protection in every right of person and property.

8th. While we regard as utterly invalid, and never to be assumed or made of binding force, any obligation incurred or undertaken in making war against the United States, we hold the debt of the nation to be sacred and inviolable, and we proclaim our purpose in discharging this, as in performing all other national obligations, to maintain unimpaired and unimpeached the honor and the faith of the Republic.

9th. It is the duty of the National Government to recognize the services of the Federal soldiers and sailors in the contest just closed by meeting promptly and fully all their just and rightful claims for the services they have rendered the nation, and by extending to those of them who have survived, and to the widows and orphans of those who have fallen, the most generous and considerate care.

10th. In Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, who in his great office has proved steadfast in his devotion to the Constitution, the laws, and interests of his country, unmoved by persecutions and undeserved reproach, having faith immeasurably in the people and in the principles of the Government, we recognize a Chief Magistrate worthy of the nation and equal to the great crisis upon which his lot is cast, and we tender to him, in the discharge of his high and responsible duties, our profound respect, and assurance of our cordial and sincere support.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—On the 1st instant the city poundkeeper had been at work for about six weeks and had drowned 3,600 dogs—one hundred a day. The largest proportion of the business was done in the beginning of the dog season. The pound was opened on the 18th of June.

—— The most extraordinary instance of patience on record in modern times is that of an Illinois judge, who listened for two days while a couple of wordy attorneys were contending about the construction of an act of the Legislature, and then ended the discussion by quietly remarking: "Gentlemen, the law is repealed."

—— The exports of petroleum from this country to Europe are rapidly increasing. The following statement shows the comparative exports to foreign countries in 1865 and 1866, up to the 3d instant:

	1865. Gallons.	1866. Gallons.
From New York, - - -	5,281,937	16,088,288
From Philadelphia, - -	1,621,777	12,043,214
From Baltimore, - - -	348,925	1,182,648
From Boston, - - -	463,453	869,997
Total, - - - -	7,716,092	30,184,142

It will be seen that in 1866 the exports are four times as large as during the preceding year.

—— The Treasury Department is overrun with applications for bounty under the late provision of Congress, but nothing can be done with these claims for several months, except to file them. The carrying out of the act demands an elaborate preparation, and soldiers can gain nothing by crowding the business. In fact, the Department has not even issued a form of application, and it is probable that most of the claims already presented will be returned to the parties for revision.

—— While some workmen were repairing the dam just above the Genesee Falls, at Rochester, on Tuesday last, a temporary dam, constructed to aid the main work, gave way. One man was swept over the "Middle Falls" and drowned. Another was wedged in between the head gates and the debris of the dam, and it was over an hour before he was extricated from his perilous position. Another man was swept under the head gates into the race, and came near drowning. One man who was swept over the dam caught hold of a timber on the edge of the Falls and was saved.

—— The Denver News announces that a new daily line of stage coaches is to be put on the Smoky Hill route immediately. The road is now being stocked, and the coaches will commence running about the 1st of September.

—— Favorable accounts have been received from the western portion of the country with regard to the disposition which is manifested in connection with a fair representation of its industrial and producing facilities at the Paris Exhibition of 1867.

—— The granite arch at Plymouth, over the place where the Pilgrims first landed, which is to be twenty-five feet high when finished, has stopped at twelve feet, the funds being exhausted.

—— In Central Georgia thousands of freedmen are agitating the question of immediate emigration to Liberia. This spirit was said to be rife among them at their late demonstration in Macon.

—— Several young men who left Springfield, Mass., in April last, for Montana, have returned, impressed with the idea that that golden Territory is not all their fancy painted it. They visited eleven different mines, lost a round sum by the trip, and finally concluded that home was the best place for them.

—— Walter Brown, of Portland, Maine, has accepted Joshua Ward's challenge to a single scull race for $2,000 or $3,000 a side, with the provision that the contest take place at Portland or New York, and not at Newburg, N. Y., as Ward proposed.

—— The excellent prospects of the cranberry crops throughout South Jersey, the present year, are so encouraging that double the number of acres will be placed under cultivation next year. The company which was recently formed for that purpose express themselves well satisfied with the fact that the soil in South Jersey is admirably calculated for producing abundant crops of these valuable berries.

—— The Chicago papers, now that the cholera has fairly made its appearance in that city, assert that the disease has prevailed there ever since the early part of June, but that the physicians, to avoid creating a panic, have called it by a milder name. The condition of the river, which has become a stagnant bayou at that point, is assigned as a principal cause of the violent outbreak of the pestilence.

—— There is a party of thirteen theological students from Andover, camped out on the beach at Rain Island, Sippican Harbor, Marion, Mass. They have five A tents, blankets and commissary stores, a sailboat at their disposal, and an accomplished skipper, who acts in the capacities of cook, fisherman and pilot. They say they are enjoying themselves better than people at the fashionable watering-places.

—— Mr. Charles T. Willard, a well-known photographer of Philadelphia, met with a sudden death on Friday. He was passing along Fifth street, in that city, when he accidentally fell into a deep cellar, recently excavated. Mr. Willard was the inventor of ciphers for telegraphing, which were used in the army during the war.

Foreign.—Letters recently received from Australia announce the arrival at Melbourne of one hundred thousand salmon, sea and brown trout ova, forty per cent. of which were hatching in the breeding ponds of the river Plenty in Tasmania. It is also stated that at least two thousand salmon fry, varying in length from nine inches to twelve inches, had left the fresh water and gone to sea, and that four hundred brown trout, about twelve inches long, the produce of the ova shipped in January, 1865, are thriving in ponds.

—— France possesses 61 regular theatrical companies; England, 37; Austria, 34; Prussia, 32; Italy, 24; and Russia, 15. The towns which have the most theatres are Paris, which has 40; London, 26; Naples and Milan, 13 each; Rome, Brussels and Turin, 10; Berlin, Vienna and Florence, 9 (this comprises the concert-rooms of Vienna); Madrid, Venice and Genoa, 8; Seville, 4; Lisbon, Hamburg, Amsterdam, Bologna and Verona, 5. There are in Europe 1,480 theatres, although there are only 298 distinct companies. Out of these 4 only belong to Greece, 4 to Turkey, 3 to Roumania and 1 to Servia.

—— Ten years ago there were but eight Lutheran ministers in Paris, and only four Lutheran churches. Now the number of ministers is twenty-one, and they have under their charge fourteen churches and chapels. Vast numbers of German laborers have been attracted to Paris within a few years, and the whole population has been rapidly increasing. The French Government, at its own expense, has recently erected a fine church for the Lutherans, and has legally transferred it to their use.

—— The silver plate belonging to the royal family of Saxony, which has been sent to Prague, weighs thirty tuns, and the crown jewels ten tuns. Most of the contents of the "Grüne Gewölbe" has been sent to Munich.

MR. SETH GREEN'S TROUT PONDS, ON SPAWN CREEK, NEAR MUMFORD, MONROE CO., N. Y.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY N. B. BARKER, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL PROPACATION OF TROUT.

THE fact is now fully established that we can raise fish as readily as we raise cattle and sheep, and that a little outlay of care and attention will provide us abundantly with this delicious kind of food. In France, for some years, the propagation of different varieties of the finny tribe has been attended with marked success, proving, conclusively, that ponds and rivers, properly stocked with spawn, would soon teem with millions of young fish, which, if protected, would rapidly attain growth and perfection. And as the demand for the nutriment of the water as an article of food is constantly increasing, the profitable character of this branch of industry especially commends it to attention. Hitherto we have had little need in this country to to such means for gaining our supplies; our numerous rivers and lakes teem with life, affording us an easy variety and abundance of their treasures, while every little stream tempts the angler and rewards his effort.

There is one variety of fish, however, so delicious as food, and so much sought after as game by the sportsman, that it has entirely disappeared from many of our streams, and would soon become extinct. This is the brook-trout, the delight of every disciple of Izaak Walton, and the gem of the spicure. To the artificial culture of this beautiful and delicious fish attention has been particularly turned, and with the most flattering results. It has been found entirely practicable to stock our streams, under certain conditions, with an ever-increasing supply, and henceforward the raising of fish will become an important element of industry. Streams in which the fish already exist may thus be bountifully stocked, or they may be introduced into waters where they never before were found, since the spawn can be carried safely from place to place, any required distance; and any person who chooses to construct a pond may thus fill it with fish in a very short time.

Our illustrations on this page show some of the features of piesciculture as practiced by Mr. Seth Green, of Mumford, N. Y., whose skill must now give him a national reputation, and whose ponds are the most extensive in the country.

The most prolific trout stream within our knowledge is the Caledonia Spring. For fifty years it has been the resort of the angler; day and night the sportsman pursues his finny game along its banks, and yet the supply seems rather to increase than diminish. This celebrated trout brook rises from the rocks in the village of Caledonia, Livingston county, New York. Its whole length is but one mile, when it unites with Allen's Creek, one of the tributaries of the Genesee, in the village of Mumford. The stream falls about fifty feet, from the springs to its junction with Allen's Creek. The country is thickly settled, and one of the richest and best farming towns in the State. The surface of the land is quite level, with banks but little above the surface of the water.

The bottom of the stream is covered with small white shells and gravel. The water is clear, pure, and perfectly transparent, so that any object can be seen for three or four rods very distinctly. It is tinctured with lime and sulphur. Its temperature at the spring is forty-eight degrees the whole year round, but down the stream three-quarters of a mile it rises in the hottest days i summer, to fifty-eight degrees by night, but is down in the morning to fifty-two. In winter it settles sometimes to forty-three, but generally keeps up to forty-five or forty-six. The temperature of the water in Allen's Creek is very even the year round, but very cold in summer and quite warm in winter, never freezing the very coldest weather. The water through the whole length of the creek, as well as every stone, stick, weed and blade of grass, is alive and literally covered with numerous insects and larvæ of flies summer and winter, so that the trout, however numerous they are, easily obtain all the food they want all times of the year. Mr. Green has purchased this stream, and constructed his ponds upon it.

HATCHING TROUGHS.

The pond containing the largest fish and principal spawners was first constructed. A strong volume of water passes through it from the main stream, the quantity received and discharged being so regulated that there is no danger of overflowing. It enters under a wheel, which is so exactly fitted to the place that not the smallest fish can escape, and maintains a regular motion. This pond is seventy-five feet long, twelve feet wide, and four or five feet deep. Mr. Green's custom is ever the lower end of this pond, which affords shade and a hiding-place for the trout when they choose to retire from view. There are from eight to ten thousand fish in this pond, and water enough for fifty times the number. A great deal of feed passes to them from the stream, but they are fed every day with fresh meat, chopped fine, and it is exciting to see the vast multitude dart to the surface as they see the coveted particles descending.

Fig. 1 represents a single egg as it leaves the female trout; it is almost a clear white, with the exception of a small dark spot in the centre. Fig. 2 shows a small dark line across the egg—the embryo fish. Fig. 3 shows the young fry after it has broken its scales. Fig. 4 shows the fish at a more advanced stage, the sac being much smaller, having been nearly absorbed; and Fig. 5 represents the fish after the entire disappearance (by absorption) of the sac. At this stage it begins to feed, and grows very rapidly under favorable circumstances—that is, in pure spring water of the right temperature, and with plenty of food. The latter is the first thing sought for by the young fish, and the habit or instinct thus early developed strengthens and remains until extinguished with life.

The reader can judge of the rapid growth of trout by comparing Fig. 6 with the cut representing a two-year-old on this page. The trout produces from two hundred to two thousand spawn, each according to their size and age. After obtaining the spawn, it is placed in the hatching-troughs, which are covered by a suitable house, to screen the young trout from the glare of the sun, and protect them from storms of hail, that might in a moment destroy thousands of them, and from a heavy fall of rain, that would wash them from the troughs where they are kept several weeks after hatching.

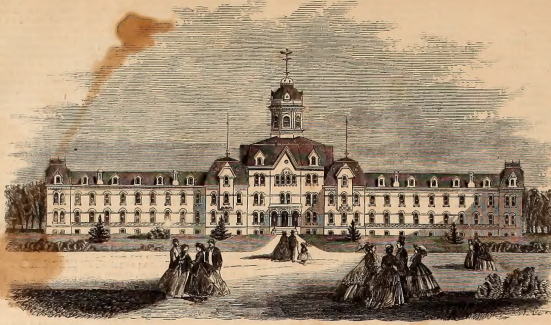
Mr. Green's troughs are three in number: The water is brought from the main stream through bored logs and received into a tank (A), six feet long, two feet eight inches wide, and a foot and a half deep, entering at B, from whence it passes through six strainers (c c c c c).



At D it passes into the trough E, running entirely across the end of the house, and from thence by small gates (which are regulated at pleasure to increase or diminish the flow of water) it passes into the several hatching-troughs (F F F). These troughs are subdivided, or rather, two are placed together, and between them are passages (H H) for conveniently distributing the spawn, inspecting the operation of hatching, and feeding the young fish. It will be observed that the troughs are partitioned into small squares. By this arrangement the force of the current is checked at each bar, and the trout are prevented from huddling in a mass and becoming suffocated.

A TWO-YEAR OLD TROUT—FULL SIZE.

The space (f) on one side is a platform, having a sluice and the various conveniences for feeding, etc. At one end (f) is a pond eighteen feet square, with about two feet depth of water. If by any means trout escape from the troughs, they cannot get beyond this pond, and the room is ample for keeping millions until they are two or three inches long. From this pond the water passes at K into the main stream.

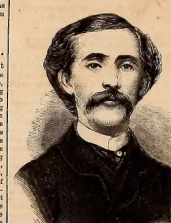
The hatching-house and troughs, though both expensive, are complete in arrangement, and are fulfilling the highest anticipations of their persevering and enterprising proprietor. The bottoms of the troughs are covered with small clean gravel, over which the water passes by gentle flow. Thus prepared, they are ready for the reception of the impregnated spawn, which are spread evenly over the gravel by a dexterous movement of the water—the spawn not being touched or allowed to come in contact with anything but the water and gravel. Impregnated spawn sink to the bottom, even in water running with considerable force, and will remain stationary, if undisturbed, until the young fish begin their efforts for a release from confinement. In from fifteen to twenty days after the spawn are deposited, the young fish (Fig. 2) is discernible with the naked eye.

THE GERMAN HOSPITAL ON SEVENTY-SEVENTH STREET, BETWEEN LEXINGTON AND FOURTH AVENUES, NEW YORK.—SEE PAGE 375.

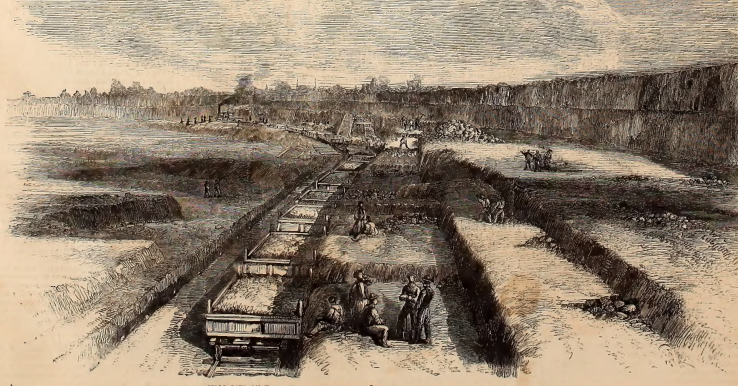
The spawn can be transported from the eighth to the fifteenth day after impregnation, in glass bottles filled with water, by express to any part of the country, with safety, and will nearly all hatch if distributed thinly over well-prepared gravel beds in the stream near the spring, where the current is gentle and the temperature remains from forty to forty-six degrees through the winter, and will nearly all take care of themselves after hatching through the spring and summer, and grow to from three to five inches in length by fall. This is the easiest and cheapest way to stock all streams and ponds where the temperature and water will permit. But where they will not, then they must be stocked with trout.

An outlay of from five to five hundred dollars, in spawn and preparing the stream and gravel beds, according to the amount any one may feel disposed to invest, will produce a corresponding show in the early spring of young trout. Some of these young trout will spawn in the fall, and all the fall following, and with proper care will in a few years fully stock the stream or pond, and will pay the owner and angler for all the expense and trouble, in the very exciting sport of taking them on the fly, as well as a delicious meal daily.

The advantage of artificial fish-culture over the natural process, when properly pursued, is most striking. Under the most favorable circumstances to be expected, it is estimated that only about five to ten per cent. of spawn come to maturity in creeks. They are fed upon by other fish; washed from spawning-beds by floods; covered up with sediment; "gobbled up"—in settled localities—by ducks and geese, and in various other ways destroyed. Besides all this, the few trout which do mature in the natural way are killed out of season in spite of laws designed to protect them; driven from their former homes by the poison from tanneries, and filth from other manufacturing establishments, while the mud and fluid washings cover the gravel beds where only trout will spawn. Those who would raise fish, and especially trout, must provide them with pure spring water, and ponds protected as carefully as they would protect their orchards from worms, or their flocks from wolves.



MR. JAMES MAXWELL, OF THE SUSQUEHANNA B. B. CLUB, WILKESBARRE, PA.



OUR BASE-BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.

NUMBER six of our portraits of prominent base-ball players is that of Mr. James Maxwell, the noted catcher of the Susquehanna Club of Wilkesbarre, Pa., one of the recent accessions to the clubs belonging to the National Association. The Susquehanna Club was organized in July, 1865, by about twenty young men of Wilkesbarre; the majority of whom were practically ignorant of base-ball as improved by the National Association, the game of their school-boy days being the only one they were familiar with. It was not long, however, before they acquired the requisite skill, by practice, to place them on an equal footing with other clubs of the State outside of Philadelphia, several interesting encounters with the Wyoming Club, the Luzerne Club, Unions, of Kingston, Pawnee, of Plymouth, and lastly, their grand match with the celebrated Athletics, rapidly educating them up to the point aimed at, they coming out of their contest with the champions of Philadelphia with a better average score than any other provincial organization of the State.

Mr. Maxwell, the subject of our sketch, is now the catcher of the Susquehanna Club. He is a young man of twenty-four years of age, to whom a sugar-bunnery of invigorating outdoor exercise has imparted great activity and endurance. In 1862 he enlisted in the 143d Regiment P. V., from Luzerne County, and served three years with the regiment, being fortunate enough to escape with life and limb from the dangers of many a stirring scene of strife and carnage in the South. On his return home he became an active member of the Susquehanna Club, and is now its representative player. Although an excellent general player, he more particularly excels in catching, rarely failing to hold every ball passing the batsman. His fearlessness of swiftly batted or thrown balls also specially qualifies him to play a base, and in any position in the field he is a valuable man. Being an accurate and strong thrower, and a sure catch, he can take an out-field position most creditably, and as regards endurance and pluck, he has few equals, his war experience having given him a thorough training in this respect. In fact, no question whether any of the "crack" metropolitan organizations have a player who surpasses him in hi physical qualifications, however their experience may give them an advantage. Socially, "Jimmy" is a favorite with all, and is held in high estimation by his club. We shall give in our next the portrait of Mr. E. G. Seldon, of the Chester Club, Norwich, Conn.

QUESTIONS OF DOUBT.

Is a secret still a secret
If 'tis told to two?
Is a secret still a secret
When revealed to you?
Every mortal has his failings—
So at least they say—
If of one's faults you are aware,
Why need you tell them, pray?

If a gossip meet a gossip
Stopping for a chat,
If a gossip meet a gossip,
What to you is that?
Every gossip has her budget—
Tales both old and new—
Each one sure of her sole source,
No matter tales or true.

If a lady meet a lady
Coming down the square,
If a lady lose a lady
Need you stand and stare?
Every corner you are turning
Need you pause to see
Just how each pretty girl is dressed,
Or wonder who she be?

If a dandy meet a dandy
Regard out spruce and trim,
If a dandy meet a dandy
Need you gaze and grin?
Every fop-spot for the tailors
Must show the style aloud,
Need you look as if to ask
Does "Mother know you're out?"

If a traveler meet a traveler
On our great railway,
If a traveler crowd a traveler,
Which shall get up, pray?
Every learning has its problem
Tell me why should we
Make all unhappy round our path,
When all might happy be?

A LIVING TOMB.

THE day was drawing to a close. The sky was ablaze with the yellow glow of the setting sun, whose lingering rays rested upon the precipitous side of the hills which clustered around the Hudson where it enters the Highlands. The recent storm had left the hills half merged in the glistening water, producing a golden-green shimmering, dreamy tint upon the placid surface.

Floating on the tide, scarcely a ripple marking the slight progress we made before the moderate breath of wind, three young men sat in a sharp-prowed little sailboat.

Its owner, Harry King, sat in the stern, steering; Charlie Thorpe, a friend, who had never before visited the section, and myself, were merely introducing to the beautiful natural scenery, we perceived upon the head of the bowsprit, while I sat in the centre of the boat.

Although a long residence in the vicinity had rendered Harry King somewhat unsusceptible to the grandeur of the scene, it was not in my nature to gaze down the long perspective without sentiments of admiration and awe.

Here were the giant hills clad in radiant green, towering up on either side, bold, rugged, sharply outlined against the summer sky, across which floated a few fleecy, crimson-edged clouds, seemingly scarcely elevated above the mountain-tops. Solemn and above, the river was hemmed in by the everlasting rocks, and, from its surface, no eye could determine the moment when over these lofty heights would come the furious tempests which are so common in this region.

Utterly absorbed to the influence of the moment, without a thought of the material world, scarcely realizing its existence in the presence of the grand rocks and the thoughts it engendered, we "took no note of time."

A few river craft were lying at anchor or becalmed, and were only unrecognizably with the tide down the resplendent aisle between the guardians of the beautiful stream.

The air was still, and the mere shadow of a breeze—it seemed no more—scarcely rippled the sheeny surface. A steamer, waving its forward pennant, gracefully glided into view, evidently born of the cold mountains to the south, so abrupt and so well-concealed was the river's course. For a moment we gazed at her "through glass," and like a thing of life, curving gently and with a graceful sweep into the watery circle, and then speeding on up the long stretch with a rapidity and fountain of many-colored drops wreathing her sharp bow.

"Isn't that beautiful?" exclaimed Harry, as she cut her swift way through the gleaming water between the white sails of the becalmed river craft.

"Beautiful! that doesn't express half of it. It is grand!—sublime!—it is unequaled!"

An exclamation of alarm at that moment broke from Harry's lips. We followed his gaze, and saw a spectacle which made us tremble for our safety.

Right up over our heads, having swept over the mountains unnoticed by me, was a huge, ragged-edged cloud, black as night, whirled hither and thither by great masses of furious wind, which, it was apparent, was raging in upper space. The tree-tops on the mountain-side already felt its force, and we saw them tremble and bow low before its fierce onset. Clouds of dust, interspersed with leaves, rose, in wide circles, and up until swallowed by the distance. In the as yet quiet water, the wild commotion in upper air was plainly sketched, but we had no time to observe the grandeur of the rising storm. It menaced us with dangers more powerful in their influences than its own sublime features.

"Down with that sail!" shouted Harry, after his first glance upward.

We dashed at the lines which held it, but, in our inexperience, rendered the lowering of the sail more difficult, if not impossible.

"Hurry! hurry! for God's sake be quick!" said he again, as he braced himself for the shock, but still keeping his hands upon the halliard-ropes, to bring her up after the first concussion.

We pulled and strained at the tightly-knotted ropes, but found it impossible, in our nervous excitement, to loosen them. And while we labored and cursed our unskillfulness in vain, we could see the tempest sweeping down the mountain-side, carrying destruction in its path, uprooting and dashing the trees about, and more decidedly the trees which had grown there in the sunny soil.

"Take the rudder!" shouted Harry, just a moment before the storm reached us.

I sprung and it, Harry, who understood the management of the boat, leaped from his seat and darted toward the little mast. Before he could reach it the howling wind struck our disproportionate sail.

I heard a sharp crack, a terrible rushing, as if a sea long dammed up and at last released by a narrow opening, a tearing sound from the broad sail, a shrill scream from Thorpe, and saw myriad of brilliant spirits dancing for a brief next instant was floundering in the water, but half conscious, having received a blow from some object in the fierce blast which swept over, my suffocating sensation at my lungs oppressed me, and a fierce ringing and throbbing in my head almost crazed me.

All around was dark. The faint wash of the waves came to my ears as from a great distance convinced me that I was in the water, and not far below the surface. I was a good swimmer, but nothing horrible position it seemed useless to attempt it.

I had consciousness sufficient left to know that, under ordinary circumstances, I would rise to the surface by the mere buoyancy of my body. I knew I was not in the land of spirits, for I had retained a slight knowledge of all that had occurred from the moment the storm burst upon us; and a sharp, grading pain in my side admonished me that I had not escaped injury.

I recollected at that moment of having heard that between the upper timbers of the boat and the bottom of an overturned boat there was to be found a space in which the air was collected, to the advantage of the diver, and vainly tried to avail myself of the knowledge.

During this time, though it could not have been more than a few seconds, I felt a tightening pain in my lungs was increasing, and my brain throbbed frightfully, as if it would burst from its confinement. My head swam, and I sank almost unconsciously, and I suffered excruciating agony, but my mental powers were preternaturally active.

The common assertion that "I saw every action of my life pass in review," to express the vivid distinctness with which the least actions of my life—actions which I had forgotten years before—were arrayed for a brief moment before my mental vision.

I struggled to reach the gunwale of the boat, but I was so entangled in the rigging that it would have been impossible to clear myself and bring out before nature would give up the struggle.

Already I began to see strange visions, and friends from the lower world, darting hither and thither through the water, staring at me with great goggle eyes, that wore a frightful, wild look, as if they only awaited my succumbing to procure me. Death, or a breath, was not so powerful as might be supposed; but the struggle so horrible, of being devoured by these submarine anthropophagi, that I made a last effort to regain exhausted frame, and gave me a momentary acquisition of power to escape such a fearful horror.

I lay on my back with my feet toward the stern of the boat, my head resting on one of the seats—between the seats and the bottom of the boat—my lower limbs entangled in the snake-like rigging.

I placed my elbows upon the seat under my head and raised the upper part of my body to-ward the bottom of the boat. With the strength I had left I struggled and I sank again.

My blood throbbed vehemently in every pulse—made me sick of life-torment, exquisite relief—the desire from its forced confinement, and I receiving all the torture of its struggles. A thousand fiery serpents seemed writhing in my brain, producing a dull sensation—a benumbed semblance of pain. I felt sick and faint, gradually losing strength and all disposition to struggle for life. But the horrible forms, invested with a phosphorescent glare, that surrounded me, and crowded near with each succeeding pulse-beat, as if they were fearful lest the breath would leave the body before they could devour it.

That was the impression I had then, and it roused me to action. I toiled desperately to raise my head—placed face to the upper part of the water and the hard planking, but my arms gave way repeatedly despite my frantic struggles. At length, when I had revived myself for a last effort, the boat lurched heavily, and that threw my face up into the open space where was collected the blessed air. Then one heavenly moment—just one hurried, gasping breath; but never was ambrosia so sweet; never before did mortal realize the transcendent bliss of the gods—and the water waved back over me. My strength revived, and I struggled to breathe, but found a stifling atmosphere; but my arms had become weak, and before my lips could open to take in the precious draught, they withered under me, and I sank down among the horrible water-fiends that crowded still closer around, with a glare of devilish fire in their eyes as they surveyed their prospective prey.

How more than a minute could have elapsed, since my first immersion, but no one can answer me. In my mind I had turned over almost countless plans for escape, but each one was abandoned as soon as thought of. My limbs were so entangled in the rigging that I had at once given up all hope of releasing them in time to drag under the boat and rise on the outside, and when my waning strength warned me that to do it at this moment would be but to drop into the cavernous jaws that impatiently gaped to receive me.

My heart throbbed fearfully, and the blood rushed and seethed along the turgid veins as if to burst them asunder. My limbs and body seemed to be gradually swelling to prodigious dimensions, and I wondered, even while despairingly struggling, how such a small vessel could contain a corpse of such proportions.

I was on the point of succumbing to the stupor which was rapidly stealing over me. The agony of my throbbing head grew less, and dull. The boat expanded until it covered and shrouded a world. I felt as dismal fluid. The little ray of light which streamed down into the dark water was obscured, and I began to sink; very slowly at first, but as the latter was a mere, clammy substance which refused to receive me; then the speed increased, and I seemed to be fal ing through space, with a dull consciousness that, when the motion ceased, I would be in the spirit-land. Then my senses were wrapped in a delicious stupor, and the water sounded above me like the notes of a grand symphony, in which the waterfiends took part, murmuring their weird notes soothingly, and blending one with their gibbering, mesmeric eyes.

But the spell was broken. There was a scrambling noise on the outside of the boat, and a moment afterward a voice. Though the tones were unmistakable, I knew that it was Harry who spoke. His voice was in strange contrast with the supernatural strains, and I jarred unpleasantly in the scene around. As I was not yet ready to a sense of my peril, the sweet music died into a hoarse murmur from the gaping throats of the fiends from, as I thought, their prey escaping at the moment they were assured of its possession.

The love of life, which had been growing weaker every moment, suddenly grew strong, and I made a cause fresh strength and a return of the terrible struggle. I made a frantic effort, placed my hands upon the seat, and, after a desperate struggle, during which I cleared away a portion of the tangled rigging from my feet, I succeeded in reaching once more the life-giving air. I had kept my mouth firmly closed during all those moments of mental and physical agony; my teeth were set together with a power sufficient to have crushed them to atoms, and my lips were locked until the blood, denied its course, had been forced back from the white lines. But when my face reached the cool air, they opened with a spring, and took in the precious element, and the blood returned in still more furiously through my exhausted frame, and I redoubled the torture; and it drove away the phantom-like fiends, though they still hovered around and under the boat, thoughtfully paddling their dark wings, and speculating upon the length of time during which I could exist upon the modicum of air.

I heard a scream, I heard Harry's voice, but though it sounded loud and harsh, his words were barely distinguishable.

"Are you dying? he is gone!" said he. "I would have given my life to have saved his!"

"He must be under the boat," said Thorpe. "He is a good swimmer; and under circumstances so tangled in the rigging, we would have seen him before now."

I lay down below the surface as my strength gave way; but the few inspirations I had been able to make had so revived me that I was not long suffocating. I recollected that pressure of mind was always recommended to persons in peril, and as the danger appeared to grow less formidable with my clearity, I did not despair of regaining sufficient strength to inform them of my position; therefore I remained as still as much as possible, but making what exertion I could to free my limbs from the encircling ropes.

I succeeded in releasing my right foot, and next my burning, whirling brain would conjure fearful images of death in this horrible form, and then in that, and I would start up to shriek, but to have it strangled ere it left my tongue. Then the water-fiends drew near, and leered at me with their eyes, and I shuddered with fear, and painfully raised my throbbing head into the external air, and drank—oh, how eagerly!—the precious air, until, exhausted, I dropped below the surface.

They hovered on the upturned boat, and the little ray of light streamed down through the shimmering water like an angel's finger-tip, diffusing a halo around it, not only on the coming water, but around my heart, with a gleam of hopefulness.

I examined it closely for some time, unable to account for it, but at length remembered that a plug had been fitted into the bottom of the boat, and concluded that Harry had used the replenishment of my small stock of air.

The water beat against the boat with a muffled sound, uninterrupting, regular as the strokes of a clock, and even rhythmical to my preternaturally acute senses.

If I could only get my feet clear, they would drop, and I could inhale without difficulty," I thought, as each surge of the boat threw me under. But the more I struggled the more securely seemed the knots to be tied about them, and for a time I relinquished the attempt as too exhausting. Only at intervals, when the feeling of suffocation became unendurable, did I exert my strength to raise my face.

The open space between the boat and the water did not exceed six inches, but it was sufficient, with a constant change, to keep me supported life it had been possible to keep my face in it.

Death consciously suggested itself, but I was so occupied with the plans that I had not time to think even of eternity. I still retained life, and therefore I retained strength as the feverish heat of my blood was tempered by aeration, and became a more hopeful of-rescue.

While under the raving draught after an unusually long immersion, I heard Harry shouting. He uttered a cry of disappointment, and the boat gave a sudden lurch, and was sent rapidly through the water, while many voices joined in a cry that seemed like a distant echo.

"They are rescued," I thought, "and I will be left here to perish."

Maddened by this thought, I kicked the planking, and struggled frantically to be heard; but my tongue refused utterance, and I was soon consoled to discover

"O God! deliver me from this doom," I groaned inwardly, as the water-fiends again crowded around me, and I felt my agony, kicking their shriveled lips in anticipation.

The water around me grew darker. A spark shot across my eyes; then another and another, until the black space under and around me was filled by them; some were bitter yellow, others blue, others burning with the speed of thought, crossing and recrossing in the dark expanse, writing in letters of fire my eyes ached following their brilliant course. Sharp, gleaming eyes in the midst of these whirling sparks gazed at me, and I thought I could read my fate in them:

"Melancholy accident; boat capsized; one man drowned; sense of two persons from the overturned boat."

The boat bore, a clasping for the burial, a little gathering in a pleasant room looking out upon the river, where now were seated my mother and sister, unconscious of the deadly peril; their grief at the loss of the only son and the eldest relative; a winding procession following to the grave, and the interment of one whose life, every day, scarce thought of death. I heard the earth and pebbles fall with a hollow sound upon the coffin lid, and a general swelling of sorrow from those of those loved ones whom I claimed as my own; and the washing of the water formed an appropriate requiem.

All this I saw pictured in the glaring eyes of my enemies, and I marveled me to desperation. My arms received tenfold strength, and my head grew clear in an instant, and the sparkling water-fiends vanished, leaving the sunlit and black, except where the blessed ray streamed down through the little orifice, a visitant from the upper world.

"What would I not give were I but on the other side of this shell which encircles me!"

The thought weighed heavily a number of pounds so far as my reaching it was concerned.

I beat the thin planks furiously with my water-logged hands, and waited my reward. It came, for which, in that narrow space, sounded like the muffled thunder. But no response was elicited. I was forced to the conclusion that I had been unheard.

Death was still. The voices had ceased, and I was deprived of companionship. Why? I read this those whom I had cherished, now exert themselves to save me? Why had I received from the most thoughtful friendship; but now, when I most needed it, no hand, of all those I had thought would serve me, was even extended to draw me from my perilous situation.

"Ah, friendship! what art thou?"

A dark, impenetrable shadow—a necessity but when the sky is clear and fortune smiles. Left alone—left to die! To mark the feeble quiverings of a heart that would have its last drop of blood wrung from it ere fate harsh could come to them. Left to die! Left to wait and watch the grim array that was already advancing to devour me. Left here alone, with not one friend to cheer the last hour of life! Left to die and be forgotten! And while help was yet near. They must know I am here! Why don't they look? cast but one glance upon the water! Why don't they see and, with a few fathoms little to them that another life hangs in the balance.

Is there no hope?"

In the glittering eyes around me I read the response:

"None!"

"But I will not die! So young, with such bright prospects—such usefulness in the world! Surely, Providence never intended that I should die in such horrible manner. Oh, no! I cannot believe it! Friends are not yet a fiction! Here? Is it in the feeble body? No! It scarce contains sufficient strength to lift the swollen face up to the air above! Ha! is it by means of that I called my friends?' No! They have deserted me when I most needed their assistance. Is it to come from the outside world? Ha! ha! What does it know of me and my danger? What would it care, if I did? I must perish!" and from the murmuring water-fiends came the dismal echo:

"Perish!"

"Ah, but a moment of agony if I so will it. I have but to cease all effort and sink into unconsciousness—but before I succumb I must once more breathe the pure air, farewell, earth! Farewell, mother! Farewell, sister! Farewell—To what besides have it to bid farewell? Surely, not to the professed friends who deserted me? No!"

Thus I raved.

The regular beat of the waves soothed me, and the little orifice in the boat was tinted with beautiful colors—a blending of the rainbow-hues, soft and mellow, widening from the little opening and circling down through the dark waters, imparting to it a portion of their own beautiful coloring. The waves were transformed into musical cadences that glided into my ears, now soft and plaintive, as if grieving for me, and an intermingling of voices that thrilled and yet lulled me to rest.

The pain of my head subsided so perceptibly, so gently, that it seemed as if it were a tangible body releasing its grasp. Then the notes grew loud and discordant, swelling into a grand crescendo, until the whole earth appeared filled with the harsh clangor, the decreasing pain shot up anew, and the choked blood careered with terrible velocity through the swollen veins. But with the pain came returning consciousness and a love of life, which prompted me to make one more effort to save myself.

It was apparent that the boat was in motion, but whither I could not conjecture. It might be that the steamer we had seen just before the catastrophe had taken the boat in tow. If so, salvation was impossible, for already the water seethed up in the little air-chamber, and threatened to cut off even that scanty source of life. Animated by the thought, I struggled wildly, furiously, and, oh, thank God! I succeeded in clearing my feet from the entangled lines, and, as they slowly sank, my head rose until I could press my lips to the orifice; and, oh, how sweet were the long, continuous draughts!

"I may be saved yet!" was the thought that sent a thrill of hope through my system. It was not difficult to keep my mouth pressed to the air-hole, and not much strength was required to preserve my hold upon the rack in the bottom of the boat.

My feet dangled in the water below, at times coming in contact with the streaming cordage, and once they struck against the mast, which I discovered had been broken off short, within a yard of its foot.

The speed of the boat increased. The waters murmured hoarsely on the outside, and the spray sometimes entered; but this was nothing compared with my former situation. That the boat would soon reach the shore I was convinced by the fact that the tide ran at a right angle with our course.

Voices occasionally reached me, and I was strongly tempted to raise my feeble voice in reply but I resisted the temptation, and reserved my strength until it would be of service.

The boat jarred, and some one stood up on it. I placed my lips to the opening, and uttered a cry, which, though uttered with all my power, was so quavering and plaintive that I could scarcely believe it my own.

"Halloo! who is that?" cried Harry.

"Who is what?" replied some one.

"Somebody spoke, and it was Champ's voice."

Again I uttered my quavering call, and this time Harry discovered my situation.

"My God!" said he; "Champ, is that you?"

"It is," I replied, faintly.

"How did you—— But this is no time for asking questions. Back water, men! he is under the boat!" Then to me:

"Can't you drop under the boat and rise on the outside?"

"I am too weak."

"Heavens! what is to be done? I'll come down for you."

"No," said I, "I am almost helpless. How far are we from the shore?"

"Only a few yards."

"Stop in about four feet of water."

"All right. Keep up your spirits; we'll soon have you ashore." Then to himself:

"My God! that's horrible! Only to think of it!"

A rude jar almost tore my grip from the grating.

"Carefully, boys," said Harry. Then to me, doubtingly, as if he expected no answer:

"Did you feel that?"

"For God's sake don't jar the boat so again."

"Look out there, men! You'll be into that rock again."

"No fear, sir; we'll be ashore in a minute."

"We are almost in, Champ."

"Pull slowly," said I. "I'll drop my feet when I can touch."

"Here we are. Back water, men! There, that will do? Can you touch, Champ?"

"Yes."

My feet, swinging under the boat, floated against a rock, but my limbs were so utterly powerless that they bent under me with the first addition of weight. At that moment a hand clutched my foot, and a human form rose up by my side. I loosened my stiffened fingers from the grating, fell into Harry's arms, and the next moment gazed upon the outer world in all its gorgeous splendor.

The storm had passed by, and the hills were resplendently beautiful in their emerald bright verdure. A single beam of warm, yellow sunlight crowned the dark green summit of the opposite mountain, and brought into view one tree, which, though blasted and withered, still stood up among the contrasted vegetation to meet the gladsome light. Like that tree, bruised and withered, I leaned on the shoulder of my friend, under the light of heaven, surrounded by living forms, warm hearts and kind hands.

OILING A VENTRILOQUIST.—Many amusing stories are told of the manner in which ventriloquists have imposed upon the ignorant and unsuspecting, but the following incident proves that, sometimes, the tables may be turned and the joker himself made the object of sport. A physician says that he was going down the Mississippi, some months since, on a steamer whose engine was upon the deck, and he sauntered in that vicinity to see the working of the machinery. Near by stood a man apparently bent on the same object. In a few moments a squeaking noise was heard on the opposite side of the engine. Seizing the oil-can—a very large one, by the way—the engineer sought out the dry spot, and, to prevent further noise of the same kind, liberally applied the contents of his can to every joint. All went on well for awhile, when the squeaking was heard in another direction. The oiling process was repeated and quiet restored; but as the engineer was coming quietly around toward the spot occupied by the doctor and the stranger, he heard another squeak. This time he detected the true cause of the difficulty. The stranger was a ventriloquist. Walking directly up behind him, he seized the astonished joker by the back of the neck, and emptied the contents of the can down his spine. "There!" said he, "I don't believe that engine will squeak again."

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

SOME time since, the Executive Committee of the National Union Club at Washington issued a call for a Convention of Union men of all parties, to be held at Philadelphia, on the 14th of August. The call met with a prompt response, and district conventions were held in all the States, to appoint delegates to attend the grand rally. For the first time in several years representatives from all the States and Territories have now met in council, with the object of harmonizing discordant elements, and promoting good feeling and a speedy restoration of the Union.

The Convention was organized with Major-General John A. Dix as temporary chairman, and the appointment of the necessary committees. Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, was chosen president, and one delegate from each State and Territory appointed vice-president. The proceedings of the Convention were characterized with unusual harmony, very few speeches being made, and a sense of the grave responsibilities of the occasion prompting the members to act rather than to talk. The building in which the sessions were held, familiarly known as the "Wigwam," was not completed, and, in consequence, a considerable degree of discomfort was experienced. We give a view of the exterior of the Wigwam, according to the architect's plan. It is about one hundred feet in width and one hundred and sixty feet deep. The roof of the central portion is fifty feet above the floor, while that of the sides is forty feet. The main front of the building is finished with an imposing entrance, and large windows for light and air. On entering, there is a main floor one hundred and thirty feet long by seventy feet wide, on which planed board seats are placed for the delegates, with a platform at the further end for the officers and for the representatives of the press. Rising on either side are sixteen tiers of standing-places, which will accommodate four thousand or five thousand persons, who will have to stand. Over the main entrance, and facing the President, there is a stand for a band of music. Under the amphitheatrical stands for reporters are committee-rooms, telegraph offices, bar-rooms, etc. The interior is decorated with flags and a portrait of Andrew Johnson, while from the platform rises an arch with thirty-six sections, each section being the armorial insignia of a State, with Pennsylvania as a keystone. The roof is made water-tight with patent felting.

An interesting incident occurred at the opening of the Convention, the delegates from Massachusetts and South Carolina entering the building arm-in-arm, causing the highest degree of excitement and enthusiasm. Outside the Wigwam, the crowds of carriages and pedestrians, and the booths for refreshments, presented a busy, changing scene, only repeating, however, the accompaniments of all large gatherings. We have devoted a considerable portion of our pages this week to illustrate the prominent features of this Convention, which, in many respects, is the most important ever held in our country.

THE GERMAN HOSPITAL.

THE want of a German Hospital in this city has long been felt, and the idea of erecting one frequently entertained. The first practical effort toward carrying out this idea, was made by the directors of the German Society, who appointed a special committee to accumulate a hospital fund by soliciting contributions, arranging concerts, and establishing aid societies. In 1862 a charter was obtained from the Legislature, and a Board of Trustees organized. A suitable site has been obtained, and the contract made for the erection of one pavilion, the corner-stone of which was laid on the 13th ult.

Our German population manifested their interest in this movement by turning out in immense crowds, and making liberal contributions for the work.

This hospital is to be built upon the ground inclosed by Seventy-sixth and Seventy-seventh streets and Lexington and Fourth avenues.

The present project is to build two pavilions, an administrative building, also a building for a laundry, engine and boiler-room.

Each pavilion is to be 167 feet long, and 52 feet wide at the ends, and 30 feet wide in the centre which forms the wards.

The administrative building is to be 60 by 80 feet, and the laundry building is to be 42 by 60 feet.

The pavilions are to have a cellar, basement, first and second stories and attic. The principal wards in the first and second stories are 106 feet long, 27 feet wide, and 16 feet high. They will accommodate thirty-two patients each, allowing 1,431 cubic feet to each patient.

At one end of the pavilions adjoining the wards, are the physicians' and nurses' rooms, convalescent and dining-halls, pantry, scullery, linen-room, hoist-way, dumb-waiters, and a stairway 6 feet wide, with a platform of half the height of the story.

At the opposite end of the pavilions are to be the water-closets, baths, lavatories, separated from the wards by a lobby.

The wards are to be heated by hot air, the air being heated by coils of steam-pipes arranged in chambers in the cellar. The cold air is to be conducted to these chambers from a large air-shaft outside of the building, receiving its supply some thirty feet above the surface of the ground.

The basement is to be devoted to accident and ophthalmic wards, examining and store-rooms, closets, etc. The attic is to be appropriated to private wards, attendants' rooms, also tank and ventilating chambers. Each pavilion is to have a surgical operating ward.

The administrative building is to contain, in the basement, the principal kitchen, apothecary's room and laboratory, servants' dining-hall and store-rooms.

In the first story will be the Superintendent's offices, his private apartments, public reception-rooms, library, etc. In the second story is to be a chapel, private wards and bedrooms. The upper story is to contain the operating theatre and servants' bedrooms.

The buildings are to be built of hollow brick walls, with stone trimmings to doors and windows. The walls and ceilings in the wards are to be painted with oil, the floors will be laid with Georgia pine or oak, and waxed; the floors of bath and water-closet rooms are to be tiled. The buildings are to be connected by corridors which will be inclosed in the basement, and to be an open colonnade in first story with a balustrade on the roof so as to afford communication in the basement, first and second stories, between all the buildings. In the basement of the corridor will be a tram-way or track, like a railroad, for trucks to convey food, clothing and fuel, from one building to another, where it can be conveyed to all the stories by means of lifts or dumb-waiters.

The dead-house will be a separate building on the ground fronting Lexington avenue. It will contain a dead-chamber, an examination and watchman's room; also an observation ward, for contagious or doubtful diseases.

P. J. CULLINAN.

THIS gentleman, whose portrait we publish this week, was recently the happy instrument of saving the lives of four young ladies, who had ventured into water beyond a proper depth. Such acts of courage and daring are worthy of record, and one who risks his life to save others deserves the regard of his race.

The following account of the transaction, which occurred on the 3d of August, appeared in the daily papers:

"On Friday afternoon last, about four o'clock, as a bevy of young girls, whose parents are among the guests at Thompson's hotel, at the Nevesink Highlands, were bathing in Shrewsbury river, near the steamboat landing, half a dozen of them got into the deep water, and four of them would probably have been drowned but for the timely assistance of a brave deliverer. With the alarm given this deliverer promptly appeared, in the person of a young gentleman of New York, Mr. P. J. Cullinan, who, without waiting even to take his watch from his pocket, plunged into the river, bringing up first one of the young ladies, and then one in each hand, who were lifted into boats brought to the rescue; but the fourth of the girls thus saved had gone to the bottom, and was secured by Mr. Cullinan only by diving and bringing her up by main strength. When brought to the shore she was completely insensible. She was a daughter of Gen. Hendrickson, a soldier of the Union army, in the late war, who bears something more in his person of the evidences of his services to his country than Gen. Santa Anna. The names of the girls are Miss Isabella Adams, of New Orleans; Miss Ella Van Wie, of New Jersey; and Miss Emma Birkbeck of New York. Another of the party, Miss Henrietta Wallis, daughter of Dr. Geo. B. Wallis, of this city, being able to swim a little, not only saved herself, but a companion, Miss Mary Dodge, of New York, by pulling her ashore, and was instrumental in saving the others by instantly running for relief.

NEW JERSEY MARL PITS.

THE advantages of marl as a fertilizer have been greatly overlooked in this country until within a very recent period. With our immense territory of rich soil in the new States, we had little care to improve lands worn out with long cultivation, and so neglected the means of maintaining the fertility of our farms, although they were often quite available. Of late years it has been found more advantageous to make lands adjacent to market as productive as possible, and immense sums have been expended for the various appliances which subserve that end. Among these, marl occupies a prominent place. It is found in almost inexhaustible quantities in many parts of the country, and can be profitably applied to almost any soil. The lower portions of New Jersey contain immense quantities of marl, and our illustration shows the manner of digging and sending it from the pits. It is easily cut out, and is thrown directly into the cars, which stand on convenient tracks, by which it is taken wherever it is needed. By its use lands that were quite barren have been made to produce liberally, rewarding amply the labor and money expended upon them.

BIERSTADT'S ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

THE London Saturday Review has the following appreciative notice of our countryman's picture, exhibiting in London:

"Mr. Albert Bierstadt's large picture of 'The Rocky Mountains,' exhibited separately in the Haymarket, is remarkable for its reliance on a kind of interest which the general chorus of critics has hitherto persistently declared to be insufficient for artistic purposes. The received theory is, that without human interest the materials of natural landscape have no artistic availableness, and that no natural scenery, however beautiful, can affect us in a work of art, unless subtly connected in our minds with associations of history or tradition. Mr. Bierstadt is too true a lover of nature to feel bound by any such narrow theory as this, and his picture is the illustration of a scene which is absolutely devoid of all historic association whatever, and which, so far from being familiar to the eyes of tourists, had remained unvisited by white men until an exploring party, of which the artist was himself a member, discovered it in the year 1858.

"It is true that an Indian encampment is introduced in the foreground of the picture, but the strongest advocate of 'human interest' can scarcely maintain that the wretched existence of these savages confers any reflected glory of man's achievement on these towering crests beyond. We may even go further, and argue that the introduction of the Indian camp gives to the natural landscape an importance yet more overwhelming than if no human life were visible in its august presence. Here is a magnificent mountain-chain, a great series of natural fortresses, which all the power of the human race cannot remove, and which quietly stands in its place, armed with avalanche and glacier, and fortified with walls of solid rock ten thousand yards thick. Before this majestic strength of nature, here so inconvenient to westward-marching man, and so unconquerable by him, even all the armies of the North would be as insignificant as an army of ants before Stonehenge; but the artist has not given us men in their force, but men in their decrepitude, the remnant of an ill-used and suffering people, seeking respite and safety in the wilderness. And yet it is an interesting picture—in many respects, the most interesting landscape of the year. To some spectators, as certainly to ourselves, these summits may be not the less sublime that nobody has yet lunched upon them, and these valleys not the less beautiful because no large hotels have as yet been built in them for the accommodation of tourists.

"We can well believe that in the very loneliness and remoteness of this magnificent scenery Mr. Bierstadt has found a kind of fascination. He was the first artist who ever witnessed these glories, and his picture is the announcement of a discovery. This merit, such as it is, the work shares with many sketches which travelers bring home with them; but in this instance novelty of material is combined with unusual care and skill in artistic arrangement. This picture is not a piece of mere copyism of nature, but a work of thoughtful and elaborate art. It is evidently not accurate in the topographic sense; the painter has freely used materials combined, it is probable, from many memoranda; this we know at once from the absence of all stiffness and awkwardness in the composition. But notwithstanding this full use of artistic liberty, we receive no doubt a more complete impression of the character of the scenery than any piece of simple topography, however conscientious, would have conveyed to us. It is late summer and evening, an hour before sunset; the slanting sunshine lights vividly a sweet natural pasture, with groups of magnificent trees; this pasture slopes gradually to the margin of an exquisitely beautiful little lake, bounded by rocky precipices to the right and in front of us. Over these pours a white waterfall, and, beyond the waterfall, the eye climbs range behind range of rocky eminences, till it finds itself in the region of glaciers, and on the heights of eternal snow. These Rocky Mountains, it appears, are not less magnificent than our European Alps, and Landor Peak, the central object in this picture, might fairly bear comparison with the Jungfrau or Monte Rosa. Mr. Bierstadt has been so anxious to preserve the large relations of his picture as a whole, that his mountain-drawing suffers a little by some want of detail and sharpness. There used to be a theory among our younger English painters that detail proved industry, and the absence of it sloth; but we know too well how easy it is to sacrifice days and weeks over the relations of a few tones where there is no detail whatever, to accuse Mr. Bierstadt of indolence.

"These Rocky Mountains are not minutely drawn, and, so far as form is concerned, there is even a lack of delicacy; but the extreme care with which the tones are everywhere studied deserves our warmest thanks, and we are the more bound to give expression to them that such care meets usually little other reward than the internal one of a satisfied artistic conscience. The same praise is due to the admirable gradations of light. Although the effect is a brilliant one, involving broad shadows on the foreground and middle distance, with strong contrasting lights, we suffer, nevertheless, from no sense of abruptness, and the luminous appearance of the whole picture is due far more to subtle passages of tenderly-increasing brightness than to the force of its most striking points."

BRIDE-CATCHING.

LET us take a Turanian example of bride-racing. The ceremony, which is performed on horseback, is as follows:

A girl is first mounted, who rides off at full speed. Her lover pursues: if he overtakes her, she becomes his wife. * * * * But it sometimes happens that the woman does not wish to marry the person by whom she is pursued. In this case she will not suffer him to overtake her. We were assured that no instance occurs of a Kalmuck girl being thus caught unless she has a partiality to the pursuer. If she dislikes him she rides, to use the language of English sportsmen, "neck or naught," until she has completely effected her escape, or until her pursuer's horse becomes exhausted, leaving her at liberty to return and to be afterward chased by some more favored lover. That is, the chase, where it leads to marriage, as it commonly does, is a mere form, the woman meaning to be caught. As it is always preceded by a contract, fixing the bride's price and consenting to the marriage, it is, undoubtedly, merely a symbolical ceremony, in which the idea is that of "the unprotected female" trying to escape from her would-be captor. The chance of escape which it offers to a reluctant bride is an accident of a ceremony, the origin of which cannot possibly be referred to a desire to consult the bride's inclinations. Vambéry says that this "marriage ceremonial," no doubt with modifications from case to case, is in use among all the nomads of Central Asia. He describes it in the case of the Turkomans. The young maiden, attired in bridal costume, mounts a high-bred courser, taking on her lap the carcass of a lamb or goat. She sets off at full gallop, followed by the bridegroom and other young men of the party, also on horseback. She has always to strive, by adroit turns, etc., to avoid her pursuers, that no one of them approach near enough to snatch from her the burden in her lap. The chase ends, I suppose, in her being caught. "The game" is called Kökûri.

But all wild tribes have not troops of horses, like the hordes of Central Asia. When the Australian, who gets his wives by the ancient methods de facto, chases a loubra, it is on foot. Should he ever reduce the race to a symbol, the symbol will certainly represent a foot-race. And this is the form of bride-racing among the natives of Singapore, who also, being accustomed to boating, have an aquatic variety of the form. They hold great jubilees, at the fruit season, near the groves of the tribe, which often lie together, and during these jubilees their marriages take place.

"The marriage ceremony," says Mr. Cameron, "is a simple one, and the new acquaintance of the morning is often the bride of the evening. On the part of the suitor it is more a matter of arrangement with the parents than of courtship with the daughter; but there is a form generally observed which reminds one strongly of the old tale of Hippomenes and Atalanta. If the tribe is on the bank of a lake or stream, the damsel is given a canoe and a double-bladed paddle, and allowed a start of some distance; the suitor, similarly equipped, starts off in chase. If he succeeds in overtaking her, she becomes his wife; if not, the match is broken off.

It is seldom that objection is offered at the last moment, and the race is generally a short one. The maiden's arms are strong, but her heart is soft and her nature warm, and she soon becomes a willing captive. If the marriage takes place where no stream is near, a round circle of a certain size is formed, the damsel is stripped of all but a waistband, and given half the circle's start in advance; and if she succeeds in running three times round before her suitor comes up with her, she is entitled to remain a virgin; if not, she must consent to the bonds of matrimony. As in the other case, but few outstrip their lovers." This is the Kalmuck case over again. We find the form both as bride-racing and as bride-catching in various quarters in the islands of the Pacific.

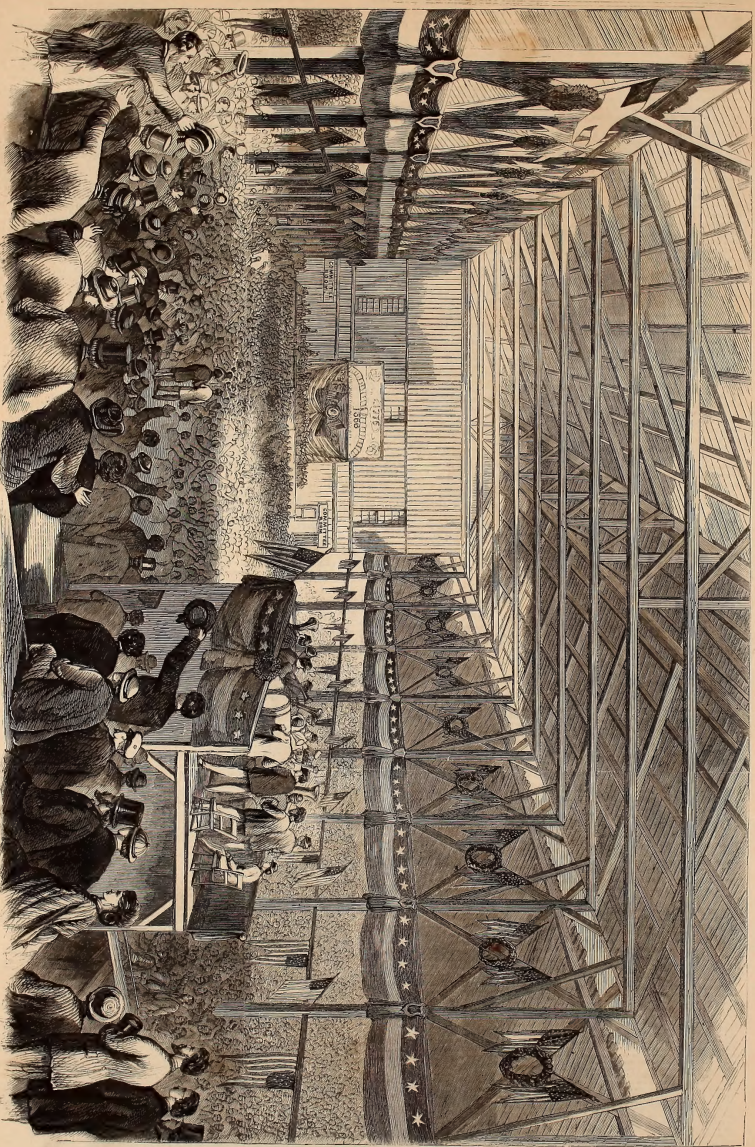
NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND.—At some of the railway stations it is customary to have a fixed charge for a good substantial meal. On one occasion I was very much amused by the manœuvers of a green Yankee who was unacquainted with the rules, and evidently aimed at sustaining nature as economically as possible. After a careful scrutiny of the viands, and sundry hesitating movements, he at length decided to treat himself to a bun and a glass of water; and as he munched and drank, I could detect a self-sufficient expression in his glance at the gormandizers, which seemed to imply, "Yes, it's all very pleasant now, but wait till the reckoning comes." The twenty minutes allowed for dinner had almost elapsed when our abstemious philosopher marched boldly up to a beautiful young woman who presided at the counter, and held forth two cents, saying in a bantering tone:

"I've had a bun and a glass of water, tew, but I calkilate you don't charge for that."

"Fifty cents, if you please, sir," was the young lady's calm reply.

"Fifty cents for a bun and glass of water! Do you see any green in this child's eye?"

"Fifty cents for dinner, sir. We have one stated price, as you can see by the printed notices, and eat whatever you like."



The Americans have a keen enjoyment of a practical joke; and the spectacle of the 'cute Yankee, who had so cleverly over-reached himself, tickled the bystanders exceedingly as they crowded round to gaze on the individual who had been so "severely sold." But "this child" was not so easily discomfited. He glanced at the clock. Perhaps there was still time to retrieve his false position.

"Fifty cents, and eat whatever you like—eh?"

"That's so."

Paying his fifty cents, without another word, the Yankee sprang upon the eatables like a famished wolf. With one hand he secured a plate of ham, with the other a dish of custards. While his greedy eyes roved over distant dainties, he darted at every dish within his reach, heaping his plate with the most heterogeneous comestibles, and swallowing indiscriminately the contents of savory and fruit pies, preserves, pickles, vegetables, &c. Judging from his voracity, his object seemed to be, not to eat fifty cents' worth, but to empty every dish on the table. Luckily, perhaps, for him, at this critical moment the signal for starting was given, and the Yankee, casting a glance of despair at the table, started up with red face and protruding eyes, and with a "hunk" of bread and cheese in his hand, made his way to the train, where he subsided, after the fashion of a gorged boa-constrictor.

METALLIC DUST.—Travelers along the sea-shore of New Zealand have to wear vails to protect their faces and eyes from a fine metallic sand, which rises with every puff of wind. This sand proves upon analysis to be the purest ore of iron known. Its composition is peroxyd of iron, 88·45; oxyd of titanium with silica, 11·43; loss, 12. Experiments show that the ore yields in the furnace 75 per cent. of the best iron; or, by cementation, an excellent quality of steel. The smelting was done in a little furnace, 17 inches diameter by 10 inches deep. A tun of fuel (coke) made a tun of metal titaniferous, which, added in the proportion of five per cent. to ordinary steel, transforms it to first quality.

THE INTERIOR OF THE WIGWAM—SCENE AT THE OPENING OF THE CONVENTION—THE DELEGATES FROM MASSACHUSETTS AND SOUTH CAROLINA ENTERING ARM-IN-ARM.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, F. B. SCHELL.—SEE PAGE 375.

THE EXTERIOR OF THE GREAT WIGWAM, GIRARD AVENUE, PHILADELPHIA, IN WHICH THE NATIONAL UNION CONVENTION HELD THEIR DELIBERATIONS ON TUESDAY 14TH, WEDNESDAY 15TH, AND THURSDAY 16TH, OF AUGUST.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, F. H. SCHELL.

I NEVER WILL GROW OLD.

Oh! no, I never will grow old,
Though years on years roll by,
And silver o'er my dark brown hair,
And dim my laughing eye!

They shall not shrivel up my soul,
Nor dim the glance of love
My heart casts on this world of ours,
And lifts to that above!

Now, with a passion for those haunts
Where wild free nature reigns,
With life's full leaping through my heart,
And reveling through my veins,

'Tis hard to think the time must come
When I can seek no more,
With step bold as a mountain child's,
Deep dell and rocky shore;

No longer on my swift young steed,
Bound o'er the hills as now,
And meet half-way the winds that toss
The locks from my brow!

Yet still my spirit may go forth
Where fearless fancy leads,
May take at will as glorious rides,
On wild, invisible steeds!

Ye tell me as a mourning dream
Shall pass away, ere long,
My humble, yet most passionate
Adoring love of song.

No, no! life's ills may throng my way,
And pride may bend the knee,
And Hope's bright banner lure the dust—
The Muse shall deathless be!

Madeline's Marriage; OR, THE STEPDAUGHTER.

CHAPTER VII.—FAMILY SECRETS.

MAYFIELDS found Cyril awaiting her in the dining-room the next morning. The sunshine gave her assurance. She was as calm and as grave as he. He caught himself stealing stolen glances at the quiet face with its pure colorless complexion and setting of heavy braids, at the graceless, plain form, and the sly, proud way in which the young mistress of the Villa Dessa did the honors of the breakfast-table.

"I dare say, Mrs. St. Hellens?" he inquired, maliciously assuming that impressive courtesy of address of the world which is so embarrassing to its unsophisticated victim.

Madeline was just noticing the absurd contortions which the two little plain face was reflected in, as every phase and upon every angle of the chased volutes of the massive silver service behind which she sat. The ingenuity and perfectly unclassic unsung, and for all her dignity, she was awkward and uncomfortable; but as she opened her lips and said, "Oh, yes, thank you," all the grotesque little images opened their lips also, with such ludicrous effect that she smiled broadly and, in her smile, gave her companion and critic a clue to the rarest charm of her face, and in a listless, amateur way he wished he could make her smile so again.

"Will you think me officious if I offer to introduce you to your new home?" he ashed, presently.

"I should like it to have you," she said soberly.

So when they had pushed their chairs back he rose, saying with a bow, "I am at your service," and Madeline followed him, in and out the dark, high-ceiled chambers, with their patterned windows, uncurtained except by the fog without, with their carved, massive high-post bedsteads, solid, cumbersome sideboards and escritoires, and mirror which had been brought from France before the Revolution—all the paraphernalia accumulated during a century, and seen dimly through the dis coating of cobwebs and mold. "I'd no idea that the old house was in such a ruinous state," Cyril said, as he shut slumber, as the doors they closed after them rang out dreary echoes. "You will have plenty to occupy you in getting established here;" and he turned to Madeline, who followed, stepping quietly, and holding her hands folded in a sort of reverential way before her.

"Mr. St. Hellens told mamma that he intended furnishing the house as soon as he got here," she said, simply.

"If my father's health had been better he would, of course, have relieved you of the responsibilities which will fall upon you now," her guide replied, with significance.

The drawing-room had its bookcase—the key lost, the volumes long unread; its spinnet, untouched for many years which had not been used for many a year; ottomans bordered with faded wreaths; all the memorials of life and interest which outlived their time and are inexpressibly touching.

The two who stood silently in the dingy room—handsome, fresh-hearted, young—seemed out of place, like shameless usurpers come to trouble the past. The rooms belonged rather to the silent portraits of dark eyed women and men from the walls, with dreamy reproach—to the ancestral St. Hellenses, who kept watch from the canvas that had outlasted the clay. Madeline shivered—something of this sort coming into her mind; and Cyril, his own spirits somehow clogged, hurried her away.

It was pleasanter out of doors. The tall magnolia trees were still glistening and green, and the sward smooth as velvet. There was a hedge of roses, all abloom; some of the blossoms as white and pure as the cluster that one of the pictured lady's in the parlor held in her jeweled hand; others, creamy and perfect as wax, dyed gorgeous with Syrian crimson, with damask, and red, and every one fresh and dewy. Madeline broke off branch after branch, with avaricious extravagance. All at once, pausing with a pained look, she said:

"Can you tell me why Mr. St. Hellens does not like roses?"

Cyril looked surprised.

"Does he not?"

"No," said Madeline, going back to those days which were really so near, in the past, and which yet seemed so very far away: "I took him some roses when I first knew him, and Simon said he could not bear the perfume."

"Simon?"

"Yes."

"Strange!" said Cyril St. Hellens.

Something about his expression gave Madeline courage to ask a question, or rather to define a thought, which had come to her time and again through the days of the journey—a troubling thought which refused to be put off.

"I don't understand"—she hesitated, and looked into Cyril's face, hoping he would comprehend her meaning, but his eyes were dropped, and he waited—"about—Simon," she added, with a sort of graphic determination.

"He has been with my father a great many years," was the reply.

"Yes—I know," but her tone was unsatisfied. There was a brief pause.

"Shall we rest a few moments while you arrange your cousin?"

She followed him to a rustic bench near, and they sat down.

"I don't know that I care for them," she said, indifferently. "I was thinking I would take them to Mr. St. Hellens, and then I remembered."

She began plucking off the petals and scattering them around, with her eyes fastened upon them. Cyril studied her, but there was not a line in her face that offered a clue to her history or her character.

"I really don't believe she is ambitious," he mused. "What in the world has tempted her?"

"You are very young to have married, Mrs. St. Hellens," he ventured.

"I am sixteen."

He smiled.

"And my father is forty-seven."

"I thought he was older than that," she said, with unconscious frankness.

"I think he looks older. He has had so much poor health—and so many keen disappointments."

She looked up with interest.

"Has he told you nothing of his life?" seeing that he had touched the right chord.

"Nothing."

"He has a daughter, you know," trying to rouse her curiosity.

"Yes."

"And yet you are his first wife." Cyril spoke abruptly.

Madeline's large eyes grew grave with surprise.

"I do not think," continued Cyril, "that I shall have much confidence in telling you something of his history."

She was silent, neither inviting nor declining.

"I think it is fair you should be told."

"I should like to." Her voice was earnest; in a manner shocked.

"Mr. St. Hellens and my mother—were once engaged," he began, with some little hesitation. "They were about of an age, twenty or twenty-one, I think. The engagement was brought about by the parents of both. They had never met until just prior to the time proposed for their marriage. Is my mother's name familiar to you in connection with Mr. St. Hellens?"

"No," said Madeline, hastily; pray, do not tell me anything which is disagreeable to you."

"There is nothing disagreeable," he answered, mechanically, laughing. "Mr. St. Hellens was—what he is. Mr. St. Hellens met a relative—a distant relative of hers—a Mexican by birth, whose name was Isa Carstarphen. Miss Carstarphen was very beautiful—very different from my mother—a lawless, untamed child the family considered her, for she had lived there. She was brought home to the parlor, and still took her meals with her governess in the nursery. But stopping, as he was in the habit of doing, at the house of a friend, there was a Badeau—he met Miss Carstarphord—rather clandestinely, I think—and won her heart, Mr. St. Hellens says in his life, violently in love. His engagement with my mother meantime continued, and the preparations for the marriage progressed, while he and Miss Carstarphord were continually, and secretly meeting, and his whole heart was given to the former circumstance. Just before, he has often told me how little he justified it to himself. He seemed, he says, so wound in the toils of his former circumstances that, for a finger was free, and accident at last detected and extricated him. It was only a week previous to the wedding."

"But you do not mean that he—that he had—"

"I do not understand what you mean."

"You said he—never—married any one?" She was attempted to say, in explanation of her meaning.

"You shall hear. A week before my mother and he were to have been married, she and her father went quite by accident to a room which was rarely occupied, except by the ladies of the family while at home, and which was not dusk; and opening the door suddenly, they saw, by the firelight, Mr. St. Hellens with Miss Carstarphord, passionately clasped in each other's arms. My grandfather's anger was excessive at this outrage against his hospitality and honor, and as he attempted to visit it upon Miss Carstarphord, Mr. St. Hellens immediately and fully explained. His marriage with my mother was, of course, rendered impracticable—he begged permission to marry Miss Carstarphord. My grandfather would not listen to his entreaties; he was exasperated beyond measure, he ordered Mr. St. Hellens from the house, and the following day started with Miss Carstarphord for Baton Rouge, where he placed her in a convent. Mr. St. Hellens used every means to propitiate him, to obtain pardon, and permission to marry the woman he loved. His own parents, however, were deeply as severe as my mother's, and he found himself perfectly powerless in his separation from Miss Carstarphord. He learned finally, in some difficulty, at last, that she was in a Mission Religieuse, of the Order of the Sacred Heart, despite her determination to be loved her. It was not until some months after they had been parted that he obtained the information of the whereabouts of the convent—Simon, head porter, in fact, of the convent—Simon——"

"Simon!" Madeline repeated the name with a start, which to her very heart.

"Yes; he occupied rather an authoritative and confidential position, having charge of many of the outside arrangements of the religieuses, and being in high favor, and completely trusted by the Mother Superior, owing to some peculiar circumstances of his life——"

"Peculiar circumstances?" interrupted Madeline."

"Yes; his history was rather a strange one; and the mystery is how Mr. St. Hellens ever won him over, for he was fanatical in his devotion to the church. However, he succeeded in corrupting him—as they called it—until he agreed to enable him to meet Miss Carstarphord for one last time, for they had wrought upon her imaginative, excitable temperament until they had persuaded her to take the veil, as she was undergoing by this time the ordeal of preparation. It was the night previous to the ceremony that the interview was accomplished. That night the novice is obliged to spend alone, in the chapel, in prayer. They were at some distance from the dormitories, and at midnight Mr. St. Hellens was admitted, by Simon's agency, for a final interview, to the earth, which is the church. It was a moonlight night. He advanced cautiously through the corridors, opened the door of the chapel, and found Miss Carstarphord prostrate before the altar, upon the floor. He spoke, touched her. She did not answer. He raised her in his arms and kissed her kitheen, and so were and was that he would have hardly recognized her. He believed that her fears and vigils had killed her; and in the madness of the moment the sacrilege was forgotten—for the St. Hellenses have all strong passions—and it was, therefore, truly a sacrilege—and he carried her with him from the convent. Next morning, secreted in his room, she awoke to consciousness. Her repentance was possible to them, a return was not. The novice was missed, Simon implicated, and Mr. St. Hellens fled. There was no alternative but flight, and accordingly the three were smuggled on board a vessel bound for France. No legal marriage, owing to their joint religious views, was possible. They, therefore, secreted themselves in a quiet hamlet, and lived absorbed and contented lives. Some years passed, when Mr. St. Hellens's parents and my mother's were dead, and my mother married. Mr. St. Hellens's property remained still unannounced, and established themselves in the seclusion of Villa Desir. It was from that long retirements which your husband occupies were fitted up."

Cyril St. Hellens paused and looked at his companion. Mr. St. Hellens sat as him with some startled eyes, her face perfectly blanched, her nerveless fingers dropped heavily in her lapful of wilting roses.

"Why, what is the matter?" he exclaimed. "Does my story frighten you, Mrs. St. Hellens?"

"Why, no. It is not—trying to shake off her nervousness."

"But what is the matter, then?" and he looked at her with actual anxiety. "What are you thinking of, that you look so scared?"

"Why—I—nothing," she answered, faintly, glancing around her with a sort of bewilderment.

"You are tired, perhaps? Shall I finish some other time? It is getting late—almost dinner-time, too. I will tell you the rest to-night. I shall have to make the most of my time, for I must leave Dorset soon."

"Well," she acquiesced, rising as if something oppressed her. On their way to the house they met Simon.

"Mr. St. Hellens would receive them," he said. It did not at the moment occur to Madeline as strange that the man should thus assume the control of his master's time—the privilege of ushering or not ushering in his son and his wife.

In his strange, helpless lethargy—his brain clouded, his body weak—he seemed to have given up all power, and in this faint present—to have lapsed into the vivid past.

Madeline, still more keenly, experienced a sense of the peculiar circumstances. What right had she to meddle with the ashes of the consuming passion which had withered the life of the man by the bed-side, and destroyed her? What right to assume the place, to ask for the regard, whose memory was so sacredly to another? She was but better left to the care of the one being who linked him with what he had lost? She followed the outside as if in a dream.

Mr. St. Hellens's apartments were bright and cheerful—but to Madeline they were crowded with ghosts. The rooms were small, but quite parted in their way. Of the suite, one door was closed—always closed, Madeline found afterward.

CHAPTER VIII.—A NEW CAREER.

THERE was little with Mr. St. Hellens was, of course, a mere ceremony. He lay in his dead, unfevvish sleep, still growing older and older, more and more frail—the mask which covered his perceptions an i obscured his mind steadily more impenetrable. He had not recognized Cyril an instant. Sometimes wandering for a moment, he talked of Madeline, seeming to reproach himself.

"You have sent for Dr. James, I suppose?" Cyril said to Simon.

"Yes, sir, last evening. He was here an hour since."

Cyril exhibited no surprise; it was customary that Simon should act unquestioned.

But Madeline, when they were alone in the drawing-room, late that afternoon, said, rather hesitatingly:

"I should have liked to have heard the doctor's opinion of Mr. St. Hellens."

"I have fallen into the way of trusting everything to Simon, because my father gave him unlimited confidence. Simon is free, you know; he is well educated, and really possesses talent. Sometimes I used to feel that my father gave up to him rather too implicitly, but I believe his interest and that of the St. Hellenses are one. Simon has no family, no relations; he is a strict Catholic; in that, I think, my father's great regard for him lay."

Madeline did not pursue the subject.

She and Cyril sat in the twilight, on either side the fire. They were thinking of one another—strangers. A girl's head with its weight of hair rested upon her hand. The uncertain light left her at times in a deep shadow, and then threw her attitude and expression; the molding of the broad, white brow, the little quiver of the crimson lips, the very tint of the drooping lashes.

"This will be rather a dull life for you, I fear, Mrs. St. Hellens," said Cyril, after a silence.

"You think so because you, yourself, find it dull?" she asked, with an arch smile.

"I," he said, candidly. "I should find it very dull."

"How do you live, Mr. St. Hellens—in the world—has it no society, you know?" She asked the question so innocently that it amused him.

"You do not know much of society, I expect?" he said.

"No."

"It will be easier for me to show you than to tell you. Now, what is your idea of it—of a party, for instance?"

"Yes—I don't know. Music and dancing and gay dresses, and all that. I have never thought much about it."

"I will return from Baltimore I shall bring some of my friends—some of the friends of the family, to visit you. In the meantime you will have a chance to get these dingy old rooms refurbished."

"Are you going to Baltimore?"

"Yes—I am delayed, waiting for my father's arrival. It is on account of his Carstarphord that I go, you know. There is some faint chance finding her at the convent, though, I expect."

"Isa Carstarphord!" exclaimed Madeline, "Mr. St. Hellens's——"

"His daughter. The mother has been dead ten years. Dead to Mr. St. Hellens for fifteen."

"Ah, yes!"

"We believe that she, too, has been detained in a Mission Religieuse."

"Fifteen years, did you say?" asked Madeline, abstractedly.

"Yes—Mrs. St. Hellens, almost as long as you have been in the world, I should."

"How did it happen?" she asked, as if pursuing a separate train of thought.

"Simply enough, I remember, I left my story unfinished this morning. There is not much more. Mr. St. Hellens went to the convent to claim his return found her gone, with no trace left. It was supposed that her confessor—who visited her that day—had induced her, as a work of expiation, to return to a conventual life. It had been remarked that she was greatly devoted to him, and that she spent a great deal in religious exercises for some months. This ultimately proved true, although Mr. St. Hellens could never learn for her until the death took place, some five years after her flight. Then he donated a handsome sum to the Mission in which she died."

"And the child?"

"They had three children. But one of them lived, and she was abducted a few weeks after the mother's flight. Mr. St. Hellens has sought for her unsuccessfully. If she can be found, she is his sole heir—otherwise his estates go to the church."

"Mr. St. Hellens," said Madeline, earnestly, we must find her."

"What troubles me now," said the young man, "is, that if found, she is unprovided for. My father made no will for years, and is incapable regarding her discovery during his lifetime as a certainty. You know he could not alter it in his present condition."

"But," said Madeline, in an incomprehensible tone—"but Mr. St. Hellens——"

Cyril looked into her face narrowly.

"We hope so," he said, formally.

"And you," said Madeline, with embarrassment—"until he does, his—daughter—that is, I would give her half of what Mr. St. Hellens has given me. Simon," and she looked rather anxiously and appealingly at Cyril, "she has a much better right to it."

"Certainly—it is not ambitious," Cyril concluded to himself, without offering the opinion which his companion evidently expected.

The excitement, the novelty was over; the strain, the suspense, and the surprises had had come in such quick succession to Madeline St. Hellens were at an end.

Naturally and unusually widowed, transplanted from one lonely and uncared-for condition to another, which in every way differed from all her past experience, the childish little mistress of the grim old house, the girl-wife of its helpless and unconscious owner wandered wearily from room to room, each one drearier than the last, and all inexpressibly more cheerless than they had seemed as she first saw them, when at least the presence of a companion kept in abeyance the personality of their gloom. From the wing she was practically banished; and when there, the ghostly occupants, with their chill, invisible touches, and the shadows forms which her fancy conjured, oppressed her more than even the watchful pictures and weird reflections that looked from the moldy mirrors.

She fled out of doors. The spicy air of October, with the rustle and hush of its falling leaves and dropping nuts, and long, purple-misted calms, were very gracious to her. But the storms began soon—days of fine, driving rain, and of clouds which never lifted as she watched them, and nights when the loose windows rattled, and the branches of the old trees swung with wails and moans against the casements.

She made no effort to direct her surroundings of their gloomy way. When silent supper had been served, the servants went off to their quarters; the heavy oaken door which opened into the passage leading to the wing was closed, and no sign or sound of companionship came to the half-scared girl as she sat in the great drawing-room alone, watching the two candles, in the tall, solid silver branches, burn slowly away, till ten o'clock came, and Hebe, a warm little yellow girl, opened the door to see if "Miss Madline would like to go to bed?" upon which they went quietly up-stairs to the oak room, with its panels ever ready to open, the great ruffled pillows and suffocating curtains of the bed, through which she saw dimly by the firelight the weird, wicked eyes of the Marmalite face, and the grim, lion-like claws of the carvings upon the furniture, and, watching them, fell asleep. It was one of those epochs, wasted for work for hands or hearts in which character crystalizes unaware.

A month had gone; Cyril had not returned. Nothing had happened. Then one evening, when the candles had been begun to burn away, she was startled by Simon entering the room. She had never liked Simon. She seemed still to possess that instinct which dogs and children have, and what had been at first an indefinite dislike was settling into a positive dread. His resolved, uncompromising expression, and quiet, cold respect, made her shudder.

He begged her pardon in his calm, undersgrade way, as he came in, petrifying her into dignity he had a few words to say to her.

She looked at him inquiringly.

"I have just received a letter from Mr. Cyril, Mrs. St. Hellens."

"Ah!"

It interested her to hear anything.

"He is not to return until Christmas."

"No?"

"That, however, is not the point. I see that you shrink from the trouble, which some one must take, of entering these rooms from time to time. Mr. Cyril hopes to find you comfortable on his return. If you desire, I will undertake what I presume my master would have delegated to me, had his health remained unimpaired."

Madeline sighed.

"If Miss Carstarphord returns with Mr. Cyril," and Simon's eye flashed keenly a moment into her face, "it seems proper that she should find a suitable home."

"Yes, very well; Madeline answered, in a relieved way. "Did the letter mention any one coming?"

"It is madam," and the crafty eyes met hers again, and dropped instantly, and Simon retired.

The next month was busy enough at the Villa Dodo—for a promise par excellence—and when once launched upon the work of change, Madeline engrossed herself delightedly with its details. She had no taste for, or dreamy, or Christmas-boxes—those things that sap enthusiasm as it accumulates—and she mingled a childish pleasure with a maternal one in sorting and arranging. Her eyes grew bright, and a faint pink came into her pale cheeks. The autocrity, which was forced by species upon her, helped her to assert her position with herself.

Christmas week Cyril returned. He was never accustomed to stop at Desir. He had his rooms in the city. He rode out, however, soon after his arrival.

It was late in the winter afternoon. The sun had sunk in a sea of orange, that faded into the frosty grey of twilight sky, as Madeline was summoned alm coming up the avenue. It gave her just a little thrill of excitement and pleasure that some one was coming. She glanced around the rooms, and wondered if he would like the change?

Cyril was used to handsome rooms; the Verrelis, and Scarsdales, and the Antonos had richer curtains and softer carpets. He would not be apt to notice them. But Madeline had made the drawing-room of Desir unique. Against the wall hung glistening festoons of holly, brightened with berries, and other festoons to meet them of mistletoe, heavy with opals and pearls, making a splendor of Christmas jewels for the yule-time. Madeline's bright taste and little shrewd hands crept out toward the glow and warmth of the festival. She had made mottoes of the scriptural text and, in red wreaths and devices of the same berry corner, twisting the running pine around the glittering candelabras and the frame of the pictured lady, who, surveyed her summer roses and bright and eager she drew Cyril into the room like an expectant child, and then, frightened at her freedom, waited for him to speak. He looked at her first, she was so like some dainty dancer. Her small, graceful head, full frizzled, nevertheless, seemed always drooping with its heavy coils of hair; the exquisite cutting of her features, and the strange purity of her skin heightened by the semblance. He was not used to her sort of beauty.

"The rooms were pretty—yes, very pretty," but he did not seem to be thinking of them.

"I have not found her, Mrs. St. Hellens," he said, in a troubled way.

Madeline had longed to know. She had coveted the coming of the girl with her strange title. Her life was lonesome; she sighed:

"I am very sorry."

"Do you think my father will understand—is there any change?"

"Not say."

"I must see him."

"I will go with you. I have been waiting for you, and have not seen him to-day."

Emerging through the dark, narrow passages, they were dazzled by a soft, clear light. Some faint sense, lingering upon the air, and a rapt strain of a Christmas melody came toward them. They started, looking at each other, seeming to shrink back on the threshold of an enchantment.

"It is some of Simon's witchery," said Cyril, advancing with a light laugh, and they entered Mr. St. Hellen's room.

The invalid's eyes were unclosed, with a dreamy, half-pleased expression upon his lips sweet, and this faint emanation of vitality seemed to hover over his shrunken frame, like the poise of a spirit about to depart.

Opposite the bed was erected an altar. It was draped in satin, heavily embroidered, dimmed, shadowy, with age, but sumptuous, rich and soft by the light of the wax candles, which burned upon it, before a picture of Our Lady—a fair and dazzling picture, with a face of ineffable beauty, and under its crown of light. A silver standard before the Madonna, between vases of flowers, thrilling in odor and vivid of tint, and among them blasted the jewels of a woman's trinkets, the brilliants of a necklace, the relics of a brooch, making a core of glitter in the surrounding shadows of the heavily festooned room; while a faint perfume of incense crept through the closed door of the sealed chamber, where some priested spirit of deepest organ chords struggled in a passion of rare power.

Madeline held her breath. The tempting, secluded luxuries of a Romish religion lured her around her. She realized what had been in the woman's heart who had stolen away from love and home, fascinated by the mystery and the intoxication of infinite mystery—who had given up all this dim, fading earthly, for an everlasting spiritual.

Cyril was speaking to his father. He spoke her name;

"You know, sir, who I mean—your Isa."

The sick man did not understand him. He had lapsed from his actual Christmas Eve to one of a quarter of a century ago, and Cyril, presuming at last to leave him to his scattered memories.

He and Madeline retired to the parlor.

"Simon has extinguished me," she said, with childish disappointment that her decoration did not compare with those of her mysterious altar.

He looked around gravely, with a kind of pity for the little thing, an idea of soothing her disappointment, as one does that of a child.

"You must go with me to the cathedral tomorrow, Mrs. St. Hellens; and, by-the-way, I got tickets for the opera Thursday night, presuming you would go. It is the first night of the season."

Madeline's eyes met those of the young man openly, with a steady candor.

"Is that right, Mr. St. Hellens?" she asked.

"You mean ?——"

Her face crimsoned.

"You know I told you I knew so little of the world; and I would not——"

"I understand you," he said, with an unaccustomed thrill of admiration and respect; "and I believe"—and he smiled reassuringly"—that I could be as safe in your companionship as you are, if you had graduated under Mrs. Grundy, and, above all, as jealous of Mrs. Remi St. Hellens's impressions about the world as she herself."

She looked satisfied.

"There is one thing," he continued, with a direct, embarrassed logic, "that I will speak of, Mrs. St. Hellens, since you have made me a sort of court of appeal."

Madeline looked at him anxiously. Somehow she was always prepared for the old fault-finding, which had hurt her so.

"I think"—he paused—"you will not mind what I say?"

"Oh, no," wonderingly.

"Well, then, would you not rather call me by my first name?"

She stared.

"You know——"

Her face flushed again to her temples.

"Yes, of course. I am Cyril to Isa"; and she, for once, was less embarrassed than he.

"Now," he added, "I must say good night."

"Won't you stay with us?" in a little, beseeching way.

He was engaged that evening—a Christmas Eve at the Verrelis—and yet he hesitated for a minute. It was Christmas eve. It did seem hard to leave the little creature alone that night. But the coming evening—one of them on each side of the fire! His father's wife was pretty and innocent, but she was not all of his pilgrimage. He turned her some little gift as a surprise for Christmas morning and take her to the cathedral to hear the mass, and then he could go. Madeline was disappointed for some one, for he didn't really see how she lived in such a vacuum. But as to staying to tea with her—

"It is really impossible to-night," he said; and she sympathized with his regret, and, instead of watching him wistfully out of the door, she went back to the company of the tall candles.

SACREDNESS OF TEARS.—There is a sacredness in tears. They are not a mark of weakness, but of power. They speak more eloquently than ten thousand tongues. They are the messengers of overwhelming grief, of deep contrition, and unspeakable love. They never, wanting any argument to prove that man is fallen, and that he is mortal. They are the only sign of sorrow that is not human, which can never decay; sanctified, when the fountains of feeling are purified, when the tears are gushing forth as crystal streams. Or, speak not harshly to the stricken one weeping in silence. Break not the deep solemnity by rude laughter or intrusive footsteps. It spies not woman's tears—they are wept make her an angel. Scoff not if the stern heart of manhood is sometimes melted to tears—they are what help to elevate him above the brute. I love to see tears of affection. They are pointed tokens; but still more I love to see a person shed tears in private. It shows more tenderness of heart. If I should be the object of such tenderness, I would be too much swept over my grave, I could never die in peace.

THE CONTRAST

BY MRS. T. DAVIS.

Joy, joy for the beautiful birds
Who build with singing their nests,
And joy for the children, whose pleasant words
Flow out from their innocent breasts;
But, alas! for the heart that is old,
Ere time with a shadow hath cast,
Whose hope is vanished, whose love is cold,
Whose pleasures are all with the past.

Oh well for the lambs in the grass,
That play in the sunshine all day,
And well for the mother, whose bright hours pass
In singing her baby to sleep;
But, alas! for the woman, who ne'er
Hath cradled a babe on her breast—
Who never hath felt of a mother the fear
And hope and delicious unrest.

From Ancona to Rome.

We had been traveling for a good many months through Germany, and had just crossed over from Trieste (that modern Babel, where you hear every language that is spoken under the sun) to Ancona, the nearest port to Rome. From the sea, Ancona looks beautiful enough, for it is possessing, in Trajan's triumphal arch, one of the most perfect relics of antiquity; but a very few minutes on shore are quite sufficient to prove that you are a long way indeed from honest, clean Germany. It makes one almost ill, even now, to think of the dirt, and the discomfort, and the smells, and the cheating we encountered there.

To avoid spending the night in Ancona, we lost no time in starting for Loretto, the first halting stage on our journey toward Rome. We were charged enormously for it, but it broke down three times on the outskirts of the town, and an hour or two was wasted in patching up the broken springs. Whenever we came to a hill (and the road for the first day almost nothing but hills) our posthones set up a shout—the first time to be considered drum. The shout, however, meant no harm, but was intended merely as a signal to any one who might be plowing near, and as the signal was duly understood. A couple of oxen or cows (as was the case in one instance) were taken out of the plow and harnessed as leaders to our team, their equipage consisted at such times of a very rheumatic carriage and four still more rheumatic horses—horses and carriage as long distance as one can well be. A pair of conductor and a soldier occupied the box, the former intended as our defense against the postillions, the latter to protect the bandits while the co-driver, good in hand, walked leisurely by the side, pricking the poor, patient beasts every now and then by of direction. And yet, after all, this is the bright side of the picture; for there are no bright sides to Italy; just as the end of our day's journey, we reached the bottom of the hill, on which stands Loretto, and full half the town must have come out to meet us, men, women, and children—all intent on begging. They rushed out of their ambush with frantic gesticulations and shouting in the same tone, and almost in the same words, always ending, "For love of Maria Madonna!" Some tried flattery: "Great Englishman!" "Great French General!" "A halfpenny!" Others attempted to work on our compassion: "Fame, fame! I have fourteen brothers and sisters, all orphans, and starving! Date mi qualche cosa!" The district of Loretto, which records can describe her dirty an Italian beggar is—squeezed up close, in hopes of squeezing something out of us through sheer pressure. We were told that the steepness of the hill let us at their mercy, for the horses could not possibly go faster than a walking pace. At length, to our very great relief, we found refuge in the dreary, dirty hotel, at the top.

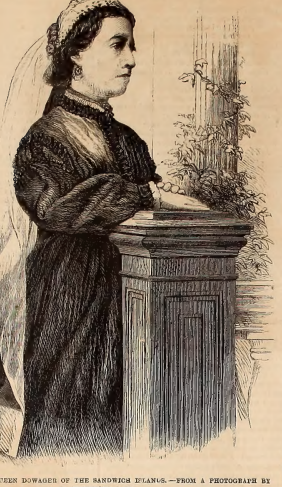
Except Rome itself, there is no spot in all Italy so sacred as Loretto. No one need be told the reason, for the Santa Casa, or Holy House, has been looked on as a holy shrine by nearly half the very building in which the Virgin lived at Nazareth, in which the angel Gabriel appeared to her, and where the Holy Child passed His early life; and its claims are sanctioned by all the authority of the Roman Church: yet at Nazareth there is not a trace of the house, there is a rival Santa Casa, making equal claim to be genuine. The tradition is of comparatively modern date, for it is not believed to have left Nazareth than the thirteenth century, and it is first (Stanley's "Sinai and Palestine," p. 346) found in detail in a bull of Leo X., bearing date of A.D. 1518.

The story itself, and the evidence on which it rests, are among the most marvelous of European legends. In the Apostles Creed in the catechism of the Santa Cas stands. We subjoin the English version of it, as authorized by authority, which we purchased on the spot:

"THE MIRACULOUS ORIGIN AND TRANSLATION OF THE CHURCH OF OUR LADY OF LORETTO.

"The Church of Loretto was a chamber of the house of the B. V. nigh Hierusalem in the city of Nazareth, in which she was born and bred and salused by the angel and therein conceived and brought up her sonne Jesus to the age of twelve years. This chamber after the accession of our Saviour was by the apostles consecrated into a church in honor of our B. Lady, and S. Luke made a picture in her likeness, extant, because it be scene at this very day. It was frequented with great devotion by the people of the country where it stood, whilst they were Catolicks, but when leaving the faith of Christ they followed the sect of Mahomet, the angels took it and carryinge it into Sclavonia, placed it by a towne called Fiumeo, where not being had in due reverence, they againe transported it over sea, to a wood in the territory of Recanati, belonging to a noble woman called Loreta, from whom it took the name of our B. Lady of Loreto, and thence againe they carried it by reason of the many robberies committed, to a mountain of two brothers in the said territory and from thence finally, in respect of their disagreement about the gifts and offerings, to the common highway not far distant, where it now remains without foundation, famous for many signes, graces, and miracles, whereat the inhabitants of Recanati who often came to see it, much wondering, environed it with a strong and thick wall, yet could no man tell whence it came originally." (Vide Bull of A.C.C.XV. Leo X.) appeared in sleep to a holy devout man, to whom she revealed it, and he obtained the same of the archbishop of this province. She determining forthwith to try the truth of one vision, resolved to chooses XVI. men of credit, who to that effect should go together to the city of Nazareth, as they did, carrying with them the treasure of the church, and comparing there with the foundations yet remane, they found them wholy agreable, and in a wall thereby ingraven that it had stood there and had left the place, which done, they presently returning back, published the promises to be true, and from that time forwards it hath been certainly knowne that this church was the chamber of the B. V. to which Christians begun then, and have ever since had, great devotion, for that in it daily she hath donne and doth many sad many miracles, one Friar Paul de Silva an armit of great sanctity who lived in a cottage next unto this church, whither daily he went to matins, said that for ten years' space, on the VIII. of September and twenty hours before day he saw that descend from heaven upon it which he said was the B. Virgin who there shewed her-self on the feast of the nativity. The confirmation of which two vertuous men of the said city of Recanati divers times saw and heard the same, and Gregorio was Governor of the forenamed church, as followeth the one cald Paul Renaldini avouched that his grandmother Antonella Gualtier saw what time she brought it over sea, and in the presence of the forementioned wood, and had often visited it there, the which Antonella was very lame, in like manner affirmed, that his grandfather being C.XX. yeares cold had also much frequented it in the same place, and for a further proof, that it had been there, reported that his grandfather's grandfather had a house upon the place, wherein he dwelt, and that in his time it was carryed by the same space from the to the mountaine of the two brothers where they placed it as aforesaid, to the honour of the ever glorious Virgin."

Loretto consists almost entirely of one long street, very very parsdise of beggars—tenanted by numberless small convents and convents painted candles: indeed, we began to doubt whether anything else was to be purchased in the town. At the end of this long street stands the vast cathedral, massive as a fortress, and flanked by the huge palace of the governor. In the recesses of its nave stands the Santa Casa. On the outside it is cased with marbles, magnificently carved; but within, it is but the appearance of a poor cottage (its size in thirty-seven feet by sixteen), and its walls are of bare brick unplastered. It is entered by a door at the upper end, and we, if we recollect right, standing a little back, in the famous statue of "Our Lady of Loretto," carved (so tradition says), by no less an artist than the evangelist St. Luke himself. It is of wood, and very black, apparently with age. Once it was covered with pearls, and even still is richly ornamented. The altar is placed a yard or two in front of the wall, and in front of the chimney of the Casa; and a passage is made all behind it, by which access is obtained to the fireplace. The fire-place itself is a bit of faith-stool, or prie-dieu; and to our astonishment every pilgrim seemed to think his devotions incomplete if he did not kneel and attered a short prayer, looking up the chimney.



A hundred and twenty masses are daily said within the walls of the Holy House, too, mass is continually being recited, and it is considered a special honor to be allowed to officiate there. Round the outside of the shrine are numerous votive gifts (the wealth of many of which were there) troops of pilgrims—old and young, rich and poor, wholly progressing on their knees, a well-worn track in the marble containing the route. A noble bronze door closes the Casa, and this door is a presentment figure of our Saviour. Strange to say, unless our eyes altogether deceived us, the figure was also fairly worn away by the kisses of the faithful, or of the faithless.

But it was time to be leaving Loretto, for many hours and many days' journey must necessarily lie between us and our journey's end. Slowly then we left the Adriatic sea and inland day found. We passed along the vale of Cittumna, still famous, as in the day, for its white oxen. Socrate say a little to our left, not just then, unfortunately, having its head white with snow; and then we crossed the Apennines—with perfect safety and distance, while the few remains of Veii we passed close by. Then came a turn to the road, and we caught our first sight of Rome. There it lay, miles off, across the Campagna, with little white with which we could make out except one great glorious dome, towering high above everything else.

The approach to Rome is impressive from its very solitude. We saw no human being for miles and miles, except occasional shepherds with mantles worn in long, drowsy fashion, and taking care of a few ragged sheep, and followed by lean, fierce-eyed dogs. We spent that night of solitude we passed two or three of the same sort, keeping watch by turns through the dead quiet of a common.

At length we came to the Tiber, and saw its yellow waters rushing between its high boundary banks, and we crossed by the Milvian bridge. Then came the first love from the top of the golden candlestick which had been taken from the temple at Jerusalem was thrown into the stream by Maxentius when retreating before Constantine. The story seems to rest on a better basis of probability than most traditions of the kind; and any government but that of the Pope would surely have had its truth put to the test before now.

Another quarter of an hour and we were past the English church (there are no rums on this side of the city), and were within the walls, and in another instant found ourselves detained at one of the most prominent symptoms of modern civilization —the custom-house.

NASMYTH AND THE CANDLESTICKS.

THE SWILL AND GARBAGE GATHERERS.

It is a common remark, that some people can live on what others waste; and its truthfulness is constantly exemplified in every large city. A fastidious taste rejects what necessity eagerly clutches, and so everything has its use, and even the refuse from one's tables and kitchens possesses sufficient value to be carefully collected and taken away for future use. This is the occupation of the swill-gatherer, a specimen of whom is shown in the accompanying illustration. The picture is a common, if not an attractive one, and as a type of our society, and one of the institutions of our city, possesses sufficient interest to be formally presented to the public. For through the alchemy of our republicanism, we shall shortly see some of these despised and humble scavengers fitted to become sovereigns, invested with the franchise of citizens, and in all probability converted into Aldermen and similar dignitaries. We must not despise small things, and we should not despise the material out of which shall hereafter be formed voters and office-holders, and magnates of every degree.

These swill-gatherers are invariably foreigners—Irish and German, usually—who, with their carts drawn by dogs or goats, or both, perambulate the streets, and carry off the garbage that is deposited each morning in the boxes or gutters. Nothing comes amiss to them: the refuse of the kitchen, scraps of every kind, pieces of coal, rags, old paper; they find a use for all, and pursue their calling as industriously as if they were occupying a far more exalted sphere. When their cart is full, or they have completed their round, they repair to their home—an humble shanty generally, on the outskirts of the city—and there assort their miscellaneous load.

The swill is fed to pigs and goats, of which they always keep a sufficient number to consume their daily collection; the coal is put aside for fuel, and the rags, paper, scraps of iron, etc., are put by themselves, and in due time sold to the regular dealers in such articles. From the various products thus obtained, these people manage to eke out a livelihood, and sometimes to accumulate the means of bettering their condition. They are industrious and frugal, and perform an important service in removing what would soon become an intolerable nuisance. Their place in society is an humble one, but they have their uses; they fill a niche in the grand structure, and in their faithful perseverance are well worthy of imitation.

SHOOTING THE RAPIDS IN A NEW GRANADIAN RIVER.

BUENAVENTURA, a small seaport of New Granada, just to the southward of Panama, is at the mouth of the Dagua, a little stream dignified with the name of river, but in reality nothing but a mountain-torrent, but rendered important as being the only means of communication with a rich and comparatively thickly populated country.

Down this torrent, in small canoes, all the products of the country are sent, and European goods in return sent back. The dexterity which these canoe-men evince, and the labor they perform, are really wonderful; for though the mountain-stream has two heavy falls and a series of rapids, only wide enough for a small canoe, yet up and down this unpromising and seemingly impracticable stream hundreds of tuns of freight and many passengers are borne. But one passenger can be accommodated in each canoe, and he must always remain in a reclining position. The descent is frightful; but one loses all fear in admiration of the dexterity of the negro canoe-men, who stand, one at the stern with ready paddle, to steer the light bark in either direction, while the bow-man, with his long pole poised in air, stands with eye intent upon the boiling rapid as the canoe whirls like lightning down the current, ready at any instant to ward her off a dangerous rock.

The ascent is accomplished by boatmen wading often neck-deep, the one ahead and the other astern shoving their light craft against the stream. Often in flying through a rapid the water will boil over the gunwales, when the canoe-man, without a moment relaxing his vigilance, using his foot for a scoop, will, with a wonderful sauce, bail the bout of a considerable amount of water.

QUEEN EMMA.

In a country where every man is a sovereign royalty is regarded with very little favor, and royal visitors are received with more of curiosity than interest. Where there is no assumption of superiority, and no disposition to claim the prerogatives of courtly authority on the part of those visitors we receive them cordially and accord to them the respect due to their rank; and so we have extended to the royal lady from the Sandwich Islands, now our guest, such a welcome as is due to herself as a woman and to the position she has occupied as the representative of power among a people toward whom all our sympathies turn. Queen Emma is the widow of the late Kamehameha IV., is about thirty years of age, and taking no active part in the affairs of State, devotes herself wholly to the instruction and improvement of her people. Her visit to England was mainly with a view to raise funds for missionary purposes, and she succeeded in obtaining about fifty thousand dollars. Her personal virtues and earnest devotion to the welfare of her race render her an object of special regard, and we accord to the woman what, perhaps, we would deny to the queen.

Our portrait will give our readers an idea of her personal appearance.

NASMYTH AND THE CANDLESTICKS.

THE inventor of the steam-hammer—that marvelous application of steam-power which has played so important a part in our mechanical and engineering enterprises—has recently related some anecdotes of his early labors, which are in the highest degree instructive and interesting. Mr. Nasmyth, who was the son of Alexander Nasmyth, the Scottish landscape painter, owed his original fondness for mechanical experiments to his father, who, when not engaged in painting, delighted to amuse himself with lathe-turning, or making mechanical models; but his chief good fortune was in having for a school companion the son of a small iron founder. In company with this lad, James Nasmyth, when only twelve years old, delighted to spend his half-holidays in the little foundry at Edinburgh; and here, by intently watching the workmen at their labors, he quickly learnt to turn out a number of ingenious articles in wood, brass, iron and steel. In working the latter material, he tells us that at the early age of eleven or twelve he had already acquired considerable proficiency. At fifteen he made his first essay at constructing a miniature steam-engine. It had a cylinder of only one inch and three-quarters diameter, but it was really a working steam-engine, and performed useful service in grinding up the oil colors which the elder Nasmyth used in his painting. Subsequently he made other such working models for sale, and with the proceeds was enabled to pay the price of tickets of admission to the lectures on Natural Philosophy and Chemistry, delivered in the University of Edinburgh.

It was not until 1834, and when twenty-six years of age, that Mr. Nasmyth was enabled to start in business for himself in an humble way in Manchester—the city which has now so good reason to be proud of his name. All his engineering tools for commencing business were constructed by himself in Edinburgh, where his father was too poor to give him much assistance. It is related that on one occasion, being altogether without the means of obtaining material for making a brass wheel for a planing machine, he cast his eye upon a glistening row of antique candlesticks made of this metal, which stood in orderly arrangement upon the mantelpiece of the kitchen in his father's house.

KANDYAN CHIEFS.

They were of good metal, and were just the thing for his purpose; but to him at melting them down was to propose a sort of sacrilege, for Alexander Nasmyth had had, as he said, "many a crack" with the pool Burns while these family candlesticks had stood upon the table. At the mother's request, however, the sacrifice was consented to; the candlesticks were carried off at once to the little workshop, and recast into the wheel of the planing machine, which was recently still to be seen in one of the workshops of Mr. Nasmyth, in Manchester.

AN INGENIOUS PONY.

EVERY fresh instance of the wonderful sagacity of animals must be interesting to those who make natural history their study. Numerous as are the extraordinary cases of instinct remarked by many persons, yet every new instance, as it comes home to one, seems stronger than before, till at length the boundary line between reason and instinct becomes very narrow and ill-defined. The following account of the sagacity of a Norwegian pony is a forcible illustration of the power of adapting means to ends which animals frequently display:

During the last summer, autumn and winter, while their masters were abroad, this pony, in company with another, brought at the same time from Norway, had a holiday at grass. They not only enjoyed perfect rest from work, but very soon perfect liberty; inasmuch as no common or uncommon fastening, no devices of the groom availed. They could unfasten, undo, or untie every gate, and ranged at will wherever their inclination led them. For some time they were the companions of a foal last year, which, being a great beauty, was treated to two feeds of corn every day, a luxury denied to the ponies; but one of them, not understanding the meaning of such partiality, and having been brought up with somewhat of republican opinions, always contrived to get through the door of the shed which divided her from the foal's dinner, and to share the oats with him. Various were the contrivances of the groom to baffle the pony's ingenuity, but they all signally failed. If he tied the door with a stout rope, the pony knew how to pick out the knot with her teeth; if he fastened it with a chain and staple and wooden peg, no sooner was his back turned than the peg was drawn and the gate undone. At length, tired of being so often beaten, the man barred the entrance to the shed with a heavy rail. This was a sore trial to the poor pony; and the man looked on from a little distance with a complacent smile, and rubbed his hands with glee at the victory he had at last achieved, as he saw the pony make fruitless efforts to lift the heavy rail with her neck. Her strength was unequal to this, and she seemed at once to give it up in despair, for she turned round and trotted off to her companion. But what was the astonishment of the groom to see her return to the rail with help. She had persuaded her friend, the other Norwegian pony, to come to her aid. They both together put their necks under the rail, and now what one could not accomplish the combined strength of the two achieved—the rail was thrown down, and the way to the corn cleared!

I do not know what means at length succeeded in baffling the pony; but when no longer able to come to the door, she managed to take down the shutter of the shed and feast her eyes at any rate upon the corn.

On a subsequent occasion, when these two Norwegian ponies were confined in a yard, they so repeatedly unfastened the gate (whatever might be the new device of the groom to render it secure) and made their escape, that nothing would avail but to nail it up with some stout nails, when all other means had been tried and failed.

KANDYAN CHIEFS.

SAVAGES of all nations and countries resemble one another in their disposition to wear uncouth ornaments and disfigure their persons. Their idea of greatness is in becoming repulsive; they wish to be feared rather than loved, and generally they are hideous enough to frighten anything possessed of sensibility.

SHOOTING THE RAPIDS OF THE DAGUA, NEW GRANADA.

Our engraving represents some Ceylonese chiefs, who evidently belong to a low type of humanity. They are types of the past, however, as Western customs have changed the former order of things, and modern civilization has dissipated an effete barbarism.

A HAWAIIAN IDOL.

FIFTY years ago the people of the Sandwich Islands worshiped such senseless monstrosities as the specimen presented in another column. To-day a prominent personage of those same islands is receiving the hospitality and attention of our authorities and the respect of our citizens. The contrast is a striking one, but we will not pursue its lessons. The idol above-mentioned was taken from one of the houses where such images were kept, and brought to Boston, some years ago. It is of stone, and upward of six feet high, and altogether a revolting object.

ONLY HUMAN.

"WELL, if Charley thinks I am perfect, I am sorry, that is all; for he will find himself sadly mistaken," said Carrie ARMSTRONG.

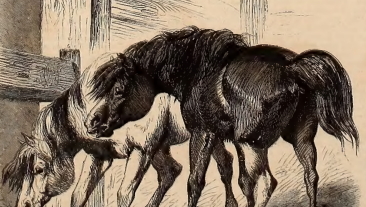
"That is just what I told him, Carrie," said her cousin Ethel. "Though you have as few faults as most of us, you are not a divinity by any means; and, can you believe it, he was quite offended at my frankness, and said I was wanting in true affection and regard for his promised wife; that I was hypocritical in professing so much where it did not exist, when it was only for his happiness and yours that I spoke as I did."

"I shall try to make Charles happy, and I believe I shall, in a measure, succeed," replied Carrie; "but you know, Ethel, what a hasty temper I have; I am afraid I shall not control it any better with him than I have with my own friends at home. The first exercise of it will, I suppose, make the divinity step down from her pedestal. Charles is foolish in that respect."

"That he is, Carrie," broke in her brother. "By the time he has seen the flash and sparkle of those dark eyes, the curl of that pretty lip, the toss of that dainty head, and the torrent of words that can sometimes come out from between those pearly teeth, the faultless angel will begin to assume a form of clay. I have often hoped you would show out before him a little; but you never have."

A merry peal of laughter rang out upon the afternoon air, and the crimson ran up a little higher in the cheeks of the beautiful bride-elect at the playful jest of her brother, which was, after all, not wholly a jest, for those who knew Carrie best, and loved her most, were not unaware of the passionate gusts of temper that would sometimes sweep over her sunny mind, leaving it for the moment dark and unlovely.

There was perhaps a fault somewhere in her early training—for Carrie was the eldest—and a whole troop of uncles and aunts, besides her parents and grandparents, had felt themselves authorized to assist in molding her young mind; and what with plenty of petting and but little correction, she had grown to womanhood without being wholly able to control the whirlwind of temper that sometimes led astray her better judgment and really good nature.



GREAT IDOL AT THE MISSIONARY HOUSE, HAWAII.

From her earliest remembrance she had heard her parents repeat the wonders of her childhood, conspicuous among which were her mad freaks of willfulness, when in childish rage she would throw herself upon the floor, or hide in some cheerless, out-of-the-way place till her temper had expended itself; and she often wished, as she grew older, that instead of fostering this disposition, there had always been a faithful application of Solomon's remedy.

But Carrie was a lovely girl, for all that, and a general favorite, and the two bridesmaids who sat upon either side of her, their fingers busy in setting the last stitches in an elegant morning-robe, that was to compose a part of the bridal trousseau, loved her with true sisterly affection, and were almost as deeply blinded to her faults as the prospective bridegroom himself. And William, her brother, who walked up and down in the shadows of the creepers that covered the veranda lattice, and gave vent to the half-satirical, half-complimentary words, prided himself in his beautiful sister, whose life outnumbered his but two years, and hers had barely reached its twenty-second year; and there was a feeling of regret, not unmingled with envy, that another had come between himself in the affections over which he had so long reigned supreme.

All the long summer afternoon the three fair girls had plied their needles in the pleasant drawing-room, and as the breeze which had been blowing freshly from the south had died out, they gathered up their work and came out upon the balcony, to await the arrival of the three gentlemen who were coming to tea, and to complete the arrangements for the wedding, that was to take place the next Tuesday.

Carrie's father was not a wealthy man, neither was her future and Carrie, with commendable economy, was always busy, and her fingers fashioned the beautiful garments with light, happy smiles, and merry snatches of song breaking over her ruby lips, and with many a bright plan for the new home that was in store for her. And it was an allusion to these pleasant anticipations that called up the remarks with which our story opens.

Carrie Carlin sat in the departing sunlight and chatted gravely or gayly, as the case might be, and William went in and sat down in the parlor, and Mrs. Carlin and Charles Bartlett lingered still upon the garden seat, a little way from the house, so screened by the leafy shrubs that he could catch only a word or so of it, but as near that the merry voices came drifting down to his half-listening ears. A bright crimson spot burned in Mrs. Carlin's cheek, and a look of regret and anger mingled with the puzzled expression upon her face. Then Carrie came with her gay laughter, the girls came out upon the balcony, and finding he was rather early, he sat down on the garden chair, to wait the arrival of his friends. Of course he had heard all they said, and the sting they gave made him forget for the moment they were not intended for his ears, and so he had not a right to be listening to the conversation.

"I wonder if it is possible that I have been so deceived in Carrie, after all, as they say?" he muttered to himself; and then as a quick step sounded down the walk, and a light figure brushed a dress of white muslin against the stalk of pet geranium, and a happy voice warbled the lines of his favorite song as she came leaning over the gate to meet him, he knew, for him, he arose and walked down to the other end of the garden, with the quick impulse to escape from the thoughts that his lips did not move, "No, no; Carrie is all my fond imagination has pictured her. I will not believe that she is deceiving me. I thought he did, but there was a shadow upon his face that evening, a rankling memory in his breast; and he watched her so narrowly that she took the look amiss.

It was strange the young man should have fancied the woman of the world to be more beautiful, but it seemed he had, for he supposed her an exception to all else—perfect, where every one beside was imperfect. It was well he hated everything else the awakening might have been too sudden. He had been married two months before it came, and then it was the fairest guard upon his heart, a seal upon her lips. She remembered what her cousin Ethel had said, and she dreaded to undertake the woman's part, for she still considered every kind attention as before their marriage, and lavished upon her many endearing words that are never to be used again. Everything was new and beautiful about her home. Her father had insisted that it should be his gift to them, and it seemed as if Carrie, without being too ungenerous and unamiable, could not find any excuse for the exercise of that temper, which she so often called the bane of her life, the gloomy nightshade that hung about her, poisoning where all else would have been bright and fair.

She had cried, also, in expecting too much from her husband, though she had never acknowledged it even to herself; and there were faults in him that startled, almost shocked her. Even now with these rationally, let alone considering, the cloven foot, which she had been hiding from her, so suddenly peep out. She had known before but a small part of their intercourse had not been so familiar as to bring out the faults in each, but one morning after Charles had gone to his office of business, she found his watch-key under, his dressing-table covered with various et ceteras, which he had not thought of returning to their proper place in desk or mantel, and the papers she had carefully tied together and placed in their several compartments upon the floor, where he had left them after searching for a missing bill, his dressing-gown pocket was empty, and the cologne she should only wear upon extraordinary occasions, now filled with innumerable wrinkles, which required nearly a whole hat and gave with a great deal of vehemence, to remove. Perhaps it was good employment, though rather destructive to the temper, for her temper subsided by the time it was restored to its wardrobe, and she went singing about her morning work, as though nothing had happened to ruffle the serenity of her married life.

Charles was extremely careless at home, but he thought that no great failure. He had a neat, graceful form, and was called a well-dressed man; indeed, he was not conscious of the amount of labor it had caused his mother and his wife to enable him to deserve that appellation.

But what he was conscious, and that Ethel Carrie's patience extremely. She was sure, whatever she attempted to do, to find herself deficient in something, and to remember to remember her husband's promise to bring it several days before, and she was often called upon to "run down" and walk out to obtain the necessary article. The first part of her walk was usually rapid, to keep pace with the considerable state of anger she felt at in this her temper gradually subsided, and Charles never knew it had been aroused. And, after all, she would think that they were trifling things, and she felt that she had reason for great thankfulness in others; and so has many another young wife whom husband is good-nightliness and careless, when all over our land pure, loving hearts are grieved, miserable, inconstant, disregarded, unprincipled men.

Carrie had been Mrs. Kimball two months. It had been a long time to her, for her husband had brought home a party of friends to dinner, and she was anxious that Charles should not be alone in his good opinion of her housewifery; and as the work depended upon her busy hands, the task had been a little too hard, and left a slight shadow of discomfort upon her mind as well as body. Carrie was at home; and as the autumn evening was chilly, a fire was kindled in the sitting-room grate, and the husband had drawn the table near the fire, and was employed in writing, while Carrie sat opposite, toying with some light netting. She asked her husband some question that chanced to come into her mind, and he replied his pen upon the edge of the inkstand while he replied. In doing this, he bent forward, and overturned the contents of the inkstand upon the table. A few great drops of ink fell upon the carpet before Carrie could place her hand before it and stop the rapid progress toward the edge of the table.

"Oh, you careless creature!" she exclaimed. "Ethel predicted that the next time I left you alone to have anything decent about this house!" and she hastily tore the evening paper in two, and applied it to the ink-stain. There was a frown upon her face, a passionate flash in her eye; her manner was determined, and she evidently meant to remove the stain, whether the task occasioned by his carelessness seem very formidable. "I should think you had been taught enough times I have taken your pen out of the inkstand, or requested you to do so," she continued; "but I hope you are satisfied, now you have spoilt this table."

"Keep on; say all you have to say," returned her husband. "I will do my writing at the office in future."

As there was not the slightest trace of ink now upon anything, and Carrie's slender fingers, as she was tossing and turning the inky paper, as they fell dependent upon removing the stain, Charles's words were very overburdened with guilt or penitence; so he removed the offending pen and inkstand from the table, returned to his writing without another word; indeed, as Carrie thought, just as if nothing had happened; yet she could not help but see that his pen moved very fast upon the blank paper before him. She did not resume her work, but sat before the fire, tapping her foot impatiently. There was flowing her anger gradually wearing itself into a feeling of shame, regret, and repentance, for having at the impulse of her heart thrown in the face of a creature she had so long overcome, or rather concealed, for it was but a concealment, after all, while. She could see in the partially shaded face of her husband a change—whether of anger, astonishment, or sorrow, she could not tell; perhaps it was the three combined; so, after waiting a little time, gathering courage and inclination, she arose, crept to his chair, and laying her hand upon his shoulder, she whispered:

"Forgive, me, Charley; I am sorry I spoke so hastily."

The face to which the husband raised his eyes was pale, with heartfelt sorrow, and he replied, only a little coldly:

"Nothing to forgive, Carrie. I am a careless fellow, I know."

As Carrie could not truthfully gainsay the remark, there fell a silence between them, and she thought it was because he thought her cross, and had not escaped her. But could she have pulled aside the veil from her husband's heart, she would have found that his thoughts of her were also hateful.

Carrie was watchful and prayerful after this, and was quite in earnest about overcoming her temper, but the growth of more than twenty years, from childhood, too, by nature, could not be torn up in a day.

Charles saw the flash of those beautiful eyes, the pout of those small lips, and the hasty, passionate movements, many times, when there were no words spoken; and then there would be sharp, thoughtless words, and then a cold, stern look, harsh recriminations sometimes upon his, though not always, for he was not hasty like her, though his displeasure was as deep as hers. Then, when it did once get the better of him, he was sullen and disagreeable for a long time, during which Carrie's spirit became vexed and pleased by fifteen times.

They were going to a concert one evening, and Carrie had prepared tea earlier than usual, dressed herself with unusual taste, and taking a book, sat quietly down to wait for Charles, not interested in it at first, but soon her eyes began to wander more and more frequently toward the pretty bronze clock that stood upon the mantel, as she saw the hour for the opening of the concert was drawing near, and still her husband did not appear.

She became alarmed at his long absence, and then recalled how he had looked upon her with uneasiness. It was half an hour beyond the time, when her husband came in a little hurriedly, but as if he had expected to find her ready.

"Well, you are a nice man, that's what you are!" exclaimed Carrie, in a sweep of fifty frowns. "How much does your rent amount to?"

"Why, what do you mean?" asked the husband, in surprise.

"Oh, forgive me, darling! I never once thought of it," said he, and his voice expressed the regret which he really felt.

"No, I'll warrant you did not," said Carrie. "You never do think of anything I particularly want. I never did see such a forgetful man. I wonder you ever get on in business at all. Last week I sent you down town to get out in the rain to get some articles which I wanted for a troop of your friends, and which I had told you repeatedly I was going to need, and you, after you had such a quarrel over that, you would have remembered it for a while. But it is just as well. Come on to your tea."

Carrie threw open the folding-door, and seated herself in her accustomed place at table, with an angry flush all over her face.

"You may take your tea alone," said Charles, "unless you can be more amiable."

Mr. Kimball closed the door with a jar that was neither very harsh nor very soft. He sat down before the cheerful fire, folded his arms, and fixed his eyes moodily upon the flame that went dancing up the chimney, sending out at the same time a cheering, refreshing warmth. There was a feeling of oppressive gloom upon his spirits; it seemed to him that thought was wholly unequal to the task.

His wife sat still in her place at the tea-table. She had not expected, in spirited, though she had poured out her tea and helped herself to the cake; but by that time her resentment had begun to give place to other emotions, and her appetite was gone; so she, too, sat still, but she was thinking—thinking how strange it was she could be so unhappy when they better; thinking how unhappy she had made herself, and her husband, too, and by-and-by she rose up softly and stole to his side. Her husband expected her. He knew about how long it took for her to transfer to another room a book from the table and appeared absorbed in its contents. In truth, his temper was just getting to its height.

Carrie once reached the scene of her wrath with a burst of tears, but she did not do so to-night. Her face was very calm and more thoughtful than sad. She drew a chair in front of her husband, and quietly took the book from his hands.

"You expect me to say I am sorry now, Charley," she said, "that I have been so such thing, though I am; but you and I have made a sad mistake in marrying each other."

Mr. Kimball started up in surprise. Had Carrie then ceased to love him, and learned so soon to regret that she was her husband? The very thought startled him.

"Carrie, Carrie," said he, "has it come to this so soon? Have we made this error and must live in it, as if afraid he was to lose her. "I ought to have made you a better husband," he added.

"Don't interrupt me, please," said she, "but minutes was in our expecting too much of each other. You once said to your cousin Ethel that you had yet to learn of your fault in your affianced bride, and Ethel remonstrated with you to no purpose. I was then, as I am now, blinded to my faults; and though I have tried (Heaven only knows how hard) to curb my willful temper, I have failed often, and I am not truly sorry, and very miserable. You, dear husband, must be aware that you have faults, though they are not half so many as mine. I am not advising sometimes to see you so careless, and you do not know how many unnecessary steps you cause me, Charley. This is a trifling one, but it is one of many. Forgive the little errands, though you are always kind to bring me a new book or piece of music, or something that you think will please me. Now we must help each other. You must help me to be more careful and attend to little trials more easily, and I, in turn, will help you to overcome whatever I see amiss in you. Shall we make a new bargain?"

She said, giving her bright eyes to his face with a bewitching grace.

"Yes, my dear little wife, we will," he replied. "I believe we can help each other: at least I know you can help me if you will only bear with my infirmities a little. I am soo how wrong we have been in expecting perfection in each other, forgiving all the while we are only human, and that so long as we live in this world we shall have sins and imperfections to overcome."

After this the reader, if he will, may imagine perfect harmony in this household; but it is doubtful if it was wholly so. There will be occasional jars and discomfort notes in the sweetest melody sometimes, but it is well if we can do to restore the lost harmony is not to expect more of others than we are ready or willing to give or do ourselves.

There is as much difference in the natural dispositions of persons as in their faces, and we cannot think of modifying or changing by our own: for what we possess in a large degree in another may be wholly wanting; and, while the faults of others may appear to us magnitude in our eyes, we may commit some which, in their sight, are far greater. Thus should we, at all times, be willing to overcome with our friends upon the plan of common humanity.

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION.

A YOUNG man recently ran away from the galaxy at Cincinnati. He was strong and vigorous, and soon made his way across the country, and escaped from all fear of pursuit. He arrived before a cottage, in an open field, and stopped to beg something to eat and rest a refuge, while he reposed a little. But he found himself in the midst of the greatest distress. Four little children are trembling in the corner, their mother was weeping at the bedside, and the father walking the floor in agony. The galley-slave asked what was the matter, and was told that the mother had left in the morning to be turned out of doors because they could not pay the rent.

"You see me driven to despair," said the father; "we have not a farthing, we have not food or shelter, and I without means to provide any for them."

The unfortunate man then told his story in tragedy, and then said:

"Will you go the means. I have but just escaped from the galleys. Whoever secures and takes back an escaped convict receives a reward of fifty francs. How much does your rent amount to?"

"Forty francs," answered the father.

"Well," said the other, "put a cord around my body. I will follow you at a distance, where they will recognize me, and you will get fifty francs for bringing me back."

The father followed the astonished fugitive, and my children should starve a dozen times before I would do so to you."

The generous young man trembled, and declared at last that he would not be taken alive. He said he would not consent to take him.

The father, with his mother, father yielded, and, taking his prey over by the arm, led him on to the city and to the police station. The prisoner had a little knife which he had kept concealed, and he cut off a piece from a rough young fellow; but the prey was overcome then. The fifty francs were paid, and the prisoner sent back to the galleys. But, after he was gone, the father found a private interview with the mayor, to whom he told the whole story. The mayor was so much affected that he not only raised fifty francs more to the father's purse, but wrote immediately to the Minister of Justice, begging the noble young prisoner's release.

The minister examined into the affair, and, finding that it was correct, sent the proper offices which had condemned the young man to the galleys, and that man already pardoned and had entered his release. Is not the whole incident beautiful?

"Are you? Did I marry you?"

"No, you married father, President," who referred to an account-book in the desk, and then said:

"Why, I believe you are right. I know your face was familiar."

A NEW EXPLOSIVE.—Gunpowder and gun-cotton are old affairs, and nitro-glycerin seems to cap the climax of danger, but there are worse combinations than these. Take a little of the latter, to which we diagnosis call attention now is to be known as nitro-mannite, or saccharine, a mixture of sugar, somewhat in blasting operations. We first encountered the name "mannite" so often before that it seemed as familiar as that of the now nearly obsolete tale, camphine. Science has discovered the most powerful new deadly explosive substance in the form of sugar. Gunpowder owes its force to the equal to about two pounds of gunpowder, or two and half pounds of nitro-glycerin. A spoonful of water coming in contact with two pounds of nitro-mannite would produce an explosive equal to that which would follow the ignition of five thousand pounds of gunpowder, or two and a half pounds of nitro-glycerin. From these facts it might be supposed that nitro-mannite is not the safest of all chemical compounds to handle.

A SKETCH OF THE JAMAICA PARLIAMENT.

DELIBERATIVE assemblies are not always marked by a due regard to propriety, and the excitement of debate, or of something more potent, seems to produce similar results the world over. A late traveler through Jamaica thus records his experience among that lawless race of colored men, which reminds us of scenes that are sometimes witnessed in our own Congress:

The House of Assembly and the Chamber of the Legislative Council are both situated in the same square with the Government House, in Spanish Town. They are yellow buildings, erected at considerable expense, and not without some pretense. But nevertheless, they are ugly—ugly from their color, ugly from the heat, and ugly from a hideousness which seems natural to them and to the place.

The house itself, in which the forty-seven members sat, is considerably smaller than not badly adapted for its purposes. The Speaker sits at one end all in full fig, with a clerk at the table before opposite to him; and two-thirds down the room, a low bar, about four feet high, runs across it. As far as it is the public are always admitted; and when any subject of special interest is under discussion, twelve or fifteen persons may be seen there successively, or at once, in a side-room opening from the house, into which members take their friends. Indeed, it is, I believe, generally open to any one wearing a decent coat. There is the Delmonico of the establishment, in which between the sessions take such refreshment as the warmth of the debate may render necessary. Their tastes seemed to me to be simple, and to inclide themselves mainly to rum and water.

I was throwing away my cigar as I entered the precincts of the house. "Oh, you can smoke, sah; my friend to me;" only, when you stand at the doorway, don't let the Speaker's eye taken the light; but it won't much matter." So I walked in and stood at the side door, smoking my cigar indeed, but conscious that I was descending my pride.

I saw five or six colored gentlemen in the house, and two negroes—sitting in the house as members, as well as the two latter men were concerned, I could not but be gratified to see them in the fair enjoyment of the objects of the institution. Had they not by efforts of their own made themselves greatly superior to others of their race, they would not have been there. I say this, fearing that it may be thought that I begrudge a black man such a position. I begrudge the blue ribbon, nothing that they can honestly lay hands on; but I think that we shall benefit neither them nor ourselves by at, tempting with a false philanthropy to make them equal to be other than they are.

The subject under debate was a railway bill. The railway system is not very extended in the island; but there is a railway and a bill for prolonging it. Indeed, the house, I believe, had on some previous occasion decided that it should be prolonged, and the present fight was as to some particular detail. What had detail was I did not learn, but the business that was performed was a continual series of motions for adjournment, carried on by a various minority at times.

It was clear that the conquered majority of—say thirty—were very angry. For some reason, apparently probably to the fairies of the house, these thirty were unreasonably anxious that some special point carried and put out of the way that night, but the three were insensible. Over and over again was the question put, and over again with a motion for adjournment.

And then the Speaker, a well-known artist, and made a calm, deliberate little oration. The words he spoke were, I am sure, very good words, and I wish that I could say that they were very wise. He offered to the house a few platitudes on the general benefit of railways, which he then applied to any railway under the sun, saying that egos and fowls would be taken to market; and that he sat down. On his behalf I must declare that there were no other words of such wisdom spoken that night. But the ball lasted only for three minutes.

After a while two members coming to the door declared that it was becoming unbearable, and carried me away to a public house in a place in close by; and one, "and if the row becomes hot we shall hear it. It is possible to stay there with an odd glass, and with the certainty of missing one's object after all." As I have no liking for mob law, I went away and played whist.

But soon a storm of voices reached our ears round the card-table. "They are hard at it now," and one honorable member, "Oh, by Jove, 'tis so-and-So," by reseruch." The yell might have been heard at Kingston, and no doubt was.

"Will they pitch into one another?" I asked, thinking of members of whom I had read of in another country.

"They don't often do that," said my friend. "They trust to their tongues, and they are good enough."

The beginning was very much true as I found when down my cards and rushed back to the Assembly. When I entered the house the question of the noise was being made by one gentleman, who was walking round and round the house, apparently in a hard voice which he would retain the very moment the Speaker was seated in the chair—for at that time the house was in committee.

"Shameful, abominable, scandalous, rascally!" shouted the angry gentleman, over and over again, as he paced round and round the chamber. "Sir, come and have a drink of rum and water."

In the speaker's window-place sage had brought him to the door at which I was standing, and these last words were addressed to me. "Come and have a drink of rum and water," and he seized me with a hospitable violence by the arm. I did not dare to deny such a kindly offer, and I drank the rum and water. Then I returned to my cards.

AN UNKNOWN SUICIDE.

An unknown man shot himself in New Haven, July 30th, of whom the following description has been sent us by the police of that city, together with his portrait, which is shown on this page.

He was supposed to have been a German, about thirty years of age, five feet eight inches in height, broad-shouldered and well formed, with dark brown hair and whiskers. He was dressed in light gray-mixed pants and vest, linen shirt, blue sack-coat, and round-topped soft hat. From documents of paper found near the body, it is supposed his initials were J. H. B. Any person recognizing this description, will confer a favor by communicating with George M. Wilcox, Chief of Police New Haven, Conn.

AFTER OF ROSES.

The delicious perfume known by this name is a volatile oil, of soft consistency, nearly colorless, and which is far too dissolved in alcohol. The best quality is prepared at Ghazipore, in Hindoostan. It is apt to be adulterated with sandal-wood and other oil. In the spring of the year the country about Ghazipore is a vast garden of roses, and presents a most beautiful appearance. The flowers are gathered and steeped in stone jars filled with water. These are set out in the air overnight, and early in the morning the essential oil is skimmed off; this is the attar, and the water is sold for "rose-water." Two hundred thousand well-grown roses are required to produce half an ounce of the attar; and this quantity when manufactured, sells, if genuine, for $20 in the English warehouses. It is very difficult, however, to obtain the genuine article, as even the original manufacturers adulterate it.

GRAND NATIONAL CONCERT

FOR THE

BENEFIT OF THE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME FUND,

AT

Grover's Theatre, Washington, D. C., Postponed until Thursday Eve'g, Oct. 11, 1866.

200,000 Tickets, at $1 each. 75 000 Presents, valued at $250,000, consisting of fine Residences, Lots, Pianos, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silverware, Watches, etc.

A CARD.—A large number of the Tickets remaining Unsold, it will be necessary to POSTPONE THE DRAWING until TAURSDAY, the 11th of October, 1866, at which time it will positively occur.

The many swindling shams that have been put upon the public during the last few months somewhat delayed our sales, until we were able to satisfy the people throughout the country that this enterprise was genuine, and solely for charitable purposes. The people are confident of the sale of every ticket, and have allotted sufficient time to guarantee the sales without any further postponement.

Postmasters, Storekeepers, etc., are requested to act as Agents, and Tickets will be supplied upon application; but no commission will be allowed.

Maximilian, Exit.

The so-called Mexican Empire totters to its fall. The Empress has gone to France to try the effect of a woman's entreaties and tears on the Napoleonic heart, and extract another subsidy from his sympathies. She will represent what, indeed, is obvious to everybody, that unless Napoleon opens his purse-strings once more, her husband will be obliged to leave Mexico long before the time fixed for the final withdrawal of the French troops. She will represent, further, that his departure may be so precipitated, that France will have no time to arrange the terms of the indemnity which is to be left as a charge on the Mexican treasury, furnishing a pretext for future annoyances and interventions. How far these representations may be successful remains to be seen. It may be that Napoleon will feel that he cannot afford to have the year signalized by the failure of his plans both in the New World and the Old. Two rapidly succeeding blows to his prestige may be more than he can bear philosophically, and he may think the postponement of the catastrophe in Mexico to another year worth another hundred million of francs. If so, the flight of Maximilian may be delayed, but rendered none the less certain.

In Mexico itself the opposition of the people to the Empire and the French is taking a more decided and active form; and were it not for the insane quarrels and intrigues among the Mexican leaders, the intervention would be brought to a speedy and bloody close. As it is, Juarez, the only Mexican chief who has exhibited constancy, courage, and good sense, has managed to gain some substantial advantages. The capture of Matamoras, followed as we now hear by that of Monterey and Tampico, clears the north of Mexico of invaders, who in the south never gained any firm foothold.

These captures are perhaps of more importance from their indirect than their direct results, inasmuch as they have elicited from the American Government a threat to Maximilian; and a threat to him is a note of encouragement to the Mexicans. With unaccountable stupidity, the so-called Emperor, after finding himself unable to hold Matamoras and other important points, proceeded to declare them in a state of blockade, or, rather, to close them to foreign and coasting trade, and to subject goods entering the country from them to confiscation.

This revival of pretensions, long ago repudiated by maritime nations, rustled the cobwebs of the State Department, and stirred the dust on the piles of unread "Diplomatic Correspondence" in that cave of optimism. It called out a Proclamation from the President, countersigned by the Secretary of State, whose name has too seldom appeared in such satisfactory connection, setting forth and proclaiming "that the decree of Maximilian, by declaring a belligerent blockade, unsupported by competent military or naval force," violated the laws of nations and the rights of the United States under treaties with Mexico; and that, in consequence, it would "be held null and void" and "disallowed." The publication of this proclamation was simultaneous with the departure of a squadron for the Rio Grande.

Of course the Austrian adventurer "asserting himself to be Emperor of Mexico," will either abrogate his decree or abstain from enforcing it, and Matamoras will be open as a depot for the accumulation of such material, warlike or otherwise, as the Republican Government of Mexico may have the ability to purchase. We anticipate no collision between the United States and the "Imperial" authorities, but the latter must lose much in prestige, influence and power by the issue of this proclamation. It is worth a victory in the field to the Liberals, besides affording them some substantial facilities.

General Lew. Wallace, an officer who served with distinction in the Union army during the war, it is said, has reached Matamoras, and is ready to throw his heavy sword into the scale of Mexican politics. The sympathies of the general in favor of the Liberal cause have been often expressed, and are well known. A call from him for recruits to the Mexican army would be responded to by thousands who would never dream of putting themselves under the command of a Mexican officer. If long adversity has taught the Mexicans anything, it must be the importance of banishing from their hearts the jealousy and suspicion of foreigners which have prevented emigration and the development of their country. Should General Wallace espouse their cause in the field, they must give him the confidence and support which his generosity deserves, and to which his abilities and experience entitle him. With him as Generalissimo of the Republican forces, no one doubts that Maximilian and his mercenaries, French, Austrians, Belgians and traitors, would all be expelled the country long before the time fixed by the French Emperor for the departure of the second installment of his legions. We should rejoice to see Americans accomplish, as individuals, what their Government should have long ago done for them and in their name—that is, the expulsion of the French from Mexico by force of arms.

"EXPECTATION."—FROM A PAINTING BY KREYSCHMER, BERLIN.—SEE PAGE 389.

The Confederation of the Andes.

The tendency of States whose populations are affiliated, but which have been kept apart by dynastic and other influences to come together and consolidate, as a means of securing strength, respect, and the growth of a high and manly spirit among the people, is shown in Italy and Germany, and is manifesting itself among the isolated and weak republics of this continent. The alliance between Peru, Chile, Ecuador and Bolivia, was formed for the primary purpose of resisting Spanish insolence and aggression; but it is not impossible, and it ought to be easy, to modify and make it permanent. In fact, the question of uniting the four republics is now freely and favorably discussed in the several States. It is proposed to call the consolidated State, "THE CONFEDERATION OF THE ANDES," with its capital in Lima. The approximate population of the confederation would be as follows:

Peru	3,500,000 inhabitants.
Chile	1,500,000 "
Bolivia	500,000 "
Ecuador	1,000,000 "
Total	6,500,000 "

The total present revenues of these States are collectively about $30,000,000, of which it is proposed to set aside one-fifth for general common expenditures. Peru is proposed to divide into two States—Northern Peru, with its Seat of Government in Trunillo, and Southern Peru, with its Capital in Arequipa. The territory now in controversy between the several republics to be regarded as federal property.

There are two difficulties in the way of the realization of this scheme: the first is, that Peru would be loth to give up her rich returns from the guano islands, the handling of which and consequent personal enrichment of those in power, is the pivot of Peruvian politics; and second, the general spirit of localism that hostilizes departments, districts, cities, and even villages. It is only necessary for Arequipa to lose a position in order to range with the opposition of Lima, or vice versa. In the wretched little State of Nicaragua, for instance, it is not enough that Leon and Granada should be indelibly antagonism, but little tumble-down places like Rivas and Legoria must have blood feuds.

Hitherto the principle of repulsion, rather than that of attraction, has been most active among the Hispano-American States, and it will be fortunate, indeed, if the outcome of Peru and Spain shall turn them the necessity, to say nothing of the policy of Union. We have fought a terrible war to maintain and perpetuate it, and Germany is now fighting bloodily to achieve it. Our sister republics should take heed, and not wait to be driven to accept or adopt what is obviously politic, useful and essential to safety and greatness.

The Delirium of Speech.

Few statesmen, however well trained and collected, ever undertook to speak to a popular assemblage on matters personal to themselves, who were not betrayed into saying something which they would afterward like to recall, and which their friends would like to retract for them. A crowd—especially a sympathizing one—music, cheers, torches, are all stimulating and dangerous accessories, rousing the orator often to eloquence, but oftener to extravagance. We have a recent and unpleasant example of this (unfortunate) habit in the delirium of speech of the President to the delegation that waited on him from the late Philadelphia Convention. In that speech he said (and we quote verbatim from the report):

> If I wielded authority, or if I wished to perpetuate my own power, how easy it would have been to hold some would that would have placed in my hands by the measure called the President's Bureau Bill. Knowing its evil consequences, I vetoed it, and thereby placed in my hands a power which would make the power of any single dictator, I will not say or any millions of appropriations, but the power of the kingdom of heaven. I had the right to control both my savings and dependents in my own name, and to use this with the Civil Rights Bill, and as an auxiliary (laughter), in connection with all the other agencies of the Government, I could have produced myself dictator. (Cries of, That's true, and applause.) But for my President, I would have trampled my pride and my ambition have been to occupy that position which I now fill, and power has made me feel (laughter). (Great cheering.) It is upon that I have always refused, and upon that I rely now. I would rather the people will not disappoint you.) And I repeat that neither the Executive power of Congress, or of any individual, calumniating process can drive me from my purpose. I acknowledge no power on earth to control my action except my God, the author of my existence, and the people of the United States. (Prolonged and enthusiastic cheering.) For the one, I try to obey all His commands to best I can consistent with my own humanity; for the other, in a political and representative sense, my high business is the people. I have never respected and obeyed by me. (Loud cheers.)

Conceding that Congress was and is as hostile to the President as he imagines it to be, the fact that it entrusted him with great and extraordinary powers shows that it had faith in his confidence in his integrity and his fidelity to the Constitution and the laws. It shows that however widely the American people may differ, they have faith in the common patriotism of the country, and in the patriotism of the man for whose blood traitors howled all the way from Washington to Nashville. That confidence, thus expressed, makes the suggestion that it might be abused by the recipient all the more reprehensible and odious.

When the President claims credit for not abusing the power conferred on him by a hostile Congress, and for not making himself a traitor and usurper, he lays himself open to criticism and censure. It is a gross and impudent assumption on the part of Mr. Johnson that he could, by the use or abuse of his power, and position, make himself "dictator" in a country made up of thirty-six millions of free and intelligent people, all of whom have votes and many of whom are orators. As one of the people—as he boasted himself to be, in his unsurrad speech, as Vice-President, with words—Mr. Johnson must well know that a "dictatorship" in the United States, at any time or under any circumstances, is a thing so utterly absurd and impossible—so far from suggestion by anybody would justify a commission de lunatico inquirendo. Spoilsmen may fawn and placemen may flatter, and there may be the school of time-servers of the man in power; but there is a wide interval between slaviskness and treason. The army and navy may look to the behest of the constitutional Commander-in-Chief within the limits of the Constitution and the Law; but no President, no Congress, no party could use the force for delirious impulse of speech. They were simple place-hunters and sycophants, who would applaud Davis, Solouque, or Santa Ana, if "thrift might follow fawning."

"Speech is silver—silence, golden," and the President of the United States gains neither in dignity, weight or worth by making a speech in which impulse overpowers intellect, and extravagance is substituted for energy. There are things which belong to the office of Cæsar's wife, are not amenable to discussion, and to which the very silliness is offensive. A "dictatorship" in the United States is one of these, and becomes an insane offensive when it falls from the lips of a President.

The Metrical System.

CONGRESS, just before its adjournment, adopted a measure which, if generally adopted, it is to be hoped will be warmly seconded by the people—namely, the legalization of the metrical or decimal system in weights and measures, to conform with the existing system of denominations in values of coin. The act of Congress does not require the adoption of the French or metrical system, but authorizes it, and leaves its substitution for the present illogical and inconvenient system to the good sense and convenience of the public.

The present system is based upon no principle. It is empirical and traditionary, confused and uncertain. Every child has trouble to master it, and the most intelligent adult makes use of it, except that they may use in business. The English foot is a measure founded on the average length of the human foot, and so with the inch, the hand and all the rest. Barleycorns make an inch, these barleycorns being supposed to be healthy grains taken from the middle of the ear. The rod of weight is on the same manner a grain of wheat. Different kinds of weight, troy weight and avoirdupois weight add to the difficulty of mastering these accidental standards. In which system of weights and measures is unknown in other countries, and is not easily understood in our own. It is the only system which has our official action; and the French system, the universal system, should replace it. The metric system was proposed at Paris in 1790, and the idea was to construct an arc of the meridian, and subdivide it till a new unit was reached. This work was done; and though the measurement is said to have been incorrect to some hundreds of yards, the result is sufficient for all practical purposes. The metre—which is the universal unit—is one ten-millionth part of the distance from the equator to the poles, or 39.37 inches in length. The application of the decimal scale to this standard results in a system of engineering of simplicity and clearness. It is now used in all business transactions in France, and has been adopted by most of the European countries.

The labor and time-economizing Yankee feels a sort of contempt for his landlord in Liverpool, when he sees him footing up the rent of a property by the complicated rule of 4, dividing the amount of the first column by twelve, and the second by twenty. What consistency, then, is there in the patience with which, after chasing off the number of rods between a hundred separate pairs of field-stakes, he divides the sum of all the measurements by three hundred and twenty to get the total perimeter of his tract in miles? How can he rest contented with a system under which the odd ounces on the tail end of fifty different invoices of butter must be footed up and divided by sixteen before he knows how many pounds he has—even the poor attempt at something like decimal ease and compactness breaking down entirely under the pressure of that arithmetical bull by which a hundred weight becomes a hundred and twelve weight, and twenty hundred is made to mean twenty-two hundred and forty?

Why should a man continue to be fuddled in barrels whose capacity for gallons he must arrive at by multiplying them into thirty-one and a half, or his beer in receptacles similarly named but requiring another multiplier of thirty-six for the same reduction; when his wife's dresses are measured by yards, eighths, and quarters of a yard, while—on her fingers at home; when the pipe that brings his Croton runs sixteen ounces, and the silver mug from which his infant child takes that Croton, twelve ounces to the pound; when, in fine, every thing about him, save the money in his pocket, must be put through a course of arithmetical gymnastics, involving all the four fundamental processes, if it ever becomes desirable to get an ultimate expression of its quantity? Can it be aware that there is no need of all this bother; that his unwieldy fractional dozens, ponderous multipliers, and several successive processes demanded by an irrational law; that the whole chapter of denominate tables is based upon ratios purely arbitrary, or such as, possessing convenience in a rude and unphilosophic antiquity, have lost all claim to it in an age when mathematical precision not only lies in reach of the humblest schoolboy, but is a sine qua non in every hourly process of practical life?

In the system now authorized, and which State laws should require to be taught in all our public schools, the unit of measure is the metre, which, as we have said, is the ten-millionth of the geographic quadrant, or the forty-millionth of the earth's whole circumference measured through the poles. The decimal ratios and denominations based upon this standard are tabulated thus:

1 myriametre,	10,000 décimètres,
10 kilomètres,	1,000,000 centimetres,
100 hectometres,	10,000,000 millim'rs.
1,000 décamètres,

1 Kilogramme,	10,000 décigramme,
10 hectogramme,	1,000,000 centigramme,
100 décagramme,	1,000,000 milligramme.

All the other tables of weights and measures, it will be seen, are readily reconstructed on these two bases.

In order to facilitate comparison, we print the following table, which shows the relation between the proposed metrical or decimal system, and that now in use, as regards Length, Surface, Capacity, Solidity and Weight:

Divorce.

In no respect, perhaps, is the difference between the usage of the Mohammedans and of the Roman Catholic Church more marked than on the subject of divorce. Among the former, a formula of a few words, uttered by the man, dissolves the marriage-tie; the sentence may be spoken hastily or in anger, but once spoken, it is irrevocable. In the latter, marriage is a sacrament; no process of any human court can impair its force, and only by a special dispensation of the head of the church can it be dissolved. If a member of the church should avail himself of the civil law of the country he resides in to break a tie which has become odious, the civil remedy is of course as open to him as to all others; but the church does not recognize any dissolu n of the religious bond, and so long as connection with it continues, possesses means, well-known to all, to enforce obedience to its laws. Between these two extremes of laxity and rigor, the Protestants have sought a middle course, and it remains to be seen how far, in avoiding Scylla, they have escaped Charybdis.

One result of the Reformation was to remove from the marriage-tie the sanctity which attaches to a sacrament. It ought, logically, to have followed from this, that the civil obligation alone should have been recognized by the adherents of that religious movement, and in the case of the Protestant Episcopalians from the Spanish Church such practice did no doubt prevail. The trammels, however, in which the mind of Christendom had been bound for so many centuries were none so easily torn away. After a short interval, the new religious teachers, while abjuring the doctrines of Rome, continued her practices, and thus it came to pass that marriage, among all classes of Protestants, was invested with a religious sanctity but little, if any, inferior in force to that of the elder church, whose yoke they had left.

The next awakening of the public mind was not religious, whatever else it may have been. The problem of the true relations of government to the governed engaged the attention of earnest men, and the fundamental truth was established that it was not a proper function of government to insist upon religious sanctions to relations which as to government were of a civil nature. So far as public morals were concerned, marriage was declared to be a matter of simple contract between individuals. If to this contract the parties interested chose to add religious sanction, they were free to do so; but the blessing of the church added in no wise to the binding character of the act itself. Naturally, to a vast majority of people the religious ceremony was the all-in-all of marriage. It was hallowed by tradition. To an even so momentous, involving so deeply the welfare and happiness throughout their lives of two human beings, it would be strange indeed if the most exalted associations and the most impressive ceremonies were not invoked to hold all the parties and chiefly that religion can afford. Most especially the mind of woman would be affected by such considerations as these, since marriage to her is in general the beginning of a new life, while to man it is but a phase—an incident of his career. But vows, however solemn, emotions, however deep, or blessings at the altar, however hallowed, are not the essence of marriage. To the priest succeeds the pronoic Registrar, and without the religious or the preceding ceremony he become an empty pageant. The sanctions of religion are optional; it is the record, duly signed, which is essential.

Our readers will, we trust, perceive why we have dwelt at such length upon the religious, as distinguished from the secular element. The former is responsible for a number of evils, it is in its nature indissoluble, being under the direct sanction of Him who liveth and changeth not; it is by a social contract, the same power that bound can unloose.

It was in the United States, where religious freedom has attained its highest development, that the separation of the religious from the civil element of marriage first took place, and where divorce, the logical sequence and counterpart of civil marriages, has become an "institution." It would be a long journey, though beside our purpose here, and possibly one which could never be fairly answered, how far the difference between the laws of divorce in the different States arose. Why in one State the courts can grant a divorce for one cause, and one only, while in another, any one of half a dozen may suffice? Why, in the New York, for instance, infidelity alone, should be the only legal ground of divorce; while in some of the western States the most vague charges as desertion, or ill-usage, or intemperance, are admitted as good grounds for dissolving the marriage-tie? Have the emigrants from the Eastern States, who peopled those Western wilds, attained to higher views of human rights and duties than we who have remained on the sea-board? Or is facility for divorce a necessary adjunct to a state of society where matters are yet in a chaotic and unsettled form, and where it is not well that rigid rules of any kind should control the actions of free men? Or is there some subtle climatic influence at work, which leavens society as it advances toward the heart of the continent, and prompts it to throw off the restraints with which the other States bind themselves? What will be the laws of divorce in the States which must shortly border on the polygamous Territory of Utah? For the right of unlimited marriage is near akin to that of easy divorce—one, in fact, is the complement of the other; and a society which has adopted the one is not far from the stage of morality which welcomes the other.

And again, as to the results. Is it possible to draw any fair conclusion as to the respective morality of the communities among which stringent or lax divorce laws prevail, and what influence on social life and manners such laws have? We fear that these points, though of absorbing interest to the moralist and to an investigator of national character, cannot for the present be satisfactorily determined. Statistics do not help us, for these deal only with figures and facts; and though morals may, in one sense of the word, be called facts, they are of that vague and shadowy kind that elude the perceptions of the census collectors.

But there is one view of the laws of divorce in the different States now forming our nationality which has lately come before the public with disagreeable prominence, and which shows a state of affairs calling loudly for remedy. Each State, as we have said, has its own laws on the subject, varying as to causes for which divorces may be granted. With the facilities of intercourse now existing between all the States, the freest or least stringent code is practically the measure of all the others. For in cases where the laws—for instance, in this State—do not afford the remedy sought for, it is very easy for both the parties to remove to Indiana, and, after a short residence, obtain the relief denied them here. But the abuse is, that one party will remove clandestinely, and without the knowledge of the other obtain a divorce. Unscrupulous lawyers find easy means of getting over the required "notice" to the respondent; and where, as in Ohio, divorces are to marriages in the proportion of one to twenty-six, there must be a plentiful crop of lawyers to do this foul work. A recent case is reported where a man, obtaining a divorce from his wife without her knowledge, during a short absence on her part, repented of what he had done, and cohabited with his wife after her return, and the children born subsequently were declared illegitimate!

But worse cases than this have lately come to light in our own courts. With the laudable intent of screening from the public eye details of domestic infelicities—perhaps we ought rather to say crimes—the custom has lately prevailed of sending divorce cases to referees, who were ordered by the courts to take evidence in private, and report the results to the judge. The abuses of this system have been something frightful to contemplate. With referees subject to undue influences—in plain words, to bribes—husbands and wives have been separated, without the one knowing that proceedings had been begun against the other; children have been bastardized, and honest women reduced to the condition of mistresses. We pretend to be scandalized by the revelations of the English Divorce Courts (and they are shocking enough); but there is this to be said, that the parties bringing the suits knew well before they came into court what disgraceful exposures would be made of their domestic lives. Better, infinitely better, would it be for the cause of morality that private vices should be unveiled in public than that the attempt at concealment should work the monstrous injustice we have lately seen.

We are told, and it is perhaps true, that recent public events tend toward the weakening of State rights and strengthening those of the Federal power. As the Union is now by general consent, if not by actual law, declared to be "one and indivisible," we should see without regret the laws of one State which operate against the morality of the others subjected to one general law for the whole. The day cannot be far distant when Congress will pass a general Bankruptcy Law; and it is not a mere sentiment, but a profound sense of the injustice and inequality of the present State laws, that leads us to desire that, in matters affecting the domestic happiness of thousands of our countrymen and countrywomen, there should be equal laws and a common court of appeal.

According to the British Emigration Tables it appears that since 1814 there have left the United Kingdom 5,901,510 emigrants, of whom 3,597,780, or nearly 61 per cent., emigrated to the United States. During 1865 the emigration amounted to 209,801, of whom 17,211 went to British North America and 147,268 to the United States. Of the emigrants who have for the last forty years quitted Great Britain, not less than three-fourths have come to this continent. After weighing this statement, we shall hear without surprise that the amount of money remitted by settlers in North America to their friends in Great Britain, between the years 1848 and 1865, both inclusive, reaches the enormous aggregate of $69,882,685. In order to estimate how far larger is the contribution made by settlers in North America than by those elsewhere, we may mention that in 1865 $2,776,880 were sent from the United States, and $101,315 from Australia. The assimilative force exercised by the North American continent on the inhabitants of Great Britain, as compared with that manifested by Australia, is in the ratio of about 27½ to 1. We cannot abstain from calling attention to another striking fact. More than two millions and a half of dollars were sent in 1865 as the means of enabling residents of England, Scotland and Ireland to emigrate to the United States. There have been several years, indeed, and notably 1852 and 1853, when the remittances from the New World to the Old, made solely with this object, exceeded five million dollars, and in 1854 they reached the enormous total of eight million dollars. When it is remembered that the returns on this point are necessarily imperfect, and may be presumed to fall very far short of the actual amount sent, we have some data for estimating the social and pecuniary elements of attraction which are actively at work in drawing off the surplus population of Great Britain and transferring it to the valley of the Mississippi or the Far West.

General Alfred L. Lee, an officer of cavalry under Banks and Sheridan, was in New Orleans during the late massacre, and an eye-witness of some of its atrocities. He states:

"My rooms happened to be about a square from the scene of slaughter, and I could see very much of it. Captain Loup, a captain of the 1st New Orleans infantry, who had just been mustered out, was standing one block from me. He was approached by two policemen; one placed his pistol at his back and shot him down, and the other stabbed him in the side, securing his immediate death. There was a noble man who represented the radical sentiment of the city, Dr. Dostie. He was not a member of the convention, but he was in the hall. He attempted to escape. When about half a block from the Capitol building he was struck with a brick and knocked down. Policemen were standing near, but, instead of arresting the assaulter, they stepped up to Dr. Dostie, and deliberately fired into the body of the defenseless man. A citizen standing by drew his sword from his cane and thrust it into his body. Still the doctor was not dead, and was dragged by the police through the crowd and placed in a common dirt-cart. I saw this myself. One policeman sat on his body and one sat near his head. The poor man attempted to raise his head, and I saw the policeman raise his revolver and striking him on the face mash his nose flat. That noble man died. I stood on my balcony and looked on that crowd of four hundred policemen, maddened with liquor and drunk with fury, assisted by firemen and Thugs, aided by two or three hundred citizens, on this field-day of slaughter. I saw passing an innocent black man, with a market-basket on his arm. He was met by a knot of policemen. They said, 'You are from the hall, are you?' He said, 'No.' They said, 'Yes, you are.' He started to run. Two policemen ran after him, and as many as a dozen bullets were shot into his body before he fell. A citizen then stamped with his heel on his face, and he was beaten to death with clubs."

TOWN GOSSIP.

The necessity of attention to little things has been most forcibly and sadly illustrated within a few days by familiar occurrences. A large fire in Broadway was caused by carelessly throwing a common match upon a floor saturated with oil and alcohol. In an instant the flames burst forth, and a large amount of property was wantonly destroyed. The fearful conflagration in Jersey City originated in a similar manner. A lamp was recklessly taken into the hold of a vessel freighted with petroleum—the escaping gas was ignited, producing a terrific explosion and one of the largest fires that has occurred in this vicinity for years. Why thoughtless boors are allowed thus to trifle with their own lives and the lives and property of the community at large is a marvel, hardly compatible with the most liberal interpretation of the do-as-you-please theory of republican institutions.

By the way, this theory is a favorite one with certain railroad companies, who are laying claim to all our streets and thoroughfares, and covering our goodly city with a complete net-work of iron. Private rights and conveniences, and protests and indignation are of no account with these magnates, who, armed with legislative grants, obtained, the "Lobby" alone knows how, play such pranks before our eyes as, in any other but this corrupt age, would consign them to infamy. Not even an injunction can arrest their despotism, and very soon New York will be known as the grid-iron city, rather than by any other cognomen.

We are indebted to our Western friends for a neat and desirable improvement in the method of paving our streets, which we are just introducing, and of which the most flattering accounts are given. It is the Nicholson pavement, composed of blocks of wood, which are rendered indestructible by being saturated with coal-tar, and laid down lengthwise, having interstices filled with gravel and asphaltum. The Society that pities animals will certainly rejoice in this change, which will spare many a poor horse the necessity of propulsion on his back, instead of on the members nature intended for such a purpose.

Some of our policemen have lately come to grief by affiliating themselves with the rogues they were appointed to watch and detect. While this fact is a sad commentary on the weakness and fallibility of human nature, it does not in the least disparage the admirable system which has maintained in our city so much of order and security, nor prove that the Metropolitan Police are not incomparably superior to any previous organization for public guardianship. It shows that unworthy men may sometimes attain positions of trust; but the summary measures adopted in this instance is a convincing evidence that such men cannot retain their places.

Out-door sports are still one of the prominent features of metropolitan life; and it is a matter of congratulation that these invigorating exercises are so well managed and kept so free from all that is improper and objectionable, that they meet with increasing favor and have become a permanent institution of American society. We are making progress in the right direction, but must go still farther, and provide suitable, healthful, open air exercise for our daughters, so that the term American female shall not be the synonym of the debility, lassitude and physical worthlessness that now characterize so many of "creation's last and best" in our country. A vigorous, healthful, properly developed lady is now a rara avis in our society, in city and country alike; and unless we have a speedy revolution in our social and domestic habits, some future Agassiz will discourse in learned cadences over the fossils of the sex once so lovely and prized, but of which no living specimens can be found.

The cholera still lingers among us, but it is so restricted by sanitary measures that its existence is hardly noticed. There is no doubt that the disease can be controlled; that it has its laws, which may be fully understood, and is not the blind demon our superstitious fears have supposed, subject to no restraint, and devouring in defiance of all prudence and care on the part of its victims. We can fight and subdue it, just as we fight fire or any other foe; and it is only our ignorance that makes us afraid.

The watering-places are still in the full tide of prosperity; but the premonitory signs of autumn winds and frosts will soon put an end to the season.

Messrs. Stephan & Co. have made a move in the right direction, by opening a splendid establishment at 688 Broadway, where gentlemen can find entertainment without coming in contact with the disgusting nuisances abounding in all the so-called saloons with which our noble thoroughfare is disgraced. "Le Pavillon" has already become the resort of a class of society distinguished by its respectability. The proprietors are to be congratulated upon their initiative, as well as upon the success already accomplished.

The temperate weather has drawn many of our fashionables to town, among whom is our dramatic critic. He has been airing himself at the theatres, and has picked up various little items of news: among them, that the Winter Garden and Wallack's Theatre have seceded from the Associated Managers, and, consequently, their advertisements will appear in the New York Herald—which now and then assumes the character of a facetious paper, as when it makes Charlemagne and Richelieu hob-nob together in the thirty years' war, and Julius Cæsar and Nebuchadnezzer go to grass together. Its last joke was a compliment to the American people, when it gravely stated that the indispensable requisites to give vitality to an illustrated paper were "sickening puritanism, distorted history, out-of-place radicalism, bigotry and offensive caricatures." As these are the very things we avoid, we follow the advice on the rule of contrary, like the man who told the boys where the parish pump was, and that they ought to take the constable there and put him under it, but on no account to pump on him! Among other on dits, is that Gotthold, the young and handsome tragedian, who made so promising an appearance at the Winter Garden some months ago, is engaged to appear in a new play, by an author who is well-known to the press of this city, but who has never before adventured before the public as a dramatist. "Not to put too fine a point upon it," we mean the author of "Beautiful Snow." The play is called "The Charlatan." A gentleman—friend, of course, of the author's—who fell asleep while the author was reading it to a select circle, speaks of it in the highest terms, and Gotthold is equally pleased with it. As we know the author to be a man of great ability, we shall certainly go to see it and record its success. Talking of new plays, reminds us that John Brougham has made a hit with his; its only fault being that it is founded on that everlasting epidemic, the Irish drama, which is really in literature what the rinderpest is among cows, the trichinæ among pigs, and the cholera and courtship among men. But we must not forget to add that Brougham's new play is not of the whisky and shillaleh order, but is the work of a man of genius, and the most brilliant dramatist and eccentric commedian of the age. He is what our friend Pierce Pungent says—a living bottle of champagne on a couple of handsome legs, frisking about the stage so charmingly, that really, when he is on it, nobody cares to look at anything else, not even himself in a glass. Apropos of charming things, Madeline Henriques has returned from Europe, and is about commencing her campaign against that fabulous piece of gutta percha, the hearts of men.

PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT.

Whereas, a war is existing in the republic of Mexico, aggravated by foreign military intervention; and whereas the United States, in accordance with their settled habits and policy, are a neutral power in regard to the war which thus afflicts the republic of Mexico; and whereas it has become known that one of the belligerents in the said war, namely, the Prince Maximilian, who asserts himself to be Emperor in Mexico, has issued a decree in regard to the port of Matamoras and other Mexican ports which are in the occupation and possession of another of the said belligerents, namely, the United States of Mexico, which decree is in the following words:

"The port of Matamoras and all those of the northern frontier which has withdrawn from their obedience to the Government are closed to foreign and coasting traffic during such time as the law of the empire shall not be therein reinstated.

"Article 2. Merchandise proceeding from said ports on arriving at any other where the excise of the empire is collected, shall pay the duties on importation, introduction and consumption, and, on satisfactory proof of contravention, shall be irremissibly confiscated. Our Minister of the Treasury is charged with the punctual execution of this decree.

"Given at Mexico, the 9th day of July, 1866."

And whereas the decree thus recited, by declaring a belligerent blockade unsupported by competent military or naval force, is in violation of the neutral rights of the United States, as defined by the law of nations, as well as of the treaties existing between the United States of America and the aforesaid United States of Mexico:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim and declare that the aforesaid decree is held and will be held by the United States to be absolutely null and void as against the Government and citizens of the United States, and that any attempt which shall be made to enforce the same against the Government or citizens of the United States will be disallowed.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, the 17th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1866, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-first. ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:

William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—At Niagara Falls, a few days ago, the horses attached to a carriage, containing a party of three gentlemen, jumped from the roadway down an embankment, twelve feet high, into the river, just above the road leading to Goat Island. It required the utmost exertions of the driver and party, none of whom were injured, to save the team from being swept over the Falls.

—— Point Lookout, at the mouth of the Potomac river, has been sold to General Bayard, of New York, for $67,500. The sale embraces all the improvements belonging to the late owners, and 240 acres of land adjacent. It is expected that the Point will be refitted up by the proprietor as a first-class watering-place in time for the next season.

—— The Louisville Courier says: "An intelligent gentleman, a resident of Georgia, furnishes us the information, which, we must confess, surprises us much, that there are at this time in process of erection in that State seventy-two mills for the manufacture of cotten and woolen goods, some of them for calicoes."

—— A project is on foot among business men in Boston to unite for the reception of a cable dispatch daily in that city, and thus do away with the present dependence upon New York city.

—— The first bale of new cotton, of the crop of 1866, was sold in Mobile, August 15, at auction. It was classed good middling, and was knocked down at 35½ cents.

—— The Fire Department of Boston proposes to send to the Paris exhibition a complete miniature illustration of the fire and alarm apparatus used in that city.

—— The Selma (Ala.) Messenger says: "We hear of factories springing up all over the country. At Camden, Wilcox county, a wealthy company have taken the initiatory steps to erect a large building and fill it with the most approved machinery. At Carrollton, Miss., a factory is now in operation, which in a short time will employ 180 spindles. In Marengo county they are making arrangements to manufacture on a large scale. At Cuba Station, Sumter county, a factory is shortly to be in operation."

—— Stock-raising is becoming an important feature in Texas. Some sections are said to be overrun with cattle, nearly wild, belonging to any one who has the facilities for catching and branding them. This laxity of ownership, however, is fast being superceded by the arrivals of large numbers of emigrants, who are settling in those sections. The favor with which the prepared South American beef has been received in Europe has suggested the practicability of similar enterprises in Texas.

—— The work of rebuilding the structure of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington, which was destroyed by fire, is slowly progressing. The large towers on the north have been rebuilt with fire-proof floors to assure the safety of all the documents beyond contingency. The large tower to the southward, which was very badly damaged, will soon be rebuilt. The roofing of the main building, two hundred feet long and sixty-five feet wide, will be of wrought iron covered in with slating, with rolled iron parlines, on a novel plan.

—— The monument directed by the Pennsylvania Legislature to be erected to the memory of the celebrated Seneca Chief, Cornplanter, is finished. It stands on the Indian Reservation, fifteen miles above Warren, on the banks of the Alleghany. There are now living three of Cornplanter's children. When the monument is dedicated, the Indians on the Reservation will be present in aboriginal costume.

—— The St. Paul (Minn.) Press says that measures are now under way to establish a newspaper printed in the Swedish language, for the use of the Scandinavians in the North-western States. The whole number of Norwegians and Swedes in the upper Mississippi Valley, in the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa and Illinois, is estimated at two hundred thousand, of which forty thousand are in Minnesota.

—— The Beet Sugar Manufacturing Company at Chatsworth, Ill., have six hundred acres of beets growing this year. They estimate the crop at ten tuns to the acre, which would yield fully one million pounds of sugar. The machinery of the Company was all brought from Germany.

—— The San Francisco Bulletin says blast furnaces are about to be erected in Oregon by the Oregon Iron Company. The works are to be located on the Walamet River, eight miles above Portland. Iron, timber and water-power are plenty there. They will be the first blast furnaces in operation on the Pacific coast.

—— Recent discoveries of stream tin in Idaho, Arizona, and other sections of the Union, induce the belief that the New World may yet compete with the Old in the supply of this mineral.

—— Parkersburg, West Virginia, has now a population of 8,000 to 10,000—considerable improvement in the last five years. Its trade during the past year has been over two and a half millions; manufactures, one and a half millions, and the petroleum shipped amounted to two million dollars.

—— The Congressional act allowing Portland to import building material free of duty for one year, is worth $200,000 to the city. The Portland Sugar-House Company, which lost a million dollars by the fire, has petitioned for exemption from taxation for five years.

—— The New Orleans Crescent of August 7, says: "The first bale of this year's crop of cotton, so far as we are informed, was received here yesterday by Mr. E. W. Burbank. It was raised in Jefferson parish by J. M. Taylor & Son, and is classed as 'good middling.' It seems to be of fine staple, and we hope the crop of the State may all turn out as well."

Foreign.—An interesting experiment has been made on Mont Cenis, in presence of the Minister of Public Works, in France, who accompanied the chief director and several engineers. The part of the railroad already completed, which ascends by a winding inclined plane, was traveled over by a train composed of several carriages, at a speed of about eleven miles an hour ascending, and fifteen descending. The highest gradient was eight and a half per cent., and several curves were at an angle of only forty degrees. The works on the Italian side are to be finished by the end of next October, so that it is expected that, by next November, Italy and France will be united by an unbroken line of iron.

—— Recently an eruption of an artesian well took place in a garden adjoining the church of St. Agnes, in Venice. The walls of the church were cracked in all directions. The substance vomited consisted of black ashes and a suffocating gas, the expansion of which is supposed to have caused the outbreak. The water which was thrown up reached as high as the top of the church.

—— The body of a native Australian, which was found in a state of petrifaction, has been sent to England. This singular specimen was found in one of the limestone caverns which abound in the plains of Musquito, in the south of Australia. The body was discovered in the natural position of a sleeping person.

—— Advices from Paraguay and the River Plate war to 10th of July are received. There had been a general failure of the allied forces in their operations against the Paraguayans, and the latter had surrounded their army in a swamp near Humaita, on the Paraguay River. The stock of the allied army was dying out rapidly, and Lopez, the commander of the Paraguayan army, was confident and energetic in his efforts to deal a final blow to the war.

—— A Florence journal relates that, after the battle of Custozza, a surgeon of the Italian army discovered among the wounded a young corporal of Bersaglieri still alive, notwithstanding three severe injuries in the neck, left arm, and right leg. When about to dress those wounds, the surgeon perceived that the sufferer was a young woman, who then declared her name to be Herminia Manelli, and her age twenty. Just before the opening of the campaign her brother, who was a corporal of Bersaglieri, had fallen ill, and returned home to his family until his recovery. The sister, whose parents had previously had some difficulty in preventing from joining the Garibaldians, took advantage of that circumstance, and, cutting short her hair, dressed herself in her brother's uniform and joined his regiment, her resemblance to him enabling her to pass unnoticed. Four hours later her regiment was engaged, and she was wounded on the field of battle. After the discovery of her sex by the surgeon, she was taken to Florence, where she died a few days after.

—— Apropos of the approaching marriage of the Princess Dagmar of Denmark with the heir-apparent of the Russian throne, the Paris correspondent of the Star relates the following story of the princess's last interview with the late Cesarewitch: "The young princess had been summoned at his express wish, and arrived, accompanied by the Queen, her mother, and the Prince Royal of Denmark. * * * She was at once led to the dying Cesarewitch, and she knelt by his side, sobbing bitterly. He had been senseless, but in the white kneeling figure he suddenly recognized his fiancée, drew her toward him, and murmuring some words, inaudible save to her, kissed her forehead. Then, as one might read of in a novel, he took the princess's hand, and, without again speaking, placed it in that of his brother Alexander, which action was at once interpreted by the family as signifying his wish that his brother should bestow on her the throne his own death would deprive her of. From that moment Princess Dagmar did not quit the death-chamber till the grand-duke had breathed his last. She closed his eyes and imprinted a parting kiss on his forehead, and thenceforth the imperial family considered her as one of themselves."

—— The Austrian Emperor, out of gratitude to the Emperor Napoleon III. for his good offices during the war, has offered to give up to France the remains of the Duke of Reichstadt, son of the first Napoleon and Maria Louisa, styled Napoleon II. by the French nation. This is exceedingly flattering to French vanity and the feelings of the Napoleonic dynasty; and the remains of the young prince, who only lived to complete his twenty-first year, are, it is said, to be transported with great pomp to the Church of the Invalides, and there find a resting-place on French soil, near the magnificent mausoleum of Napoleon I.

—— It is proposed in France to institute a decoration which should be given exclusively to women for acts of courage, devotedness, or charity. This order should be called the Eugénie.

—— The proprietor of Lloyd's Newspaper, in London, has just imported 270 tuns of Esparto grass from Algeria for the manufacture of paper. The cost of this kind of paper is one-half that of the linen fabric.

A DAY AT THE FISHING BANKS.

A SIMPLE shepherd, reclining under the cool shade of a wide-spreading tree, playing his flute and watching his flock, was one of the prettiest pictures of unalloyed pleasure a great artist of olden times could draw, and one that has ever been greatly admired. And in fact, it was a truthful and attractive one. But tastes differ, customs change, the world moves, and men of the present day are not content with any one source of pleasure, or any one class of amusements. Ingenuity is constantly on the stretch to devise something novel, something taking, something that will prove an attraction to the masses and a success to the projectors. Here, in New York, there are manifold ways of seeking pleasure and finding enjoyment; such, teh, as shall be at once innocent, healthful and invigorating. To say nothing of the out-door sports that claim so large a share of attention, there are fine excursions in every possible direction to the numerous points of interest in proximity to the metropolis. Perhaps none of these combine so much of pleasure, health and exercise as a trip to the Fishing Banks, of which we give an illustration this week.

These Banks are off Long Branch, so well known as a summer resort, and about thirty miles from the city. They are accessible every day by steamers, which leave in the morning, touching at several landing points, and after allowing their passengers to spend the day on the water, return them to the city at a suitable hour in the afternoon.

So much for the place and the means of reaching it, which is not the whole story. If you are a man of family, you will wish your wife and children to accompany you, and your plans must be formed beforehand: a good lunch prepared—for sea air is wonderfully pro-vorative of appetite; your hooks and lines put in proper order—for of course you would not go to the Fishing Banks if you could not fish; your cigar-case will need to be filled, and if you don't heed the Excise Law, another case will not be omitted. These things will occupy your thoughts and time before starting, and with the expectation and glee depicted on every countenance, you will be convinced that an excursion is a matter of no small consequence. If you are not a Benedict, you will, of course, have some friends whom you wish to accompany you for the purpose of adding zest to the day; so as either case the necessary preparations are about the same. Well, the morning arrives and you repair to the wharf nearest you at which the steamer touches. Of course you have determined to go in the Wyoming, Captain Holton, and you will suppose nothing is necessary but quietly to step aboard, plant yourself and friends in convenient seats, and await the events of the day. You were never more mistaken. At the wharf you will find an excited crowd of agents and runners trying to induce you to take the opposition boat, which lies alongside the Wyoming with steam up, music playing, banners streaming, etc. One will tell you the boat which he represents always has the best luck. Another will respond, "If you go on that boat and it sinks, there are not enough to row you safely away." And you will be pushed in this direction, and pulled in that, until you resolutely station yourself beyond the reach of these gyrations gentry, whose attentions are far more earnest than agreeable.

At length the lines are cast off, and the staunch Wyoming, with a full complement of excursionists, starts down the Bay, and you have a fine sail of two hours or more before you, amid scenery unsurpassed in quiet beauty and real attractiveness. Some of the crowd, however, have little taste for scenery, or at least more relish for the poetry of motion, as expressed in the merry dance, than for the poetry written on the hills, and caves, and islands, that which you rapidly glide. The deck is cleared, the music strikes up, and in waltz and quadrille the time swiftly flies, the gay revelers giving themselves up to the pastime of the hour with unreserved zest and glee. The tenpin quadrille is one of the features of these sports, of a somewhat novel character. A circle is formed, with one person inside, who, in the rapid change of partners, must succeed in securing one for himself, or stand and await his chance until he is fortunate enough to steal a march upon some one of the circle less watchful than himself. It resembles the well-known game called "Copenhagen," so popular in some parts of the country.

Thus the time passes until the Banks are reached and the boat is anchored, when every one applies himself or herself to the sport of the day. The bait is ready, the lines are thrown into the water, and every device adopted to lure the finny denizens of the deep and make them a coveted prize.

The man who catches the first fish is the hero of the day, and is often so proud of his achievement as if he had conquered a kingdom. Sometimes a premium is offered for success, and it is a study to watch the eager manner in which the sportsmen address themselves to the work.

The ladies also are not backward in trying their skill in this exciting sport, and some of them have no reason to be ashamed of their dexterity in handling the lines and capturing the coveted prey. Sometimes, instead of a fish, you will draw up a mass of tangled seaweed, but the laugh with which your prize is greeted reconciles you to the momentary disappointment. Good humor pervades the crowd, who are always in a mood to joke at slight mishaps and appreciate success; and success of some kind you will have, for the fish are just silly enough to catch at the tempting bait you offer them, and you can hardly fail to show some trophies of your exertion and skill. Occasionally the programme is varied by the intervention of Neptune claiming his accustomed tribute from all who for the first time invade his domain; but with a steady hand and clear conscience you may escape such experience, or, if you do not, it will be short-lived and soon forgotten.

You will have some strange characters on the steamer. There is the person who knows all about it—who can tell you how many fish you will catch, and what kind will take the bait—who has caught fish, and watched fish, and talked of fish, until persuaded that beyond what he possesses, there is no knowledge of fish to be attained. He will bore you and button-hole you until you will wish he would become a fish himself, and dive away in his appropriate element. But, then, such novelties are the charm of the excursion; and, as you have devoted the day to pleasure, you may as well meet it in every possible form.

By the time you have filled your basket and dispatched your dinner—which you can obtain at any hour on the Wyoming—the hour for returning will have arrived, and you will speed your way back to the city. If inclined to "trip the light fantastic toe," the opportunity will not be wanting; if, satisfied with the exploits of the day, you are disposed to recline upon your laurels and give yourself up to dreamy contemplation and fight your battles over again, no one will interfere with you, privileges; but, in any case, you will conclude that, under Captain Holton's charge and out in old ocean's bracing breezes, you had more real pleasure than most days bring to your lot, and that a trip to the Fishing Banks is an event of which you will always retain the most agreeable recollections.

EXPECTATION.

The engraving on our front page presents an admirable picture of rural domestic life, and is one of those home scenes to which we always recur with increased satisfaction. The restless impatience of the dog to seize the imprisoned prey; the eager, interested earnestness of the boy, finding his amusement in the display of animal instinct, are all so true to life, that one can readily imagine he is viewing an actual scene, and not its mere representation. The truthfulness of the picture is its great charm, and the experience of many will verify what the artist has so happily grouped together in one expressive representation.

THE boundaries of the province of Venetia are well-known, but not very generally the extent which it occupies on the map of Europe. It contains 27,491 square kilometres (3,670,939 acres), and has 2,490,968 inhabitants.

ON A HUMMING-BIRD KILLED IN A STORM.

Thrice cruel death! thus to discharge his dart
At thee, my bright one, in the joyous hour!
Snatch'd from the idols of thy little heart;
Thy mate the sunbeam, and thy couch the flower.

Thus exquisite is death, those burnish'd dyes
Proclaim how gorgeous once you skimmed the air,
Like some rich bloom new-fallen from the skies,
On wandering ringlet of the sun's bright hair.

No more shall revel your luxurious bill,
In cups, with which your broider'd pinion vies;
No more for you shall the magnolia fill
Her chalice at the fountain of the skies.

No more a gleaming radiance will you cast
From orange-bud or jasmine's cluster'd stem;
No more, when flushed with the divine repast,
You'll glance thro' ether like a wingéd gem.

The king of fairies, when he went to war,
Might plume his helmet from thy pictured vest.
Pet of a goddess in some distant star,
Why did you roam a truant from her breast?

Each night, they say, her pearly weepings fell;
And, doting o'er thee in thy blooming grove,
She filled with star-dew every velvet bell,
To feast, at morn, the fondling of her love.

Avice and Her Lover.

England was "Merrie England" still, and bluff King Hal lived in the odor of Masses, horse-racing, bowling, and love-making; encouraged by royal example, the country was not slow in taking up all manner of sport, and great sums were spent on horses, especially in importing such as were likely to improve the home stock. Goodly estates changed hands with as great facility as in these present days, and although long before that corporate body known as the "Jockey Club" sat in judgment upon "turf" laws, the settling-day was rigidly observed, and debts of honor paid either by money or blood. Yorkshire took the lead in those days, and the great race-meeting held in the Forest of Galtres, on the eastern side of the city of York, had just terminated; the favorite had been distanced, and the owner of the favorite, Percy Topham, of Sledmere, had a heavy reckoning to pay. No one wondered at the dark frown that had settled down upon his handsome face; though many did marvel at his reckless challenge to run his mare Lady Ann against Dick Skelton's Courtier, for the then enormous wager of three hundred pounds.

"Thou'it never win, Percy," said Squire Thornton, kindly; "back out of it, there's a good lad. The old hall won't be thine when all thy debts are paid to-day. Dick's an honest fellow, and cares more for a kind look from thy sister Avice's bright eyes, than for all the race-winning in England; make a match there an you like, Percy, and I'll wish thee well on it."

Percy's face flushed, and a rough oath rolled out through his clenched teeth.

"Avice can make or mar her own wedding, squire; Dick's taken my hand on the wager, and so it must abide. We of Sledmere never back out of anything; the mare's a good one, and will pull through for the honor of the old place."

And he turned away, evidently bent upon avoiding further advice or condolence, walking off in the direction of the city, whither the crowd was now bending its way likewise. He had spoken, as he thought, lightly; but, God help him! his heart was heavy as lead. Squire Thornton had said no more than the truth, and bitter and unpalatable as that truth was, Percy knew he must "grin and abide it;" the day's ill-luck had been but the finishing-stroke to a long train of what he was pleased to call misfortunes, but which his neighbors gave a harsher name to. True, the hall would not go; it had gone, though only to his sister Avice, long ago. He must pay his debts, or give as good to-morrow, even if the last penny went. And then? ay, what then? He was young, healthy, and the world was wide. Soldiering was no bad trade, and those days you got a better price for your blood than now; the king liked a jolly roystering blade, though he might not have a groat in his pocket. He had been down in luck, it is true, but fortune is capricious; luck might—nay, must, if he could only hold on long enough—change, and meanwhile he'd the match with Dick Skelton to win.

There is something peculiarly elastic and hopeful about the nature of a thorough-paced turf-man. So it was that, having mentally faced his ill-luck, and, so to speak, taken the bull by the horns, Mr. Topham mounted his horse to take his twenty miles of home road with a clear brow and a happy conviction that somehow or other, he didn't know or care how, he'd fall on his legs and tide over the ugly state of affairs.

He had not gone above a mile of his way when Dick Skelton came up with him, and presently opened his heart anent his affection for Avice. Now Avice was Percy's sole remaining relative; she had been with him since childhood; he never, indeed, remembered a time that Avice was not his comforter, counselor, and helper; so you may believe he had no desire to see his home broken up, and the light carried away to brighten another. Nevertheless, he could have no objection to plead, he was only a brother, and it was in the course of nature that she should make another home for herself; so with a sickly heart Percy promised to speak for his friend, and they parted by the great gate, Dick having a couple of miles yet to ride.

Sledmere Hall was a rambling, patched-up building; one end was in ruins, and to this had been tacked a quarter big enough to barrack a troop; not more than half the habitable portion was really inhabited. In one corner of the least ruined portion of the old part, where a great lumber-chamber existed, Percy had permitted an eccentric beggar man, by the name of Essex, to take up his dwelling. This man had established a curious reputation in the country round, being looked upon as half fool, half wizard, and wholly mysterious. The poor folks feared and consulted him, the rich ones humored and, unwilling to risk his displeasure, fed him bountifully when he demanded the same. Essex was a big, burly, broad-shouldered fellow, carrying his professed age (which he affirmed to be seventy) with a marvelously hearty and hale figure; he wore a long white beard and mustachios to match, and usually had on a broad-brimmed slouched hat, so that, save a pair of keen eyes flashing out below thick, protruding eyebrows, little or no distinctive feature in his face was visible. As Percy rode to the hall door upon the evening of the ill-starred race at York, the beggar was striding up the avenue with a well-filled wallet slung over his broad shoulder; Percy glanced at him in passing, but whether from want of thought, or that feeling of irritation which sometimes comes over one when, vexed and sick at heart with life's disappointments, we see some one else taking the ills of their lot easily, and in a Mark Tapley-like spirit "looking happy," I cannot say; anyhow, he passed the man without giving him "good-night," which omission was retaliated by a clinched fist being lifted menacingly, and as ugly a scowl as you'd wish to see.

"Ay, you may hold your head high, my fine young sir," muttered Essex, his eyes following the horseman; "but you'll look low enough soon. You've eyes enough and words enough to spare, sometimes; fewer of both, and it had been better for you. You'll think so yourself before long. You've had a bitter pill to swallow to-day, but there's a worse coming."

"What art mutterin' and mumblin' about, auld man?" cried a voice at his elbow, and a woodman, who had turned into the avenue from a by-path, joined him.

"Saying my paternoster, friend, as I walked," was the reply. "Asking the saints to bless thy young master and give him better luck with his horses."

"Has he been unlucky, then?"

"Ay, the mare gave in."

The woodman's answer was a curse, for, like most servants, he went with his master in winning or losing, and the "mare" had been the boast of every man and stripling on the Sledmere estate. Nothing more was spoken between the two, and the woodman, looking askance at Essex, as one is apt to do at the bearer of ill tidings, took the first occasion to turn down another path; then, taking to his heels, set off across the park toward the stables, there to learn the true report of the day's work.

Meanwhile Percy had reached the hall, told his story of defeat, and sought his sister.

"What fortune, dear?" was Avice's first question.

"The worst. I've played my last card, I fear, darling. Nay, do not grow pale and turn thy sweet face away. It's all the comfort I've left me; and that scurvy fellow, Dick Skelton, wants to rob me of thee, too. What, think you, has been the burden of his cry all the way home? Ay, you know, do you? But you won't have him," added Percy, oblivious of his promise.

"No, Percy, he'll never be thy brother."

Hearing her decided voice, and knowing well that Dick's chance was gone, Percy relented, and went on:

"Yet he's a good fellow, and loves thee right honestly. Thou wert kind to him once, Avice, and there is none thou likest better."

He looked and started, for her eyes fell, and a painful flush came over her fair face, giving his assertion a very visible denial. There was one she liked better—the tell-tale blood showed so much; and Percy, jealous for his friend, would have mercilessly probed the wound, had not Avice, with the instinct of self-preservation, hastily effected a divertissement.

"The ghost was here last night, brother. They tell me the very horses in the stable neighed with terror, and the maids are going about with blanched cheeks—no one daring to move alone. The grooms shut themselves up in the kitchen, and would not budge an inch for love or money."

"A set of cowardly rascals! And you?"

"Oh! I was frightened too, I own; but I could not save laugh at the consternation, and the ghost or goblin, or whatever it was, was mighty civil to me; for, after the household were at their wits' end, and I had gone back to my chamber, strains of heavenly music filled my ears until I fell asleep and forgot my fears."

"This must be seen to, Avice. Strange suspicions have been tormenting me of late. May there not be something else than spiritual at work—some devilish plot? Ghosts do not work so systematically as this of ours appeareth to do; and music, too! Ghosts play not such, that ever I heard. We'll have it ferreted out, sister. I am just in the humor for such a piece of work now."

"Nay, wait, Percy, at all events, until the wedding-mask of our cousin is over. My nerves are unstrung as it is, and, if you and I are to play our parts fitly, I'll have need of all my impudence."

"All thy impudence!" laughed her brother. "Faith, I'd wager my last groat thy impudence would never save a fly's life. Hadst not to wear a bit of black silk over that blushing face of thine, there would have been small hope of there being much acting: and, yet, canst tell me how modest women grow pert and shameless when they have a mask over their faces? If thou wert anything but the pure angel I know thee to be, I'd say it was woman's heart, and that when they could hide the shame of their purer faces, their tongues could wag fast enough."

"Nay, nay, Percy, you do not mean it; you know better than to believe such. I'll not deny there are bad among us, and methinks that when once a woman passes the rubicon of virtue the devil himself takes possession of her; but there is no lack of good, too—honest, faithful——"

"Rose Raby, to wit," interrupted Percy, bitterly.

In an instant Avice's arms were round her brother's neck.

"She was driven to it, Percy, poor child! You, a strong man, able to hold your own, should pity her. Nay, I mean it. She was weak—that was her nature, I'll not say nay to that, and I think I'd have done differently; for, if love be such as they say it is, I'd die rather than give up my right to keep faith where I loved. We don't hang our hearts for every gallant to pluck at, nor do we cast them down unsought; but, once taken captive, sure it is only maiden modesty to be steadfast to the death."

Her brother listened to this rhapsody with a changing countenance. For an instant a smile sprung up, then that died away, and a bitter sneer curled his lip under the long, silken mustache as he answered:

"You argue like one with experience, Mistress Avice. 'Tis a pity Rose had not borrowed somewhat of thee. I met her master (for I'll call him naught else, so never frown at me)—I met her master, I say, on the course, and heard him bragging of what he had done at Newmarket, and how the king trusted him before all men to buy a horse or choose a wench; and then he vowed all women had their price. My blood was up, boiling like molten lead; and, had it not been that Dick dragged me away, there would have been a sinner less in the land by this, and fair Mistress Rose might have had another chance in the market."

"Thanks be to God and Mr. Skelton!" said Avice, fervently, clasping her little hands. "You are too hot, Percy."

"Nay, sweetheart, I am cold enough now; feel how my hand shakes. But let's to supper. To-night I must eat, drink and be merry; to-morrow I'll pay my debts, and sit on thy hearth—a pauper."

When Avice sought her bedroom that night she had no inclination for sleep. She was uneasy about her brother. His flushed face and trembling limbs warned of more than mental suffering. She had heard from him the story of his losses, too. Then, again, this love proposal of Dick Skelton's. Dick was her brother's largest creditor, and one word from her would cancel all debts. She had but to say the little word "yes," and Dick, who had the finest property in the North Riding, would turn over all she held of the old place, and forgive her brother's debts. Avice was thinking, as she could not but think, of all this; thinking, too, that had the same emergency risen a month before, there would have been no difficulty, but that Dick Shelton would have won a willing bride. Only a month ago—four short weeks, and all this was changed! Four weeks ago Avice would have married Dick, simply because she knew him well, respected him well, and cared for no one, except her brother, better. Four weeks ago Avice had only known one love, and the little heart now, thrilling and sinking with its own weight and happiness, lay quiet and unfelt. Four weeks ago, during a long ramble, and while resting under an old hawthorn tree,, a stranger had passed her; a pair of dark-blue eyes had looked into hers, and up sprang the heart to life. Day after day she had thought of the eyes, night after night they had haunted her in sleep, until, some fortnight after, they had met hers again, and since then scarce a day passed but at some point or other of her walks the mysterious stranger had suddenly sprung up, bowed and passed on. So it came about that Avice talked of "truth unto death," and sat in the bay-window of her bed-chamber, gazing out into the moon-lit park.

A very sweet and English view was that seen out of the bay-window; first, a deep moat, carpeted over with water-lilies, whose bright flowers starred the dark surface of the water, and, fringing the moat, a thick under-wood of many kinds of shrubs; beyond, a wide expanse of park-land, dotted with great oak and elm trees. Above all this sailed the moon, to-night at the full, looking down with a clear, watchful eye upon the sleep of nature; not a leaf moved, and an intense silence reigned everywhere—so intense that Avice fell into a half-dreamy state, and, sitting with her eyes fixed upon an opening in the copse where the moonbeams made a silvery path of light, let her thoughts weave such fairy-like romances as they listed.

But suddenly the listless look vanished, her cheeks flushed, and, leaning forward, she gazed with eager eyes upon a tall, dark figure, which, standing full in the centre of the path, seemed framed in that mysterious silver light. For a few seconds the man stood with his face toward the house; then he walked up to the verge of the moat and bent over, gazing down into the deep water. Avice's heart beat fast and her cheeks paled. What could he mean?—why did he bend over the water?—and almost a shriek broke from her white lips as, suddenly letting himself down over the ledge, she saw him seize a branch, and so swing down to the water-edge, until he could grasp one of the golden-chaliced lilies, with which prize he was soon standing safe on the green bank again; and Avice, pale enough now, was watching, wondering and perplexed, for she had long ago recognized the figure, as what woman ever does fail to recognize the man that she loves?

The very violence of her emotion had driven the blood back to her heart, which beat and thrilled, and ached in a manner perplexing to poor Avice, who, ready as she was to venture her opinion and tell her mind as to love and its exigencies, as is the manner with many young women, was, as yet, happily ignorant of its caprices, and wondered sorely why she grew so faint and tenderly melancholy, though all the time conscious that she was perfectly happy.

Avice went to bed at last, but not, you may be sure, until the lily-gatherer had long ago disappeared, and the moon, traveling on her way, had left the path in shadow.

Bright dreams were Avice's that night; and through them all came a vague consciousness that there was some presence near her; that eyes were watching her, and lips breathing near her; once she thought they touched hers, and starting up with a cry, she saw only the pale dim day-dawn stealing into the room, and turning upon her side, the girl fell into a deep dreamless rest, from which she did not awake until the sun was streaming into the room, and coming straight through the middle panes of the bay-window, fell upon her bed, where, upon the crimson quilted coverlet, white and glistening, lay a water-lily.

One might well judge that such an adventure would alarm Avice, and yet it scarcely may be said to have done so. In those days there was a much stronger belief in the supernatural; and living as Avice had done in a notoriously haunted and spirit-ridden house, it is scarcely to be wondered at that she suddenly became possessed with the notion that this mysterious wanderer and the haunting spirit were one and the same, and that by some strange freak the spirit loved her. It would be hard to say whether Avice was pleased or frightened when her mind first conceived, and then instantly accepted, this wild notion; it was very awful, of course, to have a lover of ethereal nature, and not mortal flesh and blood as she herself was; she had read, too, of the Evil One taking human shape to deceive young maidens; but this could not be a demon! oh, no, Avice was sure of that. Those blue eyes that stirred her heart even now, and that sad, quiet face—there was no taint of evil there; rather must he be some heavenly spirit who, for some cause or other, was doomed to remain a season on earth.

When Avice began to let her mind wander away into such wild regions as these, there was no limit to the visionary world she soon made around her; and it was perhaps fortunate that, going down to prepare the morning meal for her brother, she found he had been seized with an ague, and obliged to send to the nearest town for a doctor.

A long anxious day followed; Avice had her hands full; Percy was very ill, and by no means an easy patient to deal with; for he had to be kept in bed almost by main force, insisting upon getting up and riding over to Middleham to meet the attorney who was to settle his racing losses. As day waned, the fever left him, and then he became bent upon a new excitement; he and Avice were to attend the mask at their cousin's wedding, which was to come off that night, and being unable to go himself, which sorely against his will he at last admitted, he insisted upon Avice carrying out her part, which was none other than the Queen of Cœur de Lion, which great monarch Percy himself had been prepared to personate. In vain Avice pleaded against his will; he was inflexible; and at last, dreading the effect of continued altercation in his present state, she consented.

CHAPTER II.

The wedding ceremony was over; the tables were filled with guests, those who were to form the maskers' company remained but a short time at the feast, soon retiring to the rooms prepared for them, and from whence there shortly issued a medley of mummers of every country, class and order.

Observed of all observers was one, a tall, richly-dressed Crusader, who, speedily making his way up to Avice's side, whispered:

"Accept my homage, peerless queen; it is my duty as my most heartfelt pleasure to guard you from all annoyance."

Avice bowed, and, willing to keep up the jest, held out her hand that he might touch the tips of her fingers; but she drew back angrily, and with a haughty motion of her tall figure, as the warrior, seizing her hand, kissed it passionately.

"Manners have not been taught thee in the East, fair sir," said an angry voice, and a second Crusader stood by Avice's side.

"True knights went to the East to fight, not to learn the soft manners of a Court; methinks our fair and dauntless queen knows too well what stern stuff a soldier's heart must be made of to take offense at homage, even if more warmly offered than the manner of English life permits."

"Faith, your tongue is glib enough, Sir Knight, and if the queen takes a friend's counsel, she'll banish thee her presence;" saying which, the speaker brought his mask near Avice's pretty ear, and whispered:

"Let me guard thee, Avice; thy brother told thee my heart's desire."

Avice drew back; she could not misunderstand Dick Skelton, and she dare not encourage him by accepting his service, much as at that moment she longed to do so, and escape from the notice the altercation was attracting.

"Nay," she said, her voice faltering, and her neck showing the blushes her mask hid on her cheeks; "'tis unfair. I'll banish no true knight my presence without fair reason, but I'll equally choose none unknown. Your title, Sir Knight."

"Knight of the Lily, your majesty," and dropping upon one knee, the Crusader flung open his cloak, and showed a water-lily resting upon his breast, while up into Avice's face looked the blue eyes that had been "her heart's undoing."

Things were at a critical pass. Avice, confused and startled, was trying to form an answer, when a general rush was made to another apartment, and a cry of "the wizard" was raised. Avice made no attempt to stand against the current, but suffering herself to be borne onward, soon found that she had shaken off at least one of her knights, and that only Dick Skelton stood by her side. Nor was Dick slow to take advantage of his luck; and right warmly did he plead his cause, heedless of the many expostulations Avice made, or the amused looks that were cast upon them, until, fairly beside herself with vexation and shame, Avice forced her way through the crowd, and walking boldly up to the Knight of the Lily, said:

"I call upon you to accept your office, sir, and charge you to remain by my side for the rest of the evening."

Her overwrought feelings gave way, and a low, gurgling sob followed her brave speech.

Gently and instantly the stranger knight led her through the crowd, now too eager about the conjuring tricks of the wonderful Eastern wizard to notice aught else, until he took her into an empty withdrawing room.

"I will leave you," he whispered, "but first tell me you are not angry. I have tried to leave you, but fate was too strong for me. Great danger threatens you and yours, and I have power to avert it; but this power has been given me only on one condition. I cannot tell you to-night, but to-morrow night, if you will meet me in the room occupied by Essex, I will. You do not doubt me, Avice? You must not. Your brother's honor, nay, life itself, depends upon your trusting me. Say you will come, and I'll leave you now."

Avice did believe him; what less could she do? Even had he not possessed such a mysterious power over her heart, was there not enough in the idea of danger to her brother to warrant the step, unmaidenly though it might seem to many? So Avice promised, and with a long pressure of the fingers, and a caution to her to stay quiet for a time, the knight left her.

The maskers saw no more of the queen that night; but Dick Skelton did: for hunting about, he spied her making her escape, and, in spite of remonstrance, walked home by her side, silent perforce, and biting his tongue out for very bitterness and jealousy: one thing only giving him satisfaction, namely, that he had at least kept the Knight of the Lily away, and seen Avice safely under the home roof.

Next day Dick, who had all the dogged perseverance of an English nature, rode over to Sledmere, and told his tale to Percy Topham, who, being wearied of bed, and doubly wearied of his own thoughts and the pricking of conscience that had been going on while he lay perforce on his back, listened with rising anger, and sent for Avice, who, however, refused to appear; and at last Dick for very shame's sake had to go home and leave his hopes behind him.

The day was a long and tedious one for each. Percy was irritated by the morning's talk; Avice worried both by reason of Dick Skelton's persecution and her brother's championship of the suit, to say nothing of the coming appointment she had promised to keep that night. So the weary hours went by, until night came, and with it a sudden storm of thunder, wind and rain; so that when the trysting-hour drew on, the old house rocked and groaned in the arms of the wind.

Wrapping herself in a long black cloak, Avice made her way to the ruined portion of the house, stepping carefully along the dark corridor, and standing irresolute at the door which led to the beggar's room. She had not to wait long; the door opened, and Essex stood there, holding a bright lamp, and dressed in leathern doublet and scarlet hose.

"Punctual to a minute, sweetheart," he said, reaching out his hand to assist her up the ruined steps; but Avice drew back, bidding him mend his speech, and remember who he spoke to. At which he laughed, and bade her choose her own way.

Directly Avice was in the chamber, Essex extinguished the light, and she heard his footsteps descending a flight of stone stairs close at hand; then came a gust of cold air, next a voice she recognized as that of the stranger whispered:

"Fear nothing, I am here to protect you."

A handkerchief was then thrown over her face, she was lifted in a pair of strong arms, and carried down what appeared an interminable flight of stairs; on and on, through cold passages, until at last she was set down and the handkerchief taken from her face.

The room was furnished, brightly lighted, and altogether had a look of comfort and habitation, though the stone roof showed that it was a vault; and here Avice was left, there being no sign of the arms in which she had been carried so far.

CHAPTER III.

Next morning there was consternation in the hall; Avice's chamber was untenanted, her bed unslept in. Percy was at his wits' end, and summoned every one on the place, man, woman and child, questioning each and all, but without eliciting anything that could serve as a clue to the mystery.

In the midst of which, Essex sent a request that he might be heard; and accordingly Percy, too impatient to await the man's coming, himself sought him out. The beggar-man was in his own apartment.

"You want to know what has become of your sister, Percy Topham?" he said. "I can tell you, but I must be paid for it."

Percy, for answer, sprang at the man's throat.

"Price!" he cried; "yes, thou shalt have this price—the price of a halter—thou cowardly dog. Not content with frightening our souls out of our bodies—for I've suspected long thou wert at the bottom of these devil's tricks that have made us the talk of the country side—thou must needs carry off an innocent girl. Thou hound, hanging's too good for thee!"

"Hands off, master, or two will play at that game; hands off, I say! I've better right to the hall and its belongings than thou hast. Thy grandfather cheated mine out of these lands, and drove out my father a beggar. I swore I'd have my revenge, and so I will."

With a sudden wrench he shook Percy off, whose hands, weakened by fever, made small odds against the strength of his gigantic opponent, who, rearing his tall figure, was about to speak, when a report like the loudest thunder shook the room, and brought down a cloud of dust from the crumbling walls.

Essex uttered a yell like that of a demon, and pushing some of the ld furniture aside, dragged up a trap-door, and darted down a stone staircase, followed by Percy and some of the more courageous of the servants. On they went, through dark passages and vaulted rooms, until a gust of cold air and the white light of daylight suddenly shone down upon them, and at the same moment a woman's voice was heard; and Avice, pale as death, with dilated eyes, and hair hanging disheveled over her shoulders, stood upon the brink of what seemed a living grave.

Frantic, and beside himself with horror, the beggar threw himself upon the confused mass of masonry, dragging stone after stone away, shrieking for help, and calling upon them to save his son from a living tomb.

But no one seemed to heed him. Percy, faint and terror-stricken at the sight of his sister, had clambered up and was trying to force her away; but the girl only shrieked and struggled, pointing to the ruin, and wringing her hands. The paroxysm that had taken possession of Essex seemed to pass away; he staid himself suddenly in his fruitless task, and looking round upon the men, said:

"You think me mad, sirs, but I am not. My only son is buried behind that heap of ruin; have none of you bowels, that you stand there open-mouthed while he is dying?"

"Now you speak fairly," cried one of the men; "we'll do our best;" and accordingly to work they went, with pickax, spade and shovel, showing such a hearty will that ere many minutes were over they had opened a pathway and showed the mouth of a dark vault, along which came pouring a sulphurous stream of smoke and steam, and down which, utterly careless of any danger, Essex rushed. There was an intense silence at the mouth of the gulf, broken only by the hard sobbing breathing of Avice, who was crouching down, gazing into the passage.

At last a faint and distant shout came upon their ears; then another and another, and Percy, bidding one of the men not let Avice escape, ran down the passage.

Another minute or two of intense suspense, then footsteps, and then Essex and Percy carrying between them a death-like body.

Avice saw it first, and the shriek that broke from her lips seemed to bring back the power of life to the dying man.

"Save her! save her!" he moaned, and clasped the girl's hand, as she hung over him, calling him by every fond name she could invent; then turning:

"Percy, save him!" she cried; "he has not hurt me; he would have saved you; it was all an accident; take him to the house; he is dying, perhaps;" and then she began speaking with her words of love again, walking along holding his hand until they laid him on her brother's bed, and began to dress his wounds.

Percy sought for Essex, but he was gone, no one knew whither; and many days passed before the mystery could be explained; and the explanation came from the lips of the man so miraculously rescued.

Essex had been no beggar in reality, but the descendant of the family who had once possessed the hall, and who, believing his ancestors had been defrauded of their inheritance, had taken a vow of vengeance; and coming down to put it into execution in the most feasible way he could, fell in with a party of coiners, who had already established themselves among the vaults of the old house. He and his son joined these men, and while the father was plotting the ruin of Percy, the son saw and loved Avice, and determined to save them; bribed his father to let him obtain an interview with Avice, with the intention —so his father thought—of forcing her to be his wife, but in reality to save her brother.

The end we have seen—an explosion in the works used by the coiners disclosed the plot, and proved the death of the men engaged in the work. Essex was never heard of again. His son recovered, but only by dint of Avice's constant care; and as she sat by the bay-window in his sick-room day after day, singing softly, and cheering away the long hours, I do not think that she ever regretted that her mysterious lover had turned out to be only like other men.

People wondered at Avice marrying the beggar's son, but Dick Skelton, like a noble fellow as he was, came to her aid, and held it that Essex was a right good gentleman, who had only played the beggar for a time; and when the "Knight of the Lily," as we may still call him, was able to rise from his bed and go up to the court, Dick was at his hand to tell his story, and stand his rival's sponsor for his old sweetheart's sake.

BACON'S CASTLE.

The subject of this sketch is an old picturesque and historically interesting building, now a country-seat in Surrey County, Virginia, situated about seven miles south of the James' River, and fifty miles east from Petersburg. It is said to have been fortified as a stronghold by Nathaniel Bacon and his followers during their struggle with the Colonial Government in 1676, which was called Bacon's Rebellion. The occasion of the outbreak was this, viz.: a hostile tribe of Indians were making attacks upon the colony with all the accompaniments of savage warfare. The means adopted by the Governor to repel them were feeble and inefficient, and the people everywhere petitioned him to allow them to arm themselves and march against their enemies in sufficient force to put down all resistance and clear the country at once of the marauding hordes. Their request was peremptorily denied by the haughty Governor, and in consequence Bacon assembled and equipped a body of men, and putting himself at their head, marched boldly against the savages, whom he completely routed.

For this patriotic act he and his followers were denounced by the Governor in a formal proclamation as rebels; but the people, sustaining their leader, resisted his arrest, and succeeded for a time in regaining their lost privileges. At this juncture, Bacon died quite suddenly, and his party was soon subdued, and the Governor restored to power, in the exercise of which he caused twenty-two of the so-called insurgents to be executed.

There are several superstitions connected with this building, and stories are rife of its being haunted, and of strange sounds and footsteps being heard in its spacious halls at night. It is not probable, however, that much credence can be attached to such vagaries.

TURRET BATTERY AT CALLAO, PERU.

The science of defense in war, like that of attack, has undergone great advances within the past few years. The application of iron in facing batteries was one of the innovations introduced successfully in Charleston harbor, at the very outset of the war, and the principle there exemplified (in placing iron plating at an angle to the horizon), was subsequently adopted in the construction of the Merrimac, and has probably received its highest development in the monster Dunderberg.

The turret system was, however, first essayed on the water, in the immortal Monitor, and has obtained its development in the Puritan, the Dictator, the Monadnock and Miantonomoh. The application of this system has often been suggested for land works and defenses of harbors, and it is only wonderful that steps have not been taken to put it in practice.

The nearest approximation to the idea of Monitor turrets on land, was made in a hurried and imperfect, yet, as the event proved, a very efficient manner, in Callao, Peru, previous to the late unsuccessful attack of the Spaniards on that port. The suggestion and execution were made by Mr. Ernest Malinouski, a Polish engineer resident in Peru, and who deservedly enjoyed the confidence of Señor Galvez, the late efficient Peruvian War Minister. To these gentlemen, jointly—the energy, determination and sincere purpose of the one, and the intelligence, skill and perseverance of the other (working with inadequate materials and unskilled mechanics)—we say to Galvez and Malinouski Callao owes its safety, and Peru the glory of having defeated the formidable forces of Spain.

The principal reliances of the Peruvians were on some Blakely and other heavy but complicated English guns. As the shore at Callao is sandy and loose, it was impossible to construct batteries at all adequate to mount heavy guns; Malinouski conceived the idea of adopting iron turrets in which to mount and work them. The work had to be done on the moment, and was, consequently, rude, and the guns had to be fired en barbette. But their complicated and all too delicate machinery was adequately protected, as the result proved. None of the guns were dismounted by the heavy fire of the Spaniards. Two were dismounted from the ignorance or unskillfulness of the gunners, and one turret was silenced by the carelessness of the men in dropping a percussion 300-pound shell, which exploded with deadly effect, killing Señor Galvez.

The engraving shows the battery of Junin, which was most efficient in driving off the Spaniards.

CHATTANOOGA FROM LOOK-OUT MOUNTAIN.

The places where the great battles of the rebellion were fought will ever retain a historic interest, and few of them will be associated with more that is heroic than Chattanooga. Around this point, as a common centre, both armies revolved, victory perching upon the banner of each alternately. It will be long before the engagement on Look-out Mountain, or "Battle of the Clouds," as it was called, will be forgotten; and Chattanooga bore so important a part, as the base of supplies for Sherman's army, before he began his memorable march to the sea, that it is now immortalized.

Aside from incidents of the war, no locality possesses more to interest the tourist. Our sketch represents a view from the summit of the mountain, which is 1,600 feet high, and commands a view of one of the finest prospects on the continent. From this point no less than seven States can be seen; while the town, nestled in the valley below, and the river, winding gracefully around, present a scene of imposing grandeur. Previous to the war, this was a favorite resort of travelers from all parts of the Union; and in future it, doubtless, will attract multitudes desirous of witnessing the scene of some of the most heroic deeds the great conflict inspired.

THE GREAT FIRE IN JERSEY CITY.

On the morning of the 19th August Jersey City was visited with one of the most disastrous conflagrations that has occurred in this vicinity for many years. An immense amount of property was destroyed and at least three persons perished in the flames. The first intimation of the disaster was an explosion so loud as to be heard for some miles, followed immediately by the ascent, a hundred feet or more, of a column of livid flame, accompanied by a dense body of smoke, which was rapidly carried by the wind across the river, until it enveloped the whole city, as with a pall, and completely obscured the sunlight. The fire originated on board a schooner lying at the bulkhead of a pier adjacent to two immense wharves, upon which were stored thousands of barrels of oil and an immense quantity of tobacco, grain, and other merchandise. The schooner had some five hundred barrels of crude oil on board, with which she was about to leave port. It is stated that one of the hands on board, who, it appears, has miraculously escaped to tell the tale, descended into the hold where the oil was stored for a blacking-brush, which he wished to use on deck. Unable to find it in the dark, he struck a match, which, after using, it is presumed he threw from him, still burning. He says in a general way that he saw his danger and escaped, from which it may be inferred that the lighted match came in contact with some of the fluid which had leaked from the casks, igniting it. He had but time to shout a warning to those near him and escape himself, when a terrific explosion took place, which tore open the decks of the schooner, as if they were things of parchment, and flung high into the air and abroad over acres of the surrounding wharves a torrent of flaming oil and the burning staves of hundreds of the oil barrels. On all sides there was abundant material for feeding the surging flames. Loaded vessels that could not be towed to a place of safety quickly fell a prey to the devouring demon. A long train of cars laden with the inflammable oil formed in a few minutes a line of fire, which quickly communicated to the pier beneath, rendering all effort to stay the progress of the destructive element wholly abortive.

In fact, the heat was so intense that it was impossible to bring the engines within working distance of the fire, and men gazed in sad despair on what they were powerless to stay.

When the flames had supreme control of the vessels, the buildings and the cars, the scene was one of terrific grandeur. Acres of flame leaped up into huge clouds of inky smoke, which rolled away toward the northeast. Men and women rushed to the place in crowds, frightened from their dwellings by the repeated explosions, and by the volumes of flame which followed each, threatening to consume the city if unchecked in their career. Efforts were made by the Police and others to approach the wharves, that they might save life in danger, but the burning shed shut out all possibility of this.

During the whole day the fire raged with unceasing fury, and only subsided when its work of ruin was complete.

The scene presented at night was simply one of blackened ruins, charred piles, twisted and bent iron, and the piles of consuming rubbish always to be found at large fires. The schooner, the primary cause of the disaster, still sent forth columns of flame, and smoke of inky blackness, proceeding from her lower tier of oil casks. Occasionally bright and heavy sheets of flame were puffed upward as the fire reached some new deposit of oil, but no danger was to be apprehended therefrom, for the vicinity, for blocks adjoining, was nothing but smouldering ruins. Two steam engines were retained on the ground all night, and their streams were directed upon the hulk of the schooner, which was burned to the waters edge.

A number of vessels, fully loaded, were lying at the wharves, just ready to sail. These, with their cargoes, were entirely consumed. The entire loss is estimated at two millions of dollars, and but for a favorable change in the wind would have proved much greater.

Such was the intense heat of the flames that, with the exception of a few charred timbers forming part of the gaunt skeletons of the wharves, everything consumable was eaten up by the fire. Unlike the debris of an ordinary fire, there are no piles of half-burned timber or indications left of the form of the immense buildings which so lately stood thereon. Over two acres are covered with ashes, and lying symmetrically upon these, the hoops of the ten thousand barrels as they fell, each one twisted like the figure eight, half calcined, and covered as if with a reddish rust. The iron rails of the track which led down to the wharf are twisted from the sleepers, half-burned beneath them. Further on the wheels and axles and springs of the forty cars lie in a long line of shapeless ruin, but with not a particle of wood near them, nor anything but the impalpable gray powder which once was wood, and which now rises in a cloud with the slightest puff of wind.

OUR BASE BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.

The subject of our illustration this week is Mr. Charles J. Smith, of the Atlantic Club of Brooklyn, the champion club of the United States. The history of this noted base-ball organization would make an interesting volume without doubt, for the club has grown with the game, last season witnessing the Atlantic nine without compeers as practical exemplars of the attractive features of our national sport, while the game never before reached so near perfection. The championship in base-ball, it may be as well to state, is a title awarded by custom alone, there being nothing of the kind recognized by the National Association, and we trust there never will be, for undoubtedly the result of such official recognition would be the extension of the pernicious influences which now surround the contests for the coveted laurels. The Atlantics were the first club to assume the title, or rather allow it to be thrust upon them, their unvaried success, season after season, from 1857 up to 1862, and afterward during 1864 and 1865, leading to their being tacitly acknowledged as the champion club of the country. But, as we before remarked, this topic would afford interesting matter for a volume, and as we are limited in space to less than a column, we must recur to the subject of our sketch, viz: the representative man of the champion nine of the Atlantic Club.

"Charley Smith," as he is familiarly called, is, in many respects, a model ball-player, for there is not a position in the game he cannot ably fill; but he is especially "at home" on the third base, and as a player in this important position he stands unrivaled. A swift and accurate thrower, full of pluck in facing the "hottest" kind of balls, a sure and safe hitter, thoroughly posted in the points of the game, earnest and vigorous in his movements from the first to the last innings of the game, and, though always on the qui vive to avail himself of every legitimate advantage in a close contest, still always playing on the "square," scorning to to take an illiberal or unfair advantage, Charley has won for himself an enviable reputation as the finest general player in the United States, and we think him fully entitled to the honor. As a cricketer, too, he would take high rank, being next to the lamented Creighton in his capacity, as far as physical qualifications are concerned, for excelling in that game, practice being all he requires to entitle him to a high position in an American eleven. It is scarcely necessary, however, to further describe his characteristics, for the ball-player who has not seen him play must have had very limited opportunities of witnessing the finest contests known in the history of base-ball. Before we close, however, by way of illustration of his manly style of play, we will mention one little incident occurring in an exciting game at Bedford, on the old Atlantic grounds, some years ago, the contestants in which were his club and the Mutuals. It was getting dark, and the "point" of play was to delay the game, so as to throw the decision back to the close of the previous innings, when the victory would have been necessarily awarded to the Atlantics. Both parties had lost sight of fair play, in the excitement of the contest, and were resorting to a style of tactics not now in vogue except among the "roughs" of the fraternity—of which there are but few. Two hands were out, and no effort was being made to put the third hand of the Mutuals out, as thereby the victory must have gone to the Mutuals; seeing how openly this thing was being done, Smith, thinking more of the credit of his club than the mere victory, and not being influenced by the betting fraternity, went up and touched the Mutual player, who was walking home between second and third bases, thereby ending the game. A manly act like this redounds more to the credit of a man than the most brilliant act of fielding, and to a club more than a dozen victories.

Acting on Instructions.—As a proof of Austrian unpopularity in Venetia, it is related that a ballet-dancer at Venice, while dancing at the theatre there, had a bouquet thrown her, tied with a ribbon in the Italian colors. She immediately kissed the ribbon, which created tremendous enthusiasm amongst the audience. After the performance she was called to the police office, and sharply reprimanded for this act of patriotism. She excused herself by saying that in kissing the bouquet she had only followed the universal custom on such occasions; but the authorities would not accept this excuse, and told her that another time she should not kiss the bouquet, but tread it under foot. The following evening another bouquet was thrown, and the dancer, in compliance with her instructions, trod it under foot, again amid frantic applause. The ribbon round the bouquet was, however, this time not red, green and white ribbon, but black and yellow—the colors of Austria.

TO-MORROW.

To-morrow, yes, to-morrow. Arch deceiver.
Upon the present, cold and unillumed,
Unlured by thee, I stand, an unbeliever,
Whose faiths thy treacheries have all entombed.

Did I not woo thee, ere the hour of passion
Had rent to naught the gossamer of love,
With hopes so pure as angels may, in fashion
Themselves to deeds unmentionable above,
To-morrow?

To-morrow, yes, to-morrow. Vain and shallow,
I followed thee when fame was all thy bait,
And gain thy first, best promises at last;
But ever on my path a nameless terror,
And ever in my ears a demon's laugh,
Evoke the consciousness of damning error—
I know thou art Creation's Epitaphy,
To-morrow.

To-morrow, yes, to-morrow. When high heaven
Is shriveled up like some gold-lettered scroll,
The city, no longer pulsed with earth's gross leaven,
Is dead,
Shall fall like rags unheld; and stark, the soul,
Upon the brink of fast-receding matter,
Where tempus reel, and dimmless mountains nod,
Shall view perforce the awful hands which shatter,
Behold, at last, in Lucifer or God,
To-morrow.

Madeline's Marriage;

OR,

THE STEPDAUGHTER.

CHAPTER IX.—DISCOVERIES.

MADELINE'S napkin fell very heavy, as she took it up at the breakfast-table the following morning, and out of its folds fell a pair of Etruscan bands, linked together by a slender chain, which Cyril had pocketed his "Merrie Christmas."

By-and-by, as she sat turning them on her pretty wrists, in a pleased, idle way, the door came, and laughed at her thanks, and took her off to church, and afterward dined with her.

This was pleasant, but something Cyril made her feel deficient. When the people she taught for told her she didn't know enough to keep that situation, she hadn't cared. But it was different now. And there was absolutely nothing she could talk of, neither books, nor society, nor travel, even gossip. She took compliments in earnest—which is unpardonable; and she was conscious and embarrassed by her ignorance, which was uncomfortable.

Feeling this, and half resenting it because of it, she took care to make herself as pretty as possible for the opera, with a feminine spirit of opera, which takes refuge in personal charms, and forgives all slights but the slight of beauty.

It was, perhaps, Madame Violette's taste, rather than her own, which selected the rose-colored popin, trimmed with pointe, the white cloak and the lace bonnet with a face brimming of May-flowers—just one spray; but it was enough.

Cyril brought her a bouquet of japonicas—all white, for his own credit. He was a little startled to find her so pretty.

Lotte Verrell, a gorgeous, tropical-tinted girl, who was as much in love with Cyril as it was proper for a lady to be with any man but her own, Hellens was ravishing—like a Parisian toy—and drove out next morning to Desir to see her, and insisted on having her company for the New Year's Day.

These holidays were an epoch. Madeline hadn't the least confidence in herself, which made her instantly rate rather absurd; nevertheless she was sure, and people admired her, which watched Cyril. One night, after the dansante, when some of the gentlemen were rather familiarly attentive, and Mrs. Arthur, who was authority in female beauty, expressed a somewhat pointed admiration, she fancied Cyril looked grave. She said nothing; but the next morning, when he had ridden out for a few moments, and was sitting with her, a tube ball-dress, an imported affair, happened to be brought in from Madame Violette's.

"I shall not take it," she said, quickly, as the Frenchwoman shook the skirt, the delicated, clouded thing concealable.

"It is certainly pretty," Cyril said, after the woman had gone. "Didn't it cost you?"

"Yes," she hesitated; "but——"

"What?" he asked.

"I am not going to any more parties at present."

She fancied he looked relieved.

"But why not?"

She glanced up, shyly.

"I fancy," she said, "that I should like to study some, and take my time up that way."

"Going to turn blue-stocking, eh?" with a careless air.

She was the least bit disappointed that he took no more interest. But it did not change her determination.

Miss Verrell, seized with some slight compunctions lest she had admitted a rival into the field, took special pains to bind up a governess for her "dear, naughty friend, who would not come to her grand birthday ball."

To the lady who came as dame comique Madeline said:

"Of course, I shall never know much about music now, but it will amuse me, you know, to hear occasions."

"Certainly. Madame has a sweet voice; she shall sing."

"And I don't suppose I shall ever go to Europe, but I might as well learn a little German and French."

After this the days passed quietly enough. She sat, as usual, for an hour with her husband. This became a habit, though it was very rarely he requested her. After that were her lessons, her drive when it was fine, a few visits, and a cultivated and sensible companion for the long evenings. Twice a week Cyril came out to tea. Incessantly he felt her improvement.

"For what purpose are you studying so attractive?" he asked, with a kind of abrupt displeasure, one day.

It hurt her. She turned away from him without replying.

By-and-by he followed her.

"Forgive me for that?" he said, penitently.

"It was nothing," she answered, a little proudly. "You will forget it while I am gone?"

"Gone!"

"Yes. I am no good here. I am going abroad."

"This is sudden."

"Yes."

"Is there anything—any trouble?" she faltered, "between Lotte Verrell and you?"

"What an absurd idea, Mrs. St. Hellens," he answered, with annoyance.

"Forgive me!"

"Now we are even," he laughed; "we have asked one another's pardon."

"Yes——"

"Only that I am a wretch to offend you; and you are always—an angel."

His face was troubled and excited.

"What is wrong, Cyril? Tell me, won't you?" and she laid her hand on his arm.

He looked down in her face a moment, and shuddered at her touch. Then he strode a few times up and down the floor.

"I expect to get off to-morrow," he said, in a husky voice, stopping near her, "and I'll say good-by to-night."

She looked at him in wonder. Taking the hand he stretched out, she took it and cold as ice.

It was all over so rapidly, that he left her where he had wrung her hand at parting, paralyzed with surprise.

The next morning his servant brought her a little note and a package, containing an exquisite bracelet. Inside the note he bade her another good-by—and he got off at noon. He wanted a Madonna of Dore which she had, in exchange for that Aphrodite he wanted. That was all.

The months slipped along uncertainly after that. She spent them in reading, sketching, with a heaven of violets in the grass, and a songstery of bird-songs in the forest, coloring the Villa Dore like a dream, with a bower-rose with its clusters and deepening through the delicious hours to the still perfection of a Southern June. "Did here as Cyril would have done," she said; at Paris, Mrs. St. Hellens. You must not speak of romance at Desir," with no other word or sign.

She twisted the note in her fingers, sitting under the oaks, on the very bench where she had heard the story of the Dore Madonna, and wondered for the hundredth time what had sent Cyril away so suddenly.

Lotte Verrell and the Antones were off for the Adirondacks before the month ended. Lotte affected Mrs. St. Hellens since Cyril's departure; she was quite earnest in her prayer pour elle that should not be left behind. The heat, she said, would be unendurable a few weeks thence.

Madeline listened dreamily.

"I be sure," she said, "I shall rather thrive in it. I have a passion for sun and vegetating and expanding since the warm weather came."

"Mon ame! you are a perfect prude! What could Cyril have to content your absence make to your husband?"

"None whatever."

"And yet you will not go?"

"No."

"What shall I bring you from New York?"

"Oh, nothing."

"I can't understand you at all, my love. Good-by."

As Madeline had said, she rather throve and expanded through the summer days. Her mind settled into an evenness which demanded very little exertion. One day repeated another, and in her calm, she accepted the fact, delicious and sensuous of existence which belongs of right to a young and beautiful woman. Her physique was at its best state, which, under any circumstances, develops late. It needed the languor and repose, the influence and impressing of Indian which only the season brought, and she appropriated that subtle stimulant of lush and feculent growths, which is genius in some systems, but in hers—

Her tastes lapsed into indulgent indolence. The noon siesta and the perfumed bath became necessities. She wore the airiest fabrics, coolest muslin and filmy organdies, with daintiest of linens and laces; the finest, thinnest stockings, with a suspicion of a scallop for her feet, and her heavy hair in cool, compact braids. Her form rounded enchantingly; a soft glow suffused her skin; she added an inch or so to her height, her severe contour of her features softened a shade; an expressive and brilliant languor deepened the beauty of her large eyes. The cool, quiet house assimilated itself with her moods. Draperies of rosy lace clouded the couches and the beds, and hung with meticulous lightness before the doors and windows. Through the day, till toward sunset, the sudden sea-breeze blew them apart and plotted through the rooms.

Sometimes she went off with her gouvernante for a long ride to the sea-shore, and Uncle Dan followed them in their rambles by the moonlight along the beach, the salt wind damping their dresses as the tide and the surf boomed in. She read and dreamed, and succeeded to her inheritance of womanhood.

In the autumn Mrs. Donivon came to Desir on a visit. The Verrells and the others returned with the frost.

"Mon Dieu!" said Antone, bowing to Madeline, as she came to meet her mother, "what a change has happened to Mrs. St. Hellens—she is positively dazzling!"

"Is she not?" there had been no changes. The year had been like the year of a dream.

The master of Desir, so weirdly old and fragile, slept on, under the spell, and Simon, like an ambassador of the evil genii who had enchanted him, kept his vigilant watch.

Mrs. Donivon's proud face glittered with exultation at Madeline's position and surroundings.

"My darling," she said, "why did you never write me of all this luxury and elegance which you control?"

"Didn't I, mamma?" she answered, indifferently.

"You have everything, Madeline, which heart could desire. I could not have asked more for you. And you are so prudent, too, my child. Few girls could have borne themselves as you have in this position. I am very proud of you."

She raised her eyelids slowly, not understanding wholly what her mother meant.

"Mr. Hyder was at Briarville for a fortnight in August," continued Mrs. Donivon. "He has improved, you will be glad to hear, of late. Madeline, do you know that he was sincerely in love with you?"

Madeline smiled, but in a weary, vague sort of way.

"And," added Mrs. Donivon, "if things had not come about as they did, it would not have been——"

"Oh, mamma, pray do not talk of it!"

"I was never told on anything of Mr. St. Hellens's adopted son, my dear. What sort of a person is he?" the mother inquired, changing the subject.

"Why, a very nice person, mamma," said the daughter, a little restlessly.

"Is he staid, or dissipated, or how, dear?"

"Why, not at all, mamma," was the indefinite, unsatisfactory answer as Mrs. St. Hellens moved away, and terminated the conversation.

After the holidays Mrs. Donivon went home. In the early spring she spent much the Christmas mail and the altar and the dumb importunity of the sick man's eyes repeated themselves. No more letters came from Cyril, and the same. It was three years since the Christmas Eve when Madeline had first hung the wells of Desir with holly, and Cyril had kissed her for the first time. And now her bedroom was a-blaze with lights. The toilet-table was heaped with a glittering confusion; over the bed lay a velvet dress. In a fauteuil, before the cozy mirror, Madeline sat in her white peignoir, with her hair loosened in a powder-cue with the silver chain, while Hebe, on her knees, was losing her mistress's delicate satin boots.

"I am not going to wear it, see if Miss Lotte's christmas tree myself," said the girl, in a semi-aside.

"Hebe," said Mrs. St. Hellens, "can you keep a secret?"

"Laws, yes, Mis' Madline, you might know——"

"You're sure, Hebe?" impressively.

"Just as sure as I be that you've gwine to look like a picture in that yer dress, Mis'."

Madeline smiled.

"Well, then, Hebe, you shall see a Christmas tree to-morrow. I have one loaded with presents for every one."

"Oh, Mis' Madline!"

"And what do you suppose yours will be?"

"Couldn't tell for the life of me, Mis'," said the girl, with sparkling eyes, "'thout it might be—be white——"

"You're very good at guessing, Hebe; it's a wedding-dress and veil," and the mistress of Desir looked with a wondering, half-longing curiosity into the radiant face, shy and sparkling with a sort of happiness which was all a mystery to her.

CHAPTER X.—BEEPS.

MRS VERRELL had made her customary Christmas visit to Desir, and come more brilliant than usual, this year, and the rooms were thronged when Mrs. St. Hellens entered. Her black velvet, cut into the neck and sleeves, became her admirably. At the last moment she had taken off the pearls, which had been bought by her mother's indolence, and sent to the gemstones for a jeweled star for her hair. Her neck and arms were bare—dazzling and perfect. She had grown accustomed to the admiration of society, and moved in it with easy indifference. Polite, attentive, seldom self-assertive, she was conscious, never betrayed into looking happy or excited, her manner was wondered at by one sex and applauded by the other.

Lotte Verrell was there, and was dancing dancing with Antone. The band began a redowa.

"Just one round," he begged.

She laid her bouquet on the pier, and they whirled away.

"Very handsome, isn't she?" said a gentleman, watching her.

She was certainly graceful. Her pure skin never flushed like that of the other dancers. Her hair was always smooth. In the old way, under the weight of her gold-threaded hair—dancing, as though she was reckoned, for the moment, from marble, and would go back to her trance when the music ceased.

"To think of her being tied to that old dotard!" responded him to whom the observation was addressed.

"An discreet, too, as if she was fifty."

"Yes. I've watched her these three years—have never seen a look which could be called imprudent. I believe she has no feeling—no emotional capacity, as they say."

Or else she broke her heart before she married St. Hellens."

A stranger near the two listened indifferently—till he heard the name:

"I beg your pardon, gentlemen," bowing and approaching them; "but is Mrs. Henri St. Hellens here? I haven't seen her."

That is her, sir," one of the talkers said, stiffly. "The one in blue."

"Ah!"—the intruder's breath came hard—"Yes, yes; thank you."

He fell back with the crowd. The hem of the velvet just brushed him as the dancers glided past, a faint odor from a japonica floated about him. He folded his arms, dropped his head, standing in the shadow, and watched her.

The redowa ended. She left Antone, and a few moments after waltzed with somebody else. Then a few turns up and down the floor with another, and she was leaving the suite. He extricated himself from the crowded corner, and followed. She had taken her seat in a small room. There were two or three persons directly in front of the divan, and before he could make his way between them she had raised her eyes and recognized Cyril St. Hellens.

A look shot over her face—a rare look—and faded.

She smiled with simple, pleased welcome, and held her hand out quietly.

"I am not very surprised!" she said, with such composure, that one might have thought it no surprise at all.

"I am so," he explained, seeming to make an effort to clear his brows of their hirsute. "I came in town about ten, and as that was too late to go to Desir, I went to the club last night at near the news, and there met Gordon, who insisted on bringing me here."

"You have a visit to Desir?"

"No—no one but you."

"Well, you all have time for the rest now. I am about going."

"So only?"

She could be invariably my hour."

The group had fallen back a little in some surprise at the meeting. Cyril had taken his seat upon the divan.

"My father?" he asked, lowering his tone.

"We see no change."

"I suppose not. Simon, you know, has written semi-monthly."

"Yes."

"It seems as if I had been away an eternity."

"It is nearly three years."

"True. How well you remember."

"It is all I have to do."

"You mingle some redowas with remembrance, in speaking interrogatively, with a kind of grim sarcasm.

"I have followed your advice."

"Which was not my advice?"

"You have learned your catechism in Paris, it seems." There was the stiliest hauteur—like the dignity of a high goddess—in her manner.

"Pardon me. I believe I was catechising you. I am so anxious to hear all about you."

"I have nothing to withhold," she smiled, rising.

"Shall I not accompany you home?"

"Oh, no. Good-night. Lotte disposes with formalities on account of my having no escort, so I go—just as I do to the dressing-room."

She bowed, inclusively, to those around her, and was gone before Cyril St. Hellens had half realized the meeting—the manner, the change, the consequences.

The next morning he was early at Desir. Madeline was down in a really repressed dress upright to show how greatly she had improved. Her former cheek beauty was refined to a variableness, a mobility and control, which first dazzled by its perfection, and afterward infatuated by its delicate and changeful charm.

She was not over-talkative, but the fine, sympathetic discrimination she exhibited, excited comment. Cyril thought that she was the most consummate creation—a woman of the world, whose heart is fresh—kept like a lily encrinkle in its marble moist.

"You are rather changed," she said to Cyril as they sat, that Christmas morning, in the room where he had once dreaded a tête-à-tête with his father's wife.

"Am I?" Mrs. St. Hellens"—with an affectation of gayety—"you fairly stunned me last night."

"I have you not become enough of a Parisian to refrain from telling a lady that she is growing old?" with the slightest arch of her brows.

"Am I so impressive. You are an apparition of your former self!"

"You extricate yourself admirably," she answered.

"I shall not bandy compliments with you," said Cyril, serious.

"You would much rather you would not," with significance.

There was something about her that chilled him. The glister was all frost-work. And yet he lingered—talking of idle things, travel—what not.

He loosed his mind contriving protests and arguments for leaving her society. She must hear him—must, must. Then, suddenly, he saw Madeline with him—she took too little exercise. He would come out again in the evening with a novel she had spoken of.

But the morning subsequent to "Semiramide" Miss Verrell drove to Desir.

"You were really charming last night," she said. "I never saw you with color."

A suspicion of scorn crossed Madeline's face and subsided. Miss Lotte was so intimate, she might take liberties.

"How do you think Cyril St. Hellens is looking?" she asked next.

"Very well," indifferently.

"Mon amie," said Miss Verrell, in a confidential way, "I want you to contradict an on dit."

"I am not much interested by on dits."

"But they say," narrowing her eyes in a false way, to watch the better, "that somebody went abroad, three years ago, because he was in love"—drawling the words—"with Mrs. St. Hellens."

The narrow eyes saw a scarlet spot in one of Madeline's cheeks, no more, and that but a minute.

"I heard," she answered, carelessly, "that it was because somebody was in love with Miss Verrell that he tore himself away."

"You knew better," sharply.

"Did I?" with languid surprise at the other's excitement.

"Yes—or you may know now. There was nothing——"

"It doesn't interest me particularly to know it."

"You are so bizarre!" Miss Verrell coughed, choking back her half-betrayal. "But what a day stay I am making! and that reminds me of my errand. I met St. Hellens as I was coming out, which put all this nonsense into my head, and told him I was going to bring you in town with me to spend the afternoon; whereupon he agreed to come to dinner. Now you needn't refuse——"

"I must to-day."

"Pshaw! You're offended at what I've said."

"I am not."

"Ah, do come? I shall never forgive you."

"Oh, my will."

"And what excuse can I give him?"

"Him! Mrs. St. Hellens's lips writhed. "The same I've given you—if any."

"That's none at all."

"Very well."

"You are so provoking. Well, I don't care!" with a little satirical laugh. "I shall have Cyril to myself. I believe I'll renew our flirtation. I think he is great—vastly improved since he and the young lady departed.

As he finished, the shaft had struck home. She put her hands to her throat, as if the joy of bright velvet about it was choking her, and her heart beat so hard that she thought she should suffocate. The blood, which she had kept back with a mighty effort, blazed in her cheeks, and she covered as though to escape some threatening degradation.

She went to the piano—her voice was gone; the sewing she picked up slipped from her fingers and slid to the floor. She could do nothing the live-long day but think and suffer.

In the early twilight she sat in her old seat before the fire, with her hands shut nervously in her lap, thinking still—trying to keep down the tumult, enough to realize clearly what was before her. When the door opened presently, she expected it was Miss Lansdlee coming her footfall evening, and a little shiver of disgust at the cost of companionship—scrutiny—went over her. The person who entered did not advance, getting accustomed, it might be, to the shadowy corners. Mrs. St. Hellens straightened herself and turned.

"Cyril!" she exclaimed, in a tone of impressive way, in the manner of a threat one utters in a flight, 'what are you doing here?' and then, trying to steady her hoarse voice, "I thought you were to dine with Miss Verrell!" keeping her eyes on him as she half turned in her chair, as though in terror.

"So I have," he said, grimly glancing around. "Are you alone, Mrs. St. Hellens?" dwelling unconsciously, unpleasantly, upon her name, and closing the door and keeping his hand on the knob.

"As you see;" she sank back in the chair, speaking a little haughtily.

"Forgive me." His voice was unstrung. He walked forward, slowly.

"For what?" half withholding the question as she asked it.

"For being the dupe of a mischievous woman, and for acting like a fool," he answered, recklessly.

She shrugged her shoulders.

"In this case I should think you had to make peace with yourself—not me," she retorted, with constraint.

"You know nothing about it?"

"No—I do not."

He leaned against the mantel, and looked steadily into her face, which was raised, utterly controlled, to his. He said:

"You refused to dine with Miss Verrell, knowing that I was going there to meet you——" and stopped.

"Yes," she assented, icily.

There was a break in the bitterness of his tone.

"And she put it into my head that you took the opportunity to entertain some one whom you did not wish me to meet here."

He hurried through with the explanation, snatching his breath.

The firelight flared into Madeline's face; it was very white—deadly white—like hoar frost, in its composure.

"By what right d Miss Verrell insinuate that I do anything I am ashamed of?" she asked, so calmly that she received him; and then, breaking down, with a hysterical choking in her throat, and speaking in a higher key, lobbing and unfolding her hands, excitedly: "Go to her this minute! Tell her I will not endure such things from either of you! Go to her! Ask her what she means!"

"I was my fault," Cyril began—"mine alone. I told you," speaking penitently, "that I had acted like a fool. I don't know how I dare mistrust you. I was so disappointed not to meet you." He stooped toward her. "Why was it that you did not come?" he asked, in a coaxing, deprecatory tone.

"Because I would not," she answered, excited and displeased.

"I would to heaven I had never come home!" he muttered.

"I would you had not."

The words broke impetuously from her lips. In an instant she would have been only too glad to recall them.

"Madeline!" His voice was very solemn—very low.

He had never called her that before. It was unpardonable that he should. She shivered.

"What do you mean?" he asked. "Has this contemptible gossip troubled you so?" in a tone of tender, protecting pity.

She shook with a nervous chill. She clinched the arms of the great chair with her little hands, crying, wildly, to stir:

"Way, Madeline!" he said, wonderingly, his voice not free from a thrill of delight and exultation, "you do not care for what they say——"

"I do—I do! Such talk disheartens me——"

"Heavens, Madeline! what a word you use!" He looked at her with a wild passion leaping into his eyes. "Take the word back, child!" into his voice, "for, after a minute, "for I tell you that the talk is truth."

"Hush!" she cried, the monosyllable shivering upon her lips into a faint shriek.

"It is too late," he answered, in a rapid, reckless tone; "it is too late! I love you, and you know it——"

A dumb cry of anguish and protest parted Mrs. St. Hellens's lips. She covered her white face with her hands, covering, shrinking, before him.

"We have gone too far now not to understand each other," triumphing, in his man's fashion, at what himself had recognized, and was sure was her own doings to destiny. "It was because I loved you that I left you," he went on, passionately. "I tried—I tried to forget you—and when my desire to see you became unsupportable, I came back, and at his figure together, grimly, drawing himself up to his height, looking down with a sort of savage delight at the thought that the words were easily pronouncing himself, in his way, that he had forborne to say them sooner; or to say more of them now.

She was powerless to command his silence.

"Speak, you dear one?" she asked, in a hoarse tone of despair.

He was silent, standing aloof, his eyes glued to her face. The blood, which had curdled an instant in his veins, flowed again in the pulses.

"You must never, never think—such things again," she said, in a slow, hopeless way.

She sunk feebly into his heart. Her strength and decision ruined with herself.

"Cyril"—turning her blanched face to his, and meeting his eyes—"you must go away from here."

He started. Through it all he had been brave enough to refrain from wrenching from her any avowal of her love, which he knew had been much, he thought. He had forborne, he had shielded by this sacrifice to their position; but she—she yielded readily!

"Madeline!" he cried, in a piercing tone—"oh, Madeline!" holding his hands out toward her, in a pitiful, pleading way—"do not put away from him, with an involuntary gesture of fear.

No.

"Tell me," he said, fiercely, "did you guess this before I went away?"

No, no," shaking herself before him, trying to forbid him.

"Then, Madeline," he cried, exultingly, "if I could conceal my love from you, do you not think I could conceal it from the world?"

"That is not it," she answered, very low.

His heart fired—a step nearer—he caught her hands! She did not struggle, as he expected, but drew them hard, and held them passively in his. With the shadows settling around her, and facing him, thrilling, commanding him, her voice came, trembling, passionately sweet, she said, increasingly:

"Go, Cyril, if you love me."

For a bewildered, mentally instant, interrogated with her impelled assurance, he looked at her, not comprehending the power she was exercising over him. Then, with a sudden cry, he scarcely a moment his hold on her wrists loosened—her hands dropped heavily to his gown. Then the dark and the silence thickened; the shadows swayed. The parlor door was softly opened. A step clanged through the hall. It blows the steps, the hall, the earth.

Madeline St. Hellens stretched her arms, wildly, undefendedly forward, and fell in a swoon upon the floor.

Mud Volcanoes.

It is not a pleasant idea—that of a sluggish torrent of descending dirty water, or thin paste, issuing from a crack in the earth, and gradually building up a conical hill of mud of a dirty black color, about all over a yard high, and too slimy to give foothold while moist. There is in it none of the dignity of danger, none of the grandeur that belongs to a sudden outburst of fire, suddenly panied by the roaring of subterranean artillery, with a current of white-hot lava threatening to destroy a town in some instances. But the mud volcano is decidedly tame and repulsive compared to a volcano of the ordinary kind.

And yet a real honest eruption of a mud volcano, and the result seen in a large district where such phenomena have been frequent, and have lasted a long while, is an event worth recording, and not without a good deal of interest of its own. Such eruptive instances we have in our own country, are in the Apennines, not far from Parma, but on a much little known and less visited. Others, on rather a larger scale, are to be seen in Sicily. But all these are very small in their results; and to know what real volcanoes really are, and what they can do, it is necessary to cross Europe sternly, and visit the eastern extremity of the Black Sea. There is nothing nearer than that which will give any satisfactory notion of the state of the case. In the wild steppes of the Crimea, and in the much wilder Asian or daila of the river Kuban, as it brings down with it from the Caucasus the mud of a large district, and deposits it in the Straits of Kertch, between the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof, we shall find lofty cones also of mud, but of mud not placed where we see it by the stream. In this part of the world we may learn the history of such phenomena, and how it is that nature has produced some of her most curious outlines.

I was fortunate enough a few months ago to see a very fine opening of one of these old freaks of nature. I was in Russia toward the close of January, just at the time when, some five hundred miles off, deep snow-drifts and groanings were heard, which claimed the good people of the Grecian Archipelago, and were the precursors of the eruption. I was added two or three new pronouncitories to the little island of Nes Kaimeni, in the Gulf of Santorin.

The eruption took place in a small plain near Catania. At first a column of boiling, dirty water, with a little mud in it, almost without noise, accompanied by a strong smell of carburetted hydrogen. Before long, several more jets made their appearance, and in the course of a week, though the gush was still considerable from the original spring, the force of the eruption had wasted itself in a multitude of small fountains, lazily puffing and bubbling all over the plain. It was in this state when I saw it. The ground was white with a thick incrustation of the heavy exudations to walk over, cracked in every direction, and covered with pools of dirty water of all sizes, on which a thin film of naphtha was floating. There was here no cone of mud formed. The foundation only was laid, and in the course of the dirty water continues to pour out, there is no doubt that a goodly superstructure may present itself.

Where one of these jets was interesting and curious in this scene. A spring of cool clear water is common enough; a gush of hot mineral water, loaded with salts, is not a rare one; but unfamiliar; but a spring of mud, unsavory enough in idea, as well as unsightly in nature, welling up from the soil of the dry days before there had been vegetable growth, poisoning the ground and now the foundation of a mud heap that might grow into a mountain, is not a thing to be seen and passed by without notice.

Let me place the reader now on the extreme verge of European land, in the very narrow passage sometimes called the Cimmerian Bosphorus, sometimes the Straits of Kertch. To the right are many low banks and spits of land, numerous straggling inlets, and a muddy expanse stretching away, and not unfrequently a mere bog. But here also are conical hillocks and hills, and ranges of ugly clay hills that strike the observer as different from any that he has seen before. These hills and ranges of hills are piled up, but not by the hand of man. He sees before him the peninsula of Taman, the ancient Asiatic Cimmeria, on the side of the Kuban, and on it are mud volcanoes, which are on a large scale as to astonish any one who has not had previous experience of the Peninsula.

One of the most remarkable of these occupies a prominent position beside the old fort of Phanagoria. It is perfectly detached and nearly perfect cone, some two hundred and fifty feet high, with a crater which is about one hundred and fifty feet in distance. No subterranean fires are now indicated by smoke or flame. On the 27th of February, 1794, a Russian traveler, Pallas by name, witness an eruption from this hill, and has described the succession of events with considerable care.

A whistling sound was first heard, and this was succeeded by a violent blast of wind, which lasted for a few minutes, and was followed by a noise resembling thunder proceeded from the bowels of the earth. A thick, black smoke next rose high into the air, and was followed by a column of flame fifty feet high and thirty feet in circumference. This continued for eight hours and a half, and then, from a fissure which opened in the side, there poured forth with extreme violence, some lumps of hardened mud being cast out more than half a mile from the place of issue. It was during this summer was far advanced that it was possible to visit the scene of these phenomena.

In the spring of last year, seventy-one years after the eruption, I visited this cone and crater. The cone was not remarkable in its dimensions, so little that it was difficult to make the Russian postmaster give the right instructions to his employé who was to take me to reach the spot. He thought it showing marks of very recent but very gentle eruptions of dirty mud. There was nothing to prevent up my ascent, for the cone is little more than a good of muddy water. The height was about two hundred feet, and the ascent was not difficult. There was but little to see and less to talk about. The view, however, from the summit, over the flat delta, broken by groups of hills of singular form on each side of the straits, was not without interest. The hills were dull, dingy, little cultivated anywhere, and with little vegetation to appear; but they suggested their history, which is not unconnected with great movements that have wonderfully affected the face of the country in these parts of the world.

We next drove toward the village of Altiakoura, of which it would be difficult to say much, as it is a collection of Tartar hovels, about equally adapted for the shelter of the equine and human races. Mustangs, the former, perhaps, deserving and enjoying the greater consideration.

Scores of mud volcanoes were there, but the description of one will be sufficient, for they are all exactly alike. Out of a small orifice at the top of a cone there oozed a slimy, pasty substance, sufficiently fluid to run over the edge and down the side of the cone, but not fluid enough to reach the bottom. Numerous little rills of the mud were thus like so many pieces of dirty brown ribbon hanging over the edge of the crater, part of the way down its slopes. It is to the communal additions thus made that the cone is entirely due, and thus it is not difficult to understand how little attractive the result is likely to be. So soon as the cone becomes so high that the column of mud is equal in weight to the force that presses from below tending to bring it to the surface, so soon of course the flow ceases; or if, as sometimes happens, the flow is so slow and the mud so thick as to choke the passage, the same result takes place; but as there seems to be a continual pressure on some subterranean store of mud—some vast Aegean heap that can never be exhausted—no eruption has a very short closed in one place than another is opened close by. Thus, temple there are seldom many vents discharging at once, there is always the same number of small craters in active or dry and wet slime, extending itself slowly in all directions, perpetually buried under its own weight, and perpetually rising again with its filthy mantle of sulphurous clay.

On the Asiatic side of the straits there is something of the same kind in but it is a dozen miles localities, but on a somewhat smaller scale. There, too, we find, among the heaps and pools of mud, small springs of naphtha, sufficient in quantity to be the object of serious research. The naphtha and mud volcanoes are naturally related, for the naphtha often floats on the top of the mud as it issues from the vent, and is almost always got from the deep clay within a few yards of the place where the mud issues. The naphtha taints the mud and produces an odor which may be detected at some distance. In some places it actually oozes out in sufficient quantity to form pools, and it is then collected in Natal, on the west shore of the Caspian, and in islands on the same side of that inland sea, where there are numerous mud volcanoes in a somewhat active. The naphtha flows in quantities so large that it has been collected, and has been used as a commercial for burning in lamps. There are now Russian companies established for the sale of it for this purpose.

Between the mud volcanoes of the orifice dairy kind Nercek, and the waters of the Caspian, there is a strip of country in which springs which are to be found sulphurous emanations, and petroleum springs and jets issuing from the pluvated hydrogen gas.

The waters of some of the waters much more highly charged with foreign ingredients than those of the Caspian proper. Those which run off from Kerch that has an especial reputation. It is said that Tchokrak, a name not capricious, but perhaps significant, is not anything nasty than the water, more filthy than the mud that settles below it, and every spring of the country around than the scenery around it, no traveler would desire to drink. Within a small lake, within a mile in circumference, separated only by a bank of gravel from the Straits of Kertch, and by a few hundreds of the Sea of Azof, like those of the Black Sea, are remarkable, especially at the latter end. Out of a thousand parts of Black Sea water, only eighteen parts of solid matter, or solid salts in solution, whereas more than those solids both in the Mediterranean parts, of the Mediterranean, consist of salts. Of the waters of the Lake of Tchokrak, however, one hundred and forty parts out of a thousand consist of other evaporation, and much the largest proportion, about one half, consists of common salt, or chloride of sodium. In some of the lake and Sea of Azof, separated by a few yards of gravel, the proportions nine times as much solid matter in solution as the other.

The water of the lake is clear by the solids retained in the water. Lake Tchokrak has a muddy bottom, and that of the Sea of Azof adjoining. But whereas the large body of water in the Sea of Azof is a clean inlet of one ordinary kind, and on sand and pebbles and shells, the Lake Tchokrak reposes on a mass of black tenacious filth, such as we have described as surrounding it.

It is so foul that if the finger stirs it up the skin is stained with a dirty black. The thickness it has never been ascertained, but in the middle it is probably forty feet at any rate. It is loaded with sulphur and bitumen, it is black with iron, it is rich in fish, and in organic matter, and it is probably the pool of one the craters of eruption of the mud volcanoes. It would seem to realize the notion of Acheron and a product of the realization.

The Lake Tchokrak a small curative establishment. It is a kind of watery, muddy, semi-fluid bottom and a kitchen, a few cells, each large enough to hold a bed and a small and one chair, a shed with a few tubs, and a large cauldron to warm water. Above these there is also a long corridor open to the lake, but sheltered by a wooden roof from the sun. It is divided into two parts by a partition, separating the ladies' from the gentlemen's apartments. There are rooms enabling the bather to traverse the long slope of slippery mud between the mud-house and the water, and this is very necessary, as there is no footing, and without wet the mud could not be walked over without falling. Such is the accommodation offered to the ordinary bather.

The bather in the mud could, officeious, for the water is not only salt, but is very rich in sodium and bromine. But it is the mud that those who resort to this lake chiefly look to. The mud is black, sticky, and has the appearance of very efficacious. The bath is a box of rough deal, of the shape and size of a coffin. This box is filled with thick hot mud, so nearly dry that the weight of the body does not sink very slightly into it. The patient lies upon it, and an attendant covers him up with a load of fresh mud, which is firmly compacted around him, so that he is not exposed but the face. All this is done in the open air in a broad sun. A small penal tenor is arranged to shade the face, and the patient is left to enjoy himself. He is thus buried alive and prepared for a period varying from half an hour to an hour and a half. The mud consists of stiffish mud, redolent of rotten eggs, in a closely fitting case of rough deal boards. The mud is covered over with half a dozen other victims, ranged side by side in the same way. As awaits his care—and surely he deserves it.

The mud is dug up, and the baked crust of mud is broken, he is found floating. He is then removed to warm bath, and it is said that he comes out clean. At any rate he is hungry. He has been stewed in his own juice, whatever they may be, and between the moistening nerves he enabled to do justice to the food provided. The mud is supposed to be of great efficacy in certain rheumatism, and in certain forms of the body, almost as if it had been intended to take a cast—not in plaster of Paris. The mud requires to be removed, and is replaced with a fresh supply the next day.

Such are some of the results of mud volcanoes —results not less extraordinary than the phenomena themselves. Perhaps the strength of the mud may be necessary to counteract the evil effect of the outrageous trade to which the human constitution is liable, owing to the singular habits of the people who live in the part of the world where the Lake of Tchokrak and its mud are not practically inaccessible.

THE DOG AND GORILLA.

A SAILOR who had once cast away, and found refuge on an island of the African coast, relates the following incident in his Crusoe life:

Moving with far more celerity than at any time since my residence on the island—thanks to the fortunate discovery of shoes in the sailor's chest—I was not long ere my steps were directed to the mouth of a gully by which I had left the more fertile and pleasant part of the island. My dog kept gamboling around me, with all the delight usually manifested by this creature when visiting new places. Every now and then, however, it would dash off at headlong speed, disappear, and, returning after a long absence, would come up at me with an air of quiet satisfaction, the explanation of which did not occur to me at first. An examination, however, of its mouth presently elucidated the mystery.

It was red with blood.

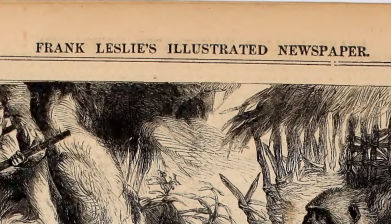
It had found some small kind of wild beast.

At once the idea flashed across my mind that I might train the powerful animal to hunt game for me, as well as itself. How this plan was carried out will be seen in its proper place.

We had reached the gully and advanced some small distance up its narrow depths, when Tiger halted, spread out his forefeet, sniffed the air, and then gave a low, prolonged howl. Something which instinct told him was an enemy had clearly passed this way. How my gun was clutched with convulsive energy, as I gazed anxiously around, I need not tell. But nothing then meeting my gaze, I again advanced.

I had not proceeded above twenty yards when Tiger gave another low, savage howl, and without paying the slightest attention to my repeated calls, burst away at a rapid pace. Following him up as quick as I could, my eyes fell upon a scene which both disheartened and terrified me.

A huge, hairy-looking man, as I at first thought, but in reality a fearful monkey, was busily engaged in destroying the last few remains of that home which had cost me so much labor and pains to erect. So great was the activity which was ludicrous in its intensity, it was taking down poles, stakes and thatch piecemeal, examining each one thing with avidity, and then casting it disdainfully from its paws.



Suddenly it turned. It heard the dog. A more hideous monster it is scarcely possible to conceive. My readings had told me of the size, force and ugliness of monkeys, but never did my imagination realize anything like this. Its face, though having, as I thought, something human about it, was pushed out into a snout like a dog-fox, and wickedly arms were waved furiously aloft, and then it flew at the dog.

I fired.

Never since the creation of the world, doubtless, had the sudden explosion of a gun been heard on that spot of earth. The effect was wondrous. Reverberating echoes came pealing back from the rocks; birds of every hue and shape, from the gaudy cockatoo to the blue wood-pigeon, and the ocean bird that shrieks, not cries, rose, uttering each their peculiar shrill, piercing, or more pleasant notes; strange jabberings from amid the trees sounded alarmingly, while even from a distance came faint noises, as if the whole island had been shaken to its centre.

But the fierce animal, which I was sure I had hit, stood still, silent, amazed, as if changed into a statue. Then it clapped its two hands upon its breast, as if searching for the wound so mysteriously inflicted, after which it gave a howl, such as sent the terrified dog back several yards in my direction.

But only for a moment. The native courage of its splendid race came to the rescue, and as I, after loading, was running up, it flew savagely at the monkey, and a desperate conflict ensued. The wounded animal, which was young, as I afterward found, and not at all full grown, fought with his hands, or rather paws, tearing at the dog's throat, and inflicting fearful scratches. Being now very near, my gun was again loaded, and this time with even more success, for uttering once more its cry, which, though hoarse and loud, was not wholly unhuman, it tore itself away, clambered with great labor a tree close at hand, and disappeared in the rich and profuse foliage.

CAPTURING THIEVES IN CHINA.

THE Chinese have a very summary method of dealing with violators of law and rogues generally. Punishment of offenses with them is pretty certain, and fearfully severe, whether just or not. A traveler among the Chinese relates an incident he witnessed on one occasion, illustrating the danger of disregarding the rights of property. During the progress of a large fire, some thieves entered a building for the purpose of plundering, amid the general confusion. They were observed by the police, who, instead of following and arresting them, very quietly fastened the door upon them, so that they could not escape, and left them to perish in the burning ruins. There was no trial, no conviction, but being caught in the perpetration of a crime, they were left to suffer the punishment they had dared to brave. Such a disposition of criminals would prove a strong incentive to honesty, or at least a check against improper conduct.

HOW THIEVES ARE CAPTURED IN CHINA.

HULL OF THE ARCTIC.

THE Arctic was the vessel in which Dr. Kane voyaged while searching for Sir John Franklin. After that memorable trip, it was used as a lighship, off Frying-Pan Shoals, its size and strength adapting it for such a purpose. When the war began, it was taken to Wilmington, N. C., and occupied as a receiving ship; but shortly afterward, with other vessels, was sunk in the Cape Fear River, to obstruct the channel and prevent the escape of our guuboats. It has lately been raised, and now floats on the river an object of curiosity, on account of the noble service it has performed.

AN AFRICAN FIDDLE.

SAVAGE nations, however rude, are usually fond of music, and though their instruments are simple, they subserve their purpose and afford a high degree of gratification.

The accompanying illustration represents a fiddle, quite common among the tribes of the interior visited by Dr. Livingstone. It would hardly find a place in a modern orchestra, but played by the natives, gives a melodious though monotonous sound.

ATTACKED BY SHARKS.

SOME years since a whale-ship was wrecked in the Pacific, all of whose crew perished except four, who made their escape on a raft. They floated about for some time in safety, when a new peril threatened them with instant destruction.

As they were gazing listlessly over the water they saw a pilot-fish approaching their frail structure, followed by two immense sharks. Almost in a moment the foremost of the two sharks was seen to lash the water with its broad, forked tail, and then, coming on with a rush, it struck the raft with such force as nearly to capsize it. The other shark shot forward in a similar manner; but, glancing a little to one side, caught in its huge mouth the end of one of the raft spars, grinding off a large piece of it as if it had been cork. This it swallowed almost instantaneously, and then, turning once more in the water, appeared intent upon renewing the attack. The sailors stood ready to receive the second charge. It was made on the instant. The shark, coming on with the velocity of an arrow, sprang clear above the surface, projecting its hideous jaws over the edge of the raft. One of the sailors, throwing his arm around the mast in order to steady himself, with an ax struck outward and downward with all his might. The blow fell right upon the snout of the shark, cleaving the flesh to the depth of several inches, and laying it open to the bone.

A companion succeeded in keeping off the other antagonist. Striking out wildly with a handspike, he thrust the end of the implement between the jaws of the monster, just as it raised its head over the raft, with its mouth wide open. The shark, seizing the handspike in its treble row of teeth, drew it out of the man's hands, and then, rushing through the water, was seen grinding the timber into small fragments and swallowing them with avidity. The one that had received the blow of the ax shortly appeared floating on the water, perfectly dead, and the other gave up the contest, leaving the raft and its occupants unmolested.

THE AMBUSCADE.

THE fox has always been proverbial for cunning, especially in eluding its pursuers and effecting its safety. The following incident shows, however, that the too eager pursuit of a selfish end may result in discomfiture. Poor Reynard, being in wait for the rabbit, was himself so closely watched as to become a victim, in fact, fairly caught in his own snare. A sportsman fond of seeking game early in the morning, relates the circumstance shown in the illustration:

Just after it was daylight I saw a large fox coming quietly along the edge of the plantation in which I was hid. Presently he concealed; he looked with great care over the turf wall into the field, and seemed for a long very much to get hold of some rabbits that were feeding in it, but apparently he had not had no chance of catching one by dint of running. After considering a short time he seemed to have formed his plans, and having watched the different gaps in the wall by which the rabbits might be supposed to go in and out, he fixed upon the one that seemed the most frequented, and laid himself close down to it in an attitude like a cat watching a mouse-hole. Cunning as he was, he was too intent on his own business to be aware that I was within twenty yards of him with a loaded rifle, and able to watch every movement he made. I was much surprised at his fellow so completely outwitted, and kept my rifle ready to shoot him if he found me out and attempted to escape. In the meantime I watched all his proceedings. He first, with great silence and care, scraped a small hollow in the ground, between the wall and the gap, as a kind of screen. Every now and then, however, he stopped to listen, and sometimes to take a most cautious peep into the field. When he had done this he laid himself down in a convenient posture for springing upon his prey, and remained perfectly motionless, with the exception of an occasional reconnoitre of the feeding rabbits. When the sun began to rise they came one by one from the field to the plantation, three had already come in without passing by his ambush. One of them came within twenty yards of him, but he made no movement beyond crouching still more flatly to the ground. Presently two came directly toward him; though he did not venture to look up, I saw by an involuntary motion of his ears that those quick organs had already warned him of their approach. The two rabbits came through the gap together, and the fox, springing with the quickness of lightning, caught one and killed her immediately. But the other, full in sight, and was carrying it off like a retriever, when my rifle-ball stopped his course by passing through his back-bone, and I went up and dispatched him.

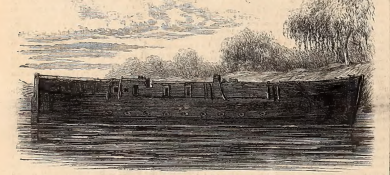
IMPORTANT EVIDENCE.

A Country Lawyer's Story.

ONE bright morning in the month of May, our usually quiet village (in the State of Pennsylvania) was thrown into a state of wild excitement by the intelligence that Laura Downing had been murdered. Her lifeless body had been found upon the bank of the large pond, with a bullet-hole through the head. The ball had entered between the eyes, and had passed entirely through the brain; and the empty pistol was found by her side.

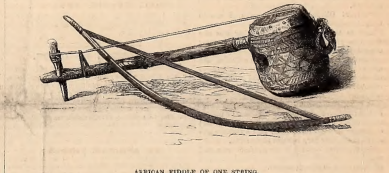
It may be asked, Who was Laura Downing?

She was a orphan, and had been generally believed by all who knew her. Her father—a poor, hard-working man—had been dead a number of years; and during the past five or six years, Laura had worked as she could find opportunity to support an invalid mother; but only a few months before the time of which I write that mother had died, and Laura had lived all alone in the little cot which had been her home since she was borne, a period, according to the parish register, of nineteen years.



The coroner came, and summoned a jury, and called such witnesses as he could find; and after due examination and deliberation, a verdict was rendered to the effect that Laura Downing had come to her death by means of a bullet discharged from a pistol; and they believed that said pistol had been in the hands of Oliver Cartwright at the time it was thus fatally discharged.

Oliver Cartwright was arrested; and when the case came before the grand jury, they found a true bill against him—a bill accusing him of the murder of Laura Downing—and he was committed to the county jail for trial.



And who was Oliver Cartwright?

THE AMBUSCADE.

HULL OF DR. KANE'S SHIP, THE ARCTIC.

AFRICAN FIDDLE OF ONE STRING.

ATTACKED BY SHARKS.

He was a young man, of four-and-twenty years of age, who had been born and brought up in the village, and who had sustained a fair reputation for honesty and sobriety; though he had never been regarded as a very bright or promising youth. His parents had both been intemperate; but they had been dead some years, and Oliver had been at work at the blacksmith's trade, and had lived with the man for whom he worked. Between young Cartwright and Laura there had not only been a strong intimacy, but there had evidently been at one time an engagement of marriage. This engagement, as appeared in evidence before the coroner, had been broken off by the girl during the previous winter, and since that time Oliver had been morose and dejected. A young man named Daniel Severance, who had come into the village to assist in erecting a new paper mill, had been very attentive to Laura, and the general impression was that she had left the old love for the new one.

Oliver Cartwright had the privilege of selecting his own counsel, and he sent for me. I was sorry that he did so; for I had heard so much of the evidence against him that I not only believed him guilty of the crime, but I could conceive of no possible line of defense. Still, I could not refuse to go to him in his season of trouble.

I found him in weak and wailing as a suffering child. He seemed entirely broken down; and the tursnkey told me that he wept more than half the time. As I sat down by his side, he seemed to read every thought that was passing within me; for, after having looked into my face a few moments, he caught one of my hands in his own, and cried out, in eager tones:

"Oh, sir, I have not suffered this in memory of any crime; for, as true as heaven, I never did harm to Laura! I would die for her now; and I suffer because I have lost her! Oh, save me if you can!—not from death—no, no! for I would rather die than live—but save me from this horrible suspicion! I did not kill her—I did not harm her! I never so much as touched a hair of her head with cruel thought!"

"Who could have killed her?" I asked. "You do not think she killed herself?"

"No," he replied, quickly, his eyes flashing, and his fingers tearing into the bosom of his shirt. "I think Daniel Severance killed her. I left her by the pond—left her alive and well—and presently afterward I saw that bad man come out from the bushes, and she took his arm, and they walked away by the edge of the water."

Cartwright's words and manner had a powerful effect upon me. Under ordinary circumstances, I should have said that he was speaking the truth; but there was much strong evidence to be disposed of before I could see my way clear to believe him now. I could not help sympathizing with him; and I was willing to believe that if he had done the deed, it must have been under a state of mind which would give good grounds for setting up a defense of insanity. But when I spoke to him of this he was pained beyond measure, and refused to listen to the proposition for a moment.

I then proceeded to detail to him the circumstances which would be brought up in evidence.

"First," said I, "it will be sworn to by several reliable witnesses, that you have, at various times, been heard to threaten Laura Downing with dire personal injury, if you saw her again in the company of Daniel Severance."

"That is true," replied the prisoner; but I only did it to frighten her, and I meant to frighten her for her good; for I did not believe that Daniel Severance was an honest man."

"It will be also sworn to that you once exhibited to Miss Downing a pistol, at the same time telling her that you had bought it on purpose to shoot her with."

Cartwright did not deny it; but he said that he never meant her harm—he only meant to frighten her away from a bad man.

"It will furthermore be given in evidence," I continued, "that on the evening of Miss Downing's death you followed her out to the pond, where you again threatened her."

"Yes," he replied; "I knew she was going to meet Daniel Severance."

"You were seen to have a pistol in your hand on that occasion, and you were heard to take an oath that you would shoot her if she did not return with you. Mr. Nichol's boy, who was driving home his cows, was close by when you made the fearful threat."

And even this the prisoner did not deny. He only said that he was still trying to frighten Laura into obedience to his wishes.

"But," said I, "the pistol which was found by the dead girl's side has been recognized as your own."

"That may be," replied Cartwright; "for when I found that Laura spurned me, and would not listen, I sank upon my knees and prayed to her. I dropped my pistol upon the bank at that time, and I know that I did not pick it up again. She turned and left me upon my knees, and there I remained until I saw Severance join her; they disappeared together, and then, broken-hearted and forlorn, I crawled home, and people thought, because they found me in such torturing agony, that there was blood upon my hands. But, before heaven, my hands are clean! Daniel Severance must have found my pistol, and it was he that killed Laura."

Such was the substance of all that I could gain from my client, and I must say that I really thought him insane; and I tried hard to get him to acknowledge the deed, and allow me to set up the plea of insanity, but he would consent to no such thing. The solemnity of his assurance, and the unmistakable love which he still held for the dead girl, staggered my belief in his guilt exceedingly. There was no variation in his manner of speech at all—nothing in which I could detect the slightest outward sign of falsehood.

Finally, I called in two physicians, and they both agreed that they would willingly testify under oath that they did not consider him of sound mind; and in their presence I urged him once more to confess to the killing, and I would save him, at least, from the extreme penalty of the law.

"Oh, heaven!" he cried, with tears streaming down his cheeks, "if I thought there was one drop of that dear girl's blood upon my hands, I would kill myself in a moment! I never did her harm—never!"

When we went out of the cell, both the physicians expressed their opinion that the young man was insane; and I determined, let come what would, that I would base the defense upon that plea. The idea of defending him against the murder was not to be thought of. The evidence was too strong. In fact, there did not seem to be a link in the chain wanting.

At first I had based some hopes upon the fact that Daniel Severance had not been seen since the evening of the girl's death; but his absence was easily accounted for. He had finished the work he had come to do; he had been paid in full for his labor; and he had gone out to the pond to meet Laura Downing for the last time on that evening, as he was to take the early train on the following morning. Even Oliver Cartwright admitted that he had so understood it. And there could be nothing strange or suspicious in the fact that we could learn nothing of Severance's present whereabouts, because his employers only knew that he belonged to some part of Virginia, and they knew he was going in that direction to assist in putting up a four-mill; but as far as the whereabouts of the said mill was concerned, they had never thought to inquire of him. I might make some handle of the absence of this man; but I could place no dependence upon it, because the men who owned the paper-mill would give such testimony as would satisfy the jury that no suspicion could be legitimately attached to it.

The day of the trial at length came, and, as might be supposed, the court was crowded. The prisoner, pale and wan, and wearing an expression of deepest sorrow, stood and heard the indictment read, and when he was asked to answer to it, he replied, in a voice that thrilled every one with its deep intensity of feeling:

"Before heaven, I am not guilty!"

The trial commenced, and the evidence for the prosecution was given as I have already explained, only, it possible, it was more positive and crushing than I had anticipated. In short, the chain that connected the prisoner with the killing of the girl was so strong and so intact in all its parts, that I could not hope to break it.

I opened the defense by proving that my client had always been a quiet, inoffensive, industrious person; and that there was no possible circumstance in his life, previous to that under consideration, that could lead any one to suppose him capable of committing a great crime. I made allusion to the absence of Daniel Severance, and urged that the said absence took from the chain of evidence a most important link, because I had every reason to believe that he was the last person seen with Laura Downing while she was alive.

After this I came upon the mainstay of my defense. I called upon the two physicians who had visited and examined my client during his imprisonment; and they unhesitatingly pronounced the prisoner of unsound mind.

The prosecution brought in no testimony to rebut the evidence touching the prisoner's insanity, though the district attorney made a decided onslaught upon it in his closing speech; but that did not help in consistency to attack the fact that Daniel Severance had been the last man seen with Laura Downing while she was alive. A Mr. Angeon, a responsible mechanic, belonging to the place, testified that just at dark, on the evening of the murder, he saw Severance on the road, in question, some three miles distant from the village, and that he spoke with him on that occasion. He (Angeon) was on horseback, and was then on his way home; and as he passed near the pond, some fifteen minutes since having left Severance at the station, he saw Laura Downing standing upon the shore.

This piece of evidence introduced a new element, and I was not slow to urge that Laura Downing might have killed herself; and if I could only have found a single witness who could have testified to the return of my client to his home before dusk on that fatal evening, I might have made a startling point here; but I had no such witness, and I was forced to base my hopes on the plea of insanity.

The judge was very fair in his charge. The jury went out, and I felt sure that they would return a verdict against my client, but I did not think they would bring him in guilty of murder. And yet I was not satisfied with the result of my effort. As I cast my eyes upon the prisoner I was deeply moved by the expression of pain which had rested upon his fair, pale face. It was not the mere pain of fear, but it was one which rested upon the prisoner she started toward him. He was quicker than his foe, and as he raised forward over the iron rod she threw her arms about his neck.

"Oliver! Oliver! Thank heaven, I am in time!"

And as these words burst from her lips she would have fallen to the floor had not the officer caught her in his arms.

Oliver Cartwright did not utter a syllable, for he stood for a moment gazing upon the pale form that rested within the arms of the warder, and then sank down, mute and senseless.

"It is Laura Downing!"

Some one said so; and as the name was caught by the multitude there followed a scene of excitement which I will not attempt to describe. But order was at length restored, and no officer was sent to bring the jury back to their seats.

By this time I had taken the girl in charge, and with the assistance of my medical friends she was soon restored to consciousness.

Laura Downing herself certainly stood before me—the same Laura Downing who, according to the best belief of all present, save herself, and according to the solemn verdict of an intelligent coroner's jury, had been dead several weeks when she had not come alone. Two men had come with her, one of whom was immediately recognized by our physicians as Dr. Charles Crawford, a reputable superintendent of the insane asylum at Crawfordville.

As soon as Laura discovered that I was the prisoner's friend and counsel, she asked that she might be ushered to go and speak to Oliver. I led her to the spot; she sat down by his side, and whispered something in his ear. He seemed to be trying to control himself, but it was of no use; he reeled his head upon her bosom, and cried like a child.

Laura Downing's story, when she finally obeyed the call of the court, was this:

On the day previous to Oliver Cartwright had followed her down to the pond, she had planned to go with Daniel Severance. She said she knew that Oliver never meant to do her any harm; and that when he threw his pistol away, and sank upon his knees before her, she came gently up to her will and wicked scheme; but the temptation prevailed, and she tore herself away from one whom she loved so long. She met Daniel Severance, and on their way to the the railway station they met a young woman who resembled herself so strikingly that her companion declared that he should take them for twin sisters.

"This female," continued Laura, "not only resembled me in person, but, by a singular coincidence, she had on a dress of the same pattern as my own. Severance spoke to her; but instead of answering him, she threw up her hands with a wild scream, and ran from us toward the pond."

Laura then went on to say that she was taken on to New York with Daniel Severance, where she had found him to be a villain. He did not mean to make her his wife as he had promised, and she fled from him.

She stopped here, and turned toward Oliver. Then she swept her gaze over the multitude, and, with her hands clasped upon her bosom, she said in a tone that carried conviction to every honorable mind:

"I had been guilty of nugh—guilty of trifling and of denial—but, as I hope for heaven here after, I have been guilty of nothing that true repentance may not wash away!"

she closed again to Oliver Cartwright, and this time she rested upon his bosom, and he murmured thanks to heaven as he clasped his arm about her.

At this point Dr. Crawford came forward and said he thought he could clear up the mystery as soon as the clothing came for which he had sent.

Meanwhile, the jury were instructed anew by the judge, and their verdict was very quickly rendered.

Ere long a man came in with the clothes which had been taken from the dead body that had been found by the pond; and when Dr. Crawford had examined the linen, he recognized it as having been the property of a patient of his.

"She was a young girl," he said, "and very intelligent; but her mind had been turned by religious excitement, and when she heard the second advent of our Saviour had come while she slept, and that the elect had all been taken up into heaven, leaving her behind. In this frame of mind she sought to take her own life, and to prevent that catastrophe, I was to effect a cure, if possible, she was sent to our asylum. She had been there only two weeks when she managed to escape. We searched for her day and year; and to-day before yesterday, as I was on my way to the station, a young lady met me in train. At first I supposed I had found my patient, and I had been engaged in conversation with her some minutes before I discovered my mistake. Then I had satisfied myself that I had been mistaken, I told Miss Downing of the circumstance; and when I left the train I saw that she left it also. Another girl of whom I had been in search, she told me of the girl she had seen some weeks before in her native place. She was on the road to meet her, and, under the circumstances, I felt it my duty to accompany her. I was very anxious and uneasy, and when she explained to me that she had seen an account of her own death in a newspaper, and that Oliver Cartwright had been accused of her murder, I suspected the truth."

And his suspicions had not led him far astray. The poor, crazed girl had ordered found the pistol which Oliver had thrown away, and had shot herself, thus accomplishing the cherished purpose of the insane mind which had controlled her. The disfiguring of the face, caused by the wound between the eyes, and burning of the clothes by the powder, had deceived Laura's nearest friends from discovering the mistake.

And so ended the trial.

As for Oliver Cartwright, no one has pretended to question his sanity since; and to-day he is one of the most respected men in the city of his residence and I dare to say that she was Julia Downing has been to him a most faithful and affectionate wife. I may be excused here for speaking of their peaceful and happy home, and surely I ought to be able to judge.

A BALLOON ROMANCE.

For some years after the invention of balloons by the brothers Montgolfier, aerostatic ascensions formed an inexhaustible feature in the plans for the management of the fetes of the proprietors of establishments situated in Cremorn, the celebrated pleasure, whose entusiasm for ballooning led him continually to devise novel exhibitions of this kind. The last of the scenes on a grand scale attempted on this way was attended by circumstance so curious that it was deemed worthy of a full description. It was on the day of the coronation of the Emperor Napoleon, who had placed at the disposal of Garnerin a sum of ten thousand francs with which to construct and erecting a balloon of colossal dimensions, to be inflated with gas, but which should ascend with fire-works in the car. Accordingly, on the 15th of December the balloon was completed, and the car was filled with fire-works, and accordingly, at fireworks came to his aid, the balloon commenced its flight, and rose majestically amid the cheers of the spectators. Three thousand colored lamps illuminated the globe, and the ascension, accompanied by unusual pomp, and the immense structure rose majestically from the entrance of the grounds, and was hailed with shouts and the ceremony of the coronation had that day taken place, and many above its course to witness it. Suddenly it appeared, amidst the applause of the Parisian populace, that the balloon was on fire, and that the car, which would finally alight was a subject of speculation with those who saw the burning; but it was soon evident to later that intelligence was received of its strange descent.

It was then learnt that a little before daybreak, after the ignition of the fire-works in the car, Garnerin had perceived a small luminous object shining in the heavens, above the region of the clouds and the vapors. At first scarcely visible, it increased ray-lily, and finally a large illuminated globe appeared to be moving rapidly over the seven-hilled city. It remained some time as if stationary, then a slight wind appeared to have it, moved away and disappeared in the direction of the north. Then was the proclamation of the coronation. The unfortunate Pope had been carried off to Paris to submit to the ceremony, and the ascension was considered by the people as a favorable omen. The balloon, which bore the news of the ceremony, had been seen by many persons, and it was believed to be the work of Garnerin, and actually crossed the city of Rome at the moment when fire works were.

The superstitious might well read in this strange event the hand of God omens, and the balloon, like other facts, scarcely less singular, marked the coincidence of the two events. Garnerin, in the meantime, continued its way, but soon descended to earth, and in a distance more than seven miles from Rome, in the waters of the Lake Bracciano. The people hastened to leave the house, and found in the car a paper with the inscription which told its history. Thus Garnerin's balloon became the principal feature in the fete of the distant capitals, announced at Rome the occasion of the coronation of Napoleon, and was hailed as a good omen and while Napoleon was preparing to place upon his head the crown of iron, and to receive the homage of the Emperor, such facts might have been considered as the work of Providence, and the strange and fatal chance which rendered the whole affair far from pleasant. The balloon was found on the shore of the lake, on ground in the Campagna Romana, the cords of the car entangled among the trees, and the car itself in the water. Garnerin escaped. Two accounts disappeared as if its course must terminate in the lake, and that it was evidently filled it soon, and was soon burned, leaving nothing behind but a portion of the ropes and the car, which, while it was burning, was seen to fall and sailed, to an angle of the monument. This scene was witnessed by the Pope from the window of Rome.

WHAT IS OUR LOCAL GOVERNMENT SO BAD?

We profess to value free institutions, and to maintain their principles in both our local and State governments. In both the people are supposed to elect their public servants by a perfectly free expression of their preferences at the polls. Generally speaking, our system of government by the people works well. Our national and State elections usually secure satisfactory results on good laws and honest and wise servants in both nation and State are, in the main, well governed. But in this city we fail. Its government is recklessly extravagant, incompetent and corrupt, and for the last thirty years it has been steadily growing worse and worse. What is the reason? Why this unsatisfactory? Cannot cities be governed on democratic and republican principles as well as States or nations? Undoubtedly they can; and it is because we have departed from government by the people, and substituted government by an oligarchy of political managers, that all our troubles and miseries have arisen. For many years the people have had little or no voice or influence in the election of municipal officers, or in the laws by which we are governed. A few political managers control the whole thing. They name and the others, nominate the candidates, control the ballot-box, and while they keep up the forms of elections year after year, the results are made as certain as if they alone appointed the various officers. The many millions of taxes annually handled by these men, in immense appropriations, disposed, and the vast body of employés dependent upon them, are all under the influence of their purposes, so that the government once in their hands, it is very difficult for the people to get it away from them. They claim to act for the party and the triumph of its principles, and thus carry with them the ignorant masses, who are governed by the name of the party, and with the aid of roughs at the ballot-box, and spurious votes, they carry the day, and the real hangmen who carry every election in spite of the feeble opposition of the honest people can be known only by the result in charter election. In the matter of things, a government like this, in the course of years, must result grievously. Left unrestrained by the wisest acts of political trickery, it must lead to the enormous arm post to the people in the tax-payers and honest citizens generally quietly submit. Why? Because they are ignorant of the wrongs of others, and like the horse-leech of the Scriptures—insatiable, and unsatisfying in their appetite for money—the managers and hangers on of the public. Extortions and burglaries which they hardly dare to practice on their own neighbors, they commit with impunity on the public treasury. And so long as the people will bear it, these men will venture upon bolder acts. The more dangerous because they trust themselves. Ten years ago our Common Council would not have dared to vote away the Central Park for twenty years, in an exorbitant contract for gas, nor would they have voted themselves a salary of one hundred and $5,000, at $18,000 a year, for ten years, and this, too, while the people were groaning under the load of the very war taxes wrung are applied to. But now they openly, unblushingly commit these outrages, knowing that they are capable of any enormity which the people will submit to.

Such daring corruptions must find a limit somewhere and before long, or the end will be a vast ruin. The tendency of such deeds is to drive our tax-payers to desperate resistance, and to drive the more peaceful, industrial reform, such as the Citizens' Association is carrying out in this city, to make unavailing. The most earnest and prompt co-operation of all good citizens, is now long will the people submit to the gross and open outrages at present in the public city depleted and the people are left to contend with the most unscrupulous and corrupt set of men that the world ever saw.

THE PRUSSIAN PEOPLE.

We have had several occasions of expressing our opinion that the Prussian soldier ranks first of all in the first power in Europe. The sterling character of the people, their morality, intelligence, industry, industry and thrift, to say nothing of their freedom from superstition and intolerance, point them out, in the interest of civilization, as the people who ought to lead in Europe, instead of the fickle, shallow, mediocre, and revolutionary French, who have been allowed as being made up of the peacock, the goat, and the sheep, combined. The valor of the first, the impetuousness of the second, and the blood-thirstiness of the third. A recent traveler tells us something about the Germans people, and their habits and modes of life which, at the moment, is especially interesting. The cabins between which the people are put are not characterized, as they too often are in other countries, by squeezes and misery crowding on one side, and envy and servility on the other. It is about the only country in Europe where the landlord and peasant live together in perfect unity. Instead of immense castles, and vast estate, several peasants and also cottages, all freeholders, surround the residence of the landed proprietor from a large estate into a village of peasants as you travel across the country, and the small owner can see and talk with the farmer of his order and more intelligent neighbor, and will do so, when the superior keeps aloof and thinks he would lose his dignity if he remain in stubborn adherence to the habits of his class. These peasants have no hard holding, lives on it, and lives with his workpeople; and if he cannot lord his two estates, he puts a relative or factor to live on the one, and he lives on the former cultivates, letting being comparatively rare:

"Let us have an immense estate and villas. They average perhaps one hundred inhabitants. The houses are built with their backs to the north, with much left room, and the front to the south. Each has a door in the middle, behind it, one the hall, a bench, and about the room the number of which is in proportion to the household occupied, if not painted. You will see somewhere a large, well-whitewashed room, with a number of beds, a looking food; on the wall a clock; and often other articles which would be in the way in a dwelling. Of cow, one or two pigs for killing in autumn, a goose, and a few fowls. Besides this, the peasant receives a certain quantity of clothing in October, and half-dozen to a dozen hens farmed out, and the chickens belong to the peasant. In the fields are potatoes, turnips, carrots, and greens enough for the cattle and consumption. Corn and grain are, during the summer, sent to grass, whilst pigs and hens are fed at home on potatoes, waste and sour ground corn, the pigs being fattened on peas toward autumn-time. The geese get fat on the grass in the fields, and the cattle in the meadows by the feeding. For the wants of the winter, there is a plot of grass grown for hay, and a field for potatoes, and a plot for flax, as also a plot for meadow hay for the cattle. Every peasant has enough to do, and is worked. For living, wood and turf are used. The latter is found on almost all estates, or if the former is wanting, it must be brought from the next forest. All carting of these things is done by the landlord's wagons.

"The laborer is bound to work all the year round for the landlord; his wife or, if she is unable to work, a female servant a large number of days in the year. They receive wages, settled monthly, under deduction of a certain number of days for rent of cottage, for which the tenants enumerated above. As for grain, the man get a bushel a week of what they farm, and the rest in wages. The second man has to do much less, high prices; they are, however, more than they were, and wages have risen in proportion to the rise in rent. Work may be considered to last from sunrise to sunset throughout the year, with a number of intervals. In winter—with one or two hours' rest for dinner. But the laborer has also to do about three hundred days on the field, when it is not worth the landlord's while to go to sleep and use the hands. He has to help to cut down his own garden, potatoes, flax, hay, and hemp. The latter is manufactured into linen and tow. The men smoke the room quite true, but you hardly ever find drunkenness, or any such vice. I calculate that the fines, thirty or fifty years ago always full of drunkenness, gradually became deserted by them, and were only used periodically by the young people for dancing and altering travelling publicans will become a meeting-place; many vanished altogether.

"The children go to school from their sixth year, and continue till their fourteenth year, in winter from eight to twelve and one to four, in summer from six to eight, with fourteen days' vacancy in harvest time, and a few days at Christmas, Easter and Whitsuntide—during which time they are taught to read, write, and cipher, and to learn by heart Bible stories and, besides, they have writing and arithmetic to do. The schoolmaster is appointed by the Government and, besides bringing a respectable amount of information there to the children, has to give their examinations in religion. No communes can appoint a schoolmaster unless he is no longer interfering, except by an adroit inspection of the examinations by the Government, without traveling all over the country. The laborers pay but little for the education of their children, and in many cases one child to school or half-a-dozen. The chief support of the schools is derived from the fines, and in most cases there is land attached to schools as well as to the parsonages. Besides the ordinary school, every schoolmaster is but ill-requited in many cases, although he has to be a musician to enable to play the organ. The schoolmaster has the children, boys and girls, on Sundays, and has to teach them singing, reading, arithmetic, grammar, geography; some drawing, and mathematics, and sometimes Latin. Besides the religious doctrine, besides Bible history and catechism."

Such a system as this will go up to the support, or landlord's house, where twenty people will be living, whereas, as they reach twenty-five or threescore, they will be found in the cottages of the adjacent one. The laborer is well cared for, and rarely leaves the estate. His wife is treated exactly like the small tenholder. "A Prussian laborer is a property of his master, and will not proceed before him in the dust, but stand up with his hat in his hand, and he will pay him hearty respect, will do his duty cheerfully, and will be faithful to him in every way. He is not treated three after mutual explanation and without rancor."

Such a system as this cannot seems to be the universal education, which enables the humblest laborer to understand one another, the absence of any habit of drinking, and the existence of a number of a under which land can be sold like a watch; and land, though rarely divided, is frequently bought. It is not to be wondered at, then, the wife gets it; if she is dead, the son who bids most has it; but the system is for the father to come to an understanding with the children, and to leave the estate to the son who needs it most, burdened with such charges as seem to him and his family fair and equitable.

ANECDOTE OF BISMARCK.

In his youth the Count was a gay student, very popular with his associates on account of his good humor. The old men of Gottingen still remember that Otto Bismarck, as a boy, was fond of practical jokes. The story of Bismarck's bootmaker has become a part of the traditions of the university. It is thus related:

Young Bismarck having been sent to a savoy, where he was to dance with the prettiest girls in Gottingen, had ordered a pair of patent-leather boots the previous day. The boots were not sent home, and Bismarck became uneasy.

"I will not have your boots," said his comrades.

"But I will have them," answered the future Minister.

On the eve of the great day Bismarck entered the shop and asked for his boots.

"Impossible, my dear gentleman, "I am in despair but I have so many orders to be built to-morrow—"

"All that is it," said the student. Very well—he shall see."

He went out, but at the end of half an hour returned, and in the most serious manner in the world, as German students are accustomed to keep at the expense of their tailors.

"Monsieur," said Bismarck, "you see these dogs before me?"

"Very well! I swear they will tear you into five hundred thousand pieces if you do not let me have by to-morrow morning my boots."

He went out—but from hour to hour before the bootmaker's shop and cry out in lugubrious tones:

"Help! help! help! Monsieur Bismarck's boots!"

The bootmaker had not the night to finish the articles required of him by this singular adventure. At five in the morning he arose, and said to his wife with a sigh:

"I can go! We must sleep."

All of a sudden, in the middle of the night, he hears a frightful howling. Bismarck, with his dogs, was before Bismarck, crying in the street:

"Help! help! help! My dogs are going to eat me!"

The whole of the student had his patent-leather boots, and danced like a madman.

The Count's mysterious disappearance and unscrupulous audacity in carrying his point appear in the character of the student of Gottingen and the statesman of Berlin.

SELF-DRAWN.—Cervantes, the author of Don Quixote, thus drew his own portrait in pen and ink: "A man of mature age here, with a grave visage, chestnut hair, smooth open forehead, lively eyes, a well-proportioned nose, though curved, and white beard, that, twenty years ago, was golden; large moustaches, a small mouth, teeth not much to speak of, for he has but six, and those in bad order, ill-conditioned, no two of them corresponding to each other; a figure between the two extremes of size, neither tall nor short; complexion, rather fair than dark; somewhat stooped in shoulders, and not very light-heeled—this, I say, is the author of 'Galatea,'" 'Don Quixote de la Mancha,' &c. . . . commonly called Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra. He was for many years a soldier, and for five years and a half a slave in Algiers, where he learned to love courage as the highest virtue. He had fought by a musket-shot in the battle of Lepanto, and lost the use of his left hand. He was a poet, and a writer, having received in the most memorable and unfortunate battle of the most memorable and unfortunate age, and was a poet of the sword, fighting under the victorious banners of the son of Charles V., of blessed memory.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

"OH, Mr. Grubbles!" exclaimed a young mother, "shouldn't you l'ke to have a family of rosy children about your knee?"
"No, ma'am," said the disagreeable old bachelor. "I'd rather have a lot of yellow boys in my pocket."

STOPPING at a village inn, there came a thunder-storm, and Captain Hall, surprised that a new country should have reached a perfection in those meteorologic manufactures, said to a bystander:
"Why, you have very heavy thunder here."
"Well, yes," replied the man, "we du, considering the number of inhabitants."

WHAT is the difference between a honey-comb and a honeymoon? A honeycomb consists of a numb r of small "cells," and a honeymoon consists of one great "sell."

A YOUNG widow was asked why she was going to get married so soon after the death of her first husband.
"Oh, la!" said she, "I do it to prevent fretting myself to death on account of dear Tom."

THE man who made a shoe for the foot of a mountain is now engaged on a hat for the head of a discourse.

A HAUNTED house is a tenement of any number of ordinary stories, to which is added an extraordinary one, in the form of a Ghost Story.

A PHYSICIAN ordered one of his patients to drink Seidlitz waters. The man made up a wry face at the suggestion. "It is only the first glass that is unpleasant," said the doctor.
"Very well, then," answered the sick man, "I'll only drink the second."

"JIM, why is it that a musician's strains are always heard so much less distinctly when he plays alone, than when in a band?"
"Why, I didn't know that it was so. Suppose it must be because he plays so-lo."

"I WISH to procure the Biography of Pollock," said a student to a bookseller. "Can you inform me where I can obtain it?"
"I cannot, sir; but I dare say you will find it in the Course of Time."

A MILKMAN sometimes resembles the whale that swallowed Jonah, for he takes a great prophet (profit) out of the water.

ARTISTS have adopted different emblems of charity. We wonder none of them ever thought of a piece of India-rubber, which gives more than any other substance.

"Now, THEN, my hearties," said a gallant captain, "you have a tough battle before you. Fight like heroes till your powder is gone, then run! I'm a little lame, and I'll start now."

A LAD applied to the captain of a vessel for a berth. The captain, wishing to intimidate him, handed him a piece of rope, and said:
"If you want to make a good sailor, you must make three ends to the rope."
"I can do it," he readily replied; "here is one, and here is another—that makes two. Now, here's the third," and he threw it overboard.

AN elderly Pennsylvania woman, with her daughter, looking at the marble statue of Girard, in the college building, the other day, startled the bystanders by exclaiming: "La! Sally, how white he was!"

A GENTLEMAN having built a large house, was at a loss what to do with the rubbish. His steward advised him to have a pit dug large enough to contain it.
"And what," said the gentleman, smiling, "shall I do with the earth which I dig up from it?"
To which the steward, with great gravity, replied:
"Have the pit large enough to hold all."

AN Irishman was asked what was his religious belief.
"Is it me belafe ye'd be askin' about?" said he. "It's the same as the widdy Brady. I owe her twelve shillings, and she belaves I'll never pay her; and faith, that's my belafe, too."

"THE ORGAN MANUAL."—As no church is properly furnished that has not an organ, it becomes a matter of importance to know something of that instrument, where it can be purchased to the best advantage, how it can be kept in order, and what are its capabilities. All this information is contained in a neat little book published by Oliver Ditson & Co., of Boston, and furnished at the small price of seventy-five cents. It is a complete vade mecum, and should be in the hands of every organist who wishes to have a thorough knowledge of his duties and is willing to adorn his profession.

"THE DEAN'S DAUGHTER; OR, THE DAYS WE LIVE IN;" by Mrs. Gore; F. A. Brady, New York, publisher. This is another of Mr. Brady's excellent reprints. Mrs. Gore is a writer always lively, and frequently exciting. No one gives us a better insight into the world of conventionality than the brilliant authoress of "The Dean's Daughter."

THE SCULPTOR'S FIRST LOVE.—In the story of Canova's earliest love—if a juvenile and vague aspiration may be so termed—there was something of a romantic and melancholy interest, which seems long to have shaded, with perceptible coloring, his future musings. While pursuing his studies in Farsetti Palace, on first arriving at Venice, he one day beheld a female, somewhat older than himself and very beautiful, enter the gallery, accompanied by a friend or attendant, who, daily departing, soon after returned again before the hour of closing, leaving the former to pursue her studies, which chiefly consisted in drawing from antique heads. Chance first placed the youthful pair near each other; and some secret excellence, hitherto undiscovered, subsequently determined him constantly to select as models such subjects as brought him nearest the fair artist. The time thus rolled away, and the youth found his bosom thus penetrated with new, delicious, but undefinable sensations. He knew not why he wished to be near her, or why he delighted to gaze on her mild and lovely countenance—so pale, delicate, yet so full of feeling—nor could he tell why the furtive glance was so often directed to her sylph-like form and graceful movements; but he felt that with such a being he should be for ever happy, although incapable of defining his ideas of that happiness. One day the object of his silent adoration was absent—another and another passed; still she did not appear. Antonio was inconsolable; but he shrank from inquiry, for he feared that every one already possessed the secret of his thoughts. Many days elapsed in this uncertainty, during which he was indefatigable in study. At length the attendant again appeared—alone, and habited in deep mourning. The heart of the youth failed at the sight; but summoning courage as she passed, in departing with a portfolio, he ventured to inquire for her friend. "La Signora Julia," replied she, bursting into tears, "is dead!" No more was asked, and nothing more was said. Who Julia was, Canova never knew; but her name, her image, long remained on his memory.

SHUTTING UP THE ROYAL MATRIMONIAL MARKET.—The war in Europe is likely to produce a scarcity of candidates for royal marriages, and this class of personages will suffer greatly. Where are the kings, the queens, the princes, and the princesses of the rest of Europe to find a sufficiency of eligible candidates for their hands as wives and husbands? Already the supply is barely equal to the demand, and with the new-fangled notions about our common flesh and blood, as applied both to princesses and workingmen, it is hard to imagine what will be the consequences of a large diminution in the number of German royalties. At the present time there are hardly any sovereignties in Europe in which a German prince or princess is not either King or Queen's father-in-law or mother-in-law, or married to the heir-apparent, or the heir-presumptive, to the crown. It has hitherto, indeed, been the mission of Germany to supply Europe with theology, classical dictionaries, and royal wives, and what is to happen when a dozen more thrones are abolished it is difficult to see. When the various Coburgs, who judiciously keep up a couple of religions in the various branches of their family, so as to be available both for Catholic and Protestant emergencies, have ceased to be themselves royal, the embarrassment will be really serious.

EDUCATION OF THE FINGERS.—Through the fingers half the education of a woman ought to be made. Her delicate and excitable brain refuses to lend itself to any very long-continued or strenuous mental exertion. By brief flashes she receives her ideas: by her quick perception and lively instincts she arrives at truths, to the laborious pursuit of which she is rarely equal. She cannot, like her more robust and less spirited companion, devote the whole of her working hours with impunity to mental toil. The too delicate machinery breaks or hardens under the continuous effort; and if she do not contrive to change her nature and become a regular pedant in petticoats, her nerves and spirits are generally seriously impaired by efforts as little in accordance with her temperament. Let her, therefore, provide herself with abundance of employment for her subtle and pliant fingers, and she will find that, while drawing, or painting, or embroidering, or knitting, or sewing, her spirits will compose, her nerves will settle, her thoughts will arrange themselves, and her intellect will strengthen.

A GOVERNMENT inquiry into the statistics of insane persons throughout France yields the following results: Out of 84,321 persons suffering from insanity, in 358 cases it was due to overwrought brain: 2,549, to domestic troubles; 951, loss of fortune; 803, loss of a dear relative or friend; 620, disappointed ambition; 120, remorse; 223, anger; 31, joy; 836, love; 477, jealousy; 368, pride; 123, political events; 82, sudden change from an active to an inactive life; 116, solitude; 139, solitary confinement; 78, home sickness; 1,095, religion; and 1,028, miscellaneous unstated causes. Of the above number of insane, 53,600 were in private houses. The expense to the State of those in public establishments was a little over eight million francs.

The Commercial Agency,
37 Park Row & 145 Nassau St.,
McKillop, Sprague & Co.,

THIS establishment has now been in active operation for nearly twenty-five years. It has its Associate Offices or Agents in every City and Town in the United States and the British Provinces, as well as in the chief cities of the Old World, and has a very large and growing patronage from Bankers and Merchants.

The reputation of the Agency for care and reliability has become firmly established; and the best evidence which can be given of its value to commercial men is found in their continued and increasing support.

From the records is furnished a detailed statement of the condition of every merchant, with his antecedents and business history. By this an opinion can be formed of the extent to which credit may be safely granted. In connection with this a is published annually, which has become the Standard Reference Book for dispensers of credit. It contains a classified list of merchants and traders throughout the country, with numerals after each name, indicating the relative commercial standing of each. This work is one of immense magnitude—the last issue containing nearly 300,000 names—and is the result of a great amount of labor.

The publishers have spared neither labor or expense, and have consequently produced a work of unequaled fullness and accuracy. The following are some of the Opinions of the Press:

[From the Daily Tribune, New York.]

THE Commercial Agency Register for 1866, by McKillop & Sprague, has made its appearance, as usual, at the beginning of the year, and is a work of greater magnitude than that of last year. It contains one thousand two hundred pages, double columns, so that the number of firms named must largely exceed two hundred thousand. According to the index, there are over ten thousand cities, towns and villages named in it. These figures show that the compiling alone of such a work involves much labor. The fact that the book meets such rapid sale shows that not only has there been great labor, but great care, given to the compiling, and that confidence is felt in its general accuracy.

[From the Evening Post, New York.]

"The Commercial Agency Register for 1866," published by McKillop & Sprague, of this city, is an entirely new work, each name having been carefully revised. The catalogue contains two hundred and fifty thousand names of bankers, merchants, manufacturers, &c., and the heavy labor of compilation and verification has been performed with diligence and accuracy, making the work a valuable reference for business men. Among the entries we find William Shakspeare publishing a newspaper at Kalamazoo, John Wesley selling flour in Philadelphia, Henry Kirke White selling stationery, and Daniel Webster keeping a liquor shop.

[From the Daily Times, New York.]

MCKILLOP & SPRAGUE'S COMMERCIAL AGENCY REGISTER.—McKillop & Sprague's Commercial Agency Register for 1866 has made its appearance, and in point of completeness and accuracy it surpasses any previous edition. It is, substantially, a classified index to the records kept at the office of the publishers, and its comprehensiveness, as well as the labor involved in its preparation, is best indicated by the fact that it reports the standing of over two hundred thousand firms, distributed through ten thousand cities, towns and villages. This edition is nearly twice as large as the last, which is satisfactory proof that merchants generally are learning to appreciate the necessity of such an index to the standing and responsibility of those who may become their customers.

Barnum's New American Museum.

Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets.

Coolest place of enjoyment in the city. The old Museum excelled in attraction by the new and present Temple of Amusement. The latest accession of curiosities, purchased at an enormous expense, is the entire collection of the late Gordon Cumming, the great Lion Slayer, consisting of the Heads, Horns, Tusks, Skins, etc., of the Hippopotomi, Rhinoceroses, Elephants, Giraffes, Lions, Leopards and other African animals, numbering over 3,000 specimens, slain by this intrepid hunter during 15 years' hunting in Africa, and made historic by his reckless daring. A new and spacious Saloon is added, in which to exhibit these great Curiosities without extra charge. To perpetuate the memory of heroes, Miller's National Bronze Portrait Gallery, containing Bronze Portraits of all the celebrated Union Generals, has been opened. DISTRIBUTION OF PREMIUMS.—Our readers will permit us to draw their attention to the advertisement of the Opening Fair and Distribution of Premiums, to commence in this city, 24th September next, under the management of J. R. Hawley & Co., old and popular Cincinnati merchants, who have too much reputation at stake, to say nothing of the deserved character of the project, to let it be any other than a straightforward, upright and business-like transaction. Those who patronize this Distribution of Premiums may rely upon being fairly dealt with. The advertisement explains the matter in detail.—Cincinnati Weekly Times.

Health, the poor man's riches, the rich man's bliss, is found in AYER'S MEDICINES, after a fruitless search among other remedies. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Holloway's Pills.—Cholera or griping of the bowels.—Laudanum may lull the pain but not destroy it. Morphine steeps the senses in artificial sleep, without refreshing the invalid. HOLLOWAY'S PILLS not only procure the same results without the baneful effects, but so entirely extinguish the elements of the disease as to promote a speedy cure without danger of relapse.

Important Qualities—Brandreth's PILLS so stimulate all the interior powers of the system that every poison or impurity is forced from the blood into the bowels, and thus passes off. Recent cases of sickness will often be cured by the effect of 6 or 8 of Brandreth's Pills, which, when the operation is full and complete, leave the blood as free from poisonous and unhealthy matter as that of a new-born babe. In colds, inflammatory diseases, and even in cholera, their use restores to health sooner than all other remedies, because they take from the blood and bowels those matters upon which pains, cramps and aches depend for continuance.

Captain Isaac Smith, of Sing Sing, says thirty of Brandreth's Pills, taken according to directions, cured him of a very severe bronchial affection after other means had failed, and he wishes his numerous friends to know the fact.

Brandreth's Pills, Principal Office, Brandreth House, New York. Sold also by all Druggists. See my name on Government stamp, without which the Pills are spurious. B. BRANDRETH.

FELLOW'S ORIGINAL

WORM LOZENGES.

We can with confidence point to FELLOW'S WORM LOZENGES as the most perfect remedy for those troublesome pests, Intestinal Worms.

After years of careful experiment, success has crowned our efforts, and we now offer to the world a confection without a single fault, being safe, convenient, effectual and pleasant. No injurious result can occur, let them be used in whatever quantity. Not a particle of calomel enters their composition. They may be used without further preparation, and at any time. Children will eagerly devour all you give them, and ask for more. They never fail in expelling Worms from every dwelling-place, and they will always strengthen the weak and emaciated, even when he is not afflicted with worms.

Price 25 cents per box; five for $1. A liberal discount to the trade.

In New Brunswick (British Province), where these Lozenges were first introduced, and their great value as a Worm Specific discovered, they have been ever one hundred gross a year used. Hereafter they will be manufactured at the New England Botanic Depot, Boston, Mass., under the superintendence of the Proprietor.

Our Police.

It has been our duty as journalists from time to time to draw the attention of our readers to the working of our present police system. That there were serious defects in the administration was evident, otherwise there could not have sprung up in the public mind that distrust in it which has become a matter of general notoriety. If there is one of our institutions more than another which the public wishes to confide in, and which all their interests predispose them, in spite of evidence to the contrary, to believe to be beyond reproach, it is that to which we entrust the protection of our persons and property. Still, with all these advantages in their favor, to which may be added a well-founded belief in the honesty of their intentions, the Commissioners have failed to confirm the public confidence in their efficiency which is willingly accorded to their personal integrity.

Some recent events have brought both branches of the department into disagreeable prominence, and, to judge from the results, the equanimity of the Commissioners must have been sadly disturbed. It was not, however, in the nature of things that matters should continue in the state they were without some explosion taking place. It was impossible, in the detective part of the force, for instance, that the compromises of felonies, which were notoriously offered and accepted, (witness the advertisements in the daily journals, as well as the private experiences of those who had lost any property by thieves or burglars,) should be carried on without the complicity of some members of the force with these illegal proceedings coming to light in some way or other. At last the plans laid to detect the detectives have met with some measure of success, and, as the matter is now before the courts, we are content to leave this branch of our subject, hoping the rogues may catch their deserts.

THE PRESIDENTIAL PARTY, UNDER ESCORT OF THE CITIZENS' COMMITTEE OF NEW YORK, PASSING ON BOARD THE FERRYBOAT COLDEN, AT JERSEY CITY, TO EMBARK FOR NEW YORK CITY, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 29TH.

But as life is more valuable than property, and injury to our persons is more to be dreaded than the abstraction of our valuables, we cannot allow the wrongs done to the entire community by the other branch of the police to pass without remarks. And we are fortunately not without a theme to serve as a thread of our discourse; for the Police Commissioners, stung, as it appears, by the remarks of one of our contemporaries as to their incapacity or supineness, have placed into print in their own defence. Qui s'excuse, s'accuse—he who excuses, accuses himself—could not be better exemplified. Those gentlemen enter a general denial of the charges against them, they court investigation, they defy criticism, but it shall not be our fault if they hereafter complain that the specific charges is brought against their administration. The complaint, then, of the public, which we do but echo, is of unnecessary and unwarranted brutality by the police, in the use of the pistols and clubs with which they are armed for their own protection. Without being aware of the law on the subject, the common sense of the public teaches them that any unnecessary violence in making an arrest is an outrage, on the personal rights of the officer, and no less than an injury and injustice to society itself. They revolt at the not infrequent sight of two stalwart fellows leading a prisoner, with his head streaming with blood drawn by the use of their heavy clubs, when it is evident that no effectual resistance could have been made against the prisoner by either of the police, if properly applied. We shudder when we read of a boy of fourteen years of age felled to the ground by the club of a policeman (as happened within the past week), and dying a few hours afterward; and again, of a policeman in Brooklyn, who averred that he would have killed his pistol at a stump, if he had known, etc., etc. One has only to read the daily papers to observe how the ordinary phrases of the reporters reflect the estimate of this class of Persuasive use of the locust," "application of the club brought the offender to reason," are the mild terms in which the daily chronicle dispenses the old maxim that the police are usually spoken of. But the Commissioners object to public notoriety as forming any ground for an attack on the police force. They say they are ready to examine the complaint of any citizen against an officer for violation of his duty, and to deal out strict justice if any charge is established. Granted. The willingness of these gentlemen to oblige the public is remarkable. Do they really suppose that any respectable citizen is going to look a broken head in trying to take the numbers of the officers who are exceeding their duties, or to take the chance of arrest on the charge of interfering with them, when any such action against their violence is all that is intended? We can only judge of what takes place at the Police Headquarters by the reports of the daily papers, and we are sure that no person of respectability, from a mere sense of public duty, would choose to expose himself to the risk and pleasantries of the Commissioners, whose chief efforts seem to be to screen their officers and browbeat the witnesses against them.

The Commissioners, in their letter, take credit to themselves for investigating, of their own accord, any misconduct that comes under their notice, whether any complaint be made or not. We will be excused if we ask for some evidence on this point, because the evidence is in their own possession, and they can produce it if they see fit. We do not underrate the difficulties they must have had in weeding the force of unworthy members who have crept into it, and do not ask how many have been dismissed because they were thieves, or drunkards, or incapables, but the public would like to know how many have been dismissed for cruelty to prisoners and brutal use of their clubs.

We have used the word illegal as applied to unnecessary violence by the police, and we do so advisedly. The police are entrusted with clubs and pistols for their own defence when attacked, and in certain cases of resistance to the arrest of offenders, and it is only to the latter class that our remarks can apply. To maltreat an unresisting prisoner, or to use more force than is necessary for his arrest, with an offense which the law will take cognizance of, whatever the Police Commissioners may do. For instance, to shoot a man charged with misdemeanor should be try to escape by the use of his heels, is homicide, and for such crime an officer should be put on trial. We will not affirm that this is the case as regards felonies, but it certainly does not accord with general notions of public safety that when a policeman cannot run fast enough to catch a pickpocket, he can be permitted to "bring him to" by a pistol-shot. Again, as to arrests; any arrest and detention of an innocent person subjects the officer arresting him to an action for false imprisonment, and if any malice can be shown, a jury will give exemplary damages, and we should not expect to see such a lesson taught to some members of the force.

We are afraid the Commissioners of Police, from the long use of unquestioned power, and the public, on the other hand, from having been accustomed during the war to arbitrary arrests, have, in some measure, lost sight of their respective rights and duties. The Commissioners act as if the police were their servants, and not the servants of the public, and display in their behalf the zeal of the one relation, instead of the impartiality of the other. The public is apt to forget that personal liberties are the dearest inheritance of the citizen in free country, and that while the smallest invasion of these imperils all their other rights. The Courts are open to protect the meanest and lowliest of their members from any assumptions of unlawful power, from whatever quarter it may come.

It is not our province to point out to our Commissioners how the discipline of the force they command may be improved. They would decidedly object to depriving their men of their clubs and pistols, and to retain them in the exceptional cases of night-work in dangerous neighborhoods and the arrests of known desperate characters. But we may point out to them that the police force of London carry only truncheons, and no one complains of their inefficiency. We must make a distinction in skillfully using truncheons, each man carries a pair of handcuffs, and the dexterity with which, by a twist of the wrist, a man of comparatively small physical strength will capture and reduce to helplessness an opponent much his superior, is a feat which must be seen to be understood. We have heard that the adroit use of these implements is part of the daily drill of the men; and as to the results, our readers will agree with us that it is less offensive to the eye to see a man led away along quietly, because incapable of resistance, than to see an unhappy wretch dragged or driven by two or three of the police, bleeding at every concussion of his head.

After all, the appeal of the Commissioners to the public is only after the verdict of the Boards whatever. Official depreciation has only one style and one language. After long silence, which only those who do not know the official mind would take for the dignity of conscious innocence, it breaks out sometimes into scolding, sometimes into reproaches. But its tone is always the same. It demands that its critics shall produce facts—it is a very Gradgrind for facts. Public impressions it scoffs at, public notoriety it ignores as the vehicle of calumny, and when in its turn it is asked to produce the record of facts of which it is the sole depository, in a fit of offended virtue it replies into silence.

Our readers will do us the justice to believe that these comments upon the actions of the city authorities are not made willingly. From the high character of the senior of the present system of police we have been its strenuous supporters, because, if not the best system possible, it has evinced the best will to carry out a system of reform which we have long considered necessary. The Commissioners say that if they have not proved themselves efficient, others should take their places. We do not agree with them. Their duties are of a character requiring long experience, and an aptness which is independent of education, and though they may still have much to learn, and, among other things, to guard themselves against the insidious influence which the exercise of almost arbitrary power has upon the purest of minds, we should be very sorry to see them yield their places to others who would have to learn the same lessons they have learned, and, perhaps, with less advantage to the public good.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.
537 Pearl Street, New York.

We present to our patrons and readers this week a splendid portrait of the late Stephen A. Douglas, to whose memory a monument is to be erected, the corner-stone of which was laid by President Johnson on the 6th inst.

In our next paper we will give a series of sketches, illustrating the grand event, from the portfolio of our special Artist, Mr. F. H. Schell, who accompanied the Presidential Party.

Literature of the Gallows.

DEATH, the most solemn of all events, is doubly solemn when the day and hour of its arrival is foreknown. A kind Providence has so ordered the affairs of men that the time of departure from this world is the one great mystery of the passage through it. What effect an infallible knowledge of the moment when both our lives and actions are to cease would have upon them, must be a matter of pure conjecture, for it is doubtful if, even in the case where a man's life is forfeited to the laws of his country, the unhappy wretch does not, to the last, cling to a hope of pardon or reprieve. A study of the various phases through which the human mind passes, or it is supposed might pass, when in full view of the gloomy portals through which it must, at a fixed time, inevitably go, is one which has proved irresistibly attractive to French genius; yet had the subject never before been drawn that way, Victor Hugo might have been anticipated, and the world have never seen Les Derniers Jours d'un Condamné.

Whether such an analysis of the thoughts and feelings of a criminal condemned to a shameful death would suit the taste of American readers, is, in the absence of actual experiment, a problem of no easy solution. We know that of the externals—if we may so express it—the sufferer, the condemned, how he looked, what he ate, and what he said, we have enough and to spare whenever an execution takes place. If the supply at all indicates the existence of a corresponding demand, there must be a large class of readers for whom this sort of literature has a strange fascination. It would appear, from what, in the estimation of this class, the excellence of the narrative is in proportion to its minuteness. No matter how grotesque and incongruous the incidental may be, the more that can be lugged in, the higher will the picture be valued. Like the Chinese tailor who inserted the patches of the old coat in the new one, and the new one in the old making, the modern artist must drag in all the accessories, regardless of fitness, propriety, dignity or consistency.

We are indebted to the minute fidelity of a Western reporter for the latest illustration of our remarks. We could almost have forgiven the writer an account of the execution of Samuel Covert, at Cincinnati, his intensely prosaic description, if by any happy inspiration he could throw some light upon the inner and mental state of the unhappy wretch, who seems to have been entertained with a kind of grand reception, including the usual handshaking, by the sheriff, before he died. The writer in "Tristram Shandy," in his remarks on Garrick's acting, was not more stupidly literal. "Was the voice," asked the critic, "was the sound suspended likewise? Did no expression of attitude or countenance fill up the chasm? Was the eye silent? Did you narrowly look?" "I looked at Garrick," replied my lord.' 'Excellent observer!" We are told, indeed, but that is all, that Covert exhibited "a wonderful composure and a subdued and resigned condition of mind," but this is offset by his being "apparently stunned" (how partially will presently appear) when the faithful historian was admitted to his private view.

We suspect there must be some mistake in the next part of this tragedy turned into a farce, for "Sam" showed no familiarity on being asked if he was "ready to be offered up"—the blasphemy of the expression can only be pardoned on the score of the ignorance of the utterer as to the meaning of his own words—replied "he was ready—he was quite prepared to die." Yet not quite ready, for, with a wonderful balance of mind, he told that, to complete his toilet, "the sheriff brought him a pair of neat cloth gaiters, No. 8 in size. He appeared pleased with them, when asked whether they were large enough, said that they pinched a little, but that he was so much pleased with them, he did not want them exchanged, as they were larger with them. Their duties are of a character requiring long experience, and an aptness which is independent of education, and though they may still have much to learn, and, among other things, to guard themselves against the insidious influence which the exercise of almost arbitrary power has upon the purest of minds, we should be very sorry to see them yield their places to others who would have to learn the same lessons they have learned, and, perhaps, with less advantage to the public good.

The scene in Covert's cell on that fatal morning could only have been redeemed from being ludicrous by the solemnity with which the actors in it—as the brink of eternity. There were present, besides "our reporter" and other officials who lounged in to look at what was going on, the judge who presided at the trial, who came also to shake hands, and who finally asked the criminal to forgive him the part he had taken in sending him hanged, which of course the prisoner, being in his new boots and a peculiar frame of mind, willingly did. We don't quite understand why the judge asked him "what he would think if the Governor commuted his sentence," unless he had come to torment him before he died. Perhaps it may be a species of facetiousness, the exact meaning of which we do not know. It seems very shocking to us; but evidently the victim of the joke was quite equal to the occasion, for "if he was would rather be hanged," an assertion which, as he died finally with a lie on his lips, we need not much trouble ourselves to inquire into the truth of.

Of course we are treated to the usual amount of the tears shed all round, and the forgiveness of everybody by everybody else, and the parting prayer of the clergyman, which, for coolauduacity of blasphemy, we have seldom heard surpassed, considering that the man died without any expression of contrition for his crime or repentance for his sins; but it may possibly be explained that this latter phase of his mental condition did not fall within the province of a sanction reporter, and the lack of mention of it is no proof it did not exist.

We must leave it to the professors of dogmatic theology to decide, if they can, the length of time necessary to prepare a man for death. All they or we can know from Scripture is the instance of the thief on the cross, in which our Divine Master pardoned the sins of a lifetime, repented of in the short interval between crucifixion and death. But be so short a shrift as this with our modern criminals, would be to lose a fine opportunity for scenic display in the jail, and it must, on no account, be allowed. The agonies which these miserable men endure, and which they cannot describe, became ingurant of the words in which to convey their sensations, we can never know. But when crushed with the nameless terror that is before them, it is no wonder they seek any refuge from the thoughts that haunt them, and find in what are called "the consolations of religion" a refuge, at least for a time, from their pursuers.

But why the prisoner condemned to death should suffer also the dreary torture of a long anticipation of his fate we are unable to understand. The cant phrases by which the public is informed that the clergy (and all denominations agree in this) have done their duty, and prepared their victim to meet the Judge, are the same in all cases. It would be strange indeed if minds macerated, as it were, by long watchings, and bodies enfeebled by the want of exercise and fresh air, did not yield to the efforts bestowed upon them, and come at last to have some faith in the promises of eternal happiness held out to them, on the sole condition that they will believe the doctrine preached to them. It is seldom, indeed, that the clergy do not profess their belief that the criminal has, under their ghostly manipulations, experienced a change of heart, and will be rewarded with eternal happiness for his shameful life and death. Even when this desirable frame of mind has not been attained, instances are on record where ministers of religion have said that the time for death must be postponed, because the repentance of the sinner was not completed, but there were symptoms that a change was at hand, which a sure spiritual result secured on very shortly. Let it not be supposed, however, that we would allow no interval of time between sentence and execution, or that the connection between extreme haste and excessive delay, and we, unfortunately, seem to have hit the extreme, which, while it tortures the unhappier the mind, would also to turn the scenes around the scaffold into a hideous melodrama, where the ludicrous mixes with the horrible, and laughter alternates with prayer.

In the accounts we have of the last events in the life of Samuel Covert, we are not spared one item of the usual prescription, and the artist even of the most strokes of his own, which lend a charm of novelty to the usual dreadful scene. Thus we learn that the chair in which the prisoner sat on the scaffold was "rush-bottomed," and that "he used it as a rocking-chair, while he nodded to his acquaintances in the crowd, with much more than common effect," which our readers will no doubt be gladly relieved to peruse. If death could be made more bitter, surely it must be so by the addition of a description of a mockery like this to gratify the morbid curiosity of those who like to look at a man about to die. Carry the system a little further, and we will have a regular offer to premium to prison authorities for the privilege of exhibiting criminals on the day before they are hanged; and if the public could be shown by the way, following up his process of conversion, the great moral drama, where amusement is united with instruction, would be complete. Seriously, however, we protest against this abuse of the chair of punishment. Its chief design is to warn others against the fate of the victim of his own excesses, and the sordid hope of its impressiveness in proportion as it is turned into a machine to advertise the incoherent gibberings of a poor wretch on the point of death, or the sentimentalism of those whose sole duty is to see him decently hanged.

We may add that what completes the farcical character of the report we have commented on, is the fact that, with all its dreary windiness, it was dispatched as a "special telegram" to one of our enterprising leading dailies.

The New Orleans Massacre.

THE late revelations concerning the so-called riot in New Orleans on the 30th of July, fully justify all that has been said in condemnation of that most fiendish butchery. It was the premeditated act of a rebel organization, with the infamous Mayor of New Orleans at its head. We have now the characterization of the affair by General Sheridan, against whom no charge of partisanship or favoritism can lie. We give below the letter of instruction relating to it, and an extract from his report of August 6th, and leave our readers to pronounce their verdict on the evidence:

NEW ORLEANS, Aug. 1.

U. S. GRANT—General: You are doubtless aware of the serious riot which occurred in this city on the 30th. A political body, styling itself the Convention of 1864, met on the 30th for, as it is alleged, the purpose of remodeling the present Constitution of the State. The leaders were political agitators and revolutionary men, and the action of the Convention was liable to produce breaches of the public peace. I had made up my mind to arrest the head men, if the proceedings of the Convention were calculated to disturb the tranquillity of the Department but I had no cause for action until they committed the overt act. In the meantime, official duty called me to Texas, and the Mayor of the city, during my absence, suppressed the Convention by the use of the police force, and in so doing attacked the members of the Convention and a party of two hundred negroes, and with firearms, clubs and knives, in a manner so unnecessary and atrocious as to compel me to say that it was murder. About forty whites and blacks were thus killed, and about one hundred and sixty wounded. Everything is now quiet, but I deem it best to maintain a military supremacy in the city for a few days, until the affair is fully investigated. I believe the sentiment of the general community is great regret at this unnecessary cruelty, and that the police could have made any arrest they saw fit without sacrificing lives. P. H. SHERIDAN,
Major-General Commanding.

NEW ORLEANS, Aug. 2, 1866.

U. S. GRANT, General, Washington, D. C.:

The more information I obtain of the affair of the 30th in this city, the more revolting it becomes. It was no riot. It was an absolute massacre by the police, which was not excelled in murderous cruelty by that of Fort Pillow. It was a murder which the Mayor and police of the city perpetrated without the shadow of a necessity.

Furthermore, I believe it was premeditated, and every indication points to this. I recommend the removal of this bad man. I believe it would be hailed with the sincerest gratification by two-thirds of the population of the city. There has been a feeling of insecurity on the part of people here on account of this man, which is now so much increased that the surety of life and property does not rest with the civil authority but with the military. P. H. SHERIDAN,
Major-General Commanding.

[Extract.]

"If the matter is permitted to pass over without a thorough and determined prosecution of those engaged in it, we may look for frequent scenes of the same kind, not only here but in other places.

"No steps have as yet been taken by the civil authorities to arrest citizens who were engaged in this massacre or policemen who perpetrated such cruelties. The members of the Convention have been indicted by the grand jury, and many of them arrested and held to bail. As to whether the civil authorities can mete out ample justice to the guilty parties on both sides, I must say it is my opinion unequivocally they cannot. Judge Abell, whose course I have closely watched for many a year, I now consider one of the most dangerous men that we have here to the peace and quiet of the city."

The part of the first letter printed in italics was suppressed in Washington by the President.

A CURIOUS book has just been published at Paris, in which, under the title "Manifeste du Magnétisme du Globe et de l'Humanité," the author, Capt. Bruck, endeavors to prove that the destiny of the human race is influenced by the earth's magnetism. In like manner as the zodiacal light, shooting stars and other natural phenomena are referable to an effect of magnetism, so are great events in the history of nations and of individuals. For, example, the 9th of November is the day of least magnetic circulation, and of least physical and moral energy, while the 22d of June is the day of most circulation and most energy. The 18th Brumaire (November 9) was a memorable day in the life of the First Consul—the 22d of June saw the finish of the Empire. Then, again, it is to magnetism that several great moral movements are due—Teutonism in Prussia, Anglicanism in England, Galicanism in France and Catholicism in the Papal States. Moral philosophers will, perhaps, be amused at this mode of treating their special subject—whether science will be benefited thereby is another question. Capt. Bruck states that he is prepared for clamor and to be treated as a dreamer.

IN the last number of the French Comptes Rendus, M. d'Archiac is stated to have laid before the Academy of Sciences a round pebble, coated with a greenish macaceous schist, and possessing a fine grain, which was discovered by M. Garrigou, in the lower grotto at Massat-Arriège, in the midst of a vast quantity of human remains and flint implements, of the age of the fossil reindeer. On the smooth surface of this fragment, which is eighteen centimètres long and ten broad, is the profile of a bear in the act of walking, extremely well executed. The authenticity of this curious stone is stated to be unquestionable.

THE fact that our national debt was reduced more than one hundred and twenty-four millions of dollars during the year which closed on the 1st of July is believed to be without a parallel in the annals of nations just emerged from a tremendous, desolating war. There is nothing like it in history. If we could go on at this rate, we should pay off the last dime of our debt within the next twenty years.

WE do not see how the President will get on with his new friends and supporters, especially as regards the question of negro suffrage. It is not many months ago that he declared himself in favor of it in a qualified form. In his letter to Gov. Sharkey, dated Aug. 15th, only a year ago, he said: "If you could extend the elective franchise to all persons of color who could read the Constitution of the United States in English and write their names, and to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than $250, and pay taxes thereon, you would completely disarm the adversary, and set an example for other States to follow." But his present associates will hear of nothing of the sort. The Richmond Examiner—late Davis, now Johnson—says of precisely this proposition: "We shall allow under no pretense the entering of a wedge that may rive us from root to topmost branch." The question is, will the rebels give in or the President? The party should be unanimous.

THE report of the British Commission on the so-called insurrection in Jamaica has been published. It appears from the report that there were four hundred and thirty-nine persons killed and one thousand houses burned under the operation of a "reckless" interpretation of martial law. How many were flogged it is hard to tell, but there were a large number—certainly not less than six hundred. Of these, some were women, and the fact is established that wire was twisted into the "cats" used. The evidence, though it justified the sentences in some cases, did not (says the report), in others, and in some cases men were executed upon mere affidavits. And while the promptitude and judicious action of Governor Eyre in suppressing the insurrection are mentioned as praiseworty, the punishments are declared to be excessive, the punishments of death unnecessarily frequent, the floggings reckless, and at Bath positively barbarous, and the burning of one thousand houses wanton and cruel.

THE Methodists have a foothold in France ten times stronger than they had in America a hundred years ago. The Rev. J. P. Cook, Secretary of the French Conference, which has just held its annual meeting at Anduse, thirty-five miles north of Nismes, gives the statistics of the conference:

"We have within the bounds of our conference 184 chapels and preaching places, 28 pastors, 91 local preachers, 16 colporteurs and day teachers, 1,858 members and probationers (increase 41), 7 day-schools, 41 Sunday-schools, with 222 teachers and 1,951 scholars, and nearly 10,000 hearers.

WEST POINT AND ITS PEOPLE.

WEST POINT, all the world knows, or ought to know, is classic ground—clustered all over with historic associations, and, on the part of one or two generations, with associations more tender than classical. Old, solemn Fort Putnam may be the representative and visible emblem of the first; recollections of the Lovers' Walk and a curling lock of hair—from a head now gray, perhaps—of the latter.

We know, through veritable Greek mythology, how Venus was married to Vulcan, and how she eloped, or something of that sort, with Mars, whereupon there was a rumpus and some scandal in Olympus and circumjacent regions. Well, the old gods are dead, but Mars lives, albeit with beardless lips, in white pantaloons and gray coat—altogether a detestable toggery. And eke doth Venus, in clouds of tarletan and renewed youth. Olympus has been rolled out—aplastado, as the Spanish would say—and is now called West Point; the nineteenth century Mars is born of Plutus and Politics; and Venus, no longer the daughter of the foam, springs from a parentage hardly more substantial. She lives on beefsteak, and is none the worse for it; would dance all night were it not that young Mars must go to bed at "taps," and is not above accepting furtive attentions from civilians from that hour to the next morning's parade.

To keep up the classical similes, however, in the absence of Lempriere, would cost too much of an effort to one who has happily forgotten the greater part of the rubbish taught to callow youth; so we leave Olympus and the gods, and come down to things both real and interesting.

In August the students at West Point indulge in the luxury of camp-life. They "go into camp," not exactly after the fashion of real soldiers, in broken, damp and swampy grounds, but on a green and level lawn, where a raised floor of planks protects them from too close contact with our great mother. The fun and failures of foraging are to them unknown, and excepting for the severities of routine, they would lead a life of elegant leisure. Camp-life, with our future brave defenders, is, in brief, little else than a protracted picnic, with the drawback of drill. But August brings with it extraordinary delights as well as special duties. Among these are "hops"—not the pungent products of creeping vines—and which, under the name of "'ops," furnish the base of Britain, but frequent, if not nightly, gatherings in the halls of the Academy, where, amid the flare of gas, and responsive to strains of music, the cadet does devoir to dame and daughter, and puts to practical test his proficiency in saltatory skill acquired under the care of the dancing-master of the post. We can conceive that it must be a great thing to "do the German," with the thrilling consciousness of clasping a small and smooth hand, and a lithe and undulating waist, instead of encountering the rough grasp and enfolding the rigid zone of a fellow cadet.

The August of 1866 will be a red-letter month in the annals of West Point at least for a full decade. Its "hops," in the language of the lisping Sophonisba, were "perfectly lovely;" and the culmination of the season, in the Academy ball of the 28th—a day sacred to the affair as is the Fourth of July to St. Jonathan—was the crest of the topmost wave of youthful enjoyment. The grave and gay, the sportive and severe, joined in its innocent relaxations with real zest; and the absence of supper and champagne, with the inevitable break-up at one in the morning, made rational people sigh that society at large is not subject to the wholesome discipline of West Point. What superb dresses might be saved from ruin, how many heads from aching, and what subsequent listless days avoided, if only grown-up youth would profit by the lessons taught to the young cadet, and regulate their social recreations accordingly!

The influence of the Academy is altogether wholesome throughout the whole picturesque region known as "The Point." Early hours, moderate recreation, and a style of living, generous without being profuse, make "The Point" a favorite resort of the Sensibles — why not Sensibles if there be Miserables? — and bring thither a style and tone which we look for in vain in any other of the resorts called "Fashionable." We are not prepared to say how far the good taste of the superintendent of the Point, outside of the Academy grounds, has contributed to this happy condition of things, but certain it is that the grand hotel which bears the respected name of Cozzens—descending like a princely title—has established a fame and a standard unequaled by that of any similar establishment in America. Oh, it may be said with truth, its walls never shelter the "fast man" or his mate. The gambler and the horse-racer (twin-brothers) find neither associates or victims among the visitors at the Point. The devil, it is said, hates holy water. Not more, however, than the depraved and vulgar contact with the virtuous and the refined. Hence has grown up among the mountains and highlands of the Hudson a society resort at once select and sociable, and here, we repeat, among all the resorts known to fashion and leisure, is the spot, par excellence, where intellect, position and wealth find harmonious contact, and summer its highest and most refined enjoyments.

TOWN GOSSIP.

A FEW days ago a no less distinguished personage than a Queen visited our city, and was received with such marks of respect as were due to her sex generally, and her own character individually. We could afford to show her attentions, for none would question their motive, and then, too, she was a very modest, well-behaved and excellent lady, so that, without injustice to our gallantry, we could not avoid extending to her our courtesies. During the past week we have had a visit from the President, an event that does not often occur, and of which our people were determined to make the most they could. For several days little was talked of or thought of but the reception of the Chief Magistrate. He came—he saw—he conquered; i. e. he absorbed attention—he suspended business—he compelled a mighty city to render to himself and his office their tribute of welcome and respect. The crowds were gratified to get a view of the first man in the nation, and the President was doubtless pleased to witness the enthusiasm of the people. If the public demonstrations were any evidence of our preference for a republican over a monarchical form of government, then that preference was most emphatically expressed. True, it was our President and not somebody else's Queen we were honoring, and the captious might put down the difference to the score of selfishness, but it is doubtful if any sovereign on earth could call forth such honest, sincere homage as we were proud to extend to the highest representative of power in our own country. Great events soon reach their climax and pass into history, and the President, with the heroes who accompanied him, after tarrying but a night with us, took their departure, and the city subsided into its accustomed ways.

These ways at present are unusually quiet, and the item-mongers find difficulty in making up their budget. In fact, New York seems on its good behavior, and, giant as it is, its immense pulse throbs with less irregularity and excitement than that of many a rural village.

Wall street is confessedly the synonym of financial shrewdness, experience and security, and yet within its precincts occur the most gigantic swindles and the boldest robberies that ever startle our astonishment. Only a few days ago, in business hours, a box containing over three hundred thousand dollars in cash and securities was deliberately taken from the vault of a bank, without the knowledge of the officers of the institution, who were engaged with their duties while the theft was perpetrated. The police have succeeded in driving away the pickpockets, but the higher order of rogues seem still to enjoy an immunity which they are using very much to their own advantage.

The fall trade is opening quite actively, as any one passing along our business streets and encountering the numerous boxes and bales that obstruct the walks can testify. It would be an interesting task to follow some of these packages to their final destination, to see their contents temptingly displayed in the windows of the retail dealer, hundreds or thousands of miles distant, to watch the play of emotion on the countenances of the eager purchasers of the latest styles, and their satisfaction in being assured that they had obtained the modes of the metropolis (for there is no hamlet, however remote that does not pride itself on being in the fashion); to go still farther, even to the homes and privacy of the final possessors of these coveted articles, and learn how much comfort they afforded, how much pride and envy they aroused, how to some they came as a boon richly prized, and to others were the sources of unhappy and embittered feeling. But the business of our merchants is to sell goods, and not to moralize over them when no longer in their hands; and the prospect of large sales during the season are very flattering.

Though the cholera still lingers in our city, its victims are so few, and its power so restricted, that but for the official reports we would not be aware of its presence. Science has vindicated its right to be the arbiter of epidemic diseases, and its ability to check and restrain them within such bounds as it may set. In fact, nearly all disease and suffering are the penalty for our disregard and violation of the simplest laws of our being; and did we properly understand and obey those laws, we might bid defiance to sickness.

The New Jersey railroads have been proverbial for their successful assay in the how-not-to-do-it policy, where the convenience and comfort of passengers were concerned, and likewise for a proclivity to make mincemeat of any unfortunates who are compelled to use them. It is said that the friends of the President in Philadelphia, fully aware of these facts, secured a policy of insurance for him before they allowed him to commit himself to the tender mercies of these monopolists. Fortunately he made the journey in safety. There is one marked exception to this general rule of the railway management of our gallant sister State, viz., the N. J. Central, a link in that grand chain of communication with the West, and with its associate line, the Lackawana, one of the best constructed and best managed roads in the country. Their ferry-boats are the finest in our harbor, their cars are neat, comfortable and even sumptuous, and all the appointments of the road such as to render it a favorite with travelers. Verbum sat.

The theatres are all about ready to begin active operations for the fall and winter. The influx of merchants and strangers has greatly increased the audiences at all the places of amusement, and the light pieces, suited for hot weather, are felt to be out of place now, and are giving way to more substantial presentations.

The pieces that have been running at Wallack's, the Winter Garden and Olympic for several weeks, were brought to an end with the close of the summer month. The Hanlon Brothers also closed a quite successful engagement at Wood's last week, which is to be refitted for the approaching season. The Broadway opened again last week, and received its full share of patronage.

Gordon Cumming's splendid Museum collection of the heads and horns, skins and bones of the monsters captured by him in the wild deserts of Southern Africa, are at Barnum's Museum, where select and appreciative audiences have daily paid their visits to the wonderful collection of that most extraordinary hunter of all times. Did we not have before us the most irrefragible proofs of his powers as a sportsman, in the spoils which constitute this exhibition, we might almost doubt the power of any man to accomplish what this modern Nimrod has achieved. Nothing short of a visit to the Museum can give one any idea of either its magnitude or interest.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Several burglars recently entered a room in the Gaines House, at Dubuque, Iowa, where four young ladies were sleeping, administered chloroform to them, and were on the point of robbing them, when one of them began to return to consciousness. One of the burglars drew a pistol and held it to her head, but by this time one of the other young ladies had awakened from her stupor and made an outcry. At this the villains fled, taking nothing valuable with them.

—— A railroad bridge is about to be constructed across the Ohio River at Louisville, Ky., at a cost of about $1,500,000, which will be a great advantage to the inhabitants of that region. It is computed that in the single item of freight between Louisville and New York the gain to shippers will be fully thirty-three per cent. The bridge will be without a draw, and so elevated that boats of any class can easily pass under it when the river is at its highest stage.

—— The widow of Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, formerly a Miss Cutts, and now remarried to Major Williams, an officer of the Federal Army, will be present at the dedication of the monument to be erected in Chicago to the memory of her first consort.

—— An interesting suit is pending in Richmond, Va., growing out of the alleged purchase, before the war, of twenty-three hundred hogsheads of tobacco for the Messrs. Rothschild. About two thousand hogsheads of the tobacco were burned on the fall of Richmond, and the rest was stored. Colonel Loomis claims the tobacco as abandoned property, but an injunction has been issued at the suit of the Rothschilds restraining him from removing it.

—— Two guerrillas were arrested in Southern Kentucky a few days ago while plying their vocation by robbing a house where an old and infirm couple resided alone. A party of young men, who were out hunting, heard a scream issuing from the house, and, entering, secured the ruffians, after a desperate fight, during which one guerrilla was shot four times and seriously wounded.

—— Major Gee, whose long trial before a military commission in Raleigh, N. C., recently ended in his acquittal, has returned to his home in Quincy, Fla., and has resumed the practice of medicine—his old profession. His trial cost the Government nearly a quarter of a million of dollars. He formerly commanded the rebel prison at Salisbury, N. C.

—— The Government has refused the request of Governor Marshall, of Minnesota, that Fort Snelling might be turned over to the State authorities for an asylum for indigent and disabled soldiers. The fort will be used as a storehouse for supplies for the forts in that district.

—— The Secretary of War has decided that the pay of the privates and non-commissioned officers of the regular and volunteer force shall be at the rates paid since May 1, 1864, until further legislation by Congress.

—— The foundations of the New York State Institution for the Blind, at Batavia, are being pushed rapidly forward, and the corner-stone of the institution is to be laid, with appropriate ceremonies, on the 6th of September.

—— The population of Toledo, Ohio, has been ascertained by a recent census to be 24,401. Last year's census made it 19,509.

—— Only 150 of the once famous Toucaway tribe of Indians now remain, and they are in Houston, Texas, subsisting on the charity of the Government.

—— A gentleman on his annual tour to the White Mountains, a year ago, discovered rocks containing gold near Lisbon, N. H. A company of Hartford and Springfield merchants was formed, which purchased the property in which the ore was found. The stock, worth a year ago $5 a share, now sells for $5,000. Some of the quartz yields $867 of gold per tun, and $159 of silver.

—— An immense brickyard, 800 feet long, and about 400 wide, is about to be established at Chicago, Illinois. It will contain machines for the manufacture of 200,000 brick a day. A canal 2,000 feet long, 200 wide and 20 deep, will connect the yard with the south branch of the river. The earth thrown up in making the excavation will be used in the manufacture of bricks.

—— A band of desperadoes attacked and routed a negro camp meeting at Shiply's Woods, near Baltimore, last week. The negroes, it seems, were holding a camp-meeting under the auspices of white Methodist ministers, a white camp-meeting being in progress at the same time. During the day suspicious-looking young men were seen about the grounds, and at night the attack was made by firing among the negroes while they were at their devotions. The blacks resisted and the fight became general, the darkness of course increasing the confusion. The fight finally ended by the negroes, at the advice of the white preachers, seeking safety in flight. The tents, bundles and trunks belonging to them were then piled together and burned by the white assailants. One white man was killed, and several negroes severely wounded.

—— One day last week the steamer Lord Elgin, on the trip from Ogdensburg to Montreal, narrowly escaped from being wrecked in one of the fearful rapids of the St. Lawrence. Just as she entered Cedar Rapids, the chain which turns the rudder broke, leaving the steamer to plunge without control through the most dangerous parts of the Rapids. Twice she struck the rocks, but, fortunately, instead of being dashed to pieces, the collision threw the boat into the current, and she passed through in safety.

—— Government has appropriated seventy-five thousand dollars for deepening and maintaining a channel across the bar of the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi, and this important work will be commenced as soon as satisfactory proposals are received. It is designed to harrow and drag the channel until a passage of a uniform depth of eighteen feet and width of two hundred feet shall be opened from deep water in the river to deep water in the gulf.

Foreign.—A Prussian drummer having damaged the skin of his drum, was ordered by his commanding officer, on arrival at a small place in Bohemia, to requiriren (the newly-coined German word for forcibly demanding anything required by the army) sufficient parchment to repair the broken instrument. After some difficulty the soldier learnt the residence of an old Jewish scribe, who undertook the drawing up of contracts, etc., in the city. On proceeding thither, the soldier found the old man in the very act of writing on a piece of parchment words in the Hebrew character. "I require that piece of vellum," said the drummer, and it was immediately given up to him. He was on the point of leaving the beggarly apartment without further delay, when his inquisitiveness was roused by seeing the curiously-written, half-finished sentence on the parchment, and he asked the old man what was the meaning of the phrase. The old Jew answered without a moment's hesitation, that the words signified "Rise up, O Eternal God, and disperse the foe!" and added that it was a prayer for the success of the Austrian arms. "Never mind, that don't matter," said the drummer, after a moment's consideration "we requiriren the prayer for the arms of Prussia."

—— The art of photography has been brought to very great perfection. Recently at an exhibition of the London Photographic Society, some cabinet pictures were shown, giving views of the various stages of a recent eruption of Mount Ætna. They were taken so near the crater that it is said the camera had to be more than once hastily removed, to escape the flow of burning lava. There were also exhibited some photographic views of the volcanic islands which have recently arisen in the Grecian Archipelago.

—— As a proof of the powers of endurance exhibited by the Prussian soldiers, it is stated that the army under the command of General Herwarth, consisting of about sixty thousand men, performed the distance between Dresden and Vienna, which, as the crow flies, is four hundred miles, in twenty-two days. Had they not been obliged to make a circuitous route, and, besides, been delayed by two battles and numerous engagements on the way, they might have arrived even in a shorter space of time.

—— A very entertaining book, by Elihu Burret, has been published in London. It is called "My Walk to Land's End." He footed his way from John O'Groat's to Land's End with a knapsack and staff. In Devonshire he visited the celebrated place of Lady Rolle, who has in her splendid park no less than three thousand varieties of trees and shrubs. Among them are two hundred different varieties of the pine, three hundred kinds of willow, and nearly two hundred of the oak. There is an artificial lake deep enough to float the Great Eastern, whose surface is covered by aquatic birds of every form and plumage. There is a wonderful Swiss cottage in the grounds, which is made of the trunks, branches and leaf stems of hundreds of various trees. The floor is a rare piece of mosaic. It looks like ivory; yet it is really paved with the knee-bones of sheep, with the half-joints uppermost! They are fitted together so compactly that four hundred of them only make a square foot. The floor is so broad that it required seventy-six thousand sheep-shanks to pave it with these fluted joints of "ovine ivory."

DEAN RICHMOND.

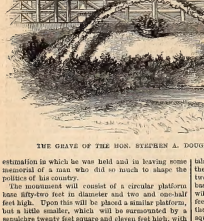
Few men have occupied a more prominent place in the political and financial circles of the Empire State for several years past than the late Dean Richmond, and his death will be felt as a public loss.

Commencing life with no extraneous advantages, by force of character and untiring industry he worked his way up to both influence and fortune. A native of Vermont, he came at an early age to Syracuse, N.Y., and while still a youth engaged in the manufacture of salt with marked success. While thus engaged he also embarked in other enterprises, by which he increased his means and enlarged his business.

About a quarter of a century ago he removed to Buffalo, where he soon became a leading operator in the produce of the West. His high character for intelligence, forecast and sagacity, and his unswerving fidelity to his engagements of every description, secured him consignments from the most substantial dealers in all the great lake towns. He took an active part in pushing forward the several railway enterprises that tended to the prosperity of Buffalo, and when the companies which owned the road, comprising the line between Albany and the lakes, were consolidated, he was unanimously chosen Vice-President of the new corporation. On the retirement of Mr. Corning, he was placed at the head of the New York Central, a place which he continued to fill until he died.

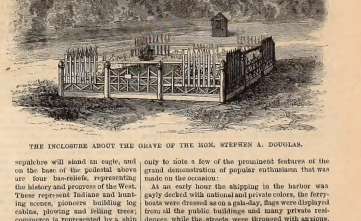
Mr. Richmond's political career has been no less marked and characteristic than his business experience. Possessing all the elements of a leader, his ambition prompted him to control parties rather than to seek their gifts; and while declining offices himself, it was his pride to place in power the man of his choice. His influence thus became personal, depending upon the adroit management of individuals in all parts of the State, whom he readily made the instruments of achieving his aims. He was a Democrat all his life, and no politician had a higher reputation as a manager. In 1856 he was appointed Chairman of the Central Committee, which position he held till his death. He took an active part in the recent Philadelphia Convention, and in him the party will lose an ardent, able and devoted leader. After an illness of about a week, he died in this city, on the morning of the 28th of August, in the sixty-third year of his age.

In personal appearance, Mr. Richmond was stout and burly, with a form of great power, which rendered him decidedly noticeable.



THE LATE DEAN RICHMOND.

THE DOUGLAS MONUMENT.



On this page is shown a picture of the monument to commemorate the public and political services of the late Stephen A. Douglas, the corner stone of which was laid with imposing ceremonies by President Johnson, on the 6th instant. We also present a view of the grave of the great statesman and the enclosure by which it is surrounded. While the fame of Douglas needs no such token to perpetuate it, there is still a marked propriety in giving public expression to the estimation in which he was held and in leaving some memorial of a man who did so much to shape the politics of his country.

The monument will consist of a circular platform base fifty-two feet in diameter and two and one-half feet high. Upon this will be placed a similar platform, but a little smaller, which will be surrounded by a sepulchre twenty feet square and eleven feet high, with walls five feet in thickness. It will contain a chamber ten feet square. In this chamber will be placed the sarcophagus, containing the remains of the great statesman. The sarcophagus will be visible through a bronze door six and a half-feet high and three feet wide. The sepulchre will be ornamented with projecting pedestals from the corners. Surrounding the sepulchre will be a pedestal twenty-one feet in height, having a base fifteen feet square. On this will be erected a column forty-three feet in length, six feet square at the base, and three and a half-feet square at the top. The column will be terminated by a capital feet high, which forms the base for the colossal statue of Douglas. Surrounding the sepulchre will be placed four sealed symbolical figures, life-size, sculptured in light marble. One of these figures will represent Illinois holding in her hand a medallion likeness of Douglas. By her side will be a sheaf of wheat and the State arms. The remaining figures will represent America with a shield, History reclining on a table, and Fame with the symbolic wreath and trumpet. Over the entrance to the sepulchre will stand an eagle, and on the base of the pedestal above are four bas-reliefs, representing the history and progress of the West. These represent Indians and hunting scenes, pioneers building log cabins, plowing and felling trees; commerce is represented by a ship and packages of goods, and the sciences are represented by a locomotive, a railroad and a telegraph. still another device represents education, a group of children, the State Capitol building, a church in the distance, etc. The statue will represent the great patriot and statesman as standing by the Constitution on one side, and by the Union on the other, which is indicated by the Roman fasces.

The first section of the monument is about half completed, and the tomb nearly finished. At each corner of Douglas's grave will be erected a pillar about thirty feet high. These will be joined by four arches which will be draped and decorated with flowers Around the bases of the pillars flags will be arranged. In front of the grave will be placed York's marble bust of Douglas, together with a model of the monument.

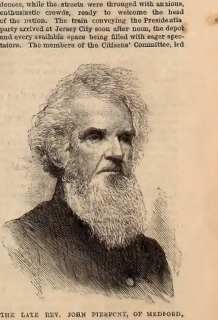
REV. JOHN PIERPONT.

THE Rev. John Pierpont was born April 6, 1785, in Litchfield, Connecticut. His education was completed in 1804 at Yale College, and in 1805 he became a tutor in the family of Colonel William Alston, of North Carolina. In 1809 he returned to Connecticut, where he studied law, and settled at Newburyport, Mass. He did not succeed as a lawyer, and his mercantile enterprises in Baltimore and Boston were also unfortunate. In 1816 he published "Airs of Palestine," one of his first poems, and subsequently studied in the Harvard Theological School. In 1819 he was ordained minister of the Hollis Street Unitarian Church in Boston. In 1835-6 he visited Europe, and published in 1840 an edition of his poems. His persistence in speaking in favor of the temperance reform caused trouble with his congregation, which resulted in a seven years' controversy, when he resigned. In 1855 he accepted the charge of the Unitarian Church in Troy, New York, where he remained four years, and then took charge of the First Congregational Church in Medford, Mass., where he continued to reside till the beginning of the war. Of late Mr. Pierpont—probably unfitted by age for the active duties of a clergyman—was obliged to accept a clerkship in the Treasury Department, and holding that position, died.



Mr. Pierpont was distinguished for the zeal with which he entered into various schemes of reform, and for his active labors in behalf of temperance, the amelioration of prison discipline, etc. He possessed poetical genius of no mean order, and it as a poet he will chiefly be remembered. Many of his poems—inspired by special occasions—are particularly excellent; and his religious poetry has rarely been surpassed in strength and simplicity.

RECEPTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

THE welcome extended to President Johnson when he visited our city, on his way to Chicago, was worthy the great metropolis of the nation and the high character of the guest. It is not often that our chief magistrate can release himself from the cares of state and mingle with the people, and when he does find occasion to go before the masses, it is highly becoming that a proper recognition of his official character and of the confidence reposed in him should be properly manifested.

The enthusiasm with which the President and his party were greeted by the citizens of New York evince the fact that there is no disposition to disregard the claims which the rulers of a free people must always have to the respect and esteem of those by whom they have been placed in positions of trust. We have space only to note a few of the prominent features of the grand demonstration of popular enthusiasm that was made on the occasion.

At an early hour the shipping in the harbor was gayly decked with national and private colors, the ferry-boats were dressed as on a gala-day, flags were displayed from all the public buildings and many private residences, while the streets were thronged with anxious, enthusiastic crowds, ready to welcome the head of the nation. The train conveying the Presidential party arrived at Jersey City soon after noon, the depot and every available space being filled with eager spectators. The members of the Citizens' Committee, led by Mr. A. T. Stewart, received the Presidential party as they alighted from the car, and at once proceeded on board the ferry-boat, when the distinguished guests were addressed by Mr. Stewart in a few words of welcome, to which the President briefly replied. The boat then crossed the river to the Battery, amid loud salutes from the vessels and forts in the harbor. Upon landing the President was greeted by Mayor Hoffman, and accompanied by him to a carriage that stood in waiting.

Secretary Seward and Mr. Stewart occupied this carriage with the President and Mayor. The next one contained Secretary Welles and Postmaster-General Randall, followed by another with General Grant and Admiral Farragut, these led the procession, which took up its line of march to the City Hall, the crowd cheering, waving handkerchiefs and expressing their gratification in the most enthusiastic manner, especially when the heroes of the army and navy were recognized. Upon arriving at the City Hall, the Mayor conducted the President to the Governor's Room, and there welcomed him to the hospitalities of the day in a pertinent address, which was properly acknowledged. A few minutes were spent in congratulations and introductions, and the line of march was resumed up Broadway. Upon leaving the Park, amid the cheers of the multitude, the President received the salute of the military, who were out in large numbers and made a fine display, adding greatly to the pageantry of the day. Upon reaching Delmonico's, which was the end of the route, the President, with Generals Grant and Meade and Admiral Farragut and the Secretaries, appeared on the balcony and received the various regiments that paraded on the occasion. The party then retired to the parlors assigned to them, and the crowd slowly dispersed. In the evening the President and party were entertained at a grand banquet, which was succeeded by a serenade. In the course of the evening the President and Mr. Seward made speeches considerably at length, but General Grant, though clamorously called for, could not be induced to break over his accustomed reticence.

The next morning the party started at an early hour for Albany, taking a steamer chartered for the occasion and left the city amid demonstrations similar to those by which they were greeted on the preceding day.

Owing to admirable police arrangements there was but little confusion, and among the many gala-days enjoyed by our city, the reception of President Johnson will occupy a conspicuous place.

GRANITES ON EIGHTH AVENUE.

BRY MOTION PLACE, GOERCK STREET.

THE CHOLERA AND FEVER NESTS OF NEW YORK.

ONE of the great evils of social life in a large city is the crowding of large masses of the population into narrow streets, and reeking alleys, and close, ill-ventilated tenement-houses. With few or no conveniences, and in constant contact with the degraded and untidy, there is a gradual giving way of the unaccustomed sense of propriety and decency, until existence is narrowed down to the bare demands of inevitable necessity. Aside from the moral aspects of this condition, its sanitary features and consequences are most deplorable. It is in such quarters malignant diseases and epidemics originate, and fatten, and acquire a virulence that often converts them into a dread pestilence. It is in such localities the cholera has been rioting during the present season—and in them it has found its victims; and though the prudent measures of the Board of Health have confined the plague to such bounds, they have not been able to prevent its entrance. And there is everything in such localities to invite disease: squalid poverty, a poisonous atmosphere, unfurnished almost deadly by the careless habits of the people, a degree of filth too disgusting for description, as irregularity of habits that would make almost any sound man sick, added to which, frequently, there is a destitution of food and comforts, that in itself would prove a cause of disease. The only wonder is, that life under such circumstances is at all possible.

On this page we give a view of some of the worst quarters of our city, appropriately termed Fever nests. There are many others equally bad, and as yet neither money has been able to remove the evil. Like lovers like, and in seeking a level, there are certain classes of humanity that inevitably sink down to such depths. We may wonder why they even fall back into such circumstances, but cannot entirely heal.

THE DRY HYDRANT, BAXTER STREET.

OUR BASE BALL ILLUSTRATIONS.

THE subject of our illustration of this week is Mr. E. G. Sabine, of the Chester Club, of Norwich, Conn. The national game is comparatively but of recent introduction into Connecticut, and yet, within two years, the number of clubs have increased from about a dozen or so to over one hundred and forty, of which there are nine located in Norwich, the Chester Club being the principal organization in that beautiful city. This club was named in honor of Captain Frank Chester, one of the brave volunteers from Norwich, who is an ardent admirer of the game. Though a young club in years, they have already obtained a prominent position, and now rank on an equal footing with the Charter Oak Club, the champion club of Connecticut, with whom they have played twice, each party winning a game. Every player in the Chester nine is worthy of notice, each filling his position with marked ability, but among them all Mr. Sabine, the pitcher of the nine and the President of the club, ranks the highest. His style of pitching is the medium-paced delivery, he imparting considerable of a bias to the ball, this style now being considered the most effective in vogue against all but the best of batsmen. A feature of his fielding is his accurate throwing to bases. He is, moreover, a sure catch, a fine base runner and an excellent batsman; but, in addition to his many physical qualifications, he is especially worthy of commendation as his social character as a young man of high moral worth and an educated, Christian gentleman. He has been the presiding officer of the club ever since its organization, to hold in high esteem by all who know him. Such men do honor to the game, alike by their fine play and moral worth. Our next portrait will be that of W. F. Williams, National B. B. Club, Washington, D. C.

WHY are the collectors of the cartoons the most praiseworthy men we have? Because they never neglect to attend to their duties.

A MISSIONARY'S STORY.

MISSIONARIES, among much that is mere cant and twaddle, have often a good, useful, or amusing thing to tell us. It comes sometimes in the form of an incident, adventure or description of quaint ways and customs. A Mr. Bancroft, who was Missionary in Rarotonga, tells us the following story about the effect of his instructions on the mind of the natives of that classical "field of labor."

"Under the belief that the alphabet and the primary syllables were, as already intimated, a series of cabalistic sounds and signs peculiar to Christianity, many of the natives were wont to congregate together in the vestry of the day and chant over the lessons they had learnt at school, just as they had been wont to chant their heathen songs. Some even imagined them to be forms of prayer, to be repeated in times of danger. An aged couple who resided near the mission-house, were greatly alarmed by the evening visit of a cat belonging to the native teacher. The cat's peculiar mew drew their attention to the door of their dwelling, and, being pitch dark, they were deterred as two bails of fire. The wife began to remonstrate with her husband for having anything to do with the new regiment, and contrary to her wishes, he had attended the daily instructions. 'See,' said she, 'what your conduct has brought upon us? Here is this monster come from the teacher to visit us. Alas! we shall be destroyed!' Poor pussy, hearing the sound of muffled conversation, became frightened, too, and began to send forth some of her most terrific cries 'Oh, Tiaki!' exclaimed the wife, 'say the prayers you have learned.' Both immediately dropped on their knees, and Tiaki began most earnestly to cry, 'Ba, ba, ba, ba; bi, bi; bo, bo.' The cat flew home in terror at such unwonted supplications, leaving the aged couple very grateful for their deliverance, and profoundly impressed with the efficacy of the new cabalistic sounds."

RIGHT TO A CRACK.—An English gentleman, wanting a dessert-service of porcelain made after a particular pattern, sent over to China specimen dish, ordering that it should be exactly copied for the whole service. It unfortunately happened that in the dish so sent over, the Chinese manufacturer discovered a crack; the consequence was that the entire service sent over to the party ordering it had a crack in each article, carefully copied from the original.

THE FISHERS.

Two fishers were down by the white sea-shore,
Mending their nets on a merry May morn;
Some of the meshes were they, and some—
Were torn to the meshes at one birth born.
And as they toil'd, and their nets grew strong,
One look'd straight in the eyes of the other—
"Let us live in love our whole life long,
For this was the last sweet word of our mother."

A maiden came down to the white sea-shore,
With length of hair, and shy of feet,
And pass'd by the rocks where the nets hung o'er,
And together the fishers sprang up to their feet;
And their face flush'd with a mixed light,
As she smiled on the one, but frown'd on the other;
And their breath came quick, and their teeth were set,
And a hate grew in a stern death-hold—
Oh! 'tis sad to forget the last words of our mother!

Ellice Browne's Mission.

EARLY Browny stood at her school-room window. The—of one in purple and fine linen, and between them and the trees which hid the river white-sailed craft slipped by every few moments, like great unicorn-born butterflies. Beside one which she glanced were dun and dreary. On some were sacks of corn-stalks arranged in orderly rows; some were dry and brown, with little patches of snow, which had yielded neither to the sun nor rain, lying here and there. Still others were some banded with fitful gleams of the afternoon's sunshine and green with the promise of future harvests, while nothing of all these carried were many farm-houses, from which the smoke curled in blue peacefulness. Looking nearer, her brow fell upon a landscape spreaded to be a huge lake, but which was, in reality, the meadows submerged for acres, for the tide was unusually high, and there had been much rain. Dotting the water still were the clustered houses of the town, and, at intervals, some tall, ancient mansion, which, from upon an elevation, looked down upon its imprecending neighbors. Toward the west stretched the bay, over its broad turbidness, as the white-edged waves rolled and broke upon its surface.

Ellice was slight, with a pale face, of which the eyes—gray, sweet, clear—were the chief beauty. Her mouth, in repose, indicated strong points of character; when she smiled, the expression was wonderfully sweet—almost, in other words, whose smile, one might implicitly trust. As for the rest of her face, one would scarcely notice it, unless it was to admire the wealth of hair off her temples, thus revealing its breadth. She always wore her hair thus, in close coils and curled at will around her neck. And yet, having looked at her and found nothing either striking or brilliant, you would, on a chance to see—turn again and study that pale face, until, fascinated, you grew into the belief that it was beautiful. There was something about it, however, that indicated constant self-struggle. Her great, questioning eyes, and lips that often broke into a quivering mobility, told of a mind, too young for speech, which had, while it slept, been separated from its mother, and, awaking, looks from face to face of the surrounding strangers, it haply it may find something which it can recognize and claim. For Ellice was always of a nervous temperament, mostly gray, relieved by a knot of gay ribbon, and by delicate ruffles at wrists and throat.

She was fifteen years old—a shade taller than usual. Her duties had been more trying than ordinary. One of the teachers in the grammar department was ill, and she sent, in the morning, that her shoes fitted Ellice, and she had, consequently, slipped into them. The children on this, her first day, had watched her proficiency and forbearance to their utmost limit. All through the day there had been whispering in remote school-corners; several little snow-balls had been improvised by means of white paper torn to small bits and moistened with the lips; and pencils and knives were exhibited under her very eyes, and she had found it necessary to interrupt two or three little mutterings, busily engaged in counting these treasures upon their book-heels. During study-hour, while absorbed in solving a complicated example for one of the elder classes, Miss Jones had been seized with a building mania, and, assisted by all the rest, who quietly passed book after book, she constructed a "house of Jones." Just as the summit was proudly attained, and Sam was preparing to rest on his laurels, Miss Jones looked up. Confusion followed; Sam started, knocked the tower with his elbow, and down came books as remains of little Johnny Bloomfield's unsophisticate attempt to draw a headkerchief from the depths of his trowsers' pocket, turned said receptacle inside out, and a top, three or four marbles, a shot enough to have dispatched a covey of partridges, pencils and fishlines, and a chunk of gingerbread joined the wreck of the town. Taking advantage of the voice, Tom Ely, always on the alert for a method, announced that the contents of one of the boys upon the second bench was filled with peanuts, and that it was within easy reach of his foot, suddenly crushed its contents, to the dismay of its owner and Ellice, while the girls tittered and the boys laughed aloud. It needed but a few words, in clear, decisive tones, from Ellice, to produce order, and, with slight interruptions, all progressed finely until the close of the school.

And Ellice, as she looked from the window, had been thinking. She did not like teaching children. Once, while a student, she had been elected by her classmates to take charge of their recitations in geometry and metaphysics during their professor's absence, and she had delighted in it. Her intellect had led her away into regions unknown to her own. She liked an interchange of opinions—liked the attrition of mind with mind; but these children—they had rule during rule during rule; attentive during recitations, caring little for study —should she ever like instructing them—ever be content? Was she doing right to censure her class, as she had done for a year, detesting her task, glad when the day was over? But what else could she do? She must do something, and she had found that a position in a seminary was the easy thing to obtain. Besides, she could not leave her father. Burning thoughts hissed through her brain sometimes, tingled to her very finger-tips. Should she leave—and starve? Dare go beseeching, and try housekeeping for some needy advertiser? She shook her head; it would not better the case. And, then, her father would miss her, and sweet, baby-faced, inefficient, Lene; and the crippled boy, Douglas, what would he do? Marry? She recalled, in another second, her former acquaintances, walking, with entangled feet, in the meshes society had woven for them. They either had not seen its snares or had been willing dupes. Blind ignorance—fatal submission! Should she not speak, point out danger, plead for self-reliance, for truth? But were there no bright traits? Assuredly, yes! And she brought to mind several that came in which she had recalled a smile, and perspiration as possible earth. For ten's sake, she remembered, the Lord would not have destroyed Sodom.

The quick blood heaved into her face, her lips burned, her aching eyes were strangely lighted. She turned from the window.

"Foolish speculations! Foolish fits with indication! How could I, with my feeble powers, where God hath placed me? Will not my obligation cease if I fulfill the hour's task faithfully? Why—yes—"

She stopped as she uttered the word, and taking up a Legendre, busied herself with a proposition. Why? She had found it a very good study, ardent soul must inevitably hate it; for perils may be borne, deeds accomplished, but men and women scarcely ever. Even a stone of duty will never break the strongholds of iniquity, nor cause to spring from the reaking soil of impurity sweet flowers than shall waft to the summer of truth and peace.

She stood standing at her window, Dr. Elliot, driving up the Agenoire, busied herself with a proposition. Why? She had found it a very good study, ardent soul must inevitably hate it; for perils may be borne, deeds accomplished, but men and women scarcely ever. Even a stone of duty will never break the strongholds of iniquity, nor cause to spring from the reaking soil of impurity sweet flowers than shall waft to the summer of truth and peace.

She stood standing at her window, Dr. Elliot, driving through the street upon which the building faced, noticed her.

Dr. Elliot, patient of political economy, of philosophy, or theology," he questioned, "in that girl trying to solve now? I must prescribe for her, or I shall have a brother of mine upon my hands, and Ellice can ill be spared. I'll just drive to the Widow Cameron's and learn the effect of those large, comfortable-looking house overlooking the town and bay. He had studied medicine at first more with the intention of qualifying himself for an influence for good it might be in his hands, commenced practice, not for the purpose of becoming famous and talked about, but because that he was ameliorating evil and lightening that burden of disease, that, incurred through sin, all, in a greater or less degree, must share. He was deservedly popular, yet his popularity did not interfere with two other practitioners, who found it necessary to sneer at his old-time methods. Dr. Browne since the beginning of his misfortunes, the failure and long illness of his brother-in-law, and Ellice, unconsciously to herself, was to him an interesting psychological study.

Years to her past, Ellice's uncle, a doctor soon appeared in the school-house, and walked quietly to the class-room door.

"Ellice!"

She sprang to her feet, a frightened look upon her face.

"Papa wores?" she exclaimed, anxiously.

"No; but you will be if you are not careful. What are you doing?" taking, as he spoke, a seat at the desk next her.

She handed him her Legendre. He coolly tossed it to the other end of the room. A little fear came into her eyes; she moved as though to rise.

"Stay here, Ellice," he said, touching her arm gently. "What is the matter? Are you not well?"

"Yes, I am well."

"Tired?"

"Yes," she cried, the veins which laced her forehead swelling into blue ridges, "I am tired-tired in soul and body!"

"Of what?" his voice softening.

"Of study!"

Her eager eyes searched his a moment, then dropped with a low while, heavy like. He might help her, she thought.

"Yes."

"Of myself—of everybody—everything!"

"Ellice, look at me."

She obeyed. His calm, blue, Saxon eyes looked steadily into hers; gradually, slowly, the soul behind them must be clean, she thought.

"How long is it since you have been out to walk?"

"Three weeks; but papa has been unusually fitful—and—"

"And to-day," he continued, "instead of going into the fresh air, you have been dreaming; fighting that old fight with duty; trying to think yourself free of those chains that will drop off themselves when the right time comes—and then as a sedative to your overwrought nerves, puzzling your brain with Legendre. Come! put on your bonnet and shawl, and take a ride with me into the country. How long since you have seen Port Schuyler, or breathed the salt sea air?"

Ellice hesitated a moment.

"There, don't look so resolute! It's but little after three, and, if necessary, Lene, for once, can prove support."

There was a bit of authority in his voice, which awoke a corresponding amount of rebellion in Ellice's heart, but allaying her common sense to take the reins, she quietly obeyed him.

"Ellice!"

"Well."

"Don't open that Legendre until I give you permission, will you?"

"Why?"

"Can you not trust me?"

She looked into his face, and smiled.

"Now," said he, as he closed the door, "for the first step in my prescription. If your eyes don't lose their weary look, and your face its care-lines, I shall call you an ingrate."

Ellice, in a few minutes, and Ellice, upon her return, found Douglass at the window watching for her, her father quiet, and Lene busy making the tea. The doctor declined all invitations to remain.

"I shall punish you again, if you are so naughty," he said, as he left her. Ellice laughed. She had found his pills silver-coated.

"And how has my little lamester been to-day?" she asked, as she lifted Douglass into her lap before taking off her shawl.

"Oh, very, very much. An' Lene's as good—told me stories, and—"

"Sung to you!" repeated Ellice.

"Yes," answered Lene, as she says—let me whisper it, sis—she says the trees taught her. Isn't it funny? But you tell me about your ride."

"Yes, I will, but papa vants his supper, and she is hungry, too. But before Douglass is tucked up in bed I'll tell you all I know about it." She put him down gently.

"Lene, I said in your lap when you eat your supper, after you've fed papa?" he plead.

"A cuddling lamester, that vants consoling. Fie, fie!—that she kissed his thin face.

"Will you, sis?"

"Yes, indeed—but, such a big, such an immense baby! Have you ever heard of such a thing?"

"Sis does, most every night," he laughed.

Two years previous, Mr. Browne had been brought in a nearly dead state, from the foundering sea of disaster had swept over him, to his utter ruin—ruin in the full sense of the term, for the shock, with its long train of evils, had left him paralyzed. Ellice, although little more than a child, was obliged to stand him, and support, in a measure, the family. American girls—some of them—know what such a school of training is. Ellice, with a mother dead, and a father helpless, suddenly into womanhood's care and earnestness. Their fashionable house was sold, and they had gone into the old-time home of Ellice's mother's wood, this had been one of its noted farm-houses. Quaint in construction, quiet, it was fraught with the old-time associations, with the sad recollections of her life, and Ellice loved it. She had, besides, a small income, but it was insufficient for the many needs of all, and she had applied successfully for a vacant position in the village school.

Mr. Browne's monomania took a singular turn. He imagined himself a glass bottle. He would sing, in a low, sweet tone, the old nursery ballad, with terrified alike by fire and cold, not being able to get the philosophic principle quite straight in his mind, and would sit for hours endeavoring to shape him into convulsions. Lene's heedless hands were a terror to him, and only by Ellice would he allow her to touch him. She had had been an aid for her, but love strengthening her hands and sharpening her heart, enabled her to perform her duty nobly.

Life—says Emerson—is a series of surprises, and we would not have it otherwise, is a part of Ellice's experience—and when Ellice found one day, upon her return from school, that her father's eyes were dull, his head in his body cold, as always so for a short time, more surprised than grieved. She could not believe that it was death, until the doctor came and declared it; but that hope was unavailing.

But her dead was buried. Not until the grave closed upon him did she realize what her father had been to her, and how much she had loved him. Lene was then but an infant, and Ellice had slipped from her sight, upon some tide outgoing from time to eternity, but as she remembered him—strong, powerful, loving—though years gone, when the family had been unbroken and prosperity had smiled upon them.

A rose upon a tombstone may say stirring or remarkable event. Sometimes Ellice felt her burden heavier than she could bear—sometimes her words seemed to be those of God. Lene's nervous temperament tried her continually at home. Douglass, the little cripple, was a source of anxiety, no heat was too intense, no cold too piercing. In summer, the house was filled with plants and flowers which she loved to train and arrange; in winter, she frequently returned from these expeditions laden with pine boughs and cones; these, after drying, she used in vases and kitchen fire-place, and curling upon the rug, watched the cleft tongues of flame as they lapped branch and tassel and cone, and, with her head upon her hands, musing with unbounded yet silent delight. She seemed to Ellice like some creature scarcely her soul. It was of no use to talk to her, so Ellice finally concluded to let her "gang her ain gait."

There was much that was lovable about Lene—and Ellice awaited the awakening which she felt assured would come. As for Douglass, Ellice felt —as he grew each day paler and weaker—her heart clinging to him more closely. His eyes were preternaturally bright, sometimes the glow of crimson would color his cheeks, but, pale or flushed, there was always that look of suffering which made Ellice, when she heard it, stop and listen if he happened to be in another room, she made some excuse to go to him, and then taking him upon her lap, talked of the buds and blossoms of the coming spring, and felt great throbs of pain, when his eyes, seeking hers, seemed to ask the question—which his lips could not utter—"What if I should die just as the violets are born?"

The holidays came in sprang, and about this time an incident occurred which gave the director, the aim to her future. The town boasted its musical society, and it had now agreed that a concert should be given at the Hall for the benefit of certain benevolent institutions located at the place. The managers were determined that this concert should be as artistic as possible. Several soloists were to be made from the members of the "Messrs," a number of old ballads and a Christmas carol were to be sung. No pains had been spared in regard to detail and rehearsals.

It was the last but one rehearsal evening. Ellice was there. She possessed a superb contralto voice, and had prominent parts assigned her. All proceeded harmoniously, and the sweet sound of the singers' voices reached the ear and heart of a passer-by, who paused and hesitated, crouching in the snow of the roadside.

A short time before, she had left her little sister, sick and begging for food, in her comfortless garret. She walked hurriedly into the town, planning the face of all she met. She had never begged, but the cold scorn of these passing faces made the words choke in her throat. Despairing and disheartened, she was just turning from a corner bakery, when a number of boys congregated there jeered at her and commenced to pelt her with snow-balls. Some one gathered her up in a wheel more closely about her, turned upon them with a terrible oath, and then rushed—half crazed—up the nearest alley, which chanced to be one of the darkest, and threw herself at length upon the snow, raving and cursing, and clutching at the white-cold snow.

The harmony of those sweet voices reached her. She buried her face, a moment, in her hands, and tears of sorrow and remorse burned through the clinched fingers. She arose, finally, and walked slowly toward the church, paused at the steps, and crawled, as if fascinated, to the door.

"Maybe I can earn something in there. Aggie is starving—poor—starving!" she muttered to herself, as though to gain courage. Hesitating a moment longer, she pushed the door open quietly, and, unobserved, took a seat.

Some commotion was soon noticeable.

"Where is Miss Sherman—she's not in any one or two ballads?" inquired the head manager, Mr. Wood.

"Ill, I believe," replied Annie Kirkeland, the leading soprano.

Mr. Wood's countenance fell.

"Always something! I would give twenty dollars rather than miss those ballads."

"Oh! if I could but earn it. I could buy wood, and Aggie should have some coffee and a doll for her Christmas—ah! but we'd have pleasant times. I'd get a tree from the woods, and we'd have it in the house, and six stockings should be filled with candies and toys," said Mag Lee, to her child-like gathering of hopes that no music had dimmed—long, long ago, since ever a wild dream had held her soul in its passionate arms, staining it with sin, and leaving it scathed and scarred. "Oh, if I could!" and leaving her corner, she walked to the middle of the room.

"Mr. Wood! I can sing, will you let me try?"

They all turned, mute for a moment, with astonishment. Then an unspeakable horror, which no language can express, of anger and pantomime, fell upon them. They soon, however, recovered the use of their tongues, and various objurgations greeted her.

Mag—"Cursing Mag," the boys called her—threw them into a chorus of delight.

"I spoke to you, Mr. Wood. Will you try me?"

"Yes, you may sing, Mag!"

Those words had never heard her at all, or heard her voice only in coarse voice and low song, stood spell-bound. For a moment her voice quivered with emotion, and a song for which she had her years before, "The Sands of Dee"—but its liquid softness, its deep pathos thrilled them. They scarcely gave them time to recover from their amazement, before she slid into a sparkling Christmas ballad, to those who listened were in that they had never heard "Comin' thro' the Rye" sung before! Then she rendered with exquisite tenderness the old song of "Auld Lang Syne."

Mr. Wood came down and stood near her.

"Well?" she said, her voice trembling with anxiety.

"I am afraid—" he began.

"No, Mr. Wood," Mag interrupted, "you said you would give twenty dollars to have those ballads sung. I will sing them for five. I have a few things at home," she continued, looking down at her ragged shawl; "I would not disgrace you; I will sing behind a screen"—she grew excited—"or—or—anywhere! so can earn some, and I want—I want"—her voice sank lower—"I want to earn an honest dollar. My little sister cried for bread when I left her. That is why I sang. Can't you employ me?"

"An honest dollar!" he repeated, with a sort of interrogation in his voice that galled her to the quick. It was part of her punishment; though her heart bled, she would bear it for Aggie's sake.

The singers called Mr. Wood back.

"We will not ask it, if she don't," they said.

"She needs help," replied he.

"Mr. Wood," exclaimed Ellice, "I will sing!"

"But we will not," retorted the others, with angry voice.

Mr. Wood, frightened at such a prospect, returned to the waiting girl.

"I shall be compelled to say no—they are all angry at your assistance."

She turned away without a word, but with a look of utter wretchedness, and walked slowly sought the door, crawled down-stairs again, out into the bitter cold. Beneath the glittering sky, so semi-more desolate, more desperate than here, slipped down into the black gulfs of despair."

Ellice had caught her glances as she left, and grew sick at heart. Like a barbed arrow, that same look penetrated Mr. Wood's soul, and he followed her. It was an easy thing to overtake her, for she was completely unnerved.

In the bitterness of a crushed spirit she understood the hate-sentiment that met her at the very first step of a new life.

"Mag!" called Mr. Wood in a softened tone. She stopped and faced him.

"Here, will you take this," offering five dollars.

"I would have given it to you there—but——"

"Pa!" She gazed, startled, stung and outraged, "you did not dare. Take it! no—a thousand times, no. I try to do right—and you are afraid to touch me from evil—and you dare not lend a helping hand in the face of the world. Mr. Wood, you have a daughter. Have you? My father loved me once. Some time—may God forbid it—but some time she may be like me. You would rather follow her to the grave? If I go home, and find Aggie dying for lack of bread, I shall wish——"

"Don, Mag—don't," said he, fearful of a terrible curse. "I would help you if I could—but" "I can't stand here and talk any longer. Woe! you take it." And he held the note toward her.

A bitter laugh was the only rejoinder. Crushing back the scorn and sorrow that choked her, and angered into her usual energy, Mag bounded past him into the darkness.

She reached Aggie. Well, she must beg. She neared a house where the lights were still twinkling, and with strong resolution passed up the snowy path and rang the bell.

"Will you give me bread?" she asked.

The servant, by way of reply, slammed the door in her face, with a fierce livid with passion, and turned to go off the piazza. She servant soon opened the door again—fearful probably of some revenge, for her dull wits comprehended that this applicant was a person not to be trifled with —and threw a loaf of bread out. Not until she had returned did Mag seize it, hide it under her shawl, and then run as fast as possible toward her home.

When Mr. Wood returned, the bubbub had scarcely subsided. Ellice had gone home. Gone home to depend upon "the rarity of Christian charity"—gone to weary her brain in the effort to solve those problems which society—poor and saintly, with no one to shield, no crimes to answer for—dare, not probe, lest, touching pitch, it should be soiled. Dares not probe, I say; sometimes it gathers a few wretched into Magdalen asylums, but the root of the wrong is not thereby reached.

Mr. Wood succeeded at last in quelling the tumult, but much oil was poured upon the troubled waters before this desirable result was attained. It was a difficult task. His conscience was all at ease. He might at least have bought something of Mag, or have gone home with her and ascertained what the trouble was. But some one might have sent him on to Ellice with her—and his reputation was of a vast deal of consequence. A dying child, a soul bound with the sacredest of repentance, were as nothing to that. Nevertheless Mag's bitter laugh haunted him.

While no rose-flush incarnadined the gray of the next morning, Ellice was busy. The fire was kindled; his saucy rays dancing after startled shadows, hiding among the quaint rafters, then singing lustily, pass stretched at length upon the warm hearth-rug. Ellice engaged in preparing breakfast, made a pleasant picture. Early though it was, a cold, pinched face had been pressed against the window, wild eyes conned with wonder ing look this ruddy picture. A knock startled Ellice.

"Come in!" she ventured to say.

Pass, aware of a little trepidation in the voice of her mistress, left her sunny corner, and, pressing her fingers, hot, watched as well the opening door.

"It's you, is it, Maggie? Don't be afraid. Come in!"

"No—no, don't call me Maggie! My name is Mag—Granny—Mag, you know," and the hunkiness in her voice changed to rancorous sharpness as she uttered the abhorred name. "I thought I'd come to you. I studied them all, but Ellice and I hate"—her hands clinched—"hate them all. All but you," she added in a softer tone.

Ellice looked at her. The right, eager expression which the night previous had deepened her blue eyes into pansy tints was gone; the sad appealing that cut closest under her long lashes was gone; they were dull with tearless grief. That evening, in her misery—sweet as sunshine—so clear as flute-notes—wrapped all in its weird melody, Ellice had thought her beautiful. The beauty had worn out of it. Sharp and hard, defiant and reckless, it told its tale. Thinking this, she moved toward her and attempted to take her hand. Mag drew back—

"Ain't you afraid?"

Ellice did not notice.

"What is it, Maggie?—what troubles you? Sit down here by the fire, and tell me about it. Maybe I can help you."

She noticed a twitching of the girl's lips as she called her "Maggie." There was something pure left in her heart—some chord that vibrated to the sound of that name; and she meant to touch it, meant to let the light fall upon that one white, clean spot.

The girl moved toward the fire—covering her face with her poor rag of a shawl.

"Aggie—Aggie is dead. My poor little sister—my wee darling—my pretty, pure Aggie!" she wailed, rocking to and fro. "And whose fault was it?" she continued, her voice growing harder with every word. "Six months ago, I went to Mrs. Wood and asked for work; I would have done anything—

She spurned me as though I had been a leper. I cried others—and met nothing but rebuffs. My father had given me a fairy education; I had never been taught to work; but I knew that they had an superintendent at the factory, and I asked him to take me on. The girls sneered, and he turned me off. You saw and heard last night. Then I begged—begged—and the word came hissing hot with shame and passion from her lips—'and it was thrown to me, as though I had been a cur. God save me! I have starved for it all the time."

Ellice sat down beside her, and took the girl's cold hand between her own—

"But you saw her, and spoke to her before she left."

"No. I rushed home with—with—my bread. There was no light in the room but the moon's; and she was still that I thought in sleep. It was so cold that I thought I wouldn't wake her until I had moistened some bread. Before I could kindle a spark of fire, I knelt down to take her, and then I think I must have fainted and fallen to the floor. I took her in my arms and tried to warm her with kisses. I would have cursed, but I couldn't, for Aggie's cold face was pressed to my bosom, and the words froze on my lips. The wretch—no kin. Frozen and starved. May God requite them. I wish I could curse them as I have begged."

Ellice laid a cool hand on the girl's burning temples.

"Mag, Mag. Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.'"

"My punishment is greater than I can bear. Poor little Aggie—to be all alone!"

The voice was strident, but her eyelids quivered. Ellice left her, went to Douglass and found her sleeping soundly. Without consulting such little articles as she supposed necessary, bundled up every stick for under he reach, and roused Maggie home. When she returned, she found Margaret calm, and insisted upon her drinking a cup of coffee and eating a piece of toast; then leaving Lena in charge, they started. What need to depict the utter poverty, and cold, and cheerlessness that filled Ellice from the first glance? A story so often that you are sick of it, and yet repetition never makes the tragedy of want, and neglect, and wretchedness, less terrible.

Little Agnes Lee was buried. Ellice did in the same way she would have done for a child had Douglass died. After all was over, she said:

"I need assistance, Margaret: Lena is so inexperienced, and Douglass requires constant watching—will you not make your home with me?"

And the wretched one, who would have died for Ellice, could not say nay, and followed her. Of course the denizens of Beechwood were aghast. Such an unheard-of thing! Lost the goodwill that some of her old friends looked coldly, some utterly ignored her existence, and some took it upon themselves to abuse her. A few, a very few, unsatisfied look which her eyes had held so long, forgot their prejudices, grew kinder, were cleaning, and she began to see a plain path before her.

And Margaret? Did she step suddenly from the region of the Shadow of Death into marvelous light and brightness? I trow not. But day by day the hard lines disappeared from her face, the blank, despairing expression fled from her eyes, leaving the olden pansy-gleams, and her face became beautiful with the beauty of faith—a row which chastens and purifies, and her character lovely with the loveliness of sin regretted and repented.

A short time previous to Dr. Elliot's departure for Europe, Ellice held a long consultation with him. The result was that she soon resigned her position in school, and going down every day to the factory, visited sewing-women in their homes, made herself the confidant of factory girls, and her very soul was appalled at the revelations which, like Saturday, were poured into her ears, who, in the endeavor to keep body and soul together by a shining bit of steel, grew mad and hardened into base souls for their own wretched. Men, too, she found—no, not men, God never made such—brutes she found, who took young girls to work from their homes and could tire apart, repeating the process day after day, until the finished work? What do you work for? Starvation in their ears, sent the hot blood in indignant throbs to their cheeks, and they fled. Fled! Where else could they go? Where was it best to receive? Curses probably—jeers certainly. Sorry food and stelter then. Starvation! And what matter? Who are the keepers of these wretches? The river! You shudder. But there is a Lethe worse than that, into which thousands plunge, and the time has come when it must be dried.

And Ellice Browne became the advocate of woman. She pictured the wrongs, and made a proclamation to which she was subjected, plead for a recognition of her work, a recognition of her capabilities as a member of the human brotherhood. Throughout the length and breadth of the land her voice rang. Sometimes her words were sharper than two-edged swords, but she knew that the festering wounds of society the filthy rags with which it sought to hide its uncleanliness, and heal them thoroughly.

But for all this paid she not a price? You know better than that—and several women whose she most needed friendship; scorn when most she needed sympathy, were her meed in many cases. Yet there were exceptions. And of the thousands who listened to her, there were many whom she was never to know, but in whose hearts the seed sown broadcast fell and bore fruit an hundredfold.

Balmy odors from garden-beds bordered with blue-eyed flax, the odor of sage and thyme, of roses and petunias, sifted through the pulsing air, nd were languidly inhaled by a pale sufferer. Occasionally across his face fell the shadows of darting swallows; occasionally, too, a snow-white or purple-crested dove, perching upon the window-sill, uttered soft, cooing notes; these and the humble-bee's droning hum were the only sounds that thrilled the drowsy air. An elderly lady, whose calm gray eyes seemed full of traces of peace, sat by the window, knitting. Yet the knitting often fell in her lap, and very often she turned her gaze from the distant, blue-draped hills, to the form opposite her. The afternoon was sultry, and the sufferer struggled toward the land, but died almost as they reached the shore. And not the less did not seem to oppress Clarence Hall—he appeared in unconsciousness of it; his lips were drawn as though in actual pain, and there was intense suffering hidden in the eyes, over which the lids drooped heavily. Once his mother caught their expression—for the marbled face was always shielding eyes that could tell a seething, misty world—and springing, as he glanced toward the hills, while his lips curled and quivered. Upon Mrs. Hall's knitting fell tears, warm and fast; yet she did not go to him, nor speak.

"Mother," at length said the young man, "did you see Dr. Beardman to-day.

"Yes, my son."

"My fears are all confirmed. I shall never be able to walk again. And earth is full of pleasant places—so full," he murmured, the dreamy look veiling his face again with deep melancholy, "that it was a hard fate, unjust.

Dr. Elliot's illness had been of tedious duration. Upon his return from Europe his mother gave a party, as a welcome tothim. Just at evening he went to the depot for a basket of champagne which had been forgotten, and lifted it into the carriage. He felt a twitching pain in his back, but gave it slight attention. The excitement of the evening drove his thoughts from himself, but the next morning, when he attempted to rise, he found it impossible. Weary days that lengthened into weeks and months followed—for his spine was seriously affected.

He was still very weak, though almost well. He was lying in the parlor in one of his lower limbs again. Thinks the doctor had communicated to him that very disease.

It is a fossal thing for one full of generous impulses, high-educated, living to do good for its own sake, to find himself the object of peculiar sympathies evolved when brought into contact with any thing of suffering, to be thus afflicted. He had used almost every negative term for self-struggling's very bitterness of soul.

Mrs. Hall looked from her son toward the open country. Her eyes darted hither and thither in very abandon of joy; still the doves came and went, and the breeze—still from the hearts of the doves rolled up intense fragrance; still the hills ir draped in blue; still the breath of the sea fathomed out on the shore. As she looked, her lips moved—

"Whosthe Lord loveth——"

He interrupted, added Clarence, who had interpreted her moving lips.

After moment he asked:

"Is Ellice Browne here you heard?"

Petesjal sha she returned last night. Dogtass has an very ill, and required so much privacy for her, at they sent her a telegram as soon as possible.

"Yes, suppose so. I believe I shall miss that boy almt as much as she will. It would seem as though the Lord might have taken me—useless and helpless—from my mother."

He sathhe with a sad smile, more pitiful than tears wild have been. The impossibility of attending the office had been his greatest trial. Again Grence Elliot glanced toward the hills. A look countenable longing came over his face for a moment—a longing which died at last into one of cold termination—cold, because born of stern duty.

"Mofir, will you bring me a pencil and paper? I think san write."

Mrs. Hall moved quietly to his writing-desk and pened the desired articles. Then she arrangthe pillows so that he could be supported, and leaning back, he wrote, and drew the curtain that the light might not disturb him. He thand her with a gentle, quiet smile, otherwise hisbrowand mouth frozen to an eternal calm, so whi so chisled, so set were they. His fingers toyed th the paper, with the pencil, as though unconsid of what he held; then, as Mrs. Elliot slippedfrom the room, realization rent the calm, the unconsciousness, as the sun rends the icefields frose in winter.

Nevefore had Clarence Elliot found expression—never before had he been analyzed to fulfill his destination; every effort sent the blood surging tuitously through his veins—a fever, succeeded a chill, that left him in a state of languor. Gdrops of moisture stood on his forehead. Very, y weak was he at that moment—a child in helplessness. At last he sighed wearily, with the wo" Come!" on a slip of paper.

"Mother, will you call her?" he murmured, relapsi into troubled thought.

Later the afternoon a slight rap was heard at the do The doctor said, "Come in!" but his hearbrobbed as wildly as a girl's as Ellice Browntered. She stepped quietly toward him, a gentle nestling in her gray eyes. He could not spk for a moment; then he said:

"I see I could not go to you. How is Douglass?"

"He well," replied Ellice, calmly.

"Eyes—I know. And you have not wept?"

"I did not."

"Dems to me that I could weep forever."

He underood him. She did not reply, but lifted wet hair off his temples, and her touch calm him.

"Ydu know why I sent for you?"

"I; how should I? That you wanted me was enou."

Ellice bed her hand him, then thrust her off.

"I want to release you, Ellice," he breathed hard, "I have no right to detain my young life to mine. I am utterly crippled. I shall never walk again; I must be carried like a baby whithersoever I go. What kind of a husband will I make for you? No, no—it must not be——"

"Clarence," interrupted Ellice, "I never loved you because—because you could walk; I love you now the less because you cannot. My life would be poor and mean without you," she continued, passionately. "I will not give you up."

"Then you are willing to go through the streets beside a husband who must lay down in the arms of one'hired to perform the duty? Think well—yourself a subject of pity, because bound to such a one; you, the admired object of mutual curiosity."

He watched her with jealous eagerness as he spoke, but there was no wavering in her eyes.

"Clarence," said Ellice, as she threw her arms around him, and touched her cool lips to his fevered ones, while a merry twinkle coquetted in her gray eyes, "now you needn't torment yourself one moment longer, or imagine that I ever intend to give you up, because," she continued, laughingly, "you are mine, and I mean to retain all the personal and portable property I can lay my hands upon."

"I meant to write it—meant to say that this must be the end—but I was too miserably weak. I could not do it; then I thought I could tell you, and so sent for you. I had fully determined that you should not—on earth—not even yourself—could change my resolution; but you see——"

"I've taken advantage of your weakness, and I mean to keep it."

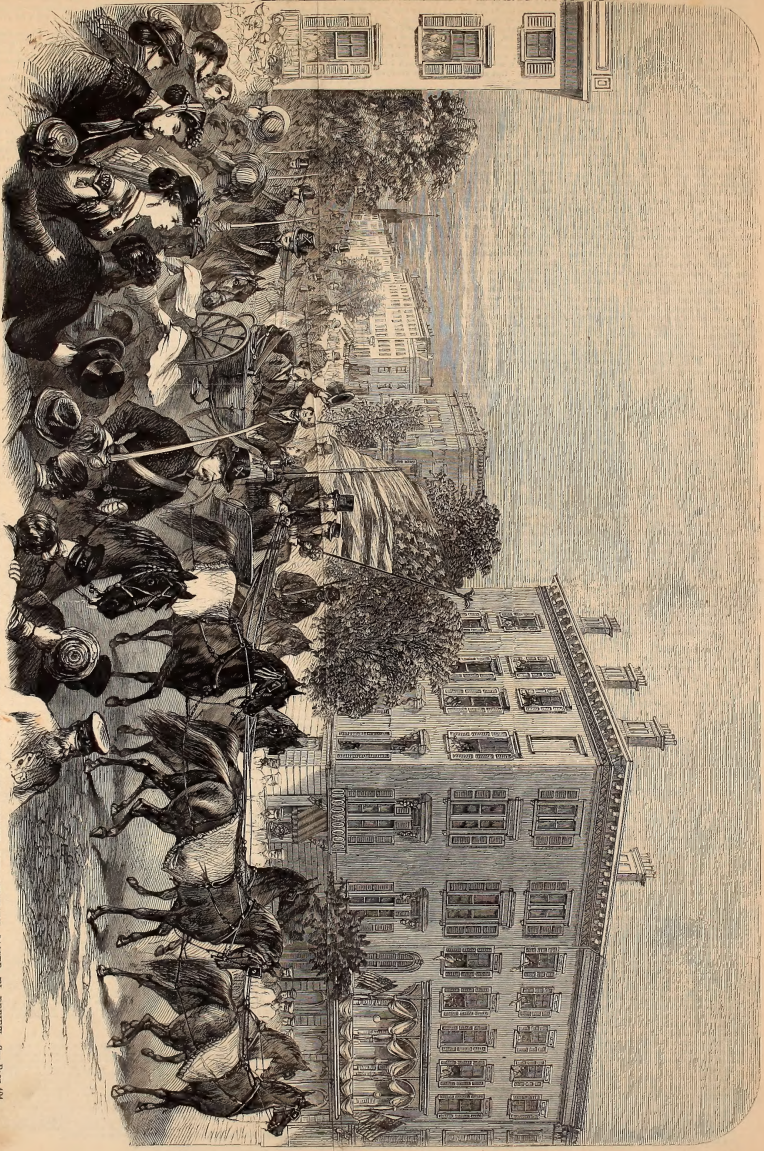
Dr. Elliot laughed, his blue eyes sparkled; he would not have thought it possible that he could have been so calm, so satisfied. He thought he would be willing to die there always could her hand remain in his, but to think that he would be quite impossible to go through life without her, reflected, and owned, in his secret soul, that he was a happy man. Ellice thought so also and had been the occasion of much distress. They talked a long time, and when Ellice, having left Mrs. Ellice, and found that worthy dame in the garden picking raspberries, stood a few moments chatting with her, and then returned.

Shortly after they were married. Ellice has never regretted her decision, and Dr. Elliot has never ceased to be glad that she did not take him at his word.

Ellice still lectures wherever duty calls her. She still pleads for woman—pleads a nobler, higher life for her—pleads, and will not cease until her mission is accomplished.

* * * * *

I have written this story with a purpose. Readers of fashion, speculating tradesmen, thousands of dollars upon charity balls—giving alms with one hand, and grasping a paltry compensation of pleasure with the other; young girls, radiant in beauty, decked in exquisite fabrics, and adorned with priceless gems; mothers, training your children for fashionable dissipation, their marriage or in the hypocrisies and frivolities of society, I have written this story that you may make it your own unto the weak, the despised, the suffering, and by so doing, your own souls shall be made white, your hands stained with no blood. And in you shall be made manifest His infinite love and tenderness.



PRUSSIAN SOLDIERS.

The Prussia every man is a soldier. The very boys at school are constantly drilled in military exercise, and learn their military exercise as they travel through the country. Immediately after the service they enter on the regular army, they are drafted into the Landwehr—troops liable to be called upon at any emergency, but not, as in regular service, to active service. Those in the Landwehr, scattered all over the country, engaged in every imaginable occupation, have their names and arms with which to recruit the gaps in her victorious army. Then there is also a force only of cavalry of more than the Landwehr Cuirassiers; not a finer body of soldiers than the infantry of the guard. The brasses are guarded from every dimness, and give a grand effect in a military spectacle. They wear shakos, red epaulettes, and white, greasy trousers which tell tanning, and white cartridge belts. Their arms are heavy cavalry sabres and pistols. Their horses are fine, large horses look well, and are plainly caparisoned. The infantry all have blue uniforms. The men carry needle-guns, and are of the finest bearded race. Among the unmanageable offices have a knapsack, like the men, but lighter, of brown leather. The landwehr regiments have no brass bands, their music consisting only of fifes and drums. The artillery have bands. The guns are each drawn by six horses, and both carriages and horses are very large. The sanitary corps also wear helmets, and in the field have a distinguishing armlet. Other regiments have their carriages, including themselves the number of which is not known. The train is a large body of men, and is in good military order, as their figures. The majority are men over thirty. The officers are gentlemanly in their behavior and manner, and hitherto been courteous and good.

We sometimes hear the Prussians described as cirtsersoldiers; it would be far better to describe them as soldier-citizens. The agreement in dress and equipment is a vast difference in all essential points between the armies of Austria and Prussia. In Austria the army is distinct from the people, and pains have always been taken to keep it on the line of demarcation between the soldier and civilian; in Prussia the soldiers are the people. Other armies, which have already effected such terrible execution among the Austrians, were not known to the Prussians. The Minie rifle quarry is in Austria might, if she had possessed them, have averted issacus. Now it is all too late.

DRESS AND MEANT.—Girard, the famous French painter of early years, was the bearer of a letter of introduction to Lonjulais, then of the council of Napoleon. The young painter was shabbily attired, and his reception was extremely cold; but Lonjulais discovered in him such striking proofs of talent, good sense, and sensibility, that on Girard's rising to take leave, he rose, too, and accompanied his visitor to the ante-chamber. The change was so striking that Girard could not avoid an expression of surprise.

"My young friend," said Lonjulais, "we require an unknown person according to his dress—we take leave of him according to his merit."

TWO CHARACTERS.

Are there! for this, too, life's toil is over;
His words are all said out, his deeds are done:
For this man, too, there comes a rest, however
Unquiet passed his time beneath the sun.

You said what seemed you best: your life's poor fountain
Just bubbled, whilst his scared or shuddered flowed;
You child him as a tired boy chides a mountain;
You frowned on him, and thought God too much frowns,

His worst thought was so great, your best so little.
Your best and worst not yours, his all his own:
You ran the world's safe way; he dared to thwart it;
You stood with thousands by you, he alone.

Wherefore, when God shall judge the world, take it
He will not meet this man by rule and line,
Who felt no common thirst, nor feared to slake it
From that which flowed within him, the Divine.

Or think you God loves our tame leveled acres
More than the proud head of some heaven-kissed hill;
Man's straight-dug ditch more than his own free river
That wanders, He regarding, where it will?

Enough—high words shake no jot or tittle
Of what, while man still lasts, shall still be true:
Heaven's great one must be slandered by Earth's little,
And God makes no ado.

Madeline's Marriage;

THE STEPDAUGHTER.

CHAP. XI.—THE RACK.

MISS VERRELL said to some guests who called on her during the evening of the day when Cyril St. Helens dined with her, and afterward appeared so inexpressibly at Ease, that if St. Helliers had not gone abroad for the love of his father's wife, it was quite evident that he had come back for that.

"And the Jeune modèle?" inquired the guest.

"The qualification does not apply."

"Pray, I forget. Have I nothing changeable about Miss Verrell, she affects the statuesque —doesn't she?"

"Don't ask me," exclaimed la belle Lotte, in a venomous voice, with a languid gesture. "I've never understood her. She has played the prude for three years, spending her mornings dead to the dutiful to the old imbecile she married for his money, and her evenings talking metaphysics with an old saint. Now, I suppose——" The young lady paused demurely.

"Well, what now?"

"Oh! still waters, you know. I've always noticed that where these quiet people are gossiped-about——"

"There's something in it, eh?"

"Je ne sais," with a significant shrug.

"And you think she's been in love with him all this while! Quite heroic in him to take himself out of the way."

"The heroic is his style."

"Do you think they correspond?"

"No," —pausing with some embarrassment. "I know they did not."

"Yes."

"Well, about he money? She'll be disappointed about that, won't she?"

He settled ten thousand dollars upon her before they were married. She has not understood making some changes in his will—but you know he's been in this queer state since the very hour his connection with Madeline ended, of course, if he never recovers, she'll get no more."

"Very strange about him, isn't it?" said Miss Verrell's friend, looking shrewdly into her face.

"Very," dropping her eyelids.

"Does Dr. Jarvis attend him?"

"He has been a few times, I believe; but the presence of any stranger seems to excite Mr. St. Helens and he is almost insane, raving and going on——"

"It is quiet, generally?"

"Yes, perfectly—so they say."

"Have you ever spoken to Dr. Jarvis? he is your physician—isn't he?"

"Pah! not often. He said he felt that Henri St. Helens's old friends owed him a duty."

"And the doctor said——"

"Though it would pain me to speak of them, I would pay any attention to his suggestions."

"Strange, now—isn't it? It wouldn't seem so strange, if you were not so handsome. On the contrary, as far as the property is concerned——"

Miss Verrell dropped her brilliant eyes into her companion's with a look of unutterable contrition—a meaning which a young lady could not possibly put into words.

"But what a horrible thought! You do not—?"

"Je ne sais," moving off, with another shrug.

* * * *

Madeline had gone during that same evening to her husband's room. It was very seldom that she went there at that hour, but it seemed that night that nothing else would help her to the end she sought. She had struggled back to life and recollection alone; writhing with self-accusations and with unmerited remorse, she had paced the floor, burying herself, with will, sobbing excitement in the depths of the fauteuil, from which she had listened to those words, trying passionately to forget their sweetness, to blot from her heart and her imagery of bliss they had left there. Crushing the sting all the while deeper and deeper into her consciousness with the idea that she was removing it for ever, she had gone to her husband. She sat down beside him, taking his little withered hand in her own—firm and rosy; and gazing into his pale, unconscious face with a pitying tenderness. Remembering the kind little gentleman who had given her the gold pieces, who had stroked and kissed as she cried to him that summer morning, who had defended and protected and married her, out of very pity for her helplessness—remembering a faint, fading smile what she had been, and what she was—even exaggerating her improvement for sheer gratitude, as she watched the little sick hand she held.

"You are not well, to-night, Mrs. St. Helens?" Simon said, watching her face in his wary way.

"Yes—quite well," turning from him.

"Shall you sit with Mr. Henri for a half hour or so, madam?"

"Yes."

"I will return in that time," leaving her, with a salutation.

It was a relief to Madeline to have him go. She sat down on the bedside, smoothing the sick man's thin hair with a little, pathetic smile on her face as he unclosed his eyes and seemed to know her. With the purest, fondest impulse of gratitude she had, in her self-upbraiding even to tenderifying what she owed him, she pressed her lips to his forehead.

"Never mind," she murmured, passionately, as though to strengthen and assure herself.

"Why, Miss Sedlow——" Mr. St. Helens's eyes looked dreamily into those of his young wife.

"Yes, sir—it is Madeline," she answered, in a cheerful voice.

"Why it seems—it seems," he said, making some effort, "as if I had not seen you in a great while before."

"I come every day, sir," she said, "to see you."

"Yes—yes," he answered, thoughtfully; while the girl kept on, soothing him with her little caressing manner.

"You are a good child, Madeline."

The hot tears sprang to her eyes.

"Oh, no," she cried; "but I shall try," and the tears rained down her face.

He did not appear to notice the agitation. He said:

"Tell Cyril——" and then paused.

He was perfectly rational, she knew. Her poor heart fluttered wildly at the thought, but she composed herself and bent still closer to listen, for his voice was very faint.

"That I should be better," he went on, collectedly, "that no one should know about her birth."

"Yes, sir, I will tell him."

"You will not forget?"

"Oh, no sir!"

"You tell Cyril?" Mr. St. Hellens looked at her suspiciously, with the curious instinct of mental disorder which detects something withheld—feeling for something in that instant for which others would call sincere. This was horrible! It seemed to Madeline that in the great strain which she put upon that instant for control, that some of the fine springs of youth and impulse withered—died in her heart, within herself, the whirr of the recoil with which these links gave way—in that " misty mid-region" where they could not sense. It is hard to tell how she contrived to say:

"Oh, yes, sir. Cyril was here to-night."

The thought of suspicion, of fear, were—disappeared from Mr. St. Hellens's face. He was wandering again.

"Do you think that the young man ever took the view?" he asked. He was rational enough to perceive that she did not understand him.

"To the opening of the will, sir, he said," he explained, in his old tone of impatience.

"Oh, yes, I remember—Mr. Hylder" —he replied. And you think he would not like one of those views, sir?' she asked, idly, little thinking to hear them, at that moment, how should she think?

"You see"—her husband went on, his voice, calling a habit to his aid, "I don't know that it not matter about her birth;" he threw, as he spoke, the same suspicious look around the room as he had cast in Madeline's face.

"Simon is not here," she said, with understanding but he might need him. But the sick man's look of relief did not change from his face. With a kind of inspiration she seized upon the thought and, through that, evidently, that idea which he intended was accomplished—that the provision which would so soon have been legally accomplished—transferring the estate to Cyril—the Jesuit's Order of X—— to the lost daughter and his love, were now fulfilled. Madeline annulled his volition and dimmed his mind—had really been elected, and Madeline was alarmed at the responsibility thus cast upon her. She knew not whether to risk exciting him by telling him the truth, now that he was in a condition to comprehend it, or to pass by the opportunity which might enable him to achieve the dearest desire of his heart, lest harm should come to his health.

Still grasping the hand she held, she looked wistfully into his face, as if for advice.

"Mr. St. Helens," she said, on a sudden impulse, "your will was never changed? You have left Ida nothing?"

He looked wildly into her face a moment, and snatching his hand from her, pressed it to his head.

"I—I—will—attend to it," he stammered, with a frantic effort to raise himself from the bed.

Madeline was greatly alarmed. She sought to soothe him and soothe him.

"It will bring you everything," she exclaimed; "you are weak—you must be still," and she tried to detain him, letting the weight of her hands fall on his shoulders.

He threw her off, angrily, with sudden strength, half raised himself from the bed, and with a sharp, choking cry, a fierce, electric contortion, fell back rigid and paralyzed.

"I have murdered him!"

Madeline was terrified at her own work. She shrieked, and in a moment Simon had reached the room.

He went quietly to work, while Madeline watched him with powerless anxiety. Unlocking the liquor-case, he poured a portion into the cup and forced it between his master's lips, lifted him into an easy position, till shortly, while they watched, the stagnant blood colored his lips faintly, and life returned.

"He has suffered a partial paralysis," said Simon, quietly, "but I trust, with care, successful, Mrs. St. Hellens, as a nurse," with a respectful smile, which might have seen a sneer.

Madeline left her husband's chamber and went to her own room. Late into the night she was still awake, and thinking. And most troublous of all her thoughts was, that she was charged with a message to Cyril. Why had the necessity of their future meeting been imposed upon her? She would not, however, so glad—oh, yes, so very glad—to have been spared the torture of seeing him again!

Poor little heart, which didn't yet know that the torture would go on all the same, with presence or absence!

CHAP. XII.—THE REVISION.

SEVERAL weeks passed in a lingering, weary way to Madeline St. Hellens. She woke every morning with a feverish start and asked herself, "Ah, me! what is it?" Consciousness regained the sense of oppression. A sudden, frightened stare around the room assured her it was empty, and yet she could never turn that she was watched by motions—voices—breathings.

Cyril had obeyed her. She had not heard from or seen him since that eventful night.

She said to herself that he was very good to spare her the pain of another interview—that it was very noble in him not to come, and yet—and yet?——

The recollection of the message with which her husband had entrusted her, worried her. As far as she knew there was no occasion for its immediate delivery, and yet it was a thing to be over with, and thought if she could see Cyril but long enough to repeat it, she would feel easier. Just long enough to say it, once more—Ida, not for the world, more!

She was ignorant whether Simon had communicated to him the news of his father's paralysis, or no. She presumed that he had. For aught she knew, Simon might have visited the invalid daily. At all events, through Simon, Dr. Jarves, some one, it was probable he kept himself informed of Mr. St. Helens's condition.

She dwelt upon the subject till she grew nervous and wan; and then wondered what ailed her.

Every day at 12 she went down to Lotte Verrell's with a vague hope of—she scarcely knew what! It was the hope of hearing some mention made of Cyril, of learning indirectly of his movies, she was disappointed. The honeyed spirit under the sugar-coat distilled itself over every imaginable topic but the one which hung so heavily on Madeline's heart.

The season of Lent, or Passion-Lent, terminating the winter's gayeties. Mrs. St. Hellens was seen then every morning at church, looking "as happy as the day is long" people said, "as though she had been dissipating instead of moping at Dear ever since Christmas." Through her veil she searched the faces of the congregation. There was Gordon, Antone, plenty whom she knew—for piety was the fashion for forty days—never Cyril. She knew that he would Madeline here than to think of herself that she looked for him—but she always looked for him, and was disappointed.

At Mi-Carême there was momentary relaxation of devotional austerity, and somebody or other made a masquerade ball. Madeline hardly knew why she did not decline the invitation which came for her. She was in that condition when a word or encouragement in the monotonous has weight; when the mind, like a vine that has been beaten and tangled by the storm, clings gratefully to Love's support, be it ever so; and when the Lasselles assured her that she should certainly go, that it was time she was out of mourning, wretchedly, and certainly needed some change to brighten her, she agreed indifferently.

Since the night her husband had had the paralytic shock she had gone more frequently and informally to his room than ever before. Beside him, she reviewed her past, and recognized its pure and unselfish feelings which his stricken state, without features and powerless frame evoked to her heart's sorrow as a baptismal benediction to the tumultuous throngs of memory. She watched him with a tender slumber of unconscious painful interest; she felt that she had incurred a species of responsibility—as though she were not into the chance of bearing witness to some other legacy of rational words which the man to whom she owed so much might bequeath. And in her mournful condition she yielded meant to her old suspicions of Simon, and lingered around, as though in a helpless, undefined way, to watch him.

Quite late, therefore, on the afternoon preceding the soiree, she left her husband's room and went for a short walk about the grounds, previous to dressing for the evening.

Her thoughts troubled her. She felt that her condition was unnatural; that the collisions of duty and instinct, and the harsh subordination of the last to the first, were shattering her health and defrauding her of her beauty. She was young without youth. She had missed the worth of loving in the sweetness of loving; she was to be together useless, aimless, hopeless in the world.

It trembled her to think so, though she could not help it. She had no one to reproach; nothing to find fault with. On the contrary, her life had been made strangely easy to her, and whatever reaction of spirits she experienced, her sense of utter, unbounded gratitude to her husband never swerved. As she loitered along, her thoughts went back to the sick room, recalling every little detail—the invalid's worn, gray face, his sharp-cened features, the appointments of the chamber, the closed door communicating with it; all the luxurious appliances of wealth for ease and pleasure; the glasses in the frosted silver frames, the deep fauteuils, the cut-glass bottles of rare aromas, and then the unassuming way, going back to the lines in Mr. St. Hellens's face.

Madeline had never seen death, but suddenly as she walked on among the shadows, thinking, it occurred to her that her husband would die! and the thought, for some reason, she had never considered this fact before. Having accepted his invalidism with her marriage, she had never inquired whether one would endure beyond the other, regarding, in her calculations concerning life, both as permanent.

Now the conclusion came with a shock: He would die—and she would be free!

Involuntarily she pressed her hands to her ears as if to shut out some evil monition, with a stunning, overwhelming sense of guilt, a frightful self-condemnation!

Mechanically, with burning cheeks, she glanced around, as though to see there was no one there to recognize her secret, and as she did so, a voice, in a suppressed tone, said, softly :

"Madeline."

She was not with a start. She was just in the frame that believes in the supernatural and trembles at all, and turned to fly toward the house, when Cyril stepped across her path. His eyes were blood-shot—his cheeks sunken :

"Are you afraid of me?" he asked, with a mocking laugh.

"Oh, Cyril, why do 'you come here?" she gasped, feeling that he had read her thought in her heart, and feeling that his words and looks were taunts.

"Because I must see you!" he answered, grimly.

"You cannot. It is impossible." She forgot that she had watched for him—longed for him. The only object was to get out of the sphere of his influence—to save him from the knowledge of her thoughts.

"I must, Madeline, for a moment. Stop!" he commanded, as she tried to pass him.

"Not for an instant," she faltered. "I must not stay. I cannot listen."

"That is well! If you do not stop here, I will follow you to the house."

She put her hands out, warding him off, with a look of imploring earnestness in her eyes, such passionate beseeching in her pale face—which had changed so since he had seen it last—that Cyril paused, and she disappeared like a phantom through the misty evening and the shadowy trees.

* * * *

An hour or two later, Madeline sat before her mirror, with Rebo fastening a gilt butterfly in her hair, to match those which were sprinkled over the black lace dress.

Nothing but that faint blue veins in her temples showed the pain which had been there. Rebo flitted around her with a sober, anxious interest, which she did not notice. Her intense absorption in herself made the fashioning of the floating cloud color—the variableness of emotion, and left the chiseled outline, like an abstraction, or a creation without a soul.

The concert-room seemed small and hot. Some professional musicians were engaged, to assure success. Their overture were performed, then from "Soumambula," marches from Tannhauser, a Scotch ballad, thundering and crashing by turns, a sickening mingling of heliotrope and frangipani, and breaths and smiles, in the crowded room.

Mrs. St. Hellens, having got in, was trying to get out. Suddenly she stopped.

Cyril was standing, with a lady on his arm. He had not observed her; he was listening to his companion, with his face lit with a very peculiarly beautiful smile.

The lady was young; glittering with a wild, redhanded beauty. Eyes, that threw a diamond-like flash; hair, full, fuschia-colored lips, and a stain like a pomegranate's petal on her cheeks. She was very young, in some respects, but was seasoned fabrics; large, voluptuous in her make, using her round, bare arm showily, as she moved her fingers in her fan. A dark, regal creature, altogether, the kind of woman who sways the Caesars and the Anthonys. Cyril was laughing, a low, musical laugh that she could not hear through herself; her lips parted an instant over a dazzle of little white teeth, and then she went on talking.

Madeline's unconscious things, it was easy to see, from her manner.

Madeline saw it, and faint as she watched them. But it was no longer the heat and perfumes of the room that she minded. She fell back into the nearest recess, keeping her eyes fixed on Cyril and the lady. Unlike the others who were standing, she did not drop his arm, and her breeding was curiously uncertain, for she was never still, no matter how softly the music played.

"Who in the world has St. Helens brought here?" a loud voice said one in a party crushing by, and carrying whole flights of butterflies from Madeline's dress with them, as she tried to keep her place.

"Some new love, I expect," was the reply.

"He was driving with her, after his new team, this morning."

"Possible! Quite an Indian queen, isn't she?" and the talkers squeezed themselves out of sight and hearing.

The loud throbbings of Madeline's heart died wholly, she thought, with her shame and her anguish, yet she kept her consciousness.

Guilty, miserable creature that she was, she had dared to—love him! to remember the words she had never the right to hear, to feed upon the precious poisons of remembrance, and to think the wicked thought which had come that night, because the man had trifled with her a moment—had yielded to an effusion of admiration of her beauty, and had presumed to utter it.

She might have known; she had heard all they said of him before he returned from abroad—that he was an epicure in beauty an empiric in conquests; tha he had laid siege to the heart of every woman he met who was beautiful enough to tempt him, and immolated his scores of victims to his insatiate vanity.

She had heard all this, and had not resisted him. Oh, shame! And worse than all was the recollection of his appearance in the garden that evening. He had come, no doubt, to let her understand that her ridiculous prohibition of his presence was a mockery; that she was nothing to him; that their mutual relation in no way forbade his frequenting his father's house. And she? She had shown him that she dare not meet him. No betrayal, however, of these whirling thoughts disturbed her fixed expression. Acquaintances went and came, the muscians played on, some one took her to supper, one and another dropped away, the crowd lessened, the air grew less stifling, and Mrs. St. Hellens stood near the piano with Mr. Antone, when she saw Cyril approaching her. He was laughing and talking still with his Indian queen; he had not left her through the whole evening. Across the crowd once he had bowed to Madeline, no more.

Just then, however, meeting some stray friend, he introduced him to his companion, and pursued his way alone.

"Mrs. St. Hellens," he said, in an emotionless tone, "I wish to speak to you a moment."

To deny him, then, there, was impossible. Besides—but she could not talk to him till she had more strength. He was merciless.

She bowed in apology to Antone, and stepped a little apart.

"I am very anxious," said Cyril, excitedly, "to explain—to introduce you——"

Ugh! She shuddered. No, no! What was he thinking of? To exhibit her shame and torture there? She broke in upon his words, recklessly:

"I have been very impatient to see you. Your father, before his attack, was perfectly rational, and entrusted me with a message to you about Miss Carstarpherd."

Cyril started.

"He said," Madeline went on, rapidly, "that it would be his wish that the circumstances of her birth should be concealed." Her low, inflexible voice never varied. "Good night!" she added, and moved away.

"A moment—a word!" said Cyril, following her, in an agitated way. "Heavens! Do not go—I must see you." She stood on the threshold of the dressing-room. "I tell you it is necessary."

"You must wait," gasping as she tried to smile, but he did not notice it.

"I shall come to you, then, to-morrow," he muttered between his teeth.

She inclined her head slightly. What was there to keep him away if he chose to come? She cared for nothing but to get away from him to-night.

TIME ENOUGH.

"Good morning, Sykes! Like myself, I suppose you are putting the good old saying into practice, and making your hay while the sun shines?"

"Oh, yes, all in good time, neighbor Harvey; there's no hurry for some days yet," replied Sykes.

"Well, I don't agree with you there, for we have had a long spell of fine weather, and we can't expect it to last much longer. I am drawing home the last of my hay to-day, and as well as I can judge by the appearance of the sky, it will not be ricked much too soon."

"You are always fidgety and restless," said Sykes, laughing; "you'll see that my hay will be quite as good as yours, though I don't worry myself about it as you do. There's time enough and to spare, before the weather changes."

"I hope it may prove so, Sykes, but I have my doubts, and it would be a pity you should lose such a fine crop as the meadow down by the burnside promises to give you, by delaying until the rain comes. When business has to be transacted, I like to do it, and then 'tis done. I wish you would do the same."

"What a croaker you are, Harvey! There's no fear of my losing the crop. I shall begin to draw it home to-morrow."

"If I don't mistake," said Harvey, "it is scarcely dry enough to bring home; for, as I passed the field yesterday evening, I remarked that what was cut looked too green for stacking, and one-third of the meadow was even then uncut."

"Then what would you have me do? If, as you say, the weather is likely to change, would you have me leave it out to be destroyed?" said Sykes, testily, "for I must do one thing or the other."

"There is no occasion for you to be cross," answered Harvey, "but I will say it is a pity you do not make a practice of managing your business in better time. With so good a farm, and a houseful of strong young lads and lasses, you ought to be one of the richest farmers in the country."

Sykes's sunburnt face took a still deeper tint, for he felt the truth of Harvey's observation, and knew that to his own ruinous habit of procrastination he might attribute the discomfort of his home, and the difficulties that lately appeared to gather round him.

He had succeeded his father in the possession of a large, and, with good management, a lucrative farm, but unfortunately for himself and those connected with him, he did not inherit the valuable qualities of energy and forethought by which his father had worked himself up from a common laborer to one of the most comfortable farmers in the neighborhood.

He married a pretty gentle girl to whom he had been attached for some time, and who looked upon him as the type of perfection. Better far had it been for him had he chosen one of those women whose matter-of-fact common sense would have given a spur to his supineness. And she, that gentle, yielding girl, would have been a treasure to an energetic, hard-working man, who, by his own example of manly labor, would have corrected the indolence and timidity of her character. But such was not to be. Too soon she fell into the habit of "putting-off" the duties that devolve upon a wife and mistress of a family, following the example of him whom she considered could do no wrong. Who can tell where this system, once commenced, will end?

Besides his excellent farm, Sykes had inherited a considerable sum of ready money, so, for a short time, all went on (apparently) well.

But why?

Because the young couple lived on their principal, and took no thought for the morrow.

Yet the time came when there was no ready cash on which to fall back, though a young family brought additional expenses. Still the husband and wife felt no alarm for the future; they knew they had an excellent farm, and there was "time enough" to make it available for all their requirements.

But Sykes was always the latest in putting in and in sowing his crops, consequently his losses were serious, and the evil of procrastination spread like a fatal epidemic through his lovely young family, for the wife and mother, soft and weakly compliant, had no energy by which she might counteract the steady indolence of her husband's character. The children naturally followed the example of their parents, and the ill-regulated, disorderly home could only be equaled by the unneat, neglected state of the farm.

No business of house or farm was ever performed at the right time; the consequence was that nothing was well done, and as years passed, the once flourishing homestead became a by-word and a source of ridicule in the neighborhood. Farmer Sykes's corn was generally left uncut until it had shed its seed, his potatoes remained in the ground until after Christmas, and if any of his acquaintances remarked on the eccentricity of this system, his reply was ever, "No need of hurry; there's time enough."

However, latterly, Sykes began himself to see that if he would stop short of perfect ruin, more exertion and regularity must be observed, for he was in arrear with his rent, and there were various other debts, which, though small at first, and might have been easily paid off, yet, from being neglected, became of serious magnitude.

After his interview with Harvey, he went to the meadow of which they had been speaking, and saw that his friend's warning was not without reason, for, should the weather change, of which, as he gazed upon the threatening clouds he could not but acknowledge there was every likelihood, there would be no possibility of preserving the hay.

In an unwonted fit of energy he returned to his house, and calling lustily to his sons, bade them go at once to the meadow to mow the grass still standing and turn that already cut. "And you, too, girls," he said to the daughters, "go off to the field and stir yourselves."

The young people looked at him in amazement.

"Why, what's wrong now, father?" said John, who was diligently smoking his pipe and watching the clouds of fume produced by his efforts; "what's all the hurry about?"

"The hurry is, that we shall lose the crop if we don't look sharp, for we are very likely to have wet weather," replied his father.

"Oh, there's no fear of that; there's time enough and to spare," answered John.

"Time or no time, you just do as you're bid, every one of you. There, James, leave off teaching that dog your monkey tricks, and, John, put that pipe out of your mouth, and be off as fast as you can. Wife, why don't you make the girls get ready to assist, instead of standing there staring at me as if I were a wild animal?"

"Well, my dear," replied his wife, "you seem in such an unusual hurry, that it quite takes away my breath, and I suppose the girls don't know what to make of it—but they shall get ready directly."

But this was more easily promised than performed. Much time was lost before the implements for hay-making could be collected, for nothing was in its place, and there was no place for anything.

When the young people were fairly set to work they performed their task vigorously and good-humoredly, and as Sykes looked on their handsome faces, flushed with excitement and exercise, he regretted that he had not, like Harvey, brought up his children to industry and regular habits by setting them the example in his own person. How different might then have been his home and prospects to what they now were! But the seed of idleness and procastination had been sown by his own hand, and it bore fruit abundantly.

The hay was cut and drawn home in haste, for the weather did indeed change, and those who had not taken advantage of the many weeks of sunshine vainly regretted their neglect. A short time after Sykes had made up his haystack, he remarked one morning that there seemed a slight vapor issuing from it, and mentioned the circumstance to his sons, who accompanied him to the farm-yard, but did not see any cause for anxiety. "The hay would be all right," they said, "after a while; it was only the outside that had got damp, and there was time enough to see to it after the corn was cut, for it was over-ripe."

Too true! The corn was over-ripe, nor was the half of the crop saved. And still the debts went on increasing, the creditors becoming clamorous, and the indulgent landlord gave notice that Sykes must no longer depend upon his clemency, as he should insist on the arrears of rent being paid up, or ejectment would be served. All these clouds of adversity were unheeded by his two sons and daughters, and vainly did their father urge them to exertion, now at the eleventh hour he was awaking to the consciousness of the disastrous effects of his supineness. On all sides his remonstrances were met by his own favorite maxim, "Where's the hurry? there's time enough. All will come straight in the end, when we sell the hay and crops." But before the crops were ready for the market the prices had fallen, and the family were aroused one morning at six o'clock by a loud knocking at the door, and farmer Harvey's voice vehemently calling out to them to rise.

"Why, what's in the wind now, Harvey?" said Sykes, opening his window, and little pleased at being disturbed; "one would think the house was on fire, you are making such a fuss."

"Though the house is not on fire your haystack will be very soon, if you and your sons are not smart, for it is smoking away like a steam-engine," returned Harvey.

Sykes and the young men hastened to the farm-yard and found the stack as Harvey had described; the hay, from not being properly saved, was put up damp, which caused it to heat, and rendered it totally unfit for food or sale.

While they were still engaged in the farm-yard, William Sykes, the second eldest son, arrived on one of his unexpected visits to his family. While still a child, he had been adopted by a distant relative of his father's, who, having no children of his own, took a fancy to the lad, and succeeded in prevailing on the parents to part with him. The training he received from Mr. Jones was the reverse of that which was bringing destruction on his father and family. When duty or business was to be attended to, no excuses were allowed—no putting off until to-morrow what ought to be done to-day. Mr. Jones's watchword was, "Do it, and it will be done." And thus was William saved from a participation in the family fault.

It was more than a year since his last visit, during which he had endeavored to impress the necessity of business habits among the household. It grieved him to see the whole family such a prey to indolence; but his representations were useless, and the destruction and confusion to which he was now a witness did not surprise him—he had foreseen how his father's affairs must end.

William's errand home was principally to inform his family of his intended marriage with Mr. Jones's niece, and to request that one of his sisters would act as bridesmaid to the young girl.

"You are a lucky man," said his brother, "to win the prettiest and the richest girl in the country."

"And you may add," replied William, "the most amiable, and the best housekeeper."

"Why, John," exclaimed his father, "I thought you were looking after Letty Jones, and that she seemed to like you pretty well. How comes it that you have let William take her from you?"

John's countenance darkened, but William, placing his hand kindly on his shoulder, said, "John, we must not let a shadow come between the affection brothers should bear to each other; therefore, though it may pain you, I will tell you how this has come about. From the time I was a lad I always loved Letty, but I thought it was as I should love my sister, until the time you came to Mr. Jones's for a few weeks; and it was by seeing you were so taken with her, and that she seemed to be more pleased with you than me, that I found by the sorrow this gave me that my love for her was very different to that for a sister; so I determined to hide my own disappointment, and to look on her only as your future wife. But from all I could learn, you never asked her to be your wife, and both she and your uncle believed you had not serious thoughts about her."

"I had, I had!" exclaimed John, impetuously; "I fully intended to marry Letty, but I thought there was time enough to ask her."

"Time enough!" repeated William; "when more than two years passed without any decision on your part."

"That's one way of wooing a pretty girl," said Sykes, laughing, "but not the right way, I fancy."

"Well, father," said John, "have you not, from the time I can remember, always put off everything from day to day, from week to week, and told us all to take matters easy, for there was 'time enough'? and I only followed your precept and practice in not asking Letty, when, perhaps, she would have taken me. So you have no right to laugh at me, whoever else may. The loss is mine, and I may thank you for it;" and John was turning to leave the room, but William detained him.

"Do not go away, John, until I have quite convinced you that until I was certain that, under any circumstances, Letty would never be yours, I concealed from her, and, as I fancied, from every one else, the love that lay deep in my inmost heart. But Mr. Jones was not deceived by my attempt to appear indifferent, and a few months ago he suddenly taxed me with my affection for his niece, and asked me did I mean to follow the example of my brother and my family, by allowing happiness and prosperity to slip away from me, in supposing there was time enough, though time was gliding on? I could not deny my love; but said that I would never attempt to rival my own brother with Letty, nor try to withdraw from him the love which I believed she had given to him. 'You are mistaken altogether,' replied Mr. Jones. 'It is true Letty did once look favorably on John, and had he asked her in a reasonable time, she would have been his wife, with my full consent; but his delay in doing so gave me opportunity for reflection and minute inquiries, by which means I discovered the family failing of procrastination, which has become a proverb in the country; and most thankful was I that John's practice of the proverb gave me the opportunity of saving her from a life of anxiety and discomfort, which could not fail to be her fate if she had married one whose principles and habits were so opposed to those in which she had been fostered: to the maxim which I have all my life practiced, as far as circumstances would permit, 'Do it, and it will be done.' My attention was lately drawn toward you by observing your restless unhappiness, and your stolen glances of love and sorrow at my Letty. With intention on my part, I also directed Letty's observation to the same fact, and I can give you the assurance that any preference for John, which might under cultivation have become strong, has died away, root and branch; and that were he now to offer himself and the three best farms in the country for her acceptance, he would be rejected. If you choose to adhere to the family adage, and fancy there will be 'time enough' for your wooing, you can do so, and lose as sweet a girl as ever the sun shone on. I say no more, but there she is,' and he pointed to the pretty shrubbery walk, into which she was at that moment disappearing. John, my heart was bursting with fond, repressed love—repressed from a sense of duty to you, but could I on such encouragement resist the desire to know if indeed her heart was free? Yet, believe me, had I in the interview to which I hastened discovered the slightest hope for you, that love, which had 'grown with my growth,' should have still lain silently in my heart. Such was not the case, dear John. A few minutes in that shady walk sufficed to assure me that my silent devotion had met a return, though she candidly confessed her first choice might have been different, had you spoken in time."

With a pale face, John extended his hand to William:

"I did love her," he said, "but I see you have acted honorably. I have only myself to blame; and I will learn to look on Letty as my sister before I see her again. God bless you both," and with hasty steps he left the room.

The marriage took place in due time, Mary Sykes acting as bridesmaid, and feeling much astonished at the regularity and comfort in which Mr. Jones's house was conducted, though there was no assistance in domestic matters but a young girl about fourteen, who acted under Letty's direction. Yet all went on with comfort and regularity; there was no putting off a duty from hour to hour, or day to day. On the least symptom of a desire for procrastination, Mr. Jones's firm tone or Letty's gentle voice would repeat their favorite maxim, "Do it, and it will be done." The contrast it presented to her own ill-regulated home was painful, but useful to her in after life, as she avoided those rocks on which her family was shipwrecked—for such was the result of their indolence. Kindly as their landlord was disposed toward them, he could give no further time for the long arrears of rent due, but took the farm into his own hands, giving Sykes and his wife a small cottage and a couple of acres rent free, and receiving the young men, John and James, as day-laborers, one of the girls being obliged to go to service.

After Mary's visit to her brother and his bride, she returned to her father's now very small cottage, bringing with her the experience of a few months, which her good feelings and good sense rendered invaluable to herself and her parents. And now, after eighteen months' residence in their new abode, where as farmer Sykes said, "they had retired to starve," there was more comfort than they had known while possessed of so much more valuable holdings. No doubt there were days when the preparation of a mid-day meal was a matter of trouble and perplexity to Mrs. Sykes.

"What shall we do, Mary?" she would say. "Your father now rises so early, and works so hard, that he ought to have something nourishing for his dinner, and there is nothing for him but a bit of cold meat left from yesterday."

"Do not be uneasy, mother," replied Mary; "you will see I will have so nice a dinner from that bit of meat, that father will say we are growing extravagant, and you, dear mother, will, I hope, be tempted to eat more heartily than usual."

"I don't see how all this is to be done," said Mrs. Sykes, "unless the days of miracles should return."

"Though those days may not return," answered Mary, "yet the days of good but economical cookery have commenced. Only watch me, mother, and you will see what a savory dish will spring up from this little bit of cold meat."

"Would you not like to add a slice from the three-legged stool?" replied her mother, half provoked at Mary's confidence in her culinary powers.

"Well, dear mother," said Mary, laughing, "I promise you that if I fail, I will try my powers on a joint of the 'article' you so strongly recommend; but in the meantime I must commence my preparations, or there will not be 'time enough.'"

"Oh, those dreadful words!" said her mother, shuddering. "Never, never speak them; they have been the pass-words to our ruin."

"No, dear mother," said Mary, putting her loving arms around her, "not our ruin, but their failure has led us to adopt and act on a better maxim, 'Do it, and it will be done.' And as I must put this maxim into practice, or father will go without his dinner, I shall now only wait to give you this one fond kiss before commencing my wonderful powers of transformation." And so taking the bone of a leg of mutton, with but very little meat on it, she chopped it in three pieces, put it in a saucepan with a quart of boiling water, added three large onions with three cloves stuck in them, some thinly-sliced carrots, and a teacupful of well-washed rice, a little salt and pepper; and all these things she stewed for three hours, then browning it with a little burnt sugar, stirred into the boiling soup. To her great delight, her mother partook heartily of it, and declared that the three-legged stool would certainly afford a future repast under Mary's treatment.

It is to be regretted that bad habits formed in childhood and youth are seldom altogether overcome, and thus in a degree it proved with John and James Sykes. They passed through life always struggling with deficient means, for they never acted at the right time. Too late did farmer Sykes see the sad effects of his own example in his sons, while the contrast that William's prosperity presented increased his self-reproach.

Mary never married, but remained with her parents, and was their comfort and solace to the last. On their death she resided with her sister, who had married one of Mr. Harvey's sons. She proved a treasure in their household by her cheerful temperament and practical good sense; and whenever she discovered a desire of procrastination in her young nephews and nieces, "Aunt Mary" was sure to have some little tale to relate, which would have the effect of exposing the ill consequences of acting on the too common expression, "Time enough."

REAPPEARANCE OF A DEAD WIFE.

It is not so very long since the belief in witches and ghosts and supernatural appearances was quite current in all classes of society, and legends founded on that belief still obtain a certain degree of assent. The illustration on this page is drawn from one of those old legends that date back to the superstitions of a past generation, and are now curious as showing how easily the wildest improbabilities were interwoven in the history of the times. A gentleman of Edinburgh, by some accident, dropped a heavy weight upon his wife's foot, crushing it so severely that mortification ensued, resulting in her death. When the pain subsided, and she supposed she was recovering, instead of dying, she said playfully to her husband, "I was thinking, while suffering so severely, that if I died I would, in my disembodied spirit, appear to you during the nights of your watchfulness, and if you allowed my body to be stolen from the grave, would scowl upon you just as owls used to do in the old houses."

Shortly after she died, and he, feeling that he was indirectly the cause of her death, reproached himself so severely that he could not rest. One morning, while lying in bed, his eyes sought the window, when it seemed as if some nebulous object had come between him and the drapery. Presently the face of his deceased wife was slowly evolved from the drapery, the features gradually becoming more distinct, until he held out his hand to touch it, when the vision slowly disappeared. At another time, when he had lain down upon the sofa just at twilight, the vision repeated itself in the distinct form and features of his wife, representing as nearly as possible her appearance when she had held the playful conversation with him. At this moment the servant brought in a light and the apparition was seen no more.

JAPANESE DRESS.

EVERYTHING relating to Japan possesses an interest, from the fact that, until very recently, that country allowed no intercourse with other regions of the world. Now that the barriers have been broken down, we find in the character and habits of the Japanese much that is novel and striking and worthy of attention. In their state of semi-civilization they have made creditable advances in certain arts, and, like the Chinese, are wonderfully ingenious and imitative. The distinctions of rank are sedulously maintained, and the contrast between the higher and lower orders of society marked by unmistakable lines. On this page we give the winter style of dress in town and country, which indicates the superiority in polish and refinement of the citizen over the rustic.

THE HONOR OF THE FLAG.

THE incident presented in the accompanying illustration brings to view one of those acts of true bravery nothing but a high patriotism can inspire. It is worthy the historic days of Italy's classic pride, and shows that her race of heroes is not yet extinct. While the iron-clad frigate Re d'Italia was sinking, two Austrian officers jumped into a boat and rowed toward the stern of the frigate, in order to seize the Italian flag which was flying there. But an Italian officer had hold of it, although he could see the ship was on the point of sinking, and, after firing a revolver at the Austrians sent down, preferring to perish with the vessel rather than deliver up the flag to the enemy.

THE PRE-ADAMITE CREATION.

SCIENTIFIC men have long disputed about the age of the world and the order of its various types of life; but recent researches and discoveries have fully established the fact that the Mosaic account refers only to the later periods of the earth's history, and that long before the creation of man our globe teemed with animated life. A race of monsters roamed about, finding their homes both in the water and on the land, and leaving only their immense, unwieldy skeletons as the evidence of their existence.

Compared with them the various species with which we are familiar are mere pigmies. Of their disposition and habits we know only what we can infer from their structure, but we know enough to invest them with an intense interest and render them subjects of devoted study. Our illustration gives a sketch of some of these animals, taken from specimens in the large Museums of Europe; and while they bear a resemblance to living forms, they are generally of a lower and less fully developed order than such as now constitute the brute creation.

A DESPERATE ALTERNATIVE.

MAN is not the only enemy against which the inhabitants of the sea must guard. In fact, the deep waters are the scene of a perpetual warfare, one tribe preying upon another and the strong devouring the weak. In the grand economy of nature, it seems necessary that provide for the sustentation of the various existence, and doubtless the provision is a wise one.

Our illustration shows how danger is avoided only by meeting a greater one, and that between the two, destruction is inevitable. Such dilemmas often occur in human experience, and as suggestive of these, the picture will possess an interest above commiseration for the fate of the poor fish.

A Fearful Ride.

PETER MULLIGAN was an Irish youth, tall, compactly built, agile, handsome and brave. The County Kildare claimed him as a native, and he claimed Kate Donnelly as his betrothed. "The course of true love never yet ran smooth," says the proverb, and they were to feel its truth.

Kate was the belle of the little community in which she and her betrothed resided. Many a youth spent sleepless nights on her account, and many a damsel wept over the inconstancy of a lover who deserted her to follow in the train of the comely belle.

Upon a wood-crowned hill, just without the village, stood the ancestral mansion of the Mitchell family, inhabited at that period by the last of his race. He was a gloomy man, who received few visitors, seldom left his retreat to honor the village by his presence, and was invariably passionate and haughty to all his retainers but one.

Mulligan was employed upon the farm as an under-gardener, and Kate was one of the house-servants.

Mitchell became enamored with his fair domestic, and took no pains to conceal his infatuation. His advances were received with ill-concealed repugnance, which only stimulated in him a greater desire to possess the object of his love.

It was not long before Mulligan was made aware of the position of affairs, but though he was in a manner compelled to endure the attentions of Mitchell to his betrothed, as may be imagined, they were no more disagreeable to her than to him.

A rupture at length occurred, which was succeeded by Mulligan's dismissal, shortly afterward followed by Kate's voluntary withdrawal from Mitchell's service. Her however, ignoring his station, was so violent in his demonstrations that he succeeded to her betrothed, who, nothing loth, only awaited an opportunity to vent his hatred upon the person of his wealthy rival.

The sympathies of the people were with Mulligan, but they were powerless to protect him from the law, to escape which he fled to America, and was soon followed by Kate.

Soon after this the old mansion was closed, the servants were dismissed, and Mitchell left the country—no one knew whither; but the old dames shook their heads and prophesied no good to Mulligan and his fair betrothed.

Upon his arrival in America he sought employment, but for a long time was unsuccessful. His stock of money was small, the price of living high, and he was bewildered by the presence of Kate, to whom, upon her arrival, he was married.

Time passed on; still no work. His money was almost exhausted, his wife was prostrated by sickness, and medical attendance was scarcely to be had at any price.

At this stage, when he was almost crazed by the gloomy aspect of affairs, and concern for her whom he had sworn to protect and cherish, Mitchell appeared; his unholy passion scarcely concealed—only held subservient by a morbid desire for revenge.

They met at an intelligence office whither Mulligan had gone seeking employment; and where Mitchell, conceiving this to be the most likely place, searched for him. Mitchell addressed some insulting language to his former gardener, who could ill brook harsh words from his most intimate friends, much less from one upon whom he looked as the cause of his and his wife's present suffering.

During the desperate fight which followed, Mitchell was severely injured, and his brain affected. He disappeared, and as Mulligan heard nothing further of him, after several months, during which brighter days dawned upon him, concluded that his revengeful enemy must have returned to Ireland.

Mitchell indeed returned, but only to superintend the sale of his estate, which being accomplished, his brain disappeared, never to return.

On the passage to, and after his arrival in, America, his wild appearance was noted and freely commented upon, but as he offered violence to no one, he was not molested. His hatred and madness concentrated upon one object, and that object was Kate's husband.

Years elapsed. He wandered up and down the country, hither and thither, but obtaining no clue to the whereabouts of his successful rival; and time, instead of abating his malady, only aggravated it by his continual brooding upon that one subject, and he was gradually becoming a confirmed monomaniac, though he had sufficient sense to preserve a rational exterior.

In the meantime Mulligan was moving through the world with what was considered a fair prospect for one of his class. He was a faithful, honest workman, and though unable to obtain permanent employment at his avocation, by dint of thrift and temperate habits he raised his increasing family with a degree of comfort above that of many of his fellow-workmen.

A heavily laden train ran out of a station on an Eastern railway. The night was dark, the rain fell rapidly, the wind was blowing fresh and gusty, the flickering lamps, seen through the falling rain, looked misty and angrily, as if chilled and frightened by the universal cheerlessness.

A few yards above the station the black mouth of a tunnel yawned to swallow the bright interior and the long, heavy train. For a moment the dark opening was visible, the glowing light shining on the dripping roof, revealing the circles and angles of the riven rock glaring back on the wet roofs of the carriages; then darkness and the hollow thunder of the train, mingled with the "swash" of the water, grew fainter, then ceased, and the train was gone, dashing through the darkness, guided by its fiery eye.

The engine-driver and stoker were snugly housed, and only at long intervals looked out into the yellow glare, with its inky background.

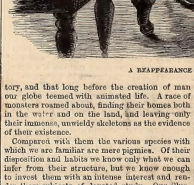
At the upper end of the tunnel stood a little cabin, occupied by the family of a track-tender, who had special charge of the tunnel.

As the time for the train drew nigh, Peter Mulligan—for the track-tender was no other than the husband of Kate—took his lights, walked through the tunnel, and everything was in order at one, and stationed himself in the centre, ready to signal "all right." The shrill "toot" of the whistle floated through the tunnel, and the ground trembled under the heavy, rolling mass.

He stood with his face toward the train, and did not notice behind him the form of a man, crouching low, stealing softly toward him, availing himself of the jutting rocks to partially conceal his movements. As the train approached, the light shone on something in his hand, which glittered and sparkled mutely as if it enjoyed the blinding glare. The thunder of the train filled the tunnel, wrapping itself around glistening, quivering rails, trembling among the ragged-edged rocks, agitating the stagnant water in the ditches at either side of the line, and endeavoring, seemingly, to lift the tons of earth and rock which arched over and confined it to the long tube.

Mulligan waved his white signal and stepped upon one side to await the passage of the train. He turned half around, and, before he saw the crouching form, the glitter of the weapon caught his eye. At the same instant the stranger bounded forward, seized him by the throat, and threw him heavily to the ground across the rails. The signal-light was wrenched from his hand and dashed upon the track, where it was shivered into a multitude of fragments.

Had the engine-driver or stoker been attending to their duty this must have been observed, for the reflector brought into full relief every feature of the tunnel, from the jagged sides to the square-headed bolts which secured the track to the ties, and it shone full upon the two men desperately struggling—one for freedom from the strangling grip upon his throat and to throw himself from the track upon which the train was approaching; the other, with his glittering weapon raised over the track-tender's head, and his large, wild eyes sparkling fearfully, to hold his antagonist down to the iron rail.



Mulligan's grew faint and his struggles weaker, but he still preserved consciousness sufficient to know that a horrible death was stalking toward him if he could not disengage himself or roll on one side. But, no! His assailant held him with the power of a madman, and it was equally impossible to do either.

The stranger bent down his frightfully pale face, and, in a sharp, piercing whisper, which Mulligan distinctly heard above the rattle and roar of the train, hissed in his ear:

"I have got you at last!"

Then the trackman knew who was his assailant, and recognized him despite his ghastly color and shrunken features.

The glittering weapon—a long, double-edged dirk—flashed as it descended, and cut a fearful gash in the shoulder of the trackman, who at that moment effected a slight change in his position. A moment more and the train was upon them.

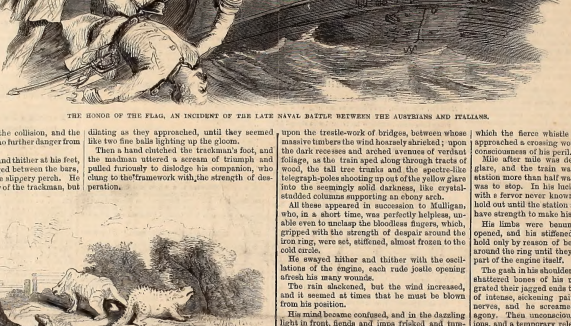
Just as the iron-pointed guard swept down upon them, Mulligan succeeded in raising his head and shoulders, made a desperate grasp at the red, slippery bars, and with his antagonist, who still retained his hold, was shot up the inclined framework and caught by the clothing on an iron hook.

One arm was broken, and hung powerless, and a sharp pain in his side admonished him of other injuries. His brain whirled in unison with the swaying, onward motion of the engine, and it seemed as if the falling raindrops were transformed into millions of erratic coruscating stars.



The would-be assassin had been stunned by the shock, but it required great exertion on the part of Mulligan to loosen the long fingers from his swollen throat. The dirk had been wrenched from his hand at the moment of the collision, and the wounded man apprehended no further danger from that source.

The maniac swung hither and thither at his feet, his arm and legs being wedged between the bars, preventing his rolling off the slippery perch. He was completely at the mercy of the trackman, but dilating as they approached, until they seemed like two fine balls lighting up the gloom.

Then a hand clutched the trackman's foot, and the madman uttered a scream of triumph and pulled furiously to dislodge his companion, who clung to the framework with the strength of desperation.

THE HONOR OF THE FLAG, AN INCIDENT OF THE LATE NAVAL BATTLE BETWEEN THE AUSTRIANS AND ITALIANS.

THE PYRADAMITE CREATION.

Mulligan could not find it in his heart to act upon the evil suggestion to revenge himself by the death of the unconscious maniac.

They were under the flaming light, and in darkness. The rain dashed down in sheets; the fierce wind shrieked hoarsely around them, and, piercing their saturated clothing, chilled them to their very vitals. With great difficulty the trackman released his clothing from the hook, and laboriously dragged his sinking body up to the platform at the top of the inclined bars. Hanging by his uninjured hand to the slippery framework, sometimes nearly jerked from his position by the sidelong motion of the engine, and again thrown upon his wounded side with a force that made him scream for very agony.

The cold rain, beating down upon the maniac, soon restored him, and with the return to consciousness he renewed his efforts to dispatch his sorely wounded opponent.

Apparently he had not been seriously injured, and all his strength seemed to return with his senses. He climbed up the slippery framework toward Mulligan, who by this time was almost helpless. The eyes of the madman gleamed like diamond points through the darkness, and he screamed with horrid glee as he carefully made his way toward the wounded man.

His face drew near; Mulligan knew it by the approach of the sparkling eyes. With one hand he clutched the bars, and with the other reached forward to seize his victim.

The trackman's legs were uninjured and at liberty, and as he was compelled to hold on with his one whole hand, they constituted his only weapons of defense.

Nearer and nearer came the two diamond points, sparkling and disappearing, now here, now there, as the maniac swayed to and fro with the engine, upon the trestle-work of bridges, between whose massive timbers the wind hoarsely shrieked; upon the dark recesses and arched avenues of verdant foliage, as the train sped along through tracts of wood, the tall tree trunks and the spectre-like telegraph poles shooting up out of the yellow glare into the seemingly solid darkness, like crystal-studded columns supporting an ebony arch.

All these appeared in succession to Mulligan, who, in a short time, was perfectly helpless, unable even to unclasp the bloodless fingers, which, gripped with the strength of despair around the iron ring, were set, stiffened, almost frozen to the cold circle.

He swayed hither and thither with the oscillations of the engine, each rude jostle opening afresh his many wounds.

The rain slackened, but the wind increased, and it seemed at times that he must be blown from his position.

His mind became confused, and in the dazzling light in front, fiends and imps frisked and tumbled, and turned their hideous faces up at him, and pointed long, skinny fingers at his shivering form, laughing with horrid glee at his misery. Then they changed to white-robed angels, who looked pityingly upon him, but shook their heads, helpless to aid.

These passed away with the gloom, and he fought again the fearful contest with his maniac adversary. The wild laugh again sounded in his ears, the ghastly, sunken features were pressed close to his own, and he heard the sharp hissing, "I have got you at last!"

Then the maniac was multiplied into a thousand madmen, who crowded around him, thrusting their nervous fingers into his, and striving to tear off his desperate clutch upon the ring; then they plunged their white fingers into his ragged wounds, and held up before his eyes the thin joints dripping with his blood.

Then the shrieking maniacs were transformed into his wife and children, who floated above, in front and on either side, in the bright light, weeping and wringing their hands, and pointing to the line which separated the darkness from the light, and muttered words which he could not hear, but knew to be words of sorrow at their inability to succor him.

The maniac laughed wildly, and gibbered to himself as he strove. He worked his way up still higher, and redoubled his exertions, shouting, in the intervals of his unmeasuring language:

"I have got you at last!"

They were his last words. He had almost torn off the wounded man's grip, and in a moment more both would have rolled under the train. Mulligan collected his waning strength, drew back his fore, and dealt his assailant a powerful blow in the face with his heavy boot, which hurled him from his perch, and as he rolled under the wheels his dying scream rose thrillingly over the combined uproar of the howling wind, the splashing of the rain, and the rattle and crash of the flying train.

Mulligan was almost exhausted, but the chilling rain contributed, with the piercing wind, to keep alive his wandering senses and what little vitality yet remained. He managed to lie down on his unwounded side, and secured what to him was a tolerable degree of ease.

Here and there along the line dim lights gleamed for a moment, speaking of cheerful hearths and comfort, then shot by and were gone. At regular intervals the trackmen's signals shone upon him, but none appeared to notice the reclining form leading on the long train; and it sped on, none but God and himself aware of his perilous position.

The wind rose higher, and the rain beat still more mercilessly upon him. Other lights passed, the train dashed through a small station, then on into the night, the glaring eye casting its strong light upon the long lines of rail which sprang out of the darkness; upon the sides of rock-cuttings, where the great boulders threatened to precipitate themselves upon the flying carriages; down into the abysses, where the topmost branch of the tallest tree scarce reached the level of the rails; which the fierce whistle of the engine as they approached a crossing would arouse him to a dim consciousness of his peril.

Mile after mile was devoured by the insatiate glare, and the train was approaching a small station more than half way to the one at which it was to stop. In his lucid moments he prayed, with a fervor never known before, that he might hold out until the station should be reached, and have strength to make his peril known.

His limbs were benumbed, his eyes barely opened, and his stiffened fingers retained their hold only by reason of being bent and cramped around the ring until they might have been but a part of the engine itself.

The gash in his shoulder bled profusely, ana the shattered bones of his mutilated arm and side grated their jagged ends together, sending thrills of intense, sickening pain along his shrinking nerves, and he screamed under the goading agony. Then unconsciousness, the frightful vicissitudes, and a temporary release from physical suffering.

The train dashed around a sudden curve, and its long length swept by the station. The agent stood on the platform, and as he held up his lantern, the light fell full upon the wounded man. He obtained but a momentary glimpse—but it was enough to arouse him to instant action.

Before he could procure a red light, the train was out of sight around a curve. He sprang into the operator's room, and shook that official roughly out of his slumbers, but it required some little time to comprehend the agent's somewhat incoherent story. When he did comprehend it, he immediately forwarded to the next station a briefly worded telegram:

"A man on the cow-catcher—stop the train!"

The engine-driver and stoker sat in their little house and smoked their pipes, whiling away the time, never dreaming of their imperiled passenger. Just before arriving at the station to which the telegram had been sent, one of them looked out and saw the red light close at hand.

"Down brakes!" shrieked the whistle; and the train stopped.

The agent handed the brief dispatch to the engine-driver, and hastened to the front of the engine; but although blood was splashed upon

A DESPERATE ALTERNATIVE.

The scene changed. He was seated in his cabin, looking out of a window at the raindrops dashing upon the rusty track. A train rushed by, and he saw himself wounded, helpless, dying, strapped down to the gridiron framework in front of the engine—himself the Mazeppa of this tragedy. He ran out to stop the train, but his signal was wrested from his trembling hands, and the madmen seized him and hurled him after the receding train. He rose high in air, up till the earth looked small and round as an apple in the distance; then down, down, falling, flying through space into a chasm, upon the bottom of which rows of long spikes stood up to impale him; and he shrieked again as the cold, rusty iron plunged into his quivering flesh.

Then he recovered a moment, and his eyes wandered feverishly around until he relapsed into semi-insensibility and then the weird, supernatural visions of his half-crazed brain, from which he could not awake.

the frame-work until its own red color was obscured by the deeper dye, no man was to be seen. A party was immediately forwarded, which followed the line back several miles, and found the apparently lifeless body of the track-tender in a bit of swampy ground along which the track ran.

He was carried to the station, medical aid was summoned, his gaping wounds were bound up, and the fractured bones set.

Under the attentive nursing of his wife he was eventually restored to something like his former vigor, but he never entirely recovered from the nervous prostration induced by his fearful ride.

The whole of the maniac's body was never found; but portions of it, strewn along the line for a long distance, were collected and given burial by the authorities.

A PHILADELPHIA ALDERMAN.

THERE is in the City of Brotherly Love a kind-hearted alderman, known to everybody for his geniality. Business with the alderman one day was dull. A rainy day tells as emptily to the exchequer of an alderman as it does to the keeper of a bonnet-shop. About four o'clock in the afternoon a couple bent upon connubialism entered the office and stated their desire. The alderman invited them to stand up, and, with a face whose gravity of expression would have reflected credit upon a bishop, began to deliver to them an address upon the general subject of matrimony. A number of people had dropped in about this time, and got the full benefit of it. They occasionally snorted out into a laugh.

The alderman was as immovable as Gibraltar. He began his discourse by a description of paradise, and conclusively showed that, if Eve hadn't strayed away from Adam into a distant part of the garden, he (the alderman), as well as all other people, would never have suffered from illicit pippins. The worthy alderman made a running survey upon the prominent married ladies named in the Scriptures, touched lightly upon the mother of the Grachi, Lady Blessington and Mrs. Stowe, and then switched off the track to the ladies of Africa who entertained Mungo Park, and the Esquimaux women who wean their infant progeny upon blubber tea.

He had spoken about twenty minutes, when the bridegroom, who was a German, interrupted.

"Dat ish fine, said he, pulling out a very greasy greenback of the denomination of five dollars, and handing it to the alderman; "but here ish all de money vot I pays. I tell you dish now."

The alderman crumpled the note in his pocket. The groom was apprehensive that for such an address a sum might be asked that would "size his pile." Some of the auditors stepped outside to laugh, the alderman's face was as immobile as the pippin upon which he had been descanting.

"After what you have heard," asked the alderman, solemnly, "are you willing to proceed?"

"Yes, yes; you shust hurry up," said the impatient groom.

"No levity, my friend," said the alderman; "this is a very solemn occasion. This is a civil contract, never to be abrogated or——"

The bride here interrupted, and rather loudly whispered to her swain that the quicker they got out the better. The groom evidently assented, for, just as the worthy alderman was about to continue his lecture, the stolid groom interposed with a remark that he wanted one of two things: either to be married within the next two minutes or a return of the wedding fee.

The day had been too dull for the return of any money whatever. The worthy alderman brought the ceremony to a close, adding:

"I therefore pronounce you man and wife, and may God have mercy on your souls!"

We came very near having two items on that occasion at the same time. A worthy citizen present, in order to muffle his laughter, stuffed his pocket-handkerchief in his mouth. While the alderman was pronouncing the benediction as above, he narrowly escaped swallowing it. The newly-married couple departed highly pleased. As the groom went out, he said in an under-tone to the blushing bride:

"Katrina, dat was a good speech; it was worth more as ten dollars."

HOW TO FRIGHTEN A LION.

I WAS out once lion-shooting in Kattiawar. In some parts of the district where it is tolerably open the sportsmen used to follow the game on horseback, ride up within range, and then dismount to get a shot, unless their beasts were steady enough to stand fire from their backs. After the shot they quickly remounted and galloped off; in fact, something in the manner that the African way of conducting the sport is described. On one occasion my friend had turned up a couple of full-grown lions, and was following them on the plain. He managed to get within range, and, as his horse would not stand quiet enough for him to fire from its back, jumped off, and threw the bridle over his arm; by some chance, however, omitting to slip his hand through it. Well, he got a fair shot, and hit one of the lions hard; but the noise startled the horse, and, as there was nothing to check it, away it galloped, leaving my friend standing. He fired his second barrel, and then had the horror of seeing the wounded lion come charging down toward him, all head, tail and legs, and roaring tremendously. His rifle was empty and useless, and, of course, there was no time to load.

His first impulse was naturally to bolt as hard as he could, and, accordingly, away he stumped for the nearest tree; but, before he could reach it, the roars came closer and closer behind him, and he felt that he had not the slightest chance of reaching the tree before being overtaken by the angry brute. Still he sped on with the instinct of self-preservation, but the lion was fast closing with him. What could he do? There was no time to be lost. In a few more bounds his head might be crushed in by the blow of a paw, or his mangled limbs be quivering in the animal's relentless jaws. It suddenly occurred to him to try and startle the beast by some unusual combination of form and sounds. His resolve was immediately taken and acted upon without delay. Stopping short suddenly in his race, with his back still toward the charging lion, now drawing very close, he ducked his head and body till he looked at it reversedly from between his legs, and in that position made some of the most hideous faces and gave utterance to some of his most appalling yells, and, at the same time, gesticulated wildly with his arms. This was a metamorphosis for which the savage beast was quite unprepared. Just before there had been a runaway man, legging it as hard as he could go in front, but now there was a fearful, shapeless creature, stationary and unyielding, and howling in the most awful way, quite beyond all lion experience. The brute was staggered, and hesitated in his headlong career; then pulled and looked; advanced a step and looked more closely; heard a frantic yell of extra power, the last despairing effort of the hunter; turned, and, with lowered tail, trotted off to join his companion, now disappearing in the distance. After a short space my friend arose, almost purple in the face from the violence of his exertions and the unpleasantly low position of his head, but much gratified, and chuckling greatly at the success of his ingenious ruse.

"Now, children," said a school inspector, "who loves all men?"

A little girl, not four years old, and evidently not posted in the catechism, answered quickly—"All women."

A CAR-OL.

SOMEBODY advocating "elevated tracks" has written a ditty to be sung in all the cars. The following stanzas are of such general application, that they will do for a concert to relieve the distress of other parties than travelers on the avenues of Gotham. The musical explosion should have directors to listen to—not to conduct it:

Packed like mackerel in kegs,
Cramped in body, arms and legs,
Treated like creation's dregs,
Through the streets we rumble.
Car conductors, with a push,
Man and maid together crush;
Hoops give way, and women blush,
Pickpockets assist the rush,
And fleece us in the jumble.

Fifty bipeds to a car!
Ranged like prisoners of war,
Or as the slaves in Cuba are,
Waiting for their buyers.
Up and down each eve and morn,
Are our "merchant princes" borne
O'er the tramways racked and torn,
In Greed's vehicles forlorn,
Foul as "Black Marias."

Faugh! how vile the inside smells
Of these body-crowded hells,
Airless as a dungeon's cells,
Dirty—past abiding.
When the cholera shall swoop
On our shores from Guadaloupe,
Won't the Demon raise a whoop,
And dash it among each group,
In our street cars riding.

"Rules" to passengers addressed,
With great suavity request,
They won't jump—but keep at rest—
When the van's in motion.
What do "cards" like these avail?
Stops the turnkey of the rail
At your call, his moving jail?
Does he heed your earnest hail?
Rarely, I've a notion.

A MERITED PUNISHMENT.

THE following incident recently occurred in Madison, Wisconsin, and illustrates the folly of a custom by far too common:

Some time since a Chicago individual who signed his name Frank L. Erskine, advertised for female correspondents. "Object, fun, friendship, or matrimony." A young gentleman of this city, who has considerable wit and leisure, answered the advertisement in the name of a myth which he named Olive Spencer. The advertiser took the bait, and the correspondence went along briskly—proceeding from friendly to amatory with astonishing rapidity. It at length got so far that he invited her (or him, we will say her so as to be understood) to visit Chicago, promising to "show her around." Coy but anxious was the tone of the response, suggesting an ugly but wealthy father, and a big brother, who kept watch of her movements, and would prevent her from going if possible, and would not let her have money. He offered to pay her expenses, or send on a railroad pass, and finally offered to come and take her to Chicago. To this she consented, and Wednesday was the day fixed for Erskine to be here on that errand. Telegrams and love notes followed each other in great rapidity, but delay interposed, and Erskine reached here on the afternoon train yesterday.

Sly notes passed between them in the afternoon, after his arrival, and an assignation was arranged, to take place on the bank of Third Lake. About nine o'clock, Erskine softly and nervously left the hotel, and at the trysting place met something in woman's clothes, the dim moonlight aiding the disguise. All the boys had been notified of the affair, and the first meeting was noticed by hundreds. They moved off, and were engaged in amorous dalliance, when an improvised police officer (a law student) interrupted their sweet responses by a mock arrest for an attempted abduction of the girl. (?)

The trembling culprit was escorted to the Court-House, which had been mysteriously lit up for the occasion and which was soon thronged with hundreds of fun-loving spectators. A double-headed court was speedily organized, consisting of a "star" printer and a rural gentleman. Counsel were assigned for the prosecution and defense, and the mock trial proceeded. The innocent advertiser for female correspondents never doubted the perfect good faith of the whole proceedings. His letters were read with running comments; the lawyers wrangled; the fun cannot be described—the jokes, repartees, grave nonsense and ludicrous solemnities of the scene. The audience was very demonstrative, convulsed with laughter at the running fire of jokes, applauded vociferously the affected zeal of the advocates and enjoyed it as they only could the most roaring farce. It cannot be reported nor described.

Finally the court and the crowd concluded to have the culprit's own statement. He told how he advertised, how the correspondence commenced, how innocent were his designs, how good his character and high his standing in Chicago. It was rich—too rich. Language cannot do justice to the subject. In his confession, he stated he was reporter for the Chicago Tribune, and editor of a monthly commercial journal. It also appeared that Erskine was not his true name, which was given, but we mercifully suppress it. After being badgered till the sweat poured from his pores, he was finally acquitted, with the warning not to do so again. He asked the privilege of addressing the crowd, which he did in oratorical style, and thanking the jury for their kindness. The victim never saw the joke, which is the most wonderful instance of human credulity on record.

This may seem to some like rough fun, and fun of a kind in which full matured men ought not to be engaged. But it was a lesson needed for one of the most prurient vices of the age. Advertising for female correspondents has been prolific of more immorality and unhappiness than almost all other causes combined. This man pursued it as a system, by his own confession. He supposed his correspondent here to be a young, romantic and innocent, but restless girl, unsatisfied at home, and fond of adventure. He came here proposing to take such a character to Chicago, to there introduce her, undoubtedly, to a career of profligacy and vice. He was well punished, for the law cannot reach this class of scoundrels. He left on the morning train, "a wiser and a sadder man."

BOHEMIA, the Austrian province conquered by the Prussian victories, has a population of 5,000,000, one-third of whom are Germans, and two-thirds Sclavonians of the Czechian race. The latter have recently distinguished themselves by vindicating the principle of national government even more eagerly than any of the other agitated and troublesome tribes of the empire. Though all their culture has been derived from Germany, and as late as thirty years ago there existed no Czechian literature to speak of, they have lately abolished all German schools in the country, and, with the reluctant consent of the Emperor, forced even the German section of their compatriots to give their children a Czechian education. Of late they have insisted upon the establishment of a purely Czechian Government, which shall be conducted by officials of their own race, and connected with the central authorities at Vienna with but slender ties. This demand being denied, their opposition assumed a more and more violent character, but little allayed by the present war.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

CIRCUMSTANCES alter cases. Red paint, which is a great improvement on the looks of old houses, is but an injury to the cheeks of young ladies.

"YOU have only yourself to please," said a married man to an old bachelor.

"True," replied he, "but you cannot tell what a difficult task I find it."

IF you wish to cure a scolding wife, never fail to laugh at her with all your might until she ceases—then kiss her. Sure cure, and no quack medicine.

A PERT little girl boasted to one of her little friends that "her father kept a carriage."

"Ah, but," was the triumphant reply, "my father drives an omnibus."

A FACETIOUS tradesman in New York, after having repeatedly announced that he was selling off, has now placarded his house with bills stating that he is selling on!

"NOW, PAPA, tell me what is humbug."

"It is," replied papa, "when mamma pretends to be very fond of me, and puts no buttons on my shirt till reminded of it a dozen times."

ENAMORED Writing-Master to a Young Lady Pupil: "I can teach you nothing; your hand is already a very desirable one, and your I's (eyes) are the most beautiful I ever saw."

AN afflicted husband was returning from the funeral of his wife, when a friend asked him how he was.

"Well," said he, pathetically, "I think I feel the better for that little walk."

SOME men are like cats. You may stroke the fur the right way for years, and hear nothing but purring; but accidentally tread on the tail, and all memory of former kindness is obliterated.

LOVE is as necessary to a woman's heart as a fashionable bonnet to her head. Indeed, we think, rather more so; for nothing less than a large measure will content her; whereas the recent fashion has shown that she can be satisfied with a very little bonnet.

CONVERSATION IN THE BACKWOODS.—"Whose map do you use?"

"Mogg's."

"What is the land?"

"Bogs."

"The atmosphere?"

"Fogs."

"What do you live on?"

"Hogs."

"What is the house built of?"

"Logs."

"Any fish in the ponds?"

"Frogs."

MISERIES.—Writing an appointment to a lady and a disappointment to a tailor, and cross-directing them. Paying your rent punctually on quarter-day to your landlord, and being distrained on the next day by his landlord. Abusing a person whom you have never seen to a stranger, who quietly observes that he is the man.

A SCOTCHMAN asked an Irishman "Why were half-farthings coined in England?"

Pat's answer was: "To give Scotchmen an opportunity of subscribing to charitable institutions."

A MERCHANT being asked to define the meaning of experimental and natural philosophy, said he considered the first to be asking a man to discount a bill at a long date, and the second his refusing to do it.

What business ought Tom Thumb to go into? Grocer (grow sir).

When does a man sit down to a melancholy dessert? When he sits down to wine and pine.

ONE ought to have dates at one's fingers' ends, seeing they grow upon the palm.

"Is your horse gentle, Mr. Dabster?"

"Perfectly gentle, sir; the only fault he has got—if that be a fault—is a playful habit of extending his hinder hoofs now and then."

"By extending his hinder hoofs?—you don't mean kicking, I hope?"

"Some people call it kicking, Mr. Green; but it's only a slight reaction of the muscles—a disease rather than a vice."

"PA, can a person catch any thing if he don't run after it?"

"Certainly not."

"Well, then, how did you catch the cold you've got?"

"COME down this instant," said the boatswain to a mischievous son of Erin; "come down, I say, and I'll give you a dozen, you rascal."

"Troth, sir, an' I won't come down if you'd give me two dozen."

"MY friend," said a doctor to an Irish patient, "be composed; we must all die once."

"An' it's that vexes me," replied Pat; "if it wor mor than onc't, I'd be aisy in my mind."

A GENTLEMAN about to die, called his faithful servant, Sambo, to his bedside, and sighed out:

"Ah, I'm going a long journey!"

"Never mind, massa; him all the way down hill, an' you soon reach the end," replied Sambo, endeavoring to console him.

THE ART OF DUNNING.—The art of dunning is not reckoned among the fine or polite arts. Indeed there are no rules on the subject, as each cause may be tried by itself, the success of various expedients being very much "as you light upon chaps." At times a lucky accident brings the money out of a slow debtor, after the manner following:

One of our merchants, nervous and irritable, received a letter from a customer in the country, begging for more time. Turning to one of his counting clerks, he said:

"Write this man at once."

"Yes, sir. What shall I say?"

The merchant was pacing the office, and repeated the order:

"Write him at once."

"Certainly, sir. What do you wish me to say?"

The merchant was impatient, and broke out:

"Something or nothing, and that very quick."

The clerk waited for no further orders, but consulting his own judgment, wrote and dispatched the letter. By the return of mail came a letter from the delinquent customer enclosing the money in full of the account. The merchant's eyes glistened when he opened it; and hastening to the desk, he said to the clerk:

"What sort of a letter did you write to this man? Here is the money in full."

"I wrote just what you told me to, sir. The letter is copied in the letter-book."

The letter-book was consulted, and there stood, short and sweet, and right to the point:

"Dear Sir—Something or nothing; and that very quick. Yours, &c.,

"———."

And this letter brought the money when a more elaborate dun would have failed of the happy effect.

FRANK LESLIE'S CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

THE September number of this popular and interesting publication has appeared, and as usual, is full of just such things as delight and instruct the little folks. The Children's Friend has struck that happy medium where it is neither above nor below the comprehension of the class of readers for whom it was intended, a desideratum not often reached. Hereafter the Children's Friend will appear weekly, instead of monthly, under the title of the Boy's and Girl's Illustrated Weekly, with some new features, so that, while retaining the general tone and character of the present form, it will be rendered additionally attractive and valuable. The signal popularity of the Children's Friend is the best evidence of the need of such a periodical, and we congratulate its patrons on the treat they will enjoy when it comes to them in its new form, and with its weekly installment of good things.

DISTRIBUTION OF PREMIUMS.—Our readers will permit us to draw their attention to the advertisement of the Opening Fair and Distribution of Premiums, to commence in this city, 24th September next, under the management of J. R. Hawley & Co., old and popular Cincinnati merchants, who have too much reputation at stake, to say nothing of the deserved character of the project, to let it be any other than a straightforward, upright and business-like transaction. Those who patronize this Distribution of Premiums may rely upon being fairly dealt with. The advertisement explains the matter in detail.—Cincinnati Weekly Times.

THE New York Piano Forte Company has become justly famous for the tone, brilliancy, and enduring qualities of their instruments, both square and grand. Nor is this to be wondered at, since the conductors are some of the most eminent mechanics in the profession. They have, consequently, introduced every new improvement in the manufacture of these indispensable household companions, so that their pianos are now among the best manufactured in this country.

MR. VICK, the famous Florist of Rochester, has sent us his Illustrated Annual Catalogue of Flower and Vegetable Seeds and Guide to the Flower Garden, for 1867. As it contains accurate description of the leading floral treasures of the world, with full directions for sowing seed, transplanting and after culture, it is a most useful little manual.

FRANK LESLIE'S BOYS' & GIRLS' ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY, AND CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

On and after October 6th FRANK LESLIE'S CHILDREN'S FRIEND will be published weekly, in the form of a handsome paper of eight pages, of three columns each, under the title of BOYS' AND GIRLS' ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY. The ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY will take a wider range than THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND, and will be more adapted to the tastes and capacities of boys and girls than that publication; but it will nevertheless retain, as an important feature, a page for children of tender years, so that it will be a welcome visitor in every family, having something of interest for all its members. It will preserve the same pure and healthful tone that has characterized THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND, and given it signal popularity. It will contain stories, travels, adventures, sketches of natural history and scenery, illustrations of manners and customs of all nations, biography, anecdotes, sports for the parlor and the field, arithmetical and geographical exercises, poetry, and whatever else may serve to instruct and entertain the young. Every number will have five or more fine illustrations, besides comic and minor engravings.

TERMS:

The price will be three cents a number, or $1 50 a year.

Four numbers will form a monthly part of thirty-two pages, of three columns each, with twenty illustrations, in an elegant cover. This will be served to those who prefer to receive the periodical monthly. Price fifteen cents each part, or $1 50 a year.

Five copies sent to one address, for one year, for $7.

PRIZES:

Any one sending a list of four subscribers, and six dollars, will receive a copy of Volume I. of THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND, neatly bound.

Any boy or girl subscribing to THE BOYS' AND GIRLS' ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY, and sending us another subscriber, with the money for the two ($3), will be entitled to receive, gratis, either of the following large and magnificent engravings:
GENERAL GRANT IN PEACE, an excellent portrait.
HIS LAST PAIR, a pleasing family picture.

The Commercial Agency,

97 Park Row & 143 Nassau St.,

McKillop, Sprague & Co.,

Have established has now been in active operation for nearly twenty-five years. It has its Associate Offices or Agencies in every City and Town in the United States and the British Provinces, as well as in the chief cities of the Old World, and has a very large and growing patronage from Bankers and Merchants.

The reputation of the Agency for care and reliability has become firmly established; and the best evidence which can be given of its value to commercial men is found in their continued and increasing support.

From the records is furnished a detailed statement of the condition of every merchant, with his antecedents and business history. By the aid contained in the books as to the extent to which credit may be safely granted. In connection with the

is published annually, which has become the Standard Reference Book for purposes of credit. It contains a classified list of merchants and traders throughout the country, with numerals after each name, giving the relative commercial standing of each. This work is one of immense magnitude—the last issue containing over 200,000 names—and is the result of a great amount of labor.

The publishers have spared neither labor or expense, and have consequently produced a work of necessary fullness and accuracy. The following are some of the

Opinions of the Press :

[From the Daily Tribune, New York.]

THE Commercial Agency Register for 1866, by McKillop & Sprague, has made its appearance, as usual, at the commencement of the year. It is a work of immense labor in the collection of its facts, and contains more than two hundred pages, double columns, so that the number of firms named must have exceeded two hundred thousand. According to the index, there are over ten thousand cities, towns and villages named in it. These figures show that the compiling alone of such a work involves much labor. It is the fact that the book is such a rapid sale shows that not only has there been great labor, but great care, given to the compiling, and that confidence is felt in its general accuracy.

[From the Evening Post, New York.]

"The Commercial Agency Register for 1866," published by McKillop & Sprague, of this city, is an entirely new work, each name having been compiled afresh. The catalogue contains two hundred and fifty thousand names of bankers, manufacturers, manufacturers, &c., and the heavy labor of compilation and verification has been performed with care and accuracy, making the book a valuable reference for business men. Among the entries we find that Shakspeare published a newspaper at Eldorado, John Wesley selling flour in Philadelphia, Henry Ward Wu retailing stationery, and Daniel Webster keeping a liquor shop.

[From the Times, New York.]

McKILLOP & SPRAGUE'S COMMERCIAL AGENCY REGISTER.—McKillop & Sprague's Commercial Agency Register for 1866 has made its appearance, and in point of completeness and accuracy it surpasses any previous edition. It is, substantially, a classified index to the records kept at the office of the publishers, and its completeness, as well as the labor involved in its preparation, is best indicated by the fact that it reports the standing of over two hundred thousand firms, distributed through ten thousand cities, towns and villages. This edition is nearly twice as large as the last, which is satisfactory proof that merchants generally are learning to appreciate the necessity of such an index to the standing and responsibility of those who may become their customers.

THE TRIUMPH OF WIT AND HUMOR.

JUST PUBLISHED, FRANK LESLIE'S BUDGET OF FUN, for October, containing his at everybody, and illustrative of the age. The large cartoons are admirable, being the Earth and Moon on a slight spree to celebrate the Cable—the Needle Gun and the Sewing Machine—also the adventures of Mr. Tuffin at Long Branch. Among the contents is the resignation of the proprietor of the Herald sparking an "indiscreet subordinate," alias Booby, &c. There is likewise a splendid illustration of how a modest young man was shocked at the revelation of a Tilting Hoop; besides numerous other humorous engravings by the first artists of the age, Newman, Fiske, Stephens, Mullen, Howard, Rosenberg, Davenport, Cresson, &c. The literary contents are equally striking. Among other novelties in the present number is the Life and Adventures of a Manager, in which the New York Managers are sketched to life; also several exciting Romances, Stories, Bon Mots, Sarcasms, and Marvelous Adventures. For Sale by all Newsdealers.

FELLOW'S ORIGINAL

WORM LOZENGES.

We can with confidence point to FELLOW'S WORM LOZENGES as the most perfect remedy for those troublesome pests, Intestinal Worms.

After years of careful experiment, success has crowned our efforts, and we now offer to the world a confection without a single fault, being safe, convenient, effectual and pleasant. No injurious result can occur, let them be used in whatever quantity. Not a particle of calomel, mercury or Wormwood will be got out of them for future reptiles. At any time. Children will eagerly devour all you give them, and ask for more. They never fail in expelling Worms from their dwelling-place, and they will always strengthen the weak and emaciated, even when he is not afflicted with worms.

Price 25 cents per box; five for $1. A liberal discount to the trade.

In New Brunswick (British Provinces), where these Lozenges were first introduced, and their great value is well known, a counterfeit has been made, but not one hundred grees a year used. Hereafter they will be manufactured at the New England Botanic Depot, Boston, Mass., under the superintendence of the Proprietor, 566-7ii GEO. W. SWETT, M.D.

The Tucker Manufacturing Company invite attention to their IRON BEDSTEADS, CHILD'S BEDS, CRIBS AND SWING CRADLES, of new and elegant designs, beautifully finished in Bronze and Bronze and Gold. These goods are made with great care, and are confidently superior to anything produced in the French or English markets.

They also call attention to their

which is unsurpassed for elasticity, simplicity, durability and cheapness. Introduced ten years ago, it has steadily increased in favor, and to-day stands unrivaled, costing less than any Pallisse, or under-bed known. It possesses all the qualities of the most luxurious Spring Bed, and in durability it has no equal.

READ THE CERTIFICATES:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, June, 27, 1866.

Whereas, H. A. Hall and others as "managing directors" of the "Grand National Concert" to be held in Washington, D. C., on the 2d of August next, have made due application to L. Clephane, Collector of Internal Revenue for the collection district of the District of Columbia, for permission to hold a lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise, and presented to him satisfactory evidence that the proceeds of said lottery, raffle or gift enterprise will be devoted to charitable uses, permission is hereby granted to such "managing directors" to hold such lottery, raffle or gift enterprise free from all charge, whether from tax or license, in respect to such lottery, raffle or gift enterprise.

E. A. ROLLINS, Commissioner.

BANKING HOUSE OF DUNCAN, NAVARO & CO.,
No. 5 Bowling Green,
NEW YORK, August 27, 1866.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

The managers of the "Grand National Concert," to be held at Washington, D. C., on the 11th October, 1866, for the benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home having satisfactorily convinced us that said enterprise is of an honorable, charitable and patriotic character, and having requested us to act as their Bankers in this city, we shall hold in our hands the proceeds of sale of all tickets sold in this city and Brooklyn, until after the drawing, as a guarantee that a drawing and distribution of the prizes will actually take place.

(Signed) DUNCAN NAVARO & CO., Bankers.

300,000 tickets will be sold at $1 each—75,000 presents awarded, valued at $250,000! $25,000 of the profits to be given to the Soldiers' and Sailors' National Orphan Home Fund. $2,500 to the Washington Male and Female Orphan Asylum, the balance, after deducting expenses, to be paid to the Treasurer of the Sailors' and Soldiers' Union of Washington, D. C.

Parties having tickets will retain them until after the awards are made, and if their number appears in the list, they will forward their tickets immediately, with full directions as to the shipping of goods or deeds for the property. Tickets for sale at all the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the city, and at the Headquarters in the Mammoth Fair Building for the Benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' National Orphan Home Fund, corner of Seventh street and Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, D. C.

The Directors appeal to the liberality of the people to give this enterprise their kind support, and thereby assist in relieving the wants of the orphans of our fallen comrades.

CARD.—A large number of tickets remaining unsold, it will be necessary to postpone the drawing until Thursday, the 11th of October, 1866, at which time it will positively occur.

The many swindling schemes that have been presented to the public during the past few months, somewhat delayed our sale, until we were able to satisfy the people throughout the country that this enterprise was genuine and solely for charitable purposes. The Directors are confident of the sale of every ticket, and have allotted sufficient time to guarantee the sale without any further postponement.

MANAGING DIRECTORS:

Major H. A. HALL, President Soldiers' and Sailors' Union; Colonel CHAS. E. CAPEHART, Major M. A. ALBERGER, WILLIAM S. MORSE.

Money should in all cases be sent by Post Office Order, Draft, Express, or Registered Letters.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

Capital Prize, $30,000!

WE HAVE THE PLEASURE TO ANNOUNCE TO THE CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES THAT

THE NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT

WILL POSITIVELY TAKE PLACE AT THE

Wabash Avenue Rink, Chicago, Ill.,

FRIDAY, SEPT. 28, 1866,

OR MONEY REFUNDED, ON WHICH TIME

Half a Million Dollars in Prizes, including $100,000 in Greenbacks, will be Presented to Ticket-Holders.

SPECIAL CARD.—We take pleasure in announcing that we have met with unparalleled success, in spite of the many swindling schemes that have been presented to the people by irresponsible parties. This last consideration has, however, operated to delay our sales and prevent our agents from properly reporting, until we were fully able to satisfy them that our enterprise is what it has been represented to be. In consequence, we are compelled to extend the time of drawing until the 28th of September, at which time the Illinois State Fair will be held, when it will positively occur.

Arrangements are now being made for the drawing. The checks, 500,000 in number, are nearly ready. The plan of drawing adopted is the following: Duplicate numbers from 1 to 500,000 are placed in a wheel; the first number drawn out takes the highest prize, the next the second highest prize, and so on until the whole 250,000 prizes are drawn; the whole drawing to be superintended by a committee appointed by the audience. The Wabash Avenue Rink has been engaged, as will be seen by the following:

CHICAGO, August 21, 1866.

This is to certify that Messrs. A. Kelley & Co. have this day leased the Wabash Avenue Rink for the evening of the 28th day of September, and paid for the same the sum of three hundred dollars ($300).

J. H. JOHNSON & CO.,
Lessees of the Rink.

We advise all parties wanting tickets to send for them at once, as the books will be closed on Friday evening, September 28, and the drawing will then commence. All orders for tickets will be promptly filled.

NO. OF TICKETS ISSUED, 500,000. PRICE $1 00.

THIS IS THE GREATEST INDUCEMENT EVER OFFERED TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

From the Chicago Journal:

KELLEY & CO.'S GIFT ENTERPRISE.—The first to embark in the gift enterprise business in Chicago was the firm of A. A. Kelley & Co., located at No. 105 Randolph street. Who does not remember their store? which opened two or three years ago, where many purchased books and other articles, and were so lucky as to find with their purchases tickets which entitled them to valuable gifts of jewelry and other prizes. Thousands of our citizens were thus fortunate, and these have the best evidences that Messrs. Kelley & Co., always perform all they promise, that they are honorable men, and do business honorably and on the square. Their Gift Concert promises to be one of the most successful of the series of Gift Concerts that have taken place in Chicago.

1. The gifts to be distributed are all they are represented to be.
2. All the prizes will positively be distributed to those holding the lucky tickets after the drawing.
3. There is such a very large number of prizes, that every one's chances are decidedly in favor of drawing something.
4. The citizens of Chicago who know A. A. Kelley & Co., have confidence in their honor and integrity, and are largely investing in their enterprise.

These are some of the reasons why we feel safe in commending Kelley & Company's Gift Concert to the public. Let the people come up and buy the tickets still remaining unsold. The drawing will positively take place on the day advertised.

Money may be sent by mail for tickets, and will be promptly responded to.
